high. The Lord was with His servants, and magnified the Word of His grace. Night after night witnessed fresh victories for the Redeemer's cause. Among the rest our departed friend bent his knees in prayer, and from his smitten heart sued for mercy. Ere long light broke in upon his soul; his load of guilt was removed, and he arose from his knees a pardoned sinner.

For about seven months he held fast his integrity, and rejoiced as one having found a precious pearl; but the enemy let him have no rest,—he saw in the youthful disciple signs of future usefulness. Unhappily, after repeated attacks from the enemy, he yielded to the force of temptation, and was robbed of his peace. He records in his journal, "For two weeks I was a miserable backslider; the distress of mind I felt on this account I cannot describe." It pleased God, however, to pity his grief, and restore unto him the joys of His salvation. This restoration was effected through the instrumentality of Mr. William Taylor; and from that time he remained a consistent Christian and a devoted member of the Church of his choice.

In September, 1830, his name appeared on the plan in the Preston Brook Circuit as a local preacher. His public ministrations were creditable to himself and profitable to his hearers; but we do not wonder at this, for he had learned the true secret of pulpit power. In his closet he cultivated close communion with his God and an ardent attachment to His Word. 'Twas there, alone with his Bible and his God, that he received those rich baptisms of the Spirit which rendered his public efforts so useful. He prayed in secret, and was thus rewarded openly.

The March Quarterly Meeting of 1832 deemed him eligible to enter the regular ministry, and accordingly proposed him for the itinerancy. The importance of the work pressed heavily upon his spirit, and all who knew him well will believe his sincerity when he says, "It was with much fear and trembling that I entered upon the work." His first station was in his native circuit, whence he removed to Preston in Lancashire, where, as his journal records, he saw many souls brought to Christ. Even now, after the lapse of twenty years, there are some in that station who retain the most pleasing remembrances of him, and to them his name is as precious ointment poured forth. The Conference held at Sanderland in 1833 stationed him again for his home circuit, whence he was sent to the Irish Mission, that field of labour then being under the care of the Preston Brook Station. Here he was in labours more abundant, but the Almighty's hand sustained him, and made him a blessing.

Notwithstanding the many difficulties of the station, the rough roads, long journeys, numerous preaching engagements, street missioning, extensive family visiting, and after all, inferior accommodation, we find in him no yielding to the flesh, for on a careful examination of his journal, which contains a full account of his labours here, we find not a single word of complaint at having to sustain these adversities, or regret at having entered this distant station. His journal records as a matter of course, that he walked eight or ten Irish miles, visited twenty or thirty families per day, and preached ten or twelve times per week, mostly out of doors. And in the midst of all, an earnest longing for deeper fellowship with his God, and an intense desire for the salvation of souls, were the two sentiments that filled his mind. It would be gratifying to record many circumstances of interest which occurred here, but we forbear; suffice it to say, that he was exceedingly blessed himself, and made a blessing to many. The Lord was with him, and owned his labours in the salvation of many souls, and no marvel—for this he prayed, lived, and laboured; the promises of God's truth were grasped with firm, unyielding faith, and were abundantly fulfilled.

By the directions of the March Quarterly Meeting, he was again recalled to Preston Brook, and here again he is distinguished for the same consistent deportment, prayerful spirit, and burning zeal for the Lord of hosts, as have shone so brightly in his previous life. The old inhabitants of this station speak of his labours here with feelings of peculiar interest; his self-denial and devotedness as a young preacher were remarkable. We have been told, on good authority, that while he laboured in this circuit, he regularly devoted two or three days per week to fasting and prayer.

His missionary enterprise was great. From the time he commenced the preaching to the time of his death, he had great faith in open air services and well conducted family visiting; and this is not surprising, when he himself had witnessed the vast amount of good effected through these kinds of Christian effort. He was the first Primitive Methodist missionary who succeeded in raising a cause in the town of Runcorn. And this place alone is a standing memorial of his peculiar aptness for that sphere of labour, and the adaptedness of this nature of work to reach the masses of society; his labours here will never be forgotten, and eternity alone will reveal the full amount of good effected through his instrumentality. The writer has met with devoted individuals in different parts of the country who received their first good under his ministrations in Runcorn; thus the good seed he scattered there has been carried into different localities, and continues still to bear fruit to the honour and glory of God. It would seem that Runcorn was made the head of a mission, and connected with it were several other places, some adjacent, others distant, each of which held a place in his affections, and was the burden of his most earnest prayers.

After labouring here for a short time he reports, "The mission is in a healthy state, about fifty souls joined to our church." And in the coming day many who then joined other churches will ascribe their conversion to his agency. The March Quarterly Meeting of 1835, appointed him to labour on the Altrincham mission ; thence he removed to Stockport, where he laboured for a time, and was then stationed to Manchester, and in each place he saw the hand of God revealed in the conversion of many souls. After spending about six years in the mission work, he retired from the regular ministry, and came to reside at Halton, where for twenty-four years he has lived to witness a good confession. From the time he settled here to the time of his death he stood at the head of this small society, and filled the office of a local preacher in the circuit. As he was identified with the early struggles of this society in its organisation, he always felt a glowing interest in all things relating to its welfare. Consequently, while his death is lamented by the circuit as a whole, it is felt by this society in particular, for the relation he sustained to it partook more of the nature of the relation a father sustains to his family, than that of an official to a society. His prudence, piety, and good management of all things relating to the interests of Zion, were sufficient to gain for him the confidence of his brethren, and make them feel at ease in his appointment to any office.

He was no place-loving and fame-seeking votary, impatient when checked, and resentful when controlled, but in these things he obeyed the rule of his Lord, and took the lowest seat, and moved not until bidden to come up higher; and usually, before the invitation was accepted, he had to be pressed to ascend. This we ascribe in part to his native modesty ; but more particularly to his fine views of Christian humility, for while he exemplified all the virtues of the Christian character, the grace of humility shone in him with peculiar beauty. As a Christian he was exemplary. He was not a fiery meteor arresting the gaze of the passers by, and exciting astonishment, but a fixed star, shining with constant and steady brightness—we always knew in what point of the Christian hemisphere to find him. He was not a demonstrative man—being much opposed to parade and ostentation—but he was a living epistle, read and known of all men. His piety was deep, sound, and practical, a vital principle full of life and beauty, that had taken firmly hold of the entire man, and made its existence felt in his every day life.

Doctor Johnson says it is at home where every man is known the best, for smiles and embroidery are alike occasional, and often employed for selfish purposes ; but when a man enters his family circle, all semblances are thrown off, and he appears in his true character. If there is truth in the above remarks, it is gratifying to remember the Christian spirit ever manifested by Mr. Turner in all his family relations. At home with his family, as well as in the assembly of the saints, he was the same humble and devoted Christian. His piety, too, was of a decided character, not accommodating itself to the whims, wishes, and sinful tastes of degenerate man, but there was a completeness about it ; it was like a well fitting garb that clothed the entire man ; hence, while he desired most ardently to live at peace with all men, to accomplish it, he would never compromise his religious principle, and lower the standard of Christian character. On this point he was firm and unflinching, though he was well tried ; for the extensive business connexion he superintended, brought him regularly into contact with almost every shade of temper ; yet he was ever the same, not rising and falling with the tone of society, but in all circles showing what beauty there is in entirety of character. The provincial paper recording his death, speaks advisedly, when it says that as a tradesman, all who knew him admired the evenness of temper and Christian spirit he manifested in all his business transactions. The Rev. R. Hill, who knew him intimately for twenty years, says, " I never knew a man who acted more perfectly and constantly on the apostle's injunction. 'Not slothful in business, fervent in spirit, serving the Lord.' He loved his Saviour and he loved His cause, and deemed no sacrifice or labour too great to promote its interests, and nothing seemed to afford him so much pleasure as to witness the prosperity of Zion. He loved his wife and family, and manifested the ardour of his affection by toiling to promote their temporal comfort and spiritual welfare. As a friend I ever found him sincere, generous, and constant ; in short, I have always regarded him as one of the most excellent of the earth, and hope to meet him in heaven." Witnesses from opposing points have testified in his favour, and on the grounds of his Christian worth are finely agreed. The numerous testimonies furnished by disinterested parties on this point, are most uniform ; men who seem to have no religious concern, as well as devoted saints, aver that he has gone to heaven " If ever soul from earth ascended." His reverence for the Word of God, his devotion to the interests of Zion, and his love for the means of grace were sincere and abundant. He was no sectarian, his heart was too large and liberal to cherish those contracted views peculiar to sectarian bigotry. He could commune with all saints, yet he was a most devoted Primitive Methodist. He regarded its polity as being adapted to the liberal spirit of the age, its inner means as well calculated to promote the life of religion in the soul, and its doctrines as irrefragable, because founded upon eternal truth ; hence he supported its government, attended its means, and faithfully preached every article of its creed. As a preacher he was very acceptable. His pulpit talents were about mediocrity, and these sanctified by Divine grace, and well trained by a systematic course of preparation for his public efforts, rendered him an efficient and respectable preacher. He was, as far as his time would allow, a diligent student, not spending his spare moments in idle gossip, but storing his mind with useful material, that would serve him when called upon to minister the word of life. And not to do this when time and opportunity were afforded, he regarded in any one as unwarrantable presumption, and inexcusable slothfulness. The rule upon which he seemed to act, was that laid down by a worthy minister of Christ, "When you enter your study make such preparation for the pulpit as though you were going to depend entirely on your own unaided power, and when you enter the pulpit, depend as entirely on the Spirit's aid, as if you had made no preparation at all."

His arrangements for the pulpit were neat and orderly; and his sermons well digested, sound and practical. He was not a son of thunder but of consolation, and right well he filled his appointed sphere; his particular failing, if failing it may be called, was want of confidence in the pulpit; yet, as a rule, there was a sweetness about his discourses that carried a healing to many hearts. His one wish was to be useful; his one aim, the glory of God.

As an office-bearer in the church, he enjoyed the confidence and affection of his brethren; as a proof of this, he was chosen by them to fill some of the most important offices a layman can hold; several times he was delegated to District Meetings and Conferences; and in all business meetings he was characterised by Christian charity; he would not take advantage of an erring brother, but would gladly cover with the mantle of charity his failings, and pray and hope for better things: forbearance was with him a ruling principle. He thought the spirit of worldly policy should have no part in Church meetings, but the spirit of the Gospel; and that wrongs should be rectified on New Testament terms. This endeared him to his brethren and gave influence to his remarks.

As a tradesman he was honest, upright, persevering, and prosperous; he sought first the kingdom of God, and other things were added.

As a father and a husband, he was kind and affectionate; the spiritual welfare of his family lay near his heart, and hundreds of times he has prayed with them and for them; whatever the press of business, or urgency of worldly affairs, family worship would not be neglected; but he regularly gathered his family around the domestic altar, and besought heaven on their behalf. Oh may these prayers be answered. As a husband he was a pattern; his partner being in the furnace of affliction for many years, was most peculiarly the object of his kindest attention, and tenderest affection. When fatigued by the days' business, his first thoughts were for her, and his first inquiries after her state—but he is gone, and the lone widow is left as a trembling reed in a bleak wilderness. Sudden and shocking was the stroke that stopped his earthly career. On the 12th of June, 1862, he was particularly cheerful, and attended to his business with unusual spirit, but alas for the frailty of earthly hopes! even then the angel of death was near. After partaking of supper as usual, and enjoying a lengthy conversation with the Rev. S. Stafford, then on a visit, he was smitten with apoplexy, which terminated his earthly career in a few hours ; he did not seem to be conscious himself of his near approach to eternity when first stricken, or, if conscious, would not distress his family by revealing the fact, but he seemed to indulge the hope of being better after a little rest ; but alas ! soon the power of speech was gone, and he became unconscious of what was taking place around him. Just before he expired, he cast a glance upon some branches of his family and sweetly smiled, and then he instantly closed his eyes in death. The scenes and sensations of that night will never be forgotten. We should certainly have liked some sign, some word from him at parting, but no ! our heavenly Father willed it otherwise. And yet such signs and assurances would not have strengthened our faith in his final safety ; of this we have no doubt. Heaven give us submissive grace to bow in meekness to His will, and kiss the smiting hand. His earthly remains were interred in the New Cemetery, at Runcorn. The funeral obsequies were performed by the Revs. T. Jobling and M. Lewis. The scene was most affecting ; many wept whom we thought too proud for tears. By his removal, the Connexion has lost a well-trying friend, the circuit a useful local preacher, and one of its best members ; his sorrowing partner the best of husbands, and his family the kindest of parents. But he is at rest ; for while placed on earth—

—————“ his mind was still above,
On heaven's calm verge he dwelt, breathed its pure air,
And when death called—a step—and he was there.”

J. T. HIGGINS.

[We cannot forbear adding our personal testimony to the excellence of the character of the lamented subject of the foregoing sketch. It was our privilege to live near him during the three years we laboured in the Preston Brook Circuit, and to enjoy many hours in his company. And since then we have met him both at his hospitable home, and in various official meetings of the Connexion. The last time was at the late District Meeting at Northwich. And we have no hesitation in saying, we fully endorse all the best things said of him in the memoir, by his son-in-law. He was truly a good, kind, humble, earnest, consistent, useful Christian ; an active office-bearer in the station, and a liberal supporter of God's cause. When we received the sad intelligence of his sudden death, we were at Tunstall, just about engaging in the important services of the school anniversary ; and we were well-nigh unfitted for our work by the shock. We esteemed our departed brother very highly, and felt our sympathies for his bereaved widow and family deeply and intensely roused. But we know their “loss is his infinite gain.” “We sorrow not as those without hope.” No ; we all may meet again. Heaven help us ! Amen.—EDITOR.]

2. "Life's labour done, as sinks the clay,
Freed from its load, the spirit flies."

"THE memory of the just is blessed;" and, especially such as have been instrumental in saving souls from death ought never to be forgotten.

JOHN PEACE, the subject of this memoir, was born February 5th, 1815, at Barwell, in Hinckley Circuit, Leicestershire. When a child he was sent to the Wesleyan Sabbath-school, and he continued to go for many years. His early life was not characterised by open profanity, neither did he mingle with the ungodly youths of his age, which may, perhaps, be attributed to the judicious counsels of a pious mother, whose aim was to "train up her children in the way they should go." Although our departed friend was strict in his morals, and abstained from the pleasures of the world, he nevertheless was a stranger to true religion, until he was about twenty-three years of age. It was on the New Year's-eve of 1838, that he went to hear a sermon preached at the Primitive Methodist chapel, by Mr. E. Morton: the text was, "No man careth for my soul." The arrows of conviction pierced his heart. The soul! the priceless soul came before him in its infinite value, the bandage fell from his eyes, and he saw himself a sinner lost and undone without God's saving grace. He at once began to cry unto God for the pardon of his sins, and by faith and prayer, he succeeded in triumphing over Satan, and he became "a new man in Christ Jesus." About two years after his conversion he began to take appointments on the preachers' plan, and was always the happiest when warning sinners to flee from the wrath to come. As a local preacher, he was acceptable, zealous, and successful; his principal theme was the atonement of Christ, and he was solemn and impressive in his manner. He was a local preacher twenty-two years.

As a member he was consistent, and his piety was never questioned, his private and public deportment being such as became the gospel of Christ. His love to God, and the souls of men, was not of a fluctuating kind, but burned with a steady and inextinguishable blaze. His house has been open to the preachers of the gospel for twenty-four years. About eight years ago it pleased the Lord to deprive him of the use of his left-hand, and from that time he was the subject of much pain and weakness; but he bore his trial with great patience. I have frequently heard him say, "Well, never mind; it's the Lord's doings, and I must bow with submission to his will;" and he has further added—

"Should pining sickness waste away
My life in premature decay,
My Father, still I'll strive to say,
Thy will, Thy will, O God, be done!"

He was confined to his bed five weeks previous to his death. I called to see him on Lord's-day, March 16th, 1862, when he said,

"Satan has been tempting me much this morning, but I am trying to put my whole trust in God." "You feel Christ precious, do you?" said I. "O yes," he replied, "I feel Christ in me the hope of glory." I am—

"Bearing a momentary pain,
Dying to live a life of glory,
Suffering with my Lord to reign."

I prayed with him, and his soul seemed much lifted up to God. Sunday, March 30th, he appeared to be much worse, and getting nearer his eternal home, but regretted that he had not done more for the cause of Christ, and with his dying breath he began to exhort his brother, saying, "Give your heart to God, for it is high time you altered your course of life." He then turned his eyes towards his sister (who had come many miles to see her brother for the last time), and said, "Sophia, meet me in heaven." His wife then drew near to the bedside, and said, "John, Jesus is coming to fetch you home." "Yes," replied the dying Christian, "I hope He will come quickly." He then requested to be left alone for a short time, so that he might hold communion with his heavenly Father. An hour or two before he died, a friend asked, "Whether he felt Christ with him?" "Yes," said he, "as precious as ever." While the body, whose foundation is in the dust, was bending towards the grave, the soul was just preparing to take its flight, when a glorious "radiance smiled upon his wasted cheek," and he died without a struggle or a groan, and went home to God, at eleven o'clock P.M., March 30th, 1862, aged forty-seven years. He has left a widow who is in society, and three children in the Sabbath-school. May we, with his bereaved family and friends, meet him, "Where adieus and farewells are sounds unknown."

ISAAC J. HARDY.

---

3. THOMAS GEORGE CROSBIE was born at Drumnakelly, county Armagh, Ireland, March 20th, 1839, and died at Mahon House, near Portadown, March 22nd, 1862. He lived according to the course of this world until he was nineteen years of age, at which time he left his home, much against the wishes of his parents.

Having found his way to England, he plunged deeply into sin, and spent all his money. Not knowing what to do nor where to go, he started for London. After proceeding as far as Edmonton, he found two shillings and sixpence to be all the money he had left, so he thought, "What's the use of going into London with half a crown, it won't keep me more than a day and a night." Hence he thought it best to stop outside the city, where lodgings would be cheaper. The next day being the Sabbath he found his way to our little preaching room at No 1, Snell's Park, and there determined upon changing his course of life. A protracted meeting was then in progress.

The next day (Monday, April 26th, 1858), Brother Thomas Morgan

informed us that a young Irishman was in distress of soul, and would be waiting at the preaching house for instruction in the way of salvation. We exercised faith at once. As we entered, he shook hands and said, "Can you tell me how I can get salvation?" "We ought to be able to do so," was the reply. And then he was pointed the straight way to Jesus. He saw the way instantly, and laid hold of Christ as his Saviour—perhaps in less than five minutes after we had met. He seemed perfectly astonished at the simplicity of the plan of salvation by faith, and in the prayer-meeting, which commenced some short time afterwards, he cried out, "O God, pardon me for not believing like this before." He commenced pointing a penitent to Christ at once, saying, "It's only believe." Upon rising from our knees, he turned round, and pointing to the pulpit, said, "My highest ambition is to stand in a place like that, and preach a good sermon." He stayed in London two months; wrote letters home, which were the means of stirring many up to seek salvation. A gentlemen wrote to him, saying, "Your whole family are groaning for salvation."

On the 30th of June following, he sailed for home, and commenced at once to lead his friends to Jesus, and succeeded with five or six, three having since died in the faith, and preceded him to glory. Just after his arrival at home, Brother Bernard Kenny, a converted Romanist, an old companion of his, was requested to visit his native place, and Mr. Russell having just come to Portadown, they met and plunged into the work of God, and a glorious revival followed,—scores and scores of souls being brought to the Lord. The year after this the great Ulster awakening took place, in which Brother Crosbie laboured almost night and day, when, as many think, the foundation of the disease (consumption) was laid, which took him away.

He laboured as a local preacher for a short time, and on September 5th, 1859, was taken out as a regular travelling preacher, by the General Missionary Committee. He laboured on the Donaghmore and Portadown mission until July 1860, and then removed to Lisburn, but here his health giving way, and perhaps being strongly tempted to desist from the work, he came home for about a month, when, being better in health, and seeing and feeling his error, he returned to his station.

He then removed to London Third Circuit, under the superintendency of Mr. Lamb, where he was much beloved by the people; but his health failing he returned home a complete wreck, and all expected his immediate dissolution. He rallied a little for a time, and then gradually sank till the time of his death, which occurred in about sixteen months.

During his affliction the enemy assailed him powerfully; the conflict was long and severe, but this passage bore him through, "For God hath not appointed us to wrath, but to obtain salvation by our Lord Jesus Christ." Two or three days before his death he said, "Before you came up-stairs, I was praying for the Lord to tune my heart to sing with the great host. I know He is worthy to be praised now, but I am so weak I cannot sing. On the evening previous to his death, he sang,

"Just as I am without one plea,
But that thy blood was shed for me;"

but here his strength failing, he said, "I cannot sing any more, I'll finish it in heaven." As we entered the room, he was struggling for breath, but cried out, "Pray;" we did so. After we had done, he said, "Keep praying in your mind." He then looked up with a heavenly smile, and said, "Jesus—Essy—Robert—Glory," as though he saw what our eyes were not at that time permitted to behold. Again he named four of the family who had gone to heaven before him, and said, "Four before the throne." We had hesitated whether to leave him or not, to go to a preaching appointment—perhaps he heard us talking, and looking earnestly at us, he cried out, "Simon, what is that to thee? follow thou me; let the dead bury their dead." When we started to go, he said, "The Lord go with you, His Spirit be upon you." While mentioning his state to the society, they were deeply moved, and well they might, for many of them had been converted under his labours, as well as the society formed through him. When we had returned, he desired us to sing,

"Come sing to me of heaven," &c.

And joined us, singing so loudly that he astonished us. While we were singing,

"Then clasp my cold and icy hands, Upon my lifeless breast,"

he crossed his hands upon his breast, and appeared to be very happy. He gave out 6 lines 8s,

"Now I have found the ground wherein,
Sure my soul's anchor may remain," &c.

And sang very heartily, especially the last verse,

"Fixed on this ground will I remain,
Though my heart fail and flesh decay," &c.

Just before his death he made his father promise to meet him in heaven, after which he said, "That will do. I have been a great deal of trouble and expense to you, but you have been very kind—very kind to me." "Don't mention it," said his father, "this hour more than makes up for all." Just as he was struggling through the waves of the Jordan, we said,

"Not a soul of Jesus' care, Ever suffered shipwreck there."

"No, no! no, no! no, no!" said he. "When thou walkest through the fire, thou shalt not be burned, neither shall the flame kindle upon thee." After these efforts he was completely exhausted, and well he might, for he had been singing, praying, praising, and talking for some hours, with very little intermission. "It's hard work to cross. Take hold of my hands," said he ; and we held him while he breasted some of the last waves. His mind wandered a little towards the last, but after a short time he fell asleep, and slept on for nearly two hours ; we heard a long breath,—instantly we were by his side,—two more long drawn breaths, and the spirit was gone. Before we left the house in the morning, the servant girl professed to find peace with God ; thus one falls, and another fills up the ranks.

The funeral sermon was preached at the house, with the corpse upon the table before us, and many listened with deep attention, especially while some lines were read which had been written by the deceased on the death of his beloved sister Harriet, whom he had now joined, "in the home of the blest in the skies."* The hearse then bore his remains away for interment, hundreds of persons following to show their sympathy and love.

He was a young man of prepossessing appearance, good natural abilities, pretty well educated, intelligent, very interesting ; and these properties being sanctified by divine grace, we do not wonder at his being greatly beloved, and at his usefulness. He had faults, but need we bring them up, are they not common to our humanity ? Let him that is free cast the first stone. He was to the writer almost as Jonathan to David, but he has gone, and we hope to spend a long eternity together in glory.

"True friendship is a Gordian knot,
Which angel hands have tied,
By heavenly skill its texture's wrought,
Who shall its folds divide ?
In vain death's all-triumphant sword,
May strive the link to sever ;
The union of the twisted cord,
In heaven shall last for ever."

ISAAC SEPTIMUS NULLIS.

4. JONATHAN THOMAS HARRISON was born at Holm Hale, in the county of Norfolk, March 3rd, 1839. His parents are members of our Connexion, and have been for many years. His feet were early taught the way to the house of God, and strict morality marked his conduct. His father says, "he never knew him swear an oath, tell an untruth, nor say a bad word." He was also very particular in his choice of companions, and always set his face against anything which he considered wrong or dishonourable. But morality is not religion ; nor did he experience the power of the Holy Spirit to renew his moral nature until he had attained the seventeenth year of his age ; but this he then experienced, under the following circumstances.

In the summer of 1856, Mr. George Chapman, local preacher, preached in the open air at Holm Hale, and our departed brother was among his hearers. The word reached his heart, and he began to think seriously about his state as an unsaved sinner. Soon after that, he heard the Rev. John Moore preach from "What must I do to be saved?" Under that sermon he learned the way of salvation, and at once decided to seek the blessing, and in a day or two, while working in one of his father's fields, he believed with his heart on the Lord Jesus Christ, and was filled with peace and love. God was his reconciled Father, and henceforth he lived in the daily enjoyment of reconciliation with him.

* See the Juvenile Magazine for September.—Ed.

Exemplifying the power of divine truth in his general deportment, diligently attending the ordinances of grace, and manifesting capabilities for public usefulness, the officials of his station (Swaffham) put his name on the preachers' plan. It was about this time—July, 1858—that I became acquainted with him, and judging him a youth of promise, I encouraged him in the work of publishing to sinners "what a Saviour he had found." Satisfactorily passing through the usual gradation of a probationer, his name appeared on the list of accredited local preachers, and in this honourable capacity he laboured as one who felt concerned to magnify his office. He read and studied to provide acceptable and instructive matter for his congregations, regularly fulfilled his appointments, and realized such encouragements as induced him to persevere in holding forth the word of life. In the June quarter of 1859, the Swaffham Station received an application for him to go out to travel, under the direction of the General Missionary Committee. He was fully and carefully examined, the result of which was a unanimous recommendation of him for the ministry. He was accepted; but immediately upon the General Missionary Committee's acceptance of him, he was advised to relinquish the idea of entering the regular ministry, as in all probability his physical strength would not be equal to the amount of labour which would be required of him. Acting on the counsel of his advisers, arrangements were made for his going to reside with the late Mr. William Thoday, at Cottenham Fen, on the Cambridge Station. With this very excellent man our departed brother abode six months; and, while acquiring a knowledge of engineering, he also grew in grace and understanding, became better acquainted with the doctrines, movements, and usages of the church of his choice, and laboured as opportunities served to promote its varied interests at different places on the station. The six months' intercourse which he had with Brother Thoday and other officials on the Cambridge Station, greatly improved his judgment in reference to religious matters, gave a deeper tone to his piety, and imparted a feature to his preaching that appeared to advantage when he returned to his native circuit.

In December, 1860, the Yarmouth Station needed a young man to supply the appointments of the Rev. R. Howchin, who was laid aside by affliction. Our departed brother was recommended; he went, and "appeared to enter on his duties under due impressions of the responsibility of his new calling, and hence he laboured not only to cultivate personal piety, but also to improve his mind. He was well received, and generally accepted as a messenger of the Cross. His general urbanity of manners won for him esteem and affection; whether in the pulpit or out, his constant aim was to promote the glory of God."

In April, 1861, he removed from Yarmouth to Cambridge, having accepted a call to enter the itinerant ministry; and during the few months that he travelled, his public, social, and private conduct was such as became one sustaining the dignified and important character of a Christian minister. He was anxious for souls, regular in his pastoral visitations, and faithful in his pulpit duties; though he did not realize that success in the conversion of souls which he so ardently desired. This was a source of grief to him. We quote an entry from his journals. December 31st, 1861.—"The year has fled; and while I look back upon the first year of my ministry, my heart is pained at the limited success that has attended my labours. I may most reasonably prostrate myself before the Lord, and implore forgiveness through Christ for my lack of earnestness; and I pray that I may be more abundantly useful in the (coming) year, more devoted to His service, and more successful in the conversion of sinners."

As a student he was diligent in his pursuit of knowledge, often burning his lamp at midnight,* and seizing truth wherever he found it; and had he been on a station affording time for the maturing of his thoughts, he would doubtless have appeared to greater advantage, and have been more efficient in the pulpit. But he did his best to meet the constant demands of our three pulpits in this town. Indeed, no young man in the first year of his ministry, could have read, studied, visited, and preached to the extent which he did without being always at work, as in fact was the case with him up to the last day on which he preached, namely the sixth of February, 1862. Next day he was unable to attend to his duties. His illness was, at first, thought to be a bad cold, of which a medical gentleman hoped he should be able to relieve him in a few days. But alas! alas! he grew worse and worse, and his sickness was pronounced the typhus fever—a disease he very much dreaded. The disease continued to gain ground, but he was much comforted by the fact that he had not to seek religion in the furnace which was trying him as gold is tried. He had believed in Christ, and now he felt firm footing on the Rock of Ages.

From the commencement of his affliction he was anxious to recover, that he might serve the cause of Christ, and, when it was thought that the fever had turned, and he was likely to recover, he expressed his gratitude in these words: "The Lord has been very gracious unto us." But the disease returned, and his mind began to wander ; in his wanderings however, he prayed such fervent and connected prayers as if he had been conducting the devotional exercises of a public congregation. On one occasion his prayer referred particularly to his own affliction, which he regarded as the means God was employing to bring him nearer to Himself. At another time, thinking he was recovering, he said, " If I had died, I should have gone to heaven." He was grateful for acts of kindness, expressing a hope that he should be able, in one way or other, to repay them. But his hope of requiting the kind attentions of his friends failed him ; and when he knew that he must die, that there remained no more ground on which to rest his ardent, confident hope of restoration, he said, " If you come and find I am gone, don't fret ; think I am gone to the land of rest." Anticipating death, he asked me, " Do you think there will be a struggle ?" I made the most appropriate reply I could, and he signified his satisfaction. " Do you," he inquired of two friends, " think I shall not get better ?" Being answered in the affirmative, he replied, " I shall soon be in heaven ;" and he began to praise the Lord.

* Had this anything to do with his early decease? Better for a young man to remember the maxim—"Early to bed, early to rise," &c.—Ed.

On Saturday, March 22nd, Mrs. S. called to see him, and he was in such pain of body that it was thought he must be in the agonies of death. Perspiration in large drops was rolling from his forehead, and he exclaimed, " Oh these mighty drops !" She reminded him that Jesus had shed drops of blood for him. The remembrance of the bloody sweat of his redeeming Lord instantly comforted him, and he said, " Bless Him." She repeated the second, third, fourth, and fifth verses of the three hundred and twentieth hymn. " Ah," said he, " that is a favourite." A heavenly smile played on his countenance, and, shaking her hand as well as his remaining strength would allow him, he cried at the top of his voice, " Glory ! hallelujah !"

On Sunday, March 23rd, he was very wandering, and his articulation indistinct, but the following sentences were heard to drop from his lips. " I have prayed to the Lord that he would bring me nearer to Himself, but I did not think that it would be in this way." " If this be dying, oh, the pain, the bliss of dying." " Here is the valley ; oh yes, it's all light." " Blessed Jesus." His last words were, " Father, mother, Mary ; Lord, help me." And on Monday morning, March 24th, 1862, at twenty minutes past five o'clock, he fell asleep in Jesus, realizing the truthfulness of one of his own observations made a few days before, " Mine is a short life ; I shall soon be in heaven." That our young men may imitate his excellences, and that his surviving relatives and friends, with the readers of his biography, may meet him in the better land, is the prayer of

THOMAS SWINDELL.

5. JOHN HORROCKS, the subject of this brief record, was born at Chadderton, near Oldham, in the county of Lancaster, in the year 1805. It appears that his parents were strangers to the saving truths of religion for a considerable portion of their lives, consequently our departed friend was not favoured with pious parental instruction.

About forty years ago Chadderton was missioned by some Primitive Methodists from Oldham, who by their lively singing and plain practical preaching, succeeded in drawing many together to hear the word of eternal life, among whom was Brother Horrocks. It was while listening to the truths of the Gospel, as enunciated by these servants of the Most High, that his mind was enlightened, and his conscience convicted, and that he was led to embrace the blessings of salvation through faith in the Lord Jesus Christ. And the change which was produced in him by this event was not a partial but an entire change, extending to all the feelings of the heart and to all the actions of the life.

Immediately after this event, he united with the people of God, and became a member of the first Primitive Methodist class that was formed in his native village. A new sphere of usefulness now opened before him; enjoying the love of God in his own soul, and feeling the force of those obligations under which he was laid to do good to others, he began to exhort his fellow men to forsake their sins, and to flee from the wrath to come; hence his name soon appeared on the plan as a local preacher; and in this capacity he continued to labour for a period of thirty-eight years. He was also a class-leader and a superintendent of Chadderton Sabbath-school; and the good which he was the means of accomplishing in these different departments of Christian labour, will only be known in that day when assembled worlds will appear before the Judge of quick and dead.

As a preacher, his abilities were not of a very high order; but if his discourses were not remarkable for their originality and depth, their eloquence and beauty, they were richly fraught with plain Gospel truth, which, when accompanied by the power of the Holy Spirit, is mighty to regenerate the human heart.

As a leader, he was very punctual at his class, and was greatly esteemed by those who were under his charge. Frequently, while they were met together on the Sabbath morning, so divinely sweet were the influences of grace shed on them by the Holy Spirit, that both leader and members were often led to exclaim—

“What heights of rapture shall we know,
When round His throne we meet.”

For some time previous to his death his health had been failing, but his faith waxed stronger the nearer he approached his journey's end. His affliction was of a complicated nature, but the immediate cause of his death was, according to the statement of his medical attendant, disease of the heart and dropsy. During the last fortnight of his earthly sojourn, he was visited by several of his friends, all of whom bear testimony to the unusually happy frame of mind in which they found him. Many of these friends could not refrain from weeping as they listened to his parting language. He said—

“If this be death, I soon shall be
From every sin and sorrow free,” &c.

To his sorrowing widow and daughter he said, “Weep not for me; God will be a Father to the fatherless and a Husband to the widow.” To Brother Elson, one of our local preachers, who saw him a short time before his departure, he said, “I have visited hundreds of persons on their deathbed, and thank God, the religion I recommended to them does not fail me now.” His last words were full of hope and triumph; he exclaimed, “The battle is fought, the victory is won! Glory be to God! my sun is set in a clear sky; my anchor is cast within the veil; there is not a dimming cloud between!”

In this happy state of mind his spirit winged its flight to the mansions of unsullied bliss on Friday, the 28th of March, 1862, in the fifty-eighth year of his age, after having been a steady and consistent member of our society for forty years.

JOHN DUMBELL.

---

6. Mr. JAMES PYBURN, class-leader at Newbottle, in the Sunderland Circuit, died in the full triumph of Christian faith, March 17th, 1862, in the sixty-fourth year of his age. His birthplace was Sunderland, where his father was in business as a tailor; and being a Wesleyan local preacher, doubtless he trained his son according to the directions of Scripture. At any rate, as his son advanced from boyhood to youth and manhood, he was distinguished for soberness of character, industrious habits, and upright principles. But when he was only nine years old his father died. He was then transferred to the care of an uncle at Thornley, near Wolsingham, who educated him, and taught him the trade of a boot and shoemaker.

In company with this uncle, he, in the year 1815, removed to Newbottle, where, in the course of time he married, and settled in business, and where he resided till his death.

About thirty years ago he became a teacher in the Wesleyan Sunday-school, but not till six years afterwards did he become a subject of converting grace. The Lord then, by the death of some of his family, and by the affliction of his wife, disposed him to give himself to the Saviour, and he became an upright and consistent member, and afterwards a class-leader in the Wesleyan society. In this society he remained till the Wesleyan Reform Question agitated it, and he then joined our society at Newbottle. As he came among us with a “free good will,” he was cordially received, and he heartily entered into our movements, especially in the Sunday-school, in which he laboured much and faithfully, and was much beloved by the children. The same may be said of the class of which he became the leader. He also, to the extent of his power, supported our mission cause. His school missionary box, for the Australian Missions, which he first introduced into the New-bottle school, generally yielded a higher produce than such boxes usually do—was the best indeed in this circuit.

The talents of our brother were of a superior order. He possessed a sagacious, penetrating mind, which, joined with unquestioned piety, and a meek and patient spirit, rendered his counsels and conversational utterances valuable, edifying, and delightful. Many a time the writer has experienced all this when permitted to enjoy a little quiet talk with him, in his shop or dwelling, and especially when listening to his highly characteristic speeches, on Sabbath-school and chapel anniversary occasions.

He was indeed one of the “excellent of the earth.” During the last two years his constitution seemed to be gradually failing, but especially within the last seven or eight months; his class were accustomed to hear him say he would not be long with them, but all was well. We cannot, however, find space to record all the expressions of his wisdom and piety during his last affliction, and which were found so edifying to his numerous visitants. He desired the doctor to be faithful with him, saying the Lord had dealt kindly with him in bringing him gradually down to the grave, and he had no fear of death. Sometimes his sufferings were severe, but at such times, patience, for which he was distinguished, had its perfect work in him, enabling him to say, “The Lord’s will is my will!” He consequently had many happy seasons on his death-bed. As his outward man decayed, his inward man acquired strength. He had a blooming hope of immortality, and could say he would soon be “Far from a world of grief and sin,

With God eternally shut in.”

In this spirit he was enabled to repel all the assaults of the enemy, to patiently wait for his change; and to give his wife up to God in the hope of soon meeting her again in glory. At the last his sufferings were heavy, but he continued sensible and prayerful to the end of the mortal struggle.

Nothing more need be added, but that he was a kind and affectionate father and husband, an honest man, a wise and faithful leader, and a pattern of patience.

JOHN LIGHTFOOT.

---

7. GEORGE PEARSON, late of Barningham, in Barnard Castle Circuit, entered into his eternal rest, November 6th, 1861, aged seventy-two years. In early life he walked according to the course of this world, and though not considered immoral he gave evidence of his conformity to the world, until his twenty-fifth year, when it pleased the Lord to give him a sight of his character, while sitting under the ministry of the Gospel. Under the conviction of his need of salvation, he was led to identify himself with the Wesleyans. Shortly afterwards he found the pearl of great price while groaning for deliverance in a "cow-shed." He was thence a laborious and useful member amongst the Wesleyans for about twenty years; and then he invited the Primitive Methodists to preach in his house. The invitation was accepted, and many will, no doubt, bless God to all eternity that Brother Pearson ever opened his house for such a purpose. About this time he cast in his lot with our people, and became distinguished for his earnestness to save his neighbours, and for his liberality in supporting the cause. His house was always open to receive the ambassadors of Christ. He on one occasion placed the last morsel he had before the preacher, and bade him a hearty welcome. And after they had partaken of the food, himself and wife, as well as the preacher, engaged in prayer, and He who has engaged to supply all our need, heard the prayer of His servants, and Brother Pearson from that day till the day of his death was blessed with a sufficiency of the good things of this life, and something to spare.

For a number of years he sustained the office of class-leader in a way that reflected credit upon his Christian character. His soul was in the work, and though not distinguished for talent and learning, yet for earnestness and love to God's people, few excelled him. In his last moments all was well. One of our local preachers visited him before he died, and reminded him that he was still at Calvary, and would soon be in glory, to which he replied, "Rather down." No doubt the enemy was striving to destroy his confidence; but knowing the power of prayer, he said to the local preacher, "Get down on your knees." Prayer was offered in his behalf, and it prevailed with the Lord, his doubts were removed, and his confidence restored, a calm serenity sat upon his brow, and with a firm trust in the mercy of God through Christ Jesus, he fell asleep. His death was afterwards improved by the writer to a large and deeply affected audience. He has left a widow to mourn her loss; but she rejoices in the prospect of meeting him again in the presence of Him whom she now loves and serves.

JOSEPH ROSS.

---

8. RICHARD BECKETT was born at Whitely Moor, in the year 1800, and died at Mexborough, in the Doncaster Circuit, the 20th of April, 1862. His parents were industrious and moral in their deportment, but were not united in fellowship with any section of the Church of Christ. They strove to train up their family according to the light they had, and also to restrain them from those gross immoralities to which many are addicted.

Our respected Brother Beckett was moral in his outward conduct, but he lived a stranger to the regenerating and saving grace of God till the year 1826, when it pleased God to enlighten his mind, and to give him to see that he was a sinner, and that without an interest in the blood of Christ he would be lost for ever. Hearing a woman pray with a person who was sick and nigh unto death, was the means of his conversion. Having found the Lord, he at once united in Christian fellowship with the Primitive Methodists, and he laboured diligently to extend the feeble cause in the locality where he lived. He was soon appointed by the church to the office of a local preacher, and in that capacity he was made successful in pointing sinners to the "Lamb of God which taketh away the sin of the world." The prosperity of Zion was refreshing to his soul.

He was diligent in attending his appointments, however long the journeys or inclement the weather. His preaching was acceptable, and many will have cause to praise the Lord they ever heard him proclaim salvation full and free.

About twelve years ago, through some unpleasantness, he withdrew from our society and joined the New Connexion, but he only remained with them about two years, as he did not feel at home, hence he returned to our people. After his return, his attachment to the cause was firm and undeviating to the end of his days. He was soon put on the plan again, and he felt a delight in the work to which God and the church had called him. The members and friends at the respective places were glad to see him in his old position, and to hear him tell of the love of Jesus, and of His power to save from the love and dominion of sin.

About twelve months ago he had a severe illness which enfeebled him very much, but under medical treatment and care he so far recovered as to resume his accustomed employment; but in February last he took a severe cold, which brought on inflammation of the lungs. He suffered much, but in the midst of all his pains and weakness of body, he was happy in the Lord, and frequently said that the religion which he had preached and recommended to others was supporting and consoling to his own mind, and enabled him to look forward with holy confidence to the day when he should be freed from all pains, and enjoy the rest which remaineth for the people of God. In his deepest affliction he was in a delightful state of mind, and frequently shouted aloud the praises of the Lamb. When he had strength to sing, the following verse was a great favourite with him—

"My Jesus, I love Thee, I know Thou art mine;
For Thee all the pleasures of sin I resign;
My gracious Redeemer, my Saviour, art Thou,
If ever I loved Thee, my Jesus, 'tis now."

I visited him about a fortnight before he died, and found him happy in Jesus, and ready for his departure. He said Jesus was precious to his soul, and that he could resign himself fully into the hands of his heavenly Father, who would do all things well. His leader says, that some weeks before his death it was evident that he was growing in grace and mellowing for the better land. A little before he died, when he saw his wife and children weeping, he said, "Weep not for me, all is well, all is right; I shall soon be with Jesus which will be far better." He requested his wife and family to live to God, and meet him in heaven. His end was most triumphant. He finished his course with joy, and entered his eternal home to be with Jesus for ever.

T. KENDALL.

D I V I N I T Y.

THE LANCASHIRE DISTRESS, AND THE DUTY OF BENEVOLENCE IN REFERENCE TO IT.

A SERMON, BY WILLIAM SAUL, OF STOKESLEY.

"As we have therefore opportunity, let us do good unto all men, especially unto them who are of the household of faith."—Gal. vi. 10.

I COULD think of no text more suitable than that I have just read, because it embodies a double duty, and in its application to the great calamity engaging our attention this evening, there is clearly a double duty to be performed. The prevailing necessities of the great mass of the people must not only be consulted by a general fund, that so we may "do good to all men," but the poor in the different churches, who, through that delicacy of feeling inspired by religious principles, are the last to obtrude their necessities, must be specially regarded, or in many cases they will be found the greatest sufferers—and this is doubtless implied in the special reference, that whilst we are to embrace within the arms of our charity, "all men" we are to take nearest to us, "the household of faith." Nor is there either invidiousness or selfishness in following directions so plainly laid down, the necessity and wisdom of which the findings of our experience in the prevalent distress have already brought to light.

It must not, however, be inferred that the difference to be observed in the distribution of our benevolence is to restrain its exercise in relieving any who are in want. Though they differ from us in religion; yea, though they are openly profligate, yet they must be assisted—professional beggarism excepted, of course, for as Paul says, "If any will not work, neither shall they eat." In the sense intended, all are to be prevented from perishing. Whether "members of the household of faith" or not, they are entitled to the grace of charity. If not renewed in the spirit of their minds, they possess a common nature, and still retain something of God's image stamped upon them. The golden rule is applicable, "Do to others as ye would they should do to you." What Christian, on falling into extreme poverty, but would be glad to receive help, though at the hand of the wicked? and the godly ought to do good to the wicked in their distress. Besides, the hardening of our hearts against those who are wicked, may confirm them in their wickedness, and bring a scandal upon the profession of religion. The directions are as positive as the example is clear. "Do good to them that hate you, that ye may be the children of your Father in heaven, for He maketh His sun to rise upon the evil and the good, and sendeth rain upon the just and the unjust." Moreover, if we only do good when we can spare the means, that is, when the effort will not involve us in self-denial and sacrifice, there is no genuine excellence about our benevolence. On the other hand, we never do good to a fellow-creature, when we do it purely and disinterestedly, without feeling that we have attained a higher enjoyment, a purer source of bliss. It feels like a translation from the sordid fellowships of earth, to those of angels and of God. If, when we hate a man, we feel that we have taken a scorpion into our bosoms, the poison of which fevers and inflames our whole being, we need not be surprised that sacrifices for the happiness of man should be attended with an almost unearthly sweetness and satisfaction,—an assurance that the treasure has neither been cast away nor misbestowed. Grant that the object of your benevolent exertions is churlish and destitute of gratitude to repay them, even then you have blessed your own spirit. Who would not then be always doing good, since the good we do will do us good, and in many cases more good than it will do to those for whom we do it? Let men be so unthankful as not to give us a good word for our good deeds, their fed and clothed bodies shall bless us. Who does not remember the description of the virtuous woman of the Proverbs, and how it concludes?—"Give her of the fruit of her hands, and let her works praise her in the gates." The noblest works are the noblest orators. They speak best who do the best. If no orators praise us in the gate, our good works shall. Good and evil deeds, respectively, leave their impress, and always either bless or curse us. "Let us then not be weary in well-doing, for in due season we shall reap if we faint not."

The poverty-stricken condition of our manufacturing districts, and the duty of affording prompt relief, cordially commend themselves to the practical sympathy of all right-minded persons.

It is well known that the causes of poverty are various—avoidable, and unavoidable. Downright wickedness and profligacy of disposition are a fruitful source. In this way, fortunes, the fruit of industry, care, and ages, are often squandered in a few years. Thousands are poor, because they touch everything with a slack hand, and abandon themselves to listlessness. Others are steeped in wretchedness because they are unskilful in the use of the means and circumstances placed at their disposal by a gracious providence. In building their fortune they have employed "hay and stubble," when they might with equal ease have had "gold, silver, and precious stones," and so their fabric is as a castle of cards, which storms overthrow. The failure of their enterprise is the result of ill-timed or ill-directed effort, but as all unskilled workmen are apt to do, they blame only their tools. There is also another class lying stranded upon the bleak shores of want, as the direct and immediate result of the "glass and the pipe;" commencing life with the fairest of prospects, in possession of good talents, good dispositions, and good tempers, but allowing themselves to be cheated into fatal errors and fashionable vices, they are now despicable and loathsome objects to gaze upon, presenting to those who knew them as beauteous boys and promising youths, a melancholy illustration of the texts, "Whatsoever a man soweth, that shall he also reap;" "Evil communications corrupt good manners."

The cases entitled to our commiseration to-night are not the consequences of faults of their own. The material and means by which they were in the habit of furnishing themselves with the necessities of life are now withheld from them.

The importance and value of labour are never more apparent than when, as now, large numbers are deprived of it, and thrown upon public benevolence. Labour seems indispensable in both a savage and a civilized state. It is doubtless fear of poverty that urges the savage to hunt, and the civilized to ply the arts of life. But for its stimulating effects, we should see myriads bidding farewell to all those habits of early rising, industry, and emulation, which are as conducive to health, as to the comforts and conveniences of society. Even where labour is not excessive in point of degree, thousands regard it as of the nature of pain, and therefore encounter it in a rebellious spirit, feel it the yoke which galls the shoulder, the iron which pierces the heart. The willingness with which many of the Lancashire operatives have accommodated themselves to unfamiliar employments, where it could be secured, not only reflects favourably on their habits of industry, by exonerating them from a hankering after ease, but is an additional element of suffering where no labour can be obtained.

It comes to our minds to remark here, how (when commercial relations are suspended by civil war) intimately connected for good and for evil the nations of the earth have become, and how comprehensive and influential the laws of mutual dependence. From the nature and bearings of the principles of reciprocity in commerce, nothing happens but is felt more or less through the whole of society, and affects every nation and interest in the world. Its geographical position, diversity of climate, and immense resources have made America the resort of merchants ever since 1492, when discovered by the exploring Columbus. The value of our own relations with America, may be inferred when a collision between the different States entails upon us more distress than we have experienced at any previous crisis of our national history.

In these circumstances it is that, the ordinary resources of our Poor Law provisions having proved wholly inadequate to the emergency, an appeal is made to the benevolence of the public through the length and breadth of the kingdom. The harrowing details, communicated by the daily press, of thousands upon thousands, with all our own sensibilities, hopes, and noble aspirings, passing through the intolerable anguish of want, make the blood of man run cold. Who can estimate the painful and even pernicious accompaniments of poverty? No mean authority says, that "starvation is too heavy a punishment for any crime short of wilful murder." But the pallid countenances and emaciated bodies of our distressed cotton operatives are not the just punishment of personal crimes. Are they not then entitled to tender consideration, and instant, active charity?

But we are not left to the conclusions of reason respecting the duty of benevolence. In all the dispensations of God towards His creatures, this duty has been expressly enjoined. If it is an ordination of heaven that "the poor shall not fail out of the land," it is no less that their wants shall be supplied. See Exod. xxiii. 11, and Lev. xix. 9, 10. Words however good are not sufficient. "If a brother or a sister be naked, and destitute of daily food, and one of you say unto them, be warmed and filled; yet notwithstanding ye give them not those things which are needful to the body, what doth it profit?" Acts of charity are as necessary as acts of justice, and God resents the neglect of the one as well as the violation of the other. The principle laid down of old is strictly applicable now. "If there be among you a poor man, within any of thy gates, in the land which the Lord thy God giveth thee, thou shalt not harden thy heart, nor shut thy hand from thy poor brother." God having made the poor as well as the rich, it is clear that poverty is intended to be relieved from the abundance of the rich. The grace of charity would be idle if God had provided no objects for it to be exercised upon. Want the disposition we may, but we shall not lack "opportunity" to manifest our benevolence. Scripture represents it as being as unnatural which to suffer the needy to perish, as it is to hide ourselves from our own flesh, we are full of care to nourish and cherish. It is also a proof of little or no love to God. "Whoso hath this world's goods, and seeth his brother have need, and shutteth up his bowels of compassion from him, how dwelleth the love of God in him?" Even remissness is thus threatened. "Whoso stoppeth his ears at the cry of the poor, he also himself shall cry, and shall not be heard."

In the prophecies of Isaiah, the feeding of the poor is set forth as more acceptable to God than afflicting our souls, or abstaining from food. "This is the fast which I choose, saith the Lord, that thou deal thy bread to the hungry, and that thou bring the poor that are cast out into thy house. When thou seest the naked, that thou cover him, and that thou hide not thyself from thy own flesh."

If we partake with others in the good things they enjoy by rejoicing with them, we ought to partake in the evil things which they suffer by compassionating their condition. Paul could say, "Who is weak, and I burn not?" Whatever were the afflictions of others, he bore his share. Jesus Christ will say to the sheep on His right hand in the great day, "I was a stranger, and ye took me in, naked and ye clothed me." When the people said to John the Baptist, "What shall we do?" he answered them, "He that hath two coats, let him impart to him that hath none; and he that hath meat let him do likewise." Those who suffer their superfluities to perish by time and moths, instead of handing them to the needy, are thus addressed by St. James, "Go to now, ye rich men, weep and howl for the miseries that shall come upon you; your riches are corrupt, and your garments are moth-eaten. Your gold and silver is cankered, and the rust of them shall be a swift witness against you, and shall eat as it were your flesh."

St. Paul enforces the duty of rendering assistance in time of need, in a comparison drawn from the members of the human body, which are by their very constitution bound to assist one another upon every emergency. "We are," he says, "the body of Christ, and members in particular." In the natural body the members have the same care one for another. If the foot sustains an injury, the eyes examine the wound, the ears listen in order to hear what will cure it, and the hands are eager to apply any remedy that may be suggested. The Jews looked upon all other nations but their own as aliens, and excluded them from the offices of humanity. Instance the case of the Priest and Levite. But although they steeled the impulses of nature, and stood as impregnable as rocks of adamant, it was because that by their own traditions they had blotted out those passages which enjoined tenderness even to the unreasoning animals. If it is a duty to be attentive to the wants of the brute creation, how sinful must it be to be deaf to the calls of charity in him who derives his origin from the same common earth as ourselves, and whose weary bones shall at length as quietly repose in her bosom as our own.

Connected with this duty of benevolence is also that of acting speedily. To delay aggravates the evil, makes the eyes fail and the spirits sink. Hence the advice, "Say not to thy brother, Go, and come again, and to-morrow I will give thee, when thou hast it by thee." Instant relief is like double relief. Who can tell what shall be on the morrow? If the poor perish to-day, of what use are the alms of to-morrow? Nothing can be better than the Apostolic rule, "He that they should be the pure representatives of the ideas to which, by the universal consent, they are related. It is no uncommon thing for men to "darken counsel by words without knowledge." What a noble simplicity do we behold in the words of the great Teacher! No hard sentences or difficult phraseology; no petty ornaments of speech; not a single laboured argument or far-fetched illustration can we discover in all His discourses. All is perfectly natural and easy—transparent, divine simplicity.

It was a high though an undesigned eulogy that a lady passed upon John Wesley, as she was coming out of the church at Epworth, after hearing that celebrated man for the first time: "Is this the great Mr. Wesley that there is so much noise about? Why, anybody may understand him." We cannot help thinking that it is no favourable sign that Wesley's sermons are so little valued by many modern Methodist preachers. We remember once hearing the late Robert Newton say on the platform that, when he was comparatively young, he did not think much of Wesley's sermons. For consistency's sake, as a Wesleyan preacher, he had them in his library; but when he wanted a volume on theology to read, he generally passed by them, and took hold of Saurin, &c. "But," said he, "I had a bad taste then."

6. Simplicity of doctrine and worship is of the highest importance, in opposition to that affectation of mystery and sacredness in which superstition and priestly power are enshrined. The true Christian minister can say, and rejoices to say it—

"His only righteousness I show,
His saving truth proclaim;
'Tis all my business here below
To cry, 'Behold the Lamb!'"

Or, in the language of the great Apostle (1 Cor. ii. 2): "I determined not to know anything among you save Jesus Christ and Him crucified." "God is a Spirit: and they that worship Him must worship Him in spirit and in truth." "Do this in remembrance of Me," shows the character of the Lord's Supper, as a commemorative ordinance. (1 Cor. xi. 23—26.) Baptismal regeneration, transubstantiation, church altars, wax candles, priestly vestments, and genuflections, and many other such-like things, are as far from Apostolic teaching and practice as romance is from sober, truthful narrative.

7. In relation to congregational psalmody. Genuine religious poetry is the language of sanctified passion under the inspiration or direction of genius. He who, in poetic composition, gives more attention to grammar, and logic, and sound, than to the free, glowing expression of just and noble sentiments, may be a good versifier, but certainly not a poet. He may be compared to a sparrow chirping upon the hedge, rather than to the lark ascending towards heaven and filling the air with artless, delightful melody. Touching sacred music, we will only refer, for the sake of illustration, to the Old Hundreth Psalm-tune. There are no fugues nor quavers in this noble tune. Cursorily viewed in the book, it is a simple, unpromising composition, a lot of dull minims and semi-breves; but there is a pathos and an elevation in it which render it a universal favourite. It is so true to nature, so entirely in harmony with all that is grand, and sacred, and blissful in religion, that we like it better after having been acquainted with it thirty, forty, or fifty years, than when we first heard it.

8. Public prayer. What an absurdity, not to say a profanity, to deliver a fine oration to the Deity, when we should be solemnly, humbly, earnestly praying to him!

"Prayer is the simplest form of speech,
That infant lips can try;" &c.

It is the language of the heart, at the throne of grace, in its various conditions or moods; the language of want, of dependence, of desire, of confidence, of gratitude, of adoration.

9. Having noticed several branches of simplicity, we will now refer to the root of it—simplicity of intention, purity of motive, in opposition to the innumerable artifices of selfishness, double-mindedness. "If thine eye be single, thy whole body shall be full of light; but if thine eye be evil, thy whole body shall be full of darkness" (Matt. vi. 22, 23). "Whether, therefore, ye eat or drink, or whatsoever ye do, do all to the glory of God" (1 Cor. x. 31). "All things whatsoever ye would that men should do to you, do ye even so to them," &c. (Matt. vii. 12). "He that giveth, let him do it with simplicity"—from genuine love. "Let love be without dissimulation. Abhor that which is evil; cleave to that which is good" (Rom. xii. 8, 9). "Behold an Israelite indeed, in whom is no guile" (John i. 47).

Lastly, our hearts, our intentions, desires, and affections, are purified through faith. We conclude, therefore, with a remark on the simplicity of faith. The great hindrances to the exercise of that faith which honours God and obtains the promises are proud reasonings, and depending on frames and feelings, leaning to our own understanding, and following impressions. Faith is taking God at His word; "believing that what He has promised, He is able also to perform."

"Faith, mighty faith, the promise sees,
And looks to that alone;
Laughs at impossibilities,
And cries, It shall be done."

W. DENT.

showeth mercy, with cheerfulness. The Lord loveth a cheerful giver." What a man does with a cheerful mind he generally does at once. This is as it should be. Late charity is next to none, and in many cases equivalent to a denial. In His gracious favours, God anticipates our necessities. "Before they call I will answer, and whilst they are yet speaking I will hear." He neither frowns us away empty, nor keeps us on the rack of expectation. "Hope deferred maketh the heart sick, but when the desire cometh it is a tree of life."

Another duty is enlarged liberality. If we have only power to do a little, "it is accepted according to that a man hath, and not according to that he hath not." The widow gave but two mites; yet Christ said, "She hath given more than they all;" and the reason was because she had given her all. If, however, a little from those who have but little is an acceptable sacrifice, we must not think that little from those who possess much is so. Paul instructs Timothy to charge them that are rich that they do good, and to show them that it is not a little good, he adds, that they be rich in good works, ready to distribute, willing to communicate; to remember that works of charity will tell to their advantage in preparing for another world; "laying up for themselves in store a good foundation against the time to come, that they may lay hold upon eternal life."

In conclusion, let me remind you that the "opportunity" is now presented of aiding by a general contribution the relief of the distressed. If the examples and illustrations supplied are not motive-power sufficient, let me ask you to picture to yourselves the horrors of a calamity which, whilst it reduced and enfeebled your bodies to skeletons, brought your famishing children around you begging for bread which you could not give; and then you will but inadequately realise what is experienced by immense thousands of parents and children scattered over all Lancashire, Cheshire, and other places. For many months the famine has been increasing, and the worst is yet to come, it is feared. Long since the small resources of many of the poor were exhausted. It is said the class above them already present faces and limbs from which the former freshness and vigour have departed. The cheerful voices of many healthy children are drowned in the piteous wails for bread. Already the cravings of hunger have begun to be supplied by new and disgusting methods. If foreign aid be not promptly rendered in yet greater abundance, the scenes of the famine of Samaria may be to some extent repeated on British soil. Shall the horrid spectacle painted by the prophet, as witnessed by him in the siege of Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar, and again in the same city by the Romans, be realised in its leading features in the land of our dearest hopes? Listen to the passage: "Their visage is blacker than a coal, they are not known in the streets, their skin cleaveth to their bones, it is withered, it is become like a stick; they that be slain by the sword are better than they that be slain with hunger, for these pine away stricken through want of the fruits of the fields."

As to the amount you are to contribute, do not regulate that by what others give, but by the gifts of God to you, your personal ability, and the cries of the needy who want bread to put into their mouths. In this view, the guinea of the rich man may be to his reproach, and the "two mites" of the widow to her eternal honour.

---

2. ON SIMPLICITY.—AN ADDRESS.

SIMPLICITY characterizes all the works of creation; which is the more remarkable, as it appears in connection with so much grandeur and variety. We might speak,

1. Of simplicity in relation to dress, in opposition to gaudy and costly apparel, which the Apostles Paul and Peter speak against as unbecoming the Christian profession.

2. In relation to diet, in opposition to an almost endless variety of highly-seasoned articles, which are equally inimical to health and to economy—as hurtful as they are expensive. This leads us to say a word about total abstinence from intoxicating drinks.

The cure of drunkenness, with its untold evils, is as simple as it is infallible, as easy as it is effectual. Just let the drink alone; avoid the first glass. Moderation in connection with the good creatures of God, properly so called, we can understand and approve of; but to talk of moderation in relation to what is not only unnecessary but deleterious, is worse than nonsense. You may call the abstainer a simpleton, but he is one of the right sort: he can give a good reason for his singularity. He is wise in refusing that which cannot do him any good, and which might lead to a great deal of harm. Nature has provided us abundantly with the best kind of beverage. Go, thou poor drunkard, thou presumptuous tippler, go to the beasts of the field, and learn of them the readiest, safest, and cheapest method of quenching thy thirst.

3. Next to probity of character, simplicity of manners gives pleasure, commands respect. Affected gentility, a studied, starched politeness, which is usually as far from sincerity as from simplicity, is more offensive even than vulgarity. Be willing to appear like yourself.

4. In relation to thinking or reasoning, as opposed to unnecessary abstruseness. It may not be owing to the depth so much as to the muddiness of the water, that you cannot see to the bottom of it. Affected profundity is real incoherency.

5. Simplicity of language may be mentioned in opposition to exuberance of imagery, or the excessive use of rhetorical figures. Words are the vehicles of thought, and fidelity and propriety alike demand that they should be the pure representatives of the ideas to which, by the universal consent, they are related. It is no uncommon thing for men to "darken counsel by words without knowledge." What a noble simplicity do we behold in the words of the great Teacher! No hard sentences or difficult phraseology; no petty ornaments of speech; not a single laboured argument or far-fetched illustration can we discover in all His discourses. All is perfectly natural and easy—transparent, divine simplicity.

It was a high though an undesigned eulogy that a lady passed upon John Wesley, as she was coming out of the church at Epworth, after hearing that celebrated man for the first time: "Is this the great Mr. Wesley that there is so much noise about? Why, anybody may understand him." We cannot help thinking that it is no favourable sign that Wesley's sermons are so little valued by many modern Methodist preachers. We remember once hearing the late Robert Newton say on the platform that, when he was comparatively young, he did not think much of Wesley's sermons. For consistency's sake, as a Wesleyan preacher, he had them in his library; but when he wanted a volume on theology to read, he generally passed by them, and took hold of Saurin, &c. "But," said he, "I had a bad taste then."

6. Simplicity of doctrine and worship is of the highest importance, in opposition to that affectation of mystery and sacredness in which superstition and priestly power are enshrined. The true Christian minister can say, and rejoices to say it—

"His only righteousness I show,
His saving truth proclaim;
'Tis all my business here below
To cry, 'Behold the Lamb!'"

Or, in the language of the great Apostle (1 Cor. ii. 2): "I determined not to know anything among you save Jesus Christ and Him crucified." "God is a Spirit: and they that worship Him must worship Him in spirit and in truth." "Do this in remembrance of Me," shows the character of the Lord's Supper, as a commemorative ordinance. (1 Cor. xi. 23—26.) Baptismal regeneration, transubstantiation, church altars, wax candles, priestly vestments, and genuflections, and many other such-like things, are as far from Apostolic teaching and practice as romance is from sober, truthful narrative.

7. In relation to congregational psalmody. Genuine religious poetry is the language of sanctified passion under the inspiration or direction of genius. He who, in poetic composition, gives more attention to grammar, and logic, and sound, than to the free, glowing expression of just and noble sentiments, may be a good versifier, but certainly not a poet. He may be compared to a sparrow chirping upon the hedge, rather than to the lark ascending towards heaven and filling the air with artless, delightful melody. Touching sacred music, we will only refer, for the sake of illustration, to the Old Hundreth Psalm-tune. There are no fugues nor quavers in this noble tune. Cursorily viewed in the book, it is a simple, unpromising composition, a lot of dull minims and semi-breves; but there is a pathos and an elevation in it which render it a universal favourite. It is so true to nature, so entirely in harmony with all that is grand, and sacred, and blissful in religion, that we like it better after having been acquainted with it thirty, forty, or fifty years, than when we first heard it.

8. Public prayer. What an absurdity, not to say a profanity, to deliver a fine oration to the Deity, when we should be solemnly, humbly, earnestly praying to him!

"Prayer is the simplest form of speech,
That infant lips can try;" &c.

It is the language of the heart, at the throne of grace, in its various conditions or moods; the language of want, of dependence, of desire, of confidence, of gratitude, of adoration.

9. Having noticed several branches of simplicity, we will now refer to the root of it—simplicity of intention, purity of motive, in opposition to the innumerable artifices of selfishness, double-mindedness. "If thine eye be single, thy whole body shall be full of light; but if thine eye be evil, thy whole body shall be full of darkness" (Matt. vi. 22, 23). "Whether, therefore, ye eat or drink, or whatsoever ye do, do all to the glory of God" (1 Cor. x. 31). "All things whatsoever ye would that men should do to you, do ye even so to them," &c. (Matt. vii. 12). "He that giveth, let him do it with simplicity"—from genuine love. "Let love be without dissimulation. Abhor that which is evil; cleave to that which is good" (Rom. xii. 8, 9). "Behold an Israelite indeed, in whom is no guile" (John i. 47).

Lastly, our hearts, our intentions, desires, and affections, are purified through faith. We conclude, therefore, with a remark on the simplicity of faith. The great hindrances to the exercise of that faith which honours God and obtains the promises are proud reasonings, and depending on frames and feelings, leaning to our own understanding, and following impressions. Faith is taking God at His word; "believing that what He has promised, He is able also to perform."

"Faith, mighty faith, the promise sees,
And looks to that alone;
Laughs at impossibilities,
And cries, It shall be done."

W. DENT.

JUNIOR PREACHERS' DEPARTMENT.

POWER IN THE PULPIT.

BY THE REV. DR. FISH, OF AMERICA.

WHEN God called Aaron to the office of high-priest, he said, as a reason, "I know that he can speak well." The reason was weighty. Speech is a mighty power. It is God's chief instrument in salvation. God's word at first created the world, and His word, from the lips of His servants, is to re-create it. Ministers are speakers by profession. With them, therefore, power of speech is of the highest moment. It was never so needful as now. The churches want many things, but nothing so much as increased power in their pulpits. It is an era of progress; and if other agencies have increased power, the pulpit must have it or lose its supremacy. It is an active, busy, noisy age; and if the pulpit would be heard, it must lift up its voice like a trumpet. It is a pretentious age; and if errorists will obtrude their false views and theories, then must the pulpit meet and explode them. It is a wicked age; and if the current of vice is to be arrested, then must the pulpit be foremost, with the soul-penetrating dispensations of the word.

But let us do honour to the Holy Spirit. The preacher, while, like other speakers, he has power to inform and excite an audience, has not power, in himself, to compass the great aim of preaching. The aim of preaching is different from that of other public speaking. It looks deeper. It would renew and cleanse the heart. If it fails here, it fails entirely. And fail it will without the accompanying "power from on high." The renewal of the soul is what no man, with all the wealth of learning and scholarship, and of cultivated taste and oratorical power, can accomplish. It is "not by might, nor by power, but by My Spirit," saith the Lord. A sermon may be constructed after the best models; it may conform to all the rules of Homiletics; the text may be suitable and fruitful; the plan may be faultless; the execution may discover genius and judgment; there may be accurate analysis and strong reasoning; proof and motive; solidity and beauty; logic and passion; argument direct and indirect; perspicuity, purity, correctness, propriety, precision; description, antithesis, metaphor, allegory, comparison; motives from goodness, motives from happiness, motives from self-love; appeals to the sense of the beautiful, the sense of right, to the affections, the passions, the emotions; a sermon may be all this, and yet that very sermon, even though it fell from the lips of a prince of pulpit oratory, were as powerless in the renewal of a soul as in raising of the dead, if unaccompanied by the omnipotent energy of the Holy Ghost. But while the power which gives preaching success is supernatural, there are efficient modes of preaching the gospel, and inefficient modes. There are laws of persuasion; rules for influencing the mind. And these are appointed of God. Is it too much to suppose, then, that the influences of the Holy Spirit are more likely to be given in respecting these laws, than in the violation of them? Of Paul and Barnabas, it is said, in a particular instance, "They so spake that a great multitude, both of the Jews and also of the Gentiles, believed." Though a sovereign, yet the divine Being is not an arbitrary sovereign; and it cannot be denied that there is a general connection between the means and the end in the operations of grace, as well as in those of nature. What, therefore, would affect a man without the Spirit, we might expect to be employed by the Spirit to carry conviction to the heart. Otherwise, the kind of preaching were a matter of entire indifference.

Our object, then, is to determine the best methods of influencing men; or, in other words, to ascertain what are the conditions of power in the pulpit, in its human aspect. These conditions may be classified under three heads—the matter, the manner, and the man.

I. THE MATTER. If we are to influence the mind, we must have something to do it with. And to do this successfully, we must use truth—must speak according to facts. The mind assents to what it perceives to be true. Its constitution requires this. It is adapted to what is true, and is moved by it, as is the lock by the key. And it refuses to be moved by perceived untruth. If there is mistake in the statement, or fallacy in the reasoning, and this is seen, argument is useless. Speech has then no power.

But in preaching, religious truth is the instrument. The preacher is the appointed student and teacher of God's work. And if he would have power, he must "preach the word." A peculiar energy attends that word. It is the "sword of the Spirit;" the "fire," and the "hammer that breaketh the rock in pieces." It is "quick and powerful, and sharper than any two-edged sword." It is "perfect, converting the soul," and "making wise the simple." Human philosophy, the wisdom of the world, has never converted a soul. It tried, and tried in vain, even to subdue the passions, and reform the life. But where the gospel goes, it demolishes the heathen temples, and sets up the reign of God. It proves itself to be "the power of God unto salvation." Strong preachers have ever been Bible-preachers. The old Reformers drew their weapons from the heavenly armoury. The sermons of Bunyan, and Baxter, and Flavel, and men of their stamp, were full of God—instinct with living doctrines. Their very garb was after the Scripture pattern. Whitefield, as a custom, read the Bible with Henry's Commentary, day by day, on his knees, praying over every sentence, line, and word. Edwards and Davies were mighty in the Scriptures. Of Chalmers, it has been said, that his sermons "held the Bible in solution." Preachers who saturate their sermons with the word of God never wear out. The manna which they bring is pure, and sweet, and freshly gathered. It never cloy. God's word is deep, and he who studies it will ever have something new. He will never be dull, for the words of the Bible are strong, living words, and its images and descriptions are very flowers of elegance. Apt citations clench the passages of the preacher's discourse, and give sanction, dignity, positiveness, authority to it. And they shed light into his subject, like windows in houses, while to most of his hearers, certainly to the pious of them, these "very words" of the Holy Spirit are delightfully edifying. They come like sweet-throated birds with a melody to the soul. "I dearly love the sound of Scripture in a sermon," said an old minister. Who does not? We recall some of the fathers in the ministry—men of one book—the scriptural element of whose sermons (faulty in some respects) made them very gardens of spices. The people loved to hear them preach, because their discourses had the smell of the myrrh and the cassia in them.

Few preachers would not be more weighty if more scriptural. A writer asks, "Do ministers read the Bible much?" The question itself is startling. It is said of George Müller, author of the "Life of Trust," whom all admit to be at least a man of God, and whose preaching has been greatly blessed, that "he rises early, enters his closet, shuts the door, opens his Bible, offers a short prayer, especially to invoke the guidance of God's Spirit upon the reading and meditation of his holy word, then reads and meditates verse by verse, chapter by chapter, till his soul becomes wholly impressed with God's presence and impregnated with God's teachings." Let those who would have power in the pulpit, pursue a similar course.

But mere scripturalness does not make a strong sermon. Otherwise the recitation of inspired passages were sufficient. There must be thought as well. Men like to be made to think. They go to church to be instructed. The preacher, then, as a prime condition, must have something to say. It will not do to be always "Dropping buckets into empty wells,

And growing old in drawing nothing up."

A great want of most sermons is want of matter. In this age of mental activity and general intelligence, vigorous thinking, solid sense, are absolutely necessary to permanent pulpit success. Humanity is on the move. The very forces of nature seem at work fabricating and stimulating ideas, and they are taken up by everybody, as it were by absorption. Even plain folks, in our day, can tell the difference between a good sermon and a poor one. If the preacher depends on oratory or rhetoric, without thought, he will ultimately want a congregation. Intelligent people will tire of words, words, words, and demand ideas, and be apt to go where they can find them.

And again, as to matter in preaching, he who would have power must dwell much upon the two great, all-comprehensive doctrines of the Scriptures—man a sinner, and Christ a Saviour. Hence the law will be used as an effective instrument; for "by the law is the knowledge of sin." A full conviction of sin, says John Owen, is "a great and shaking surprisal unto a guilty soul." This "shaking surprisal" is the first thing to be gained. One must weep because of the "curse" with which the Old Testament closes, or his eye will not be caught by "the book of the generation of Jesus Christ," with which the New Testament opens. He must be taken by the hand and led up to the top of "stormy Ebal," or he will never be ready to fly to the "sun-lit height of Gerizim." The law must therefore be preached: it is indispensable to the authority and cogency of the pulpit—but not so much the law as the gospel—chiefly the cross of Christ. It was unto "the gospel of God" that Paul was "separated." Shiloh is the great attraction, and to "him shall the gathering of the people be." "And I, if I be lifted up, will draw all men unto me." The heart will yield to the power of the cross, when it will yield to nothing else. We are told of an old emblem in the shape of a lock, constructed of rings, on each of which was a letter, and which would unlock only when those rings were so disposed as to spell the word Jesus. Apt emblem of the human heart. Was one ever known to open except to the name of Jesus? Chalmers was not the only preacher who had spent years in laboriously describing vice and virtue, and urging men to be better, and all to no effect, simply because there was no "cross" in his preaching. And it is undoubtedly a chief defect in the sermons even of evangelical pulpits, that there is not enough of Christ in them. Pious people complain of this, especially in the sermons of those just from the "schools," and not without cause. The criticism of a certain theological professor upon the trial sermon of a student in the Seminary, would apply to a multitude of the moral essays read from our pulpits. "Young man, an educated heathen could write just as good a sermon as that!" It is a historical fact, that the most successful ministers, in any age or country, have been those who determined, with Paul, to know nothing "save Christ and him crucified." Beyond question, Flavel was right: "The excellency of a sermon lies in the plainest discoveries and liveliest applications of Jesus Christ." He who makes Christ prominent cannot go wrong in the matter of his preaching. It is Pascal who suggests that as there is one, and but one indivisible point from which any picture can be rightly viewed, every other point being too high or too low, too near or too distant, so is there in theology, one, and but one, right point of observation, and that point is the Cross of Christ. The preacher, therefore, who takes his position there, commands a view of all revealed truth, and will be sure to present truth and duty in their just relations and proportions.

(To be continued.)

FAMILY DEPARTMENT.

1. THOUGHTS ON EARLY TRAINING.

"When the ground is soft and gentle, it is time to sow the seed; when the branch is tender, we can train it easiest; when the stream is small, we can best turn its course."

The character of most men is formed and fixed before it is apprehended that they have, or can have, any character at all. Many vainly and fatally imagine that the first few years of life may be disposed of as you please; that a little neglect may easily be repaired; that a little irregularity may easily be rectified. This is saying, in other words, "Never regard the morning, sleep it, trifle it, riot it away; a little closer application at noon will recover the loss. The spring returns, the flowers appear upon the earth, the time of the singing of birds has come. No matter; it is soon enough to think of the labours of spring. Sing with the birds, skip with the fawn, the diligence of a more advanced, more propitious season will bring everything round, and the year shall be crowned with the horn of plenty."

A single ray of reason is sufficient to detect and expose such absurdity; yet human conduct exhibits it in almost universal prevalence. Infancy and childhood are vilely cast away; the morning is lost, the seed-time neglected, and what is the consequence? A life full of confusion, and an old age full of regret; a day of unnecessary toil, and a night of vexation; a hurried summer, a meagre autumn, a comfortless winter.

Benjamin Haydon was a painter, who, with considerable talent, might have gained fame and fortune by his profession, but for his self-will and obstinacy, which misled his judgment, soured his temper, disappointed his patrons, and turned his friends into enemies. "Oh! why did I not yield?" he bitterly cries on one occasion when he had quarrelled with his best friend, Sir George Beaumont. "Why did I not yield? It was because my mind wanted the discipline of EARLY TRAINING! I trace all the misfortunes of my life to this early and irremediable want—my will had not been curbed. Perhaps mine is a character in which all the parts would have harmonized, if my will had been broken early." This was his bitter lamentation; and he at last ended his unhappy life by committing suicide.

Richard Cecil was not far wrong when he said that, "The most common of all human complaints is parents groaning under the vices of their children"—vices too which have grown up under the very eyes of these parents; but which they lacked firmness to repress in time!

Good laws will not reform us, if reformation begin not at home. Baxter says, "This is the cause of all our misdeeds in Church and state, even the want of a holy education of children."—Selected.

2. TO MOTHERS.

ONE day last year a woman was begging. Thousands are doing this, but probably only a few for the same purpose. She had a little boy, and the anniversary of his baptism was near, and she desired when the day should come to offer special prayer for him. But she could not offer acceptable prayer—(so she had been taught)—unless at the same time she burned candles before the image of the saint whose name her infant bore. She required only two or three pence for those candles, but those few pence she did not possess. What could be done? Should her darling child lose the blessing for want of a trifle like that? No, she would beg for it! and so she did. In some places she might have worked for the money, but she seemed too weak for work; her looks told of great suffering and deep poverty; perhaps she felt her life ebbing out, and that her prayer was the only legacy she had to leave, and, according to her knowledge, she was doing her utmost to secure heavenly favour for her child.

In this fact is an example for Christian mothers. Your prayers are your most precious gifts. If you could give your children diamonds of the purest water, or countless wealth; if you could endow them with the fairest estate, or the keenest intellect, still your prayers would be a thousand times more precious than any of these separately, or than all of them together. But that you may pray time is wanted, and you are so busy that you have no time—at least you think so. Let us consider it. Can you not do something equivalent to this poor woman's begging? That entertainment now, which promises to be so pleasant, can you not be excused from it, and devote the time to prayer for your children? or can you not profitably cut off some of the time you are devoting to preparation for it, and give the time so saved to prayer? Try. Are there not some things you might leave undone, in order that you might secure time to pray with, and for your children? or are there not some things in which you might get help? for remember that money is well laid out which is spent to give you time to pray for your family. Could you not by these or other arrangements secure a little time every day—or in the course of the week? God expects from you only according to your ability. Your prayers are the only permanent influences you can bring to bear upon your children. As they grow up they will most likely have to remove from you, but your prayers will reach them wherever they may be, for He to whom you pray has them always in His eye. You may not live to see them settled in life, but your prayers will survive you, because they have entered the presence of the Immortal King, your Father. Often has the prodigal been arrested in his course of sin, by the persevering prayers of a mother. No one had faith to pray for him, beside herself. And perhaps he never would have been a prodigal at all, only that in his youth she prayed for him but casually; she trusted to a good providence, to good companions, to a good disposition; she had not learnt the power of prayer, and of her prayer in particular. But when she saw that he was on the brink of a precipice, when she knew what an awful gulf was yawning at his feet, when she saw him the slave of sin, then she forgot her friends, and in an agony betook herself to her Saviour, to cry for His help, and never ceased crying to Him, until her prayers were answered. Do not wait till a like agony come to you, but from the present moment devote some portion of your time to prayer for your children. Do you wish to see your sons holy and good men, serving God in their day and generation? Do you wish to see your daughters noble and useful women? Pray for them, and your Father will not for bread give a stone. Do we by these remarks make our prayers more powerful than the grace of God? or do we make our prayers the ground of our children's salvation? Certainly not; we do but point out a connexion which God Himself has appointed. God has entrusted you with these precious souls, that they may be trained and educated for His glory. You have the greatest influence over them, but how can that influence be wisely used, and properly directed, except by prayer and a holy life? We have not said anything about a holy life, feeling sure that where there is loving and earnest prayer, proper conduct will be maintained. Your children are bound to you by the closest bonds,—none love them so much as you do, and as a consequence none can pray for them so fervently as you; and even you with all your love, cannot teach them aright without prayer. But their salvation is not given absolutely into your power; they may be saved, even if you do not pray for them: the probability is, that they will be saved, if you do pray. In the first case, you through your own neglect forego the highest honours and the greatest glory of your relation; but, in the second case you reap the reward; your children are doubly yours,—yours after the flesh, and yours in the bonds of the Gospel.

The records of the Christian church through 1800 years, hardly furnish an instance of a child, the subject of earnest and continued parental prayer, who did not sooner or later become a Christian, and in the vast majority of cases eminently holy and useful Christians. With this fact before you, strengthened by the general promises of God, to hear prayer, we would say make time and opportunities to pray for your children, and then you will, sooner or later, be privileged to say: "For this child I prayed; and the Lord hath given me my petition which I asked of Him."

CALUS.

SUNDAY-SCHOOL DEPARTMENT.

ON THE SALVATION OF THE YOUNG.

Special Means should be adopted for the Conversion of the Young.— Children of a very tender age are capable of experimental religion. Christianity, which has mysteries too profound for an archangel to fathom, is so simple in its elementary principles as to be understood and enjoyed by a child. One of the most beautiful episodes in the Redeemer's wonderful life presents Him gathering little children in His arms and blessing them—a proof of His affectionate solicitude, and an impressive example to His Church. If the Lord is thus waiting to receive the young, should not the Church be anxious to bring them to His loving arms? What multitudes of them claim our attention! In our own Sabbath-schools and congregations we count them by myriads; outside our denomination by millions, finding them everywhere the greater portion of the world's population, each possessing an immortal principle, and destined for eternity. These will soon be the chief actors in the great drama of life, giving complexion and character to the age, wielding a mighty influence, malignant or beneficial, in the world's history, and acquiring habits which may fix their own eternal destiny for heaven or hell. How important that any revival in the Church should reach these masses of our juvenile population—that the children in our families and Sabbath-schools should be brought not only under religious influence (for that they are already), but into a state of personal salvation.

Sunday-schools' teachers we look also to you: How advantageous your position! Individually, you have each, it may be, from six to twelve children, of various ages, under your care; and, collectively, many thousands every Sabbath-day. You come in close contact with each mind, and you know the spiritual state of each child; you have gained their confidence and affection, and when you speak every eye is fixed upon you, and every ear is open to receive your instructions. Such is your opportunity for imparting Divine truth, and producing religious impressions. Can any position be more influential, except that of the Christian parent? But the parents of these children, alas! are, for the most part, ungodly, and you alone are their religious counsellors and guides. Now, what is your great work? It is to bring these children to Jesus. Nothing less than this can suffice, and to this all your efforts must directly tend, or they will fail in the great result. You teach them to read, but it is that they may search the Scriptures which testify of Christ. You expound a parable, or explain an incident in the Redeemer's life, but it is that they may become wise unto salvation. You desire them to be moral and obedient, but you look for this as a fruit of conversion, and not as a heathen virtue. Indeed, the salvation of his scholars is the alpha and omega of a pious teacher; and he cannot, he will not, be content with anything short of this great result—this climax of his wishes, endeavours, and prayers. Fix your heart on this, ye Christian teachers; set it before you as the precious prize; let it occupy your mind day and night, and draw forth your deepest sympathies and most earnest prayers. If ordinary means fail, try the extraordinary. Tell the children plainly of their awful danger; make known to them your own deep concern for them, your intense anxiety for their salvation : entreat them with tears to repent and turn to God ; lend them religious books, bearing on the necessity of immediate decision ; take them one by one into retirement ; endeavour to rouse their conscience by private remonstrance, and direct appeals in prayer to God on their behalf ; induce them to attend the special services that may be held in the house of God ; mark the effect of the Word on their hearts, and persuade them, if possible, to attend the after-meeting for prayer. It is likely that some of these means will be crowned with success ; but if, for a time, they all fail, still do not despond, but persevere, and you shall see the desire of your hearts. Some time ago a pious teacher thus set her heart on the conversion of her scholars, and, in a few months, she had the satisfaction of seeing eight of them in the enjoyment of salvation ; and if all teachers were equally anxious, and employed the same means, we should have thousands annually saved, and brought from the Sabbath-school into the Church of God.

Ministers of the Gospel should fix their hearts on the salvation of the young ; and we respectfully throw out the following suggestion :—

1. Let every minister regard the scholars in the Sabbath-schools and the children of our friends as a part of his spiritual charge, whose salvation he is bound to seek quite as much and as earnestly as he seeks the conversion of the adult members of his congregation. "Feed my lambs," said Christ to Peter ; and Paul, in writing his epistles to the Churches, forgets not that children were included in his apostolic charge.

2. Let the minister regard Christian parents and Sabbath-school teachers as forming two great auxiliary bands of willing labourers, to help him in his efforts to bring about the conversion of the children as early as possible ; and, as such, let him study and pray to find the best mode of directing and aiding them in their important efforts for that great and glorious result.

3. Ministers, in visiting the families of our friends, should freely converse with parents as to the spiritual state of their children, and afford the counsel and help required for their early conversion. They should, also, kindly notice the children of our friends, and, having secured their confidence and affection, speak to them freely about the importance of at once giving their hearts to God ; and in closing their pastoral visits with prayer, should specially remember the children in their supplications. Richard Baxter, Joseph Alleine, and many other pious ministers, were extensively useful in thus promoting the conversion of the families under their charge.

4. Circuit arrangements should afford the ministers frequent opportunities of visiting the Sunday-schools, so that ministers may encourage and direct the teachers in their work, may become known to the scholars, and address them on the necessity and advantages of early piety, constantly urging them, as a solemn duty, to prepare for the eternal world.

5. Occasional sermons, in a plain and familiar style, should be delivered to children in connection with public worship, the prime object of which should be the full and immediate surrender of the heart to God ; and, on such occasions, as well as in personal conversation, the minister should forcibly and frequently inculcate the obligations and responsibilities involved in Christian baptism. We admit the children of our friends to this ordinance, and acknowledge their covenant relation to God, and we do well; but our duty only begins here. It must be followed up by religious instruction and counsel, insisting on the all-important truth, that, in being baptised in the name of the Holy Trinity, they were dedicated to God's service, and are therefore bound by the most sacred obligations, on arriving at the age of reason, to ratify the consecrating act of their parents by a voluntary surrender of themselves to God, and a personal trust in the Lord Jesus for salvation. They should be informed that, unless they do this, they have no interest in God's covenant—they wilfully put themselves into the condition of rebels against their Maker, and, dying in that state, must perish eternally. Sometime ago I read of a child who was led to give his heart to God by considering his baptismal obligations; and were those obligations more frequently inculcated, doubtless our covenant God would sanction the duty by His Spirit's power, and render it effectual to salvation. Parents, also, should often be reminded of the solemn obligations arising from the dedication of their children to God in baptism. If the school and the Church of God—if parents, teachers, ministers, and officers—unite in these simple and practical measures, the revival of religion we so earnestly desire will penetrate our churches and the myriads of our children and young people. Our Sabbath-schools and our families will yield a continuous harvest; and the Church of God, replenished with useful members and zealous labourers, will be enabled more rapidly to extend her aggressions on the world, and accelerate the universal kingdom of our Lord.

As an important means of preserving the piety of youthful converts, and rendering our schools continually productive of spiritual fruit, there should be the most cordial and earnest co-operation between the managers of the school and the officers of the Church. The Sunday-school, as a religious, and not a secular institution, should be in closest sympathy with the Church, and the Church in closest sympathy with it. The aims and interests of both are identical, and the operations of both should be united and harmonious; yet, as a means thereto, the organization and management of the school should be subordinate to the maternal authority and influence of the Church. The Sunday-school lives for the Church, and not the Church for the Sunday-school; the latter is an auxiliary, not an equal, and should, therefore, never assume to be an independent institution, much less an obstructive rival; for this would arrest the progress of the work of God, and introduce discord and strife. With a right organization and harmonious management, both may concur in the best plans of religious action, and the school be rendered, what it should ever be, a nursery for the Church, a spiritual seed-plot, where plants of righteousness may germinate and grow, and flourish in verdure and constant fertility.

William Cooke, D.D.

---

MISCELLANIES.

---

1. ANGELS.

THE Scriptures inform us of a superior order of beings, called angels, or ministering spirits. They reside in the immediate presence of

God. They worship Him continually, and are ever ready to do His pleasure. Their nature was never defiled by transgression, nor their understanding ever darkened by sin. Ever since their creation they have been drinking at the fount of knowledge, and enjoying happiness of the purest kind. Their dispositions are sympathetic and benevolent, hence they delight to assist Christians in their pilgrimage to heaven. In ancient times they frequently appeared to the patriarchs and prophets—spoke to them in language easily understood, and were recognised as Jehovah's messengers. When Abraham, in obedience to the Divine command, was about to sacrifice his beloved son, when the wood was laid, and the knife lifted, "The angel of the Lord called unto him out of heaven, saying, lay not thine hand upon the lad, for now I know that thou fearest God." It was enough, Abraham's fidelity was proved, and the life of Isaac was spared. When the inhabitants of Sodom had so grieved the Lord, that He determined to destroy them, angels took charge of Lot—led him out of the doomed city, and pointed out to him a place of safety. When Jacob, in fleeing from the anger of Esau, became weary and tired, he laid himself down on the ground, with a stone for his pillow; while he slept he saw a ladder with its foot on the earth and its top in heaven; and angels were ascending and descending, showing him that the intercourse with heaven was open, and that he might ascend by faith to the skies. When Hagar in the wilderness was lamenting her wretched condition and that of her boy who was dying of thirst, the angel of God called to her out of heaven, and ministered comfort and relief. When Elijah fled from the anger of Jezebel into the wilderness and desired to die, an angel appeared to him, awoke him out of sleep, and ministered to his necessities. When Daniel was in the den of lions, an angel was with him restraining their ferocity, and closing their months. When the three Methodists of Babylon (as Foster calls them) were in the fiery furnace, an angel was with them, causing the very fire to lose its power to burn, so that not even a hair of their heads was singed, nor was the smell of fire on their garments. When the Saviour of sinners was born, angels appeared over the plains of Bethlehem, and in sweetest words announced the event to the wondering shepherds. When He had fasted and been tempted by the devil forty days, angels came and strengthened Him. When He agonized in the garden, an angel ministered to Him. On the morning of the resurrection, an angel rolled away the stone from the sepulchre. And when he was about to return to heaven,

"They brought his chariot from above,
To bear Him to His throne,
Clapp'd their triumphant wings and
The glorious work is done!" [cried,

An angel liberated Peter from prison. An angel comforted Paul as he sailed a prisoner towards Rome. And, indeed, they are all ministering spirits sent forth to minister for them who shall be heirs of salvation.

But they are not interested in the welfare of believers only, for when the tear of penitence falls, they rejoice, and when the prodigal, returns to his Father, there is joy in the presence of the angels of God.

How consoling and encouraging to know that amidst all the afflictions and trials of the Christian, angels are his companions, and when his life ends, they carry his spirit into Abraham's bosom.

"How cheering the thought that the spirits in bliss,
Will bow their bright wings to a world such as this!

Will leave the sweet songs of the mansions above
To breathe o'er our bosoms some message of love.
They come, on the wings of the morning they come,

Impatient to lead some poor wanderer home;
Some pilgrim to snatch from this stormy abode,
And lay him to rest in the arms of his God.

T. W.

2. THE INSCRIBED HOUSE AT CHESTER.

CHESTER is a quaint old city, almost unique in England. It is still surrounded by walls of defence; and the remains of battlements, towers, and gates are suggestive of times of disquiet and apprehension. The very streets of the central portion are dug below the level of the proper site; and the principal shops and dwelling-houses in them seem perched on galleries, and securely covered in by the overhanging upper floors, which was the customary style of building in the olden time. These "rows," as they are termed, supply endless subjects for thought. Here and there they are supported by massive carved pillars, and beams ornamented with various significant devices, all the more interesting as antiquities, from the irregularities wrought in them by the tooth of time. Some of the houses have the whole frontage covered with Scripture subjects elaborately carved in the fashion of the day, and conveying to the eye useful instruction, when none but "clerks" could read, and books were costly manuscripts beyond reach of the multitude. Thus on Bishop Lloyd's Palace is pictorially set forth in square compartments of dark oak, the story of Adam and Eve eating the forbidden fruit at the bidding of the serpent, whereby sin was first introduced into the Paradise of Eden. Then the fatal consequences of the fall are illustrated by the death of Abel; the atoning sacrifice for sin shown in the typical sacrifice of Isaac, etc. Several other subjects occupy the remaining compartments, whose meaning is not so obvious.

In the Watergate-street there was another house which excited the visitor's wondering attention, and occasioned deep regret to the citizens when taken down by a new owner in his zeal for modern improvements in street architecture.* It was a very ancient gable-roofed structure, bearing the date of 1652 in the upper part; but on the principal beam of the first floor was this remarkable inscription, shining out brilliantly in curious old white letters on a black ground :—

"God's providence is mine inheritance."

On inquiry, tradition states that about the year 1648 Chester was visited by a fearful plague, by some termed the "sweating sickness," from its peculiar symptoms. It was sudden in its attacks, rapid in its progress, and so fatal in its results, that scores of people died daily. All trade was suspended, and no business transacted except that connected with the melancholy duty of burying the dead in a field apart from all other sepulchres.

Many of the panic-stricken inhabitants fled from the infected city; but the owner of this dwelling-house, considering himself at the post of duty, and firmly confiding in divine protection, remained with his family and servants to alleviate as far as possible the afflictions of their neighbours. Day by day he prayed for God's help, and night after night was he permitted to show forth God's faithfulness to his promises in the midst of his household; but it was a terrible season, and the hearts of the family often sank within them as they marked the daily ravages of the pestilence. The most robust were often stricken down in the streets, and died ere they could be carried to their homes; while the compassionate bearers paid the penalty of their Christian courage by themselves also becoming victims to the infectious malady. Week by week the scene became more and more dreary. Fathers, mothers, children were taken. Sometimes whole families were cut off together, without one survivor to prolong the name. Gloomier and gloomier was the prospect from the windows of the old house in Watergate-street. The town walls seemed to bar out the fresh air from the surrounding country; but possibly this prevented the infection from spreading abroad. The shops were all closed, for there were none to buy and sell. Grass grew in the streets, for there were none seen about save the physician, the minister, or the sexton. Not even a tolling bell relieved the dismal silence; the youthful singers at the venerable cathedral had ceased their sweet melody, and the most devout feared contagion by joining in public worship; yet still the praying man and his family lived on, if not in perfect health, yet without any fatal symptoms.

* In January 1862. It is hoped the frontage may still be preserved.

The inhabitants of the house on the right hand were smitten, one after another, and all were carried off to the "Plague Field;" then those on the left hand disappeared, one by one, and found a resting-place in the same devoted spot. The sounds of sickness, sorrow, and bereavement were distinctly heard and excited the liveliest sympathy, and fervent intercession on their behalf at the throne of grace; for he who prays for himself is always mindful of others also. "Are they not tempting Providence?" "Can the Lord's hand shield them amidst such rare calamity?" "Ought they not to fly while strength yet remained?" were considerations which could not but agitate their thoughts. It is not known what motives prompted to the stay in Chester throughout the perilous season; possibly the sickness was so sore in the land that the good man felt that as "safety is of the Lord," he could not mend his position, and might go forth into still greater danger; for it is a well-known fact that many carried the plague away with them, and not only died themselves, but spread contagion into other localities, thus increasing instead of diminishing the evil.

Doubtless they realized all the dread solemnity of eternity, and while daily renewing their faith in the atoning sacrifice of Jesus, they tried so to live that they might be "ready to die" at any moment, however suddenly their call might come.

At length the plague was stayed. No more deaths from this cause occurred; the surviving population began to return to the city; to purify their houses; to re-open the shops, and to resume all the affairs of life which had been so long and so dismally suspended. Great was the general astonishment at the wonderful protection of the dweller in this old house; and when he had heard the tales of sorrow and bereavement which all had to relate, he more fully comprehended the measure of his own preservation; and grateful for the mercy vouchsafed to himself, and anxious to make it known for the encouragement of his posterity, he inscribed conspicuously on the front of his house the cheering motto—"God's providence is mine inheritance."

The house remained almost unaltered within, up to the period of its demolition, having been wainscotted throughout, with such low ceilings that a tall person could scarcely stand upright, even in the principal apartments. The walls leaned, too, and the floors were uneven, while the supporting pillars bent ominously, as if age had wrought some decay; but the beautiful words of the pious householder were kept brightly painted, fit emblem of the faith that prompted them! Who would wish so striking a memorial to be obliterated? Rather would we hope that every new tenant would learn the lesson taught by his predecessor two hundred years ago, and seek to find the same inheritance realized in his own happy experience.

This mode of signalizing special events is of very ancient origin. We read in the early Scriptures, that Old Testament believers were accustomed to inscribe upon their houses, or upon stone pillars, some pithy sentence to commemorate passing circumstances of importance; and even in desert regions, the "graven rocks" bear witness to this love of registering that which greatly affects mankind. Perhaps it belongs to a comparatively simple state of society, and to that ardour of early love to God that cares nothing for the opinions of the world, and can brave the ridicule of the inexperienced as an expression of ignorance not qualified to judge.

Our unknown writer knew and felt, and "therefore he spoke." The very name of the teacher is forgotten, and scoffers laugh at what they term the "cant" of the Puritan times. But who among the sons of men, "in their right minds," would not earnestly desire,
 "God's providence for his inheritance?"
 And what could he then desire more? "It is of the Lord's mercies that we are not consumed. . . . They are new every morning."

Men are proud of illustrious descent, of family fame; and many an obscure individual is consoled amidst poverty and hardship by the remembrance that he is of royal blood, and entitled to share in the privileges of nobility.

These are, however, but trifling distinctions, if any at all, in the eyes of the Great Ruler of the universe. He says, "To this man will I look, even to him that is poor and of a contrite spirit, and that trembleth at my word." The inheritances of houses and lands perish in the using, but the rich legacy of a parent's faith and prayer obtains blessings for his offspring long after he has mouldered into dust. "Beloved for the fathers' sakes." "Mercy is shown unto children's children." God "forgetteth not the cry of the humble;" and each new mercy affords us encouragement for future trust in Him who has so often manifested His powerful loving-kindness in the day of need. Regarded in this light how many an ancestral pedigree abounds with startling instances of God's interposition to save life just when destruction seemed inevitable? Every earthquake, shipwreck, fire, and railway casualty has a long list of "narrow escapes" to append to the enumeration of fatal occurrences. And, could we look into the moral world, still more could be told of God's rescue from indifference and presumption, doubt and infidelity, from temptation to actual crime, the agony of remorse, or the torpor of despair. Ah, we little know what we escape in answer to those petitions our Saviour taught us to utter, "Lead us not into temptation, but deliver us from evil."

"It is not in man that walketh to direct his steps;" "When my spirit was overwhelmed within me then thou knewest my path;" "My steps had well nigh slipped," are the exclamations of many a believer in Christ as he reviews the course of his pilgrimage. Happy, then, are those who, having taken God for the guide of their youth, are kept by the power of His Word from the corruptions that are in the world. So seductive are these corruptions, so subtle the great enemy of souls, who spreads them out as snares for the unwary, that nothing short of the Almighty arm of God could preserve us to the inheritance of the saints in light. But, inasmuch as God himself gave His only-begotten Son to die for sinners, "how shall He not with Him also freely give us all things?" "If God be for us, who can be against us?" But, if He be against us, what then? The heritage of mercy in Jesus is freely bestowed upon all who seek it. None need hesitate for a plea—

"All the fitness Christ requireth
Is to feel your need of Him."

But to those who reject His mercy there remaineth nothing but a certain fearful looking for of judgment—the inheritance of "blackness of darkness for ever," where there is "wailing and gnashing of teeth." God grant that you and I, dear reader, may enjoy "God's providence for our inheritance" both in time and eternity. E. W. P.

3. THE DEPRAVED CRIMINAL; OR, THE IMPROPER PRAYER ANSWERED.

DR. Edmund Calamy relates in his life, that some persons of the name of Mart, in whose family he resided for some time, had a son who discovered the most impious and wicked disposition. When confined in prison he wrote letters professing penitence, but as soon as he had opportunity he returned to his former sins.

This young man had been the darling of both father and mother, and the latter had set her affections upon him to so great a degree, that when she saw him a monster of wickedness, she became deranged, and attempted to destroy herself, in which she at length too well succeeded. The wicked youth, so far from being suitably impressed, now ran to greater lengths in wickedness. At length he professed penitence, and applied to the Rev. Samuel Pomfret to intercede for him with his father. He was made ready for sea, but unhappily became connected with a gang of villains, and on the very night before he was to set sail, he robbed Mr. Pomfret, was pursued, tried, and condemned to die.

On the Sabbath preceding the Wednesday on which he was sentenced to die, his father entreated Dr. Calamy to accompany him that evening to his cell in Newgate, to converse with him, and to give his opinion as to the propriety of seeking to obtain a pardon. The doctor went and found him in a very awful state of mind, resenting different things which he conceived his father had done wrong, and saying that he might obtain a pardon for him if he would but part with some of his money. In vain did the doctor expostulate with him on the improper feelings he manifested, and entreat him to humble himself before God on account of his sins, as the only way of engaging his friends to obtain for him a reprieve. His reply was, "Sir, I scorn anything of that nature." The doctor reasoned with him on the existence of a hereafter, charged him with the death of his mother, taxed him with the murder of some persons abroad, whose blood he had actually shed, and showed him the heavy punishment he must endure in an eternal world, unless he turned to God, repented of his sins, and prayed for pardon through the atonement of the Lord Jesus. He admitted the truth of all these things, but was filled with trifling unconcern. He frankly said that he had no hope of being better in his character, and that he was rather satisfied he should grow worse. The next morning he was visited by Dr. Jekyl, who asked him whether during the whole time he had been confined in Newgate, he had once bowed his knees to the great God, making it his earnest request to him to give him a sense of his sins, and to create in him a tender heart. He admitted that he had not, nor did he think it of any use. An offer was made to him that if he would engage to pray morning and evening for the grace of God, an effort should be made, with every probability of success, for a reprieve, and subsequently a pardon. But he would make no engagement, and died on the day previously appointed.

On the day of his execution the father of the unhappy young man told Dr. Calamy that when the culprit was a very young child, and their only child, he was exceedingly ill with a fever, and that both his wife and himself thinking their lives were bound up in the life of the child were exceedingly importunate with God in prayer that his life might be spared. A pious woman expostulated with them on the vehemence they manifested, and said she dreaded the consequence of their praying in such a way, and that it became them to leave the matter to an infinitely wise God. At length the father said, "Let him prove what he will, so he is but spared, I shall be satisfied." The old man added, "This I now see to have been my folly; for through the just hand of God, I have lived to see this wretched son of mine a heart-breaking cross to those that loved him with the greatest tenderness, a disgrace to my whole family, and likely to bring my gray hairs with sorrow to the grave. I read my sin very distinctly in my punishment, but must own that God is righteous in all his ways, and holy in all his works."—Dr. Calamy's Life and Times.

Sent by G. LEE.

NOTICES OF PUBLICATIONS.

1. The Revival of Religion: the Best Means of Promoting it, and of Securing its Fruits. Prepared and published at the request of the Conference of 1862. By WILLIAM COOKE, D.D.

THIS very valuable pamphlet, as the title indicates, was both prepared and published by Dr. Cooke, at the request of the Methodist New Connexion Conference of the present year. Numerous and important as have been the services rendered by the able author to the cause of evangelical religion, we question if this will not prove to be one of the most valuable. Any one acquainted with Dr. Cooke's works will expect to find here clear and scriptural statement, sound and forcible reasoning, pointed and powerful appeals to the heart and conscience, and throughout his work an evident earnestness of purpose to promote the glory of God and the salvation of men; nor will such expectations be cut off. We have transferred to our pages elsewhere a few portions of the pamphlet adapted to do good among our Sabbath-schools, and hope this will stimulate our friends to procure and read the entire production. The price being only one penny, the esteemed author has placed it within the reach of the poorest of the poor, and glad are we to learn that besides the large numbers sold in his own denomination, a very large quantity has been purchased by other churches.

While urging our readers to procure, and, if they have the means, to distribute broadcast, this excellent pamphlet, we cannot refrain from giving here a short quotation or two, which we specially commend to their prayerful attention:—

“The word revival, in its most comprehensive sense, includes both the quickening of the Church itself and the conversion of sinners; and though these are distinct in themselves, they are so essentially united, that it is no unphilosophical or unusual appropriation of language to allow this one term to comprehend the two ideas. A revived Church is a soul-saving Church.”

Again, speaking of believing prayer as a means of revival, he says—

“Here, then, is our grand charter—the Spirit, in His plenitude and power, is to be given in answer to our prayers. Let the duty be performed in faith, and the promise shall be verified; and thus verified, the Churches shall become instinct with life and be clothed with power, and an influence shall go forth to the world that shall make it quail before the truth of God. The apostles had power with man because they had power with God, and this truth has been exemplified in a thousand instances. Bramwell’s wonderful success in the ministry was owing to his pleading earnestness with God. Waller used to wrestle with God for hours in prayer; sometimes lying flat on his face, and sometimes keeping night vigils, interceding with God for precious souls. The late revivals in America, Ireland, India, and Africa, may all be traced to intercessory prayer. And the wonderful missionary career of the Moravians sprang from unceasing prayer. In the year 1731 that people organised a system by which continuous intercessory prayer should ascend to heaven from the Church, night and day, and through every hour during each night and day, twenty-four men and as many women being alternately engaged, two by two, in this holy exercise, besides the ordinary prayers of the Church and of the private Christian. That self-consecration in the missionary work became then developed which has since astonished Christendom by its singular character. Within four short years from that time the Moravians sent missionaries to Greenland, North America, St. Thomas, St. Croix, Surinam, South Carolina, Lapland, Tartary, Algeria, Guinea, the Cape of Good Hope, and to the island of Ceylon; and now they are said to have 1,500 missionaries, lay and clerical, and 180,000 reclaimed heathens in Church fellowship with them. Such are the visible fruits of prayer.”

2. Popery Unmasked; being Thirty Conversations between Mr. Daylight and Mr. Twilight, in which the peculiar doctrines, morals, government, and usages of the Romish Church are truthfully stated from her own duly-authorised works, and impartially tried by God’s word, the only unerring rule of doctrine and duty. By HENRY WOODCOCK, Primitive Methodist Minister. London: R. Davies, Sutton Street, Commercial Road East. May be had of Primitive Methodist Ministers.

WE have here a handsome volume in cloth, 350 pp., for the low charge of half-a-crown. The work itself, as to its style and subject, can hardly fail to be interesting and instructive to readers generally. As we have elsewhere said, it is an encyclopædia on the Popish question. To the young people in our societies and schools the work will be found a valuable boon. We do not recollect any work extant in which so much reliable information on the subject is brought into so small a compass, and offered at so low a price. If the work do not sell very extensively, both among our own people and other Protestant denominations, we shall be much surprised.

We hope the labours of the respected author will be appreciated as they deserve, and then many an edition of the work will soon be called for.

3. Ebenezer, and other Poems, Commemorative of the Jubilee of Primitive Methodism, 1860. London: R. Davies, Sutton Street, Commercial Road.

THIS is a cheap and handsome volume by one of our esteemed lay brethren at Newcastle-on-Tyne,—Mr. Ralph Blackett,—and would be a very appropriate reward-book for Sabbath-schools, as well as being worthy of the best attention of our members and friends in general. It has been favourably reviewed by several influential journals, and by many of our leading ministers. The poetry is of no mean order; and the valuable historical and Connexional information it contains renders it worthy of an extensive circulation.

Let each of our readers soon procure a copy, and also recommend the work to his or her friends.

4. A Sermon on the Soul of Man, preached at the Baptist Chapel, St. Alban’s, April 23, 1862. By DANZY SHEEN, the youthful Preacher. Published by request. St. Alban’s: R. Gibbs. Islington: Bond, 30, Upper Cross Street. Luton: Stalker. Dunstable: Tibbett.

DANZY SHEEN is a juvenile local preacher in the London Second Circuit, and has been called upon, on different occasions, to preach in other stations, whither his fame has reached; and the sermon before us was preached at St. Alban’s, while fulfilling one of these extra engagements.

The text is Matthew viii. 36. The sermon is such as becometh a youthful preacher: it has on it the stamp of originality and genius, and it breathes a spirit of piety and zeal. We freely confess we like the sermon all the more for the absence of the masterly arrangement and the elegant diction, after which some juveniles aspire. The preacher does not appear on stilts, and make one nervously fear for his safety. He keeps on the level of his own capacity and experience, and his style is therefore natural and agreeable. If he attend diligently to the cultivation of his powers, and maintain deep personal piety, we augur for him a career of great usefulness.

5. Sights in the Pit, and Peeps in Glory: included in a Short Sketch of the Life, Vision, and Death of Mary Rider, Donington, Salop. Compiled by B. WHILLOCK. Published for W. Pool, Dawley, Salop, by Joseph Slater, Iron-bridge and Dawley.

MARY RIDER was evidently an extraordinary young person, and was favoured with many tokens of the divine regard; and it is very refreshing to read this touching sketch of her short but bright career. She was early converted to God, and strove thereafter to be the means of the conversion of others. Of her vision we can pronounce no positive opinion; but of her pious life and happy death, we can say the one is worthy of imitation, and the other such as we wish for our friends.

The compiler has acquitted himself skillfully in the execution of his task, and his little book is worthy of extensive patronage.

6. England's Flag Half-Mast High. Two Orations on the Death of his late Royal Highness the Prince Consort. By Rev. THOS. LOWE, Author of "The Pilot of the Galilean Lake," &c. London: R. Davies, and Jarrold and Sons.

MR. LOWE could not be expected to allow the event of the death of the Prince Consort to pass away unimproved. He is one who believes "a word in season, how good it is;" and he has talents of that versatile and popular class that enable a man to seize on passing occurrences and turn them to valuable account. The two orations were delivered at Tunstall and Lynn, and are founded on the following texts,—"Jesus wept," and "He must reign till he hath put all enemies under his feet. The last enemy that shall be destroyed is death." A touching and appropriate tribute to the memory of the lamented Prince is contained in each, and some beautiful illustrations of Scripture, and quotations of anecdote and poetry are found in both. The style, as in all our friend's productions, is highly poetical. For some readers, perhaps, too much so; but there are others who will enjoy it with a hearty relish. As specimens of his style take the following sentences:—"The world-reverberating diapason of the Archangel's trumpet shall rouse to renewed and unending life the mouldering dust of buried ages." "This immortal and glorious hope is the cradle of mortal agony, a sure anchor in the stormy blast, the lamp of the sepulchre, the pharos or the lighthouse of the death-gulf, shedding the cheering blaze of its glory over the black, cold billows."

7. Children and their Thoughts. By MARY K. ROBY, Author of "Story of a Household." London: Aylott and Son, 8, Paternoster Row.

A SWEET little volume of poems—such as children, if at all educated, will be sure to admire and prize. The amiable authoress has drunk deeply at the Pierian spring, and at a better spring than that. The living waters are in her cup, and she passes them round with a hearty goodwill. Let our young friends obtain this beautiful little work, and read, mark, and learn it. It will do them good.

8. One Hundred Evening Hymns. Edited by the Rev. F. LIEFF, M.A. Aylott and Son.

WE purpose giving practical expression to our admiration of this work by giving some of the hymns in both our Juvenile and our Large Magazines. The hymns are rich in sentiment, chaste in expression, and have the ring of the genuine coin in them. They are selected from some of our best religious poets, and may be used in the family circle, at the hour of evening devotion, with great spiritual advantage. Would that our family worship more generally included singing, as well as reading and prayer. We have a decided impression that the religion of our families would sustain no loss thereby.

9. The Character of the Bible. Abridged from an old Author. Aylott and Son. This neat little penny production contains not only the beautiful article which gives the title, but several other matters in prose and in poetry. There is a strong leaning to "our Church," as by law established, observable in some of them; so that the sectarian element is rather too conspicuous. But, nevertheless, we can speak in favourable terms of the spirit and object of the production as a whole; and the first article in the collection is cheap at the price of the book.

10. The Book that will Cheer You: or, Hymns for the Living and Dying. By RICHARD JUKES. London; R. Davies, Sutton Street.

THIS is a neatly got-up volume of Mr. Jukes' poems, many of which have previously appeared in his smaller publications, and in that form have done good service to the cause of experimental Christianity. It is well known that in the great American, Irish, Scotch, and other religious revivals, our friend's hymns were freely used, and were made a great blessing. It gives us pleasure to see them in their present form, and we hope the sale will be such as to exceed the author's most sanguine anticipations, and that another edition may shortly be called for.

11. Modern Revivals: their Features and Incidents. By JOHN SIMPSON, author of "Smiles and Tears," "Two Sons," &c. London: R. Davies, Primitive Methodist Book Room. Ward and Co., Paternoster Row; and Leeds: J. Parrott, Briggate.

THE respected author informs us that the substance of his work was delivered in the character of a lecture in Derby, Liverpool, and other places; and that he is indebted to the Rev. W. Arthur, for the particulars respecting the Irish Revivals; and to the author of "The Power of Prayer," for those in connection with the movement in America. Of the importance of his subject our readers will scarcely hold two opinions, and those who are acquainted with his previous productions will not need to be informed that he is fully competent to the treatment of it. Many very thrilling facts are here narrated in a style at once lively and sober, and those inferences and practical suggestions which a thoughtful observer might desiderate, will be found interspersed through the pages of the work as a good taste and sound judgment have dictated. We trust the book will have an extensive circulation, and be a means of doing great good.

12. The Quiver: designed for the Defence and Promotion of Biblical truth, and the Advancement of Religion in the Homes of the People. Vol. I and parts 7, 8, and 9. London: Cassell, Petter and Galpin.

WE have no hesitation in pronouncing the "Quiver" one of the cheapest and best of our serials. The reader must be difficult to please who can lay down this first volume without feeling that its perusal is a rich treat. All classes of purchasers are accommodated, too, in regard to the price. The penny number, the fivepenny part, and the cheap and handsome volume, are alike available. Of all Mr. Cassell's surprising enterprises, this is, perhaps, the most astonishing. Here we have biography, history, sacred and profane, science, Biblical exposition, anecdote, chronological narrative, poetry, and divinity, beautifully intermixed. All sound, all clear, all beautiful, all useful. For Sabbath-school teachers, junior preachers, and families, it is an admirable work. It has our very hearty recommendation. We shall most probably ere long enrich our pages with some valuable extracts.

13. John Leifchild, D.D. A Sketch of his Character and Ministry; with brief Notes of his Last Days. By JAMES BALDWIN BROWN, B.A. London: Ward and Co., 27, Paternoster Row. 1892.

THIS is a charming tribute of affection to departed worth. Mr. Brown was a relative of Dr. Leifchild, and, therefore, while it may be supposed he has spoken of the doctor with the sympathy of relationship, it must be remembered he has spoken from intimate acquaintance. Dr. Leifchild was no ordinary man, no ordinary Christian, and no ordinary preacher. He had a large soul in a large body, and all his performances were characterized by true greatness. We most devoutly wish that the spirit of this noble man—one of the noblest of heaven's aristocracy—may be largely enjoyed by the rising ministry, both among ourselves and all the churches of the saints. To our own junior preachers, at all events, we most earnestly recommend this precious book.

14. Services on occasion of the Death of the Rev. John Burnett, of Camberwell.

London: John Snow, Paternoster Row. THIS shilling pamphlet consists of a biographical sketch of Mr. Burnett, extracted from the Nonconformist newspaper, addresses at the funeral by E. Miall, Esq., Rev. John Pillans, and Rev. C. Stanford; and funeral sermons by Dr. Lindsay Alexander, and Rev. John Pillans. It is fraught with interest to all lovers of good and true men. Mr. Burnett was a thorough going dissenter, and held a high position among the Congregationalists of the United Kingdom, and especially among those who support the Liberation Society. We never saw him but once, but he was a man of that class whom to see is to know and to remember. The pamphlet before us does honour to his character, and is alike creditable to those who have written it, and to him of whom they have written.

15. Theological and Homiletical Commentary on the Gospel of St. Luke. Specially designed and adapted for the use of Ministers and Students. From the German of J. J. Van Oosterzee, D. D. Edited by J. P. LANGE, D.D., Professor of Divinity in the University of Bonn. Translated by SOPHIA TAYLOR. Vol. I. Edinburgh: T. and T. Clark. London: Hamilton, Adams and Co. Dublin: J. Robertson.

THIS is one of the volumes of the Messrs. Clark's Foreign Theological Library, which has been, and still is, deemed so great a boon to Theological Students and Christian Ministers. It were difficult to speak in too favourable terms of this noble series of works in general, or of this work in particular. This volume is worthy of the respectable house from which it emanates, and saying this is no slight praise. Would that the work were in the hands of all our ministers. If any wealthy or liberal friend should wish to do a kindness to a devoted Primitive Methodist preacher, let him select from the "Foreign Theological Library;" and if at a loss what works to select, let him begin with Vol. I. of Oosterzee on Luke. We presume Vol. II. will be equally worthy. Dr. Lange, who has edited this volume, is himself a commentator of no mean order; and, it would seem, for some reason, Dr. Oosterzee has become a coadjutor with him in this kind of labour. The pair are meely united; the learning, the piety, the honesty, the orthodoxy, of both alike command our admiration. We have here none of the neological, transcendental nonsense, of which German authors have, of late years given us more than enough. But soundness of judgment, depth of thought, frankness of expression, clearness of style, and usefulness of aim, distinguish both these able and devoted men. Nor should the easy and appropriate English of the lady translator be forgotten. We have great pleasure in recommending this volume.

16. History of the Development of the Doctrine of the Person of Christ. By Dr. J. A. DORNER, Professor of Theology in the University of Gottingen. Division First, First Four Centuries, Vol. II. Translated by Rev. D. W. SIMON. Edinburgh: T. and T. Clark. London: Hamilton, Adams and Co. Dublin: J. Robertson.

THIS is another of the Messrs. Clark's publications, and another of much the same class as the one above-named. This volume is but one of a series on the same subject, and, of course, can only be spoken of as a portion of an entire work. But so far as we can see, it belongs to a valuable series. The doctrine of the supreme divinity of our Lord Jesus Christ is shewn to have been the doctrine held by the early church in general down to the time of the Athanasian controversies. Times and places there were in which this great truth seemed in danger of being lost, but our author shows that despite all opposition it still won its triumphant way, illustrating the sentiment, "Truth is great, and will prevail." The work is a proof of profound and various scholarship, and is a rich treasure to the Biblical Student.

N.B.—We have received for notice Vol. II. of Sibbes' works; the Bicentary Essays of Drs. Angus and Waddington; Church Reform, by Rev. W. Bevan; Family Prayers, Bible exercises, Timpson's Memoirs of Elizabeth Fry; The City of the Great King; The Future, by Rev. J. Cox; The Wearmouth Abbots: Hymns for Pastors and People, by Rev. S. Dunn; A Sermon on the Death of Prince Albert, by a Home Missionary; Baggaly's Digest of the Minutes, &c., of the Methodist New Connexion; and some smaller publications. They shall have early notice.

HOME RELIGIOUS INTELLIGENCE.

WORK OF GOD.

PLYMOUTH MISSION.—Dear Editor,—Soul-saving work you, with me, consider to be the greatest of all work. He that winneth souls is wise. And they that turn many to righteousness shall shine as the stars for ever and ever. Hallelujah, for the prospect of such a glorious reward. How the thoughts of it impel one forward through storm and tempest, wind and rain, with the hope of rescuing even one poor soul from the gripe of hell's grim tyrant. Knowing that revivalistic intelligence is cheering to you and your numerous readers from any quarter, I feel induced to send you an outline of what God is doing in this corner of His extensive vineyard.

Newton was missioned twelve months ago last April, by Brother J. Rackham and colleagues. And frequently was the dewy drop seen to glisten in the eye, or silently wend its way down the furrowed cheek of the aged; while our preachers in the open-air, standing upon a saw-pit dispensed the Word of Life to an attentive people. No further good seemingly was effected; the people standing in awe of their vicar: he having aforetime showed himself an opponent to Methodism. But in spite of every influence, the brethren on this station in compliance with a request from headquarters to extend their borders, determined upon sending a preacher here to live.

And on the 21st of September, 1861, the writer came hither to reside—a stranger among strangers. He found the people in an awful state, sin's torrent in the form of Sabbath desecration and drunkenness, sweeping them down to hell's dark abode. Things were very discouraging to look at, there not being a member in society with us, nor a place to preach in, save beneath the wide canopy of heaven. Placing his trust in Jehovah, and arming himself with power at the throne of grace, he boldly sallied forth on the following day like young David in Elah's valley to do battle with hell's Goliath. And accordingly the monster was defeated, and his stronghold carried by storm; a place was soon obtained to preach in, and the word faithfully delivered was blessed to those who heard it.

During a course of protracted meetings last winter, the Spirit was mightily poured upon us, and many souls were saved. At one meeting a young man was discovered mocking God, by imitating the distressed soul. Upon seeing this, the writer exhorted God's people to pray for him. While doing so a young woman labouring under deep convictions at the further end of the room, rose from her knees and rushed to the door like one frantic. We then prayed for them both. After the meeting was over, influenced by the devil, and prompted by wicked men, the young woman came back and stormed at us like one of hell's furies. We took no further notice than to pray for her. Finding we heeded her not she withdrew in a great rage; and soon after was found at the feet of Jesus clothed, and in her right mind. She is now one of our most consistent members. At another meeting a number of hell's champions provided a chain, and threatened to drag the writer through the river, which is close by. But trusting in God he took his stand in their midst, and preached Jesus to them, and came off unhurt. Since that time the good work has gradually progressed; some forty or fifty have been converted, and a class of thirty members established. To God be all the glory! The kitchen in which we worshipped becoming too small the cry was raised, Give us room. Efforts were soon made to obtain a more commodious place, in which we undoubtedly should have failed, had not the Lord converted one, Mr. Anthony, whose house another party occupied for preaching. His love for our people soon induced him to give them notice to quit, which they accordingly did. We then went to work to supply the place with seats and pulpit, which we have succeeded in doing at the cost of £5. The place will seat about seventy.

On June 22nd, the writer preached the opening sermons. And on the Monday we had a public tea, when 90 persons sat down to a refreshing repast in the open-air. After tea we held a very interesting meeting out of doors, at which addresses were given by Brothers Vanstone, Chudleigh, Harper, Goad, the Rev. J. Holroyd, and the writer. With donations, collections, and profits of tea, we have defrayed the expense incurred. After the meeting out of doors we retired to the chapel and held a prayer-meeting, when six souls came to the penitents' form, three of whom found salvation in the blood of the Lamb. Praise the Lord.

Holberton.—At this place the Lord has begun to work. On the 29th of April last, it was missioned by Brother Wild, and on May the 11th, the writer conducted a very powerful camp-meeting here, the first one ever held in the place. Since then many souls have been saved. At a meeting conducted by the writer on the 27th of May, the heavens seemed to drop fatness; and in the prayer-meeting, after preaching, the barn in which we hold our meetings appeared to be flooded with the Divine glory. And while we sang,
 "There is a fountain fill'd with blood," twelve souls wended their way weeping to the foot-stool of divine mercy, two or three of whom found the pearl of great price.

On the 10th of June the writer took his stand in the centre of a fair being held here, and preached Christ. After a short sermon we processioned to the barn and held another meeting, when two souls stepped into the glorious liberty of God's dear children. The converting work is still rolling along. There have been about twenty-five souls brought to God, twenty of whom have united in Church-fellowship with us here. Efforts are being made to secure a chapel, which is for sale in the place. That God may open our way, and save hundreds of precious souls, is the earnest prayer of yours in Jesus,

WILLIAM THOMSETT.

2. CROWLE WHARF GREAT MEETING.—The special effort made at this place has been crowned with signal success. On Sunday and Monday, June 22nd and 23rd, we held our sixteenth anniversary, in the field belonging to our kind friend J. Watson, Esq., who annually accommodates us. We had an excellent supply of preachers, who delivered not less than thirty-five soul-stirring discourses, namely, J. Bywater, T. Penrose, J. W. Howell, T. Kendall, R. W. Monkman, T. Whitehead, T. Waumsley, P. Milson, W. Andrew, J. Wilson, J. Ratcliffe, and the writer. The addresses on the Sabbath day were attended with a very gracious influence, those on the Monday, says an intelligent looker-on, were powerful, persuasive, and some of them even eloquent. At the numerous prayer meetings both saints and sinners were constrained to say, "The Lord is here; this is the house of God, and the gate of heaven." The weather on the Sabbath-day was rather unfavourable for open air services, but we had that amount of accommodation and shelter beneath our large marquee, which enabled us to proceed with our important work during the length of the mid-summer's day, and on Monday the day was all that could be desired, the sun shone from morning till night with resplendent beauty. Very early in the morning hundreds of almost every kind of conveyance from all parts of the neighbourhood began to move in the direction of the great camp-meeting, and in addition thereto, the cheap trains from Sheffield, Barnsley, Doncaster, and the packet from Hull and Gainsborough, brought a great many passengers; and ultimately it was thought there could not be fewer than eight or nine thousand persons on the ground. In this large congregation we were glad to see several wealthy gentlemen and leading farmers, some of whom had not only given their servants and labourers a holiday, but had procured for them admission to the tables. We also had on the ground a number of ministers, and members belonging to other Christian communities, including some belonging to the Church of England. On Monday tea was provided for a great number, and about three thousand five hundred partook of the excellent things provided, so that, in addition to the sums realized by the collections made each day, above a hundred guineas were taken for tea-tickets alone, and as a great part of the provisions was given by the friends of our circuit, the proceeds this year are greater than at any previous meeting.

At these great gatherings we are glad to report that much spiritual benefit has been received year after year, and financially they have been rendered a great blessing to some of the trustees, who were in great need of help. During my three years' superintendency of this circuit, by the assistance received from the Crowle Wharf Committee, we have expended above six hundred pounds in the erection of two chapels, enlarging an old one, and building two school-rooms, and, after all, we are glad to say, we have yet in hand the handsome amount of about a hundred pounds, towards the erection of another large chapel, which is greatly needed. T. RATCLIFFE.

3. CAMP MEETING AT CHESTER.
—Dear Editor,—On Sunday, July 20th, we held our circuit camp meeting at Chester. We had several processions through the streets in the morning and afternoon, and at 3 o'clock in the afternoon there would be present eight or ten thousand persons. Two stands were erected from which the Gospel trumpet was blown with good effect by several well-tried local preachers and Brothers Kershaw and Prestwich, who have just entered upon their labours in this station. A collection was made on the camp ground to aid our new chapel fund, which amounted to £14 2s. 2d. The chapel was densely crowded at the lovefeast, and several were brought to the feet of Jesus, and made happy in his love. May the glorious work of soul-saving move on, is the prayer of

J. EASTWOOD.

4. NORTHAMPTON CIRCUIT.—The annual camp meeting took place on Sunday July 20th. A number of the members and friends met at the chapel, in Horsemarket, about 9 o'clock in the morning, and proceeded through the town, stopping at intervals for singing and prayer, and the delivery of short addresses, arriving in the Cow-meadow a few minutes before ten o'clock, where the meeting was held during the day. In the evening a public lovefeast was held in the chapel, which was filled to overflowing, numbers being unable to obtain admission. The weather throughout the day was very fine, and the assembled multitude listened with the greatest attention to the addresses which were delivered. In the prayer-meeting after the lovefeast two souls professed to find peace, and have since joined the society. To God be all the glory.

P. COATES.

5. CAMP MEETING, LYNG, WEST BROMWICH CIRCUIT.—On Sunday, July 27th, we held our annual camp meeting in a field kindly lent by Mr. Darby. We commenced by singing through the streets and giving short addresses, which were attended with much Divine influence, and many were attracted after us to the field, where, during the day, short and powerful sermons were delivered by Brothers

Nock, Turner, Wooley, Chatterton, Jones, Leath, and the writer. In the afternoon no less than a thousand souls were earnestly listening to the word of God, which had free course and was glorified. The lovefeast was mighty, the speaking short and pointed. Faith took hold on

God, and the victory was evidently gained. While believers were filled with the glory, sinners were crying for mercy, and soon eight precious souls stepped into glorious liberty. To God be all the glory.

MAURICE NICHOLAS.

MISSIONARY SERVICES.

THETFORD.—Dear Editor,—We have lately concluded two courses of missionary meetings on this circuit and feel grateful to the great Head of the Church for the help afforded in the same. We were assisted by the services of our estimable brethren W. Crown and W. H. Meadows. Having of late made numerous efforts, and still making them, in chapel building matters, we were fearful that such efforts would militate against the revenue, but we are glad to say that in all the place with two exceptions, the income exceeds that of last year. The proceeds of the different places, amount to £20 13s. 8½d., all of which, local expenses deducted, we have remitted to the treasurer, this being the first time the circuit has been able to carry out this very desirable measure. Could we as a people do so in every case, should we not soon stand on a level with any other community in reference to the number of messengers we might send out to tell the heathen world that "Jesus died to save." May we as a denomination "upon whom the ends of the world are come" take a more prominent part in this moral enterprise, is the prayer of

J. ALLISON.

FOREIGN RELIGIOUS INTELLIGENCE.

1. NEWCASTLE, NEW SOUTH WALES, DECEMBER, 1861.—Dear Editor,—Nearly eighteen months have passed away since we bade farewell to our dear friends in England, and accompanied by Messrs. Greenwood, Pritchard and Walton, with Mesdames Greenwood, and Pritchard, I and my family, embarked at Gravesend on board the "Irene," for Adelaide, South Australia. As you and many of your readers are aware, after a long but pleasant voyage, we arrived at the port of destination, and after steaming along the Australian coast for 1,200 miles, calling at Melbourne and Sydney, we reached the field of labour to which we had been appointed by the General

Missionary Committee, grateful to our heavenly Father for His abundant goodness to us during our protracted and dangerous voyage. Upon my arrival here I found that from various causes (chiefly the protracted affliction of my predecessor) the station was in an enfeebled condition. I brought the matter before the officials and members of the societies, and made several suggestions, which if acted upon would effect a change for the better. The friends showed a willingness to co-operate with me in trying to improve the station; they entered earnestly into the work, and happily our efforts have been successful, as will be seen from the enclosed account of our chapel anniversary in Newcastle. Our chapels are now filled with attentive congregations, our schools are in a flourishing condition, sinners have been converted to God, and our finances have greatly increased. For this measure of prosperity we are grateful to God who has thus magnified His name in the sight of His people. We have peace and harmony dwelling amongst us; and we are thankful to state that many of our congregations are under very good impressions. The Spirit of God is working mightily amongst the people. We are praying for, and anxiously expecting a mighty revival of religion; it is promised, and will come, for the "mouth of the Lord hath spoken it." I can assure you it is much needed here; this locality abounds with backsliders; here are hundreds who have been members of the Christian Church at home (many of them office bearers in it) and they are now living in a state of practical, and many in avowed, Atheism. There is great need for the earnest, persevering, and self-denying labour of the "Missionary of the Cross." Much has been done in this colony, but very much more remains to be accomplished. We hope still to have an interest in the prayers of God's people that we may have wisdom and patience in prosecuting our labours, and that great success may attend them. While looking back upon the past, we are encouraged for the future. May God keep us faithful to our trust, and make us all useful in our day and generation. Amen.

W. J. DEAN.

2. SERVICES IN BENDIGO CIRCUIT.—On April 13th, three sermons were preached at Eagle Hawk, in connection with our chapel anniversary; in the morning by the Rev. George Daniel, Wesleyan minister; afternoon, by the Rev.

W. R. Fletcher, M.A., Independent minister; and in the evening, by the Rev. J. Nish, Presbyterian minister. These sermons were instructive and powerful, and the Divine presence was graciously experienced. On the 14th a tea and public meeting were held, when addresses were delivered by Revs. G. Daniel, G. T. Hall, and Messrs. Morton, Snowden, Warne, and Wood. On the following Friday a social tea meeting was held, and a fellowship meeting followed, which gave an impetus to the piety of our members. The financial proceeds, including £2 10s. promises, amounted to £16 7s. 2d.

On May the 4th we held an open air service at Whitstick, when short sermons were preached by Messrs. Underdown, Morton, and Benman, the writer conducting the meeting. Several persons were in distress, and one soul found peace through believing. There was a good deal of the old Primitive fire burning in the lovefeast, and the meeting might be called a "glorious confusion," for while some were weeping others were rejoicing. May the Lord carry on his work.

On Sunday, May 11th, three sermons were preached at Sandhurst, for the circuit's benefit, by the Rev. George Grey, of Castlemaine. On Monday, a tea meeting was held at the same place, and in the public meeting that followed interesting addresses were delivered by Messrs. Grey, Hall, Snowden, Cummings, Warne, and Falkingham.

On Thursday 15th, a lecture was delivered by G. T. Hall, on the "Hartley Pit Accident." The whole of the service was very good and profitable. The presence of the Saviour was realized and his power felt. The pecuniary profit, including £2 promises, amounted to £7 8s. 3d. We have had a few souls converted at Eagle Hawk, and pray for larger manifestations of God's saving power.

GEORGE TUDOR HALL.

3. ANNIVERSARY IN CAMDEN STATION, NEW SOUTH WALES.—Camden is a small township, forty miles from Sydney, on the road to Goulburn. We have a neat chapel built of brick, in 1859, at a cost of £325, with £85 15s. 6d. remaining on the trust premises. On Sunday, May 11th, 1862, the anniversary sermons were preached by the Rev. J. Langford, of Newtown, to crowded and attentive congregations.

The following day 140 partook of an excellent tea, provided by the friends. A stirring meeting was held after the tea, addressed by Messrs. J. Langford, C. Waters, S. Brown, and J. Baker.

Proceeds of the services—Sabbath collections, £3 10s.; profits of tea, £6 5s. 3d.; collected at the meeting, &c., £3 14s. 6d.; total, £13 9s. 9d.

CHARLES WATERS.

4. FOUNDATION LAYING, GOULBURN MISSION, NEW SOUTH WALES.—Dear Editor,—On Monday, March 31st, 1862, the foundation stone of a Primitive Methodist chapel was laid at Jerrawa, by Mr. Newman; after which the Rev.

James Causland delivered an address. At 4 o'clock about one hundred persons sat down to an excellent tea, which was gratuitously provided by our female friends. After tea a religious service was held, presided over by Mr. Reeve, and addressed by the Revs. J. Causland, C. Waters, and the writer. The proceeds of the day amounted to £12 16s. 4d.

WILLIAM KINGDON.

5. CHAPEL ANNIVERSARY, GOULBURN MISSION, NEW SOUTH WALES.—Dear Editor,—The third anniversary of our chapel at Goulburn, was celebrated on Sunday, March 16th, 1862, when two sermons were preached by the Rev. W. Kingdon. The congregations were good, and the collections exceedingly liberal. On Monday a public tea was provided and about 180 persons partook of the social repast. After tea a very interesting meeting was held, presided over by Mr. Craig, Baptist; and addresses were delivered by the Rev. J. Causland, Messrs. T. Williams, D. Kadwell, and the writer. The meeting exceeded any preceding one held in connection with our people in this place. The proceeds of the anniversary, including donations, &c., amounted to £43.

W. KINGDON.

STATISTICS.

1. RELIGIOUS DENOMINATIONS IN CANADA.—The following is a summary of the population of Canada, classified according to religious profession:

Churches.	U	L
	Canada.	Canada.
Church of Rome .....	258,141	943,253
Church of England.....	311,565	63,487
Established Church of Scotland .....	108,963	23,730
Free Church of Scotland	143,043	14,866

Churches.	U	L
	Canada.	Canada.
United Presbyterians...	51,378	5,149
Wesleyan Methodists...	218,427	25,957
Episcopal Methodists...	71,615	2,537
New Connexion Methodists .....	28,300	1,292
Other Methodists.....	23,330	874
Baptists .....	61,559	7,751
Lutherans.....	24,299	859
Congregationalists .....	9,357	4,927
Quakers .....	7,883	121
Bible Christians .....	8,801	184

Churches.	U Canada.	L Canada.
Christians.....	5,018	298
Second Adventists .....	1,050	2,305
Protestants .....	7,514	2,584
Disciples .....	4,147	5
Jews .....	614	572
Memnonists & Tunkers	8,965	0
Universalists .....	2,234	2,289
Unitarians .....	634	652
Mosmons .....	74	3
No religion .....	17,373	1,477
No creed given .....	8,121	5,728
All other creeds not classified .....	14,284	678

Grand total ...	1,396,091	1,111,566
Proportion of Roman Catholics .....	18.49	84.85
Proportion of Church of England.....	22.32	5.71

2. COLONY OF VICTORIA.—The Registrar-General of Victoria has compiled several interesting tables from the Census returns. The following shows the religion of the people of this colony in 1861 and 1857 respectively:—

Religious Denominations.	1861.	1857.
Church of England and Episcopalian Protes- tants.....	205,695	157,819
Free Church .....	454	218
Protestants (not other- wise defined) .....	5,919	15,321
Presbyterian Church of Victoria .....	5,052	—
Church of Scotland.....	36,917	27,828
Free Church of Scotland and Free Presbyterians.	21,219	19,341
United Presbyterian Chs.	16,734	9,315
Other Presbyterian Chs.	346	253
Presbyterians (not other- wise defined) .....	6,835	8,443

Religious Denominations.	1861.	1857.
Wesleyans, Wesleyan Methodists, and Me- thodists .....	40,799	24,740
Primitive Methodists ...	3,775	2,044
Wesleyan Methodist As- sociation and United Free Methodist Chs.	1,146	791
Bible Christians .....	651	268
Other Wesleyan Me- thodists.....	140	145
Independents or Con- gregationalists.....	12,777	10,732
Baptists .....	9,001	6,412
Lutherans and German Protestants .....	10,643	6,488
Unitarians .....	1,430	1,462
Society of Friends .....	273	325
Calvinists and Calvinis- tic Methodists .....	650	468
Other persuasions .....	1,257	1,304
Roman Catholics .....	107,610	70,159
Catholics (not otherwise defined).....	2,219	6,348
Greek Church .....	239	127
Israelites and Christian Israelites .....	395	307
Latter-day Saints or Mormons .....	108	208
Jews.....	2,903	2,181
Unsectarian, No Deno- mination, Secularists, &c.....	952	1,406
No Religion.....	441	1,158
Mahometans .....	189	216
Pagans (exclusive of Chinese) .....	1,672	1,898
Chinese (not Christians)	24,551	25,390
Unspecified (adults) ...	2,391	2,999
Unspecified (children)	642	306
Objecting to state their religion from con- scientious scruples ...	11,536	—
Unenumerated migra- tory population .....	3,361	4,353
Total.....	540,322	410,766

OBITUARY.

1. Died at Gravesend, February 27th, 1862, SARAH the daughter of Richard and Sarah WILKINSON. Our departed sister was born at Gorleston, Suffolk, November 10th, 1839. Her parents feared the Lord, and endeavoured to bring up their children in accordance with the precepts of the Gospel. Sarah was taken early to the house of God and to the Sabbath School, in which she took great pleasure.

In 1853, her parents removed to Gravesend, and not finding here a society belonging to the Reform Methodists, they united with our society, and Sarah became a scholar in the Sabbath-school. After about two years, she was received as a teacher; she took great delight in her class, and was very much attached to her fellow-teachers. December, 4th, 1855 she was led to see the necessity of giving her heart fully to the Lord, and of enjoying a sense of sin.

forgiven. So intense was her agony that she could not leave the chapel until she obtained the blessing. In answer to fervent believing prayer the Lord set her soul at liberty, and she went home rejoicing in the God of her salvation. She joined the society, and held fast her confidence until her faith was lost in the full fruition of blessedness. Her natural disposition was calm and even, therefore when she lived under the influence of sanctifying grace, the Christian character was fully exhibited. She loved the house of God, and took great delight in collecting toward the fund for the new chapel.

In a little more than a year after her conversion, it pleased the Almighty to take to Himself her dear father. This was a great trial; she being the only daughter, she was greatly beloved by her father, and her affection for him was very great. From this period, symptoms of consumption began to appear in her constitution. She went to her native place, hoping the change would be beneficial; it appeared to be so for a time, but with the returning season, the cough which brought many a pang to the heart of her widowed mother, returned. From that time for almost five years she has lingered, occasionally flattered with the idea that the means might yet be blessed, and that her life on earth would be prolonged. When she was able to get to the house of God, her countenance would beam with delight. But when deprived of the opportunity of meeting with God's people, she was never known to murmur or complain. At the close of the services of the Sabbath, some of the teachers generally called to see her, sang a hymn or two, and prayed. It afforded her great comfort, and when told that the society or school was prospering, or that some one had got converted, she was greatly delighted. She rejoiced not in iniquity, but rejoiced in the truth. Her mother said to her, "My dear, have you no doubts?" She replied, "No: I love Jesus and I know he loves me." I visited her many times and always found her calm, trusting in Jesus. When speaking of the services of the sanctuary, she would say, "If the weather is fine, or if I am better, I should so enjoy being there." Until confined to her bed, she was ever cheerfully employed with her needle to assist her widowed mother. She was a pattern of industry, patience, and resignation. In her spare moments, she had begun an article for the Ladies' Basket, which is for the benefit of the new chapel fund. On her dying bed she requested one of her young friends to finish it, and while thinking she should not live to see the new chapel, she said how thankful she felt that the Lord permitted her to do anything toward raising the fund that bought the land. Although she suffered very severely she was not confined to her bed, except two or three weeks. On one occasion addressing a young friend, she said, "Had I religion to seek now, I should not be able to attend to it, but I know the Lord has pardoned my sins, I know He is my Father, I have no fear."

About a week before her death she was conscious of her approaching dissolution, and calmly arranged all her little matters, told her mother and surrounding friends that it would not be long, she should soon be in heaven. Her remaining time, between the intervals of severe suffering, was spent in prayer and praise. She begged her mother not to weep, saying, "I am going to heaven." Thus died our beloved sister, in the twenty-third year of her age. I improved her death in our chapel at Gravesend, on Sunday evening, March 16th, to a crowded congregation, after which I administered the sacrament of the Lord's Supper, and a backslider was reclaimed. To God be all the glory.

HENRY GREEN.

2. Died at Ashfield, in the Stowmarket Circuit, Feb. 16th, 1862, CAROLINE ROGERS, in the thirtieth year of her natural life, and the eighth year of her religious life. She was converted to God in the summer of 1854, and remained a steady consistent Christian till death. She served the Lord faithfully; not with fits and starts. She was an assistant in the Sabbath School, and a missionary collector. By her death the society has lost one of its brightest gems. The very painful affliction which terminated her mortal career was mental derangement, which laid her prostrate about ten days. Till this time she gave good evidence that she was on the Rock. Her sun has gone down while it is yet day.

R. DORLING.

3. ALICE GELDER, of Flixbro', Winter-ton Circuit, changed mortality for life on the 13th of February, 1862, aged seventy-two years. For about fifteen years she had been a good, consistent member of the Primitive Methodist Connexion. In her general deportment she gave evidence of the fact that she had been "renewed in the spirit of her mind." Though our sister was often deprived of the public means of grace by affliction, yet she was enabled to maintain the life of religion in her soul by attending to private devotion. When the time came for her to leave this world, and to enter that rest remaining for the people of God, she evinced an implicit trust in Christ her Saviour. Amid the sobs and tears of her sorrowing family, she triumphantly exclaimed "I am going home." Her end was peace.

WILLIAM WHITE.

4. THOMAS GUMBLEY was born at Leicester, in 1810, and died at Ripley, Derbyshire, on February, 4th, 1862. He was converted to God under the ministry of Rev. W. Carthy, and as a member of the Primitive Methodist Society he was very consistent and regular in his attendance at the house of prayer. He was considered by his workmen and those acquainted with him as a man who feared God. His death was occasioned by a fit of apoplexy; but his end was peace, and he left behind a bright testimony that he is gone to be for ever with the Lord.

J. LAW.

5. JANE MOWBRAY, of Hartlepool, in the Stockton Circuit, fell asleep in Jesus, on February 25th, 1862, aged seventy years. About fifty years she lived a stranger to experimental religion. But at this advanced stage of her mortal existence, the Almighty by His Holy Spirit awakened her to a vivid sense of her appalling danger. Her convictions were so deep and pungent, that her physical energies were prostrated. Such was the acuteness of her mental anguish, arising from a guilty conscience, that her friends were apprehensive of some serious disease. About midnight, her husband and one of their daughters went to fetch a medical gentleman. Before they went, she said, "You need not bring the doctor, it is the Head Physician I want." Soon after, God in mercy removed the burden from her guilty conscience, and imparted to her "joy and peace in believing." Her subsequent conduct was steady and exemplary. Through the infirmities of age she could not get to her class, as often as she desired; but when able to attend, it was to her, "sweeter than honey, or the honeycomb." As a mother and a wife, she acted her part well: and in the former capacity she has left a beneficial influence behind. Being "dead she yet speaketh." Her last illness was brief, but her mind was sweetly composed. Her faith was vigorous, and her hope was bright. The writer visited her a few days before she died, and felt perfectly satisfied with the clear testimony she gave of her acceptance with God. When dying, one of her daughters (who is a Primitive Methodist) knelt by her bedside and interrogated her thus, "Mother, do you feel your feet in the river now?" She replied, "Yes." "Do you feel happy?" "Yes." "Do you feel Jesus precious?" "Yes." Soon after she lifted her feeble hand in token of victory and ceased to breathe. Thus died this aged servant of God; her end was peace. "Night dews fall not more gently to the ground Nor weary worn out winds expire so soft."

May her sorrowing friends and the writer meet her in heaven. Amen.

JOSEPH WILSON.

6. On the 21st of February, 1862, ELIZABETH OGLESBY, of Saxby, in Barton Circuit, departed this life in the seventy-eighth year of her age. For twenty-three years she was a consistent member of society, and an earnest Christian. For thirty-five years she had contented herself about religion by attending the parish church occasionally. But when her husband became convinced of sin, and feared lest he should be lost, she thought he must be losing his senses, and might put an end to his existence; so she went to the meeting to scold his religious friends. Mr. John Wright was the preacher in attendance. He read for his text, "He brought me up also out of an horrible pit," &c. The word was with power, Elizabeth believed, wept, prayed, and found forgiveness. She then became a member of Brother Goodwin's class, and led a holy life. Her experience in the things of God was sound and deep. She was strictly honest in all her business transactions. The golden rule formed the test of her actions. Her public prayers were simple, but remarkably earnest and powerful. She was naturally cheerful, and generally religiously happy. She was a good attender on the means of grace; she lived more than a mile from her place of worship, but neither the threatening shower, the miry road, nor the dark night could hinder her from attending. She was a liberal giver to the cause of God; in this she excelled.

For many years she entertained the preachers in their travels. Death came upon her suddenly but she was found watching: she said on the occasion "I am packed up and waiting." On the day of her death, she went about her house, and died at six o'clock at night. Thus she ceased at once to work and live. I improved her death to a crowded and deeply affected congregation E. TALBOT.

7. MATTHEW TEESDALE, of the Manchester First station, died February 14th, 1862, in the sixty-ninth year of his age. He was born in 1793, near Alston, Cumberland. He lived after the course of this world till he was twenty-four years of age, when it pleased God to send the Primitive Methodists to the place of his nativity; and under their faithful and energetic ministry, he was convinced of sin, and obtained salvation by faith in Jesus Christ. He was among the first-fruits of the labours of our people.

For several years he fulfilled the office of class-leader, and his attendance on all the means of grace was exemplary.

He was a warm-hearted supporter of the cause with which he was identified, and which required in those days of opposition both sterling piety, fortitude, and attachment. The names of many of the old ministers of our Connexion were endeared to his memory.

In the order of Divine Providence he removed to Manchester, and joined the society at Jersey Street. Subsequently, he and a few others took a room in the locality of Bank Top, and for years struggled hard with that infant cause, and from that germ originated our present commodious chapel and flourishing society in Ogden Street. His affliction was long and severe. He was an humble follower of the Lord up to the time of his being called to his eternal reward. The writer visited him several times previous to his exit, and found his confidence in the Saviour remained unshaken; he fully believed that the Lord who had helped him, would not leave him in the mighty conflict. His end was peace. The race was run, the goal was reached, the prize was won.

W. BALL.

8. Died at Hull, January 25th, 1862, WILLIAM ARMSTRONG, "an old disciple," well known and much esteemed by the society at West Street. In early life he was accustomed to maritime pursuits, and eventually entered the royal navy, in which he served his king and country for some years. In this service he experienced many remarkable deliverances from danger; but during the French war he lost an arm while his ship was engaged with a French frigate. This was a critical period, and nearly proved fatal, as he had to lie bleeding twenty-four hours before his arm was dressed, which reduced him to great weakness and exhaustion. This serious occurrence awakened him to penitential reflection, and led him to make some resolutions of amendment of life, though it did not lead to his immediate conversion.

When the Primitive Methodist missionaries visited Hull in 1819, he attended their ministry, was instructed in the way of salvation by faith in Christ, and found peace through believing. He united with the infant society, and continued a steady and consistent member to the day of his death. He rendered useful service to the cause of God as a zealous and earnest prayer-leader, and as a diligent and acceptable visitor of the sick. He was ever ready to speak a word in the name of his Lord and Master, and availed himself of all opportunities of recommending religion to his fellow-men. For some years he usually spoke first at the lovefeasts in West Street chapel, an honour cheerfully conceded to him by the society, and which he improved to the edification and profit of his fellow-worshippers. The infirmities of age, however, prevented him from attending a few of the last lovefeasts, and confined him to his house. The last time I saw him he was, as usual, happy in God, and exercising strong faith in Christ. Throwing up his enfeebled arm he exclaimed with much earnestness, "The sun is up in the heavens; the clouds are all gone; I shall soon be at home." His heavenly home was much nearer than I then anticipated, as a few weeks afterwards he finished his course. As his afflictions increased, he was sometimes delirious; but when sensible, he spoke with confidence and joy of his interest in Christ and of his hope of glory. He frequently repeated the following beautiful verse:

"O what are all my sufferings here,
If Lord thou count'st me meet,
With that enraptured host I'll appear,
And worship at thy feet."

He "gathered up his feet and died" in the faith and hope of the Gospel, aged eighty-two years.

JOHN PETTY.

9. ANN, wife of John GROSE, and daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Sturtridge, of Trenince, in the Parish of Luxulyan, county of Cornwall, England, was born June 2nd, 1820, and died in the Lord, Feb. 10th, 1862, in the township of Peel, and province of Canada.

Our departed sister was converted to God, with many others, in her native parish, in England. In the month of Feb., 1836, during a revival held in Ebenezer Chapel, by the Bible Christians, she united with them, and was a constant member of that Society, until she with her husband, (to whom she was united in marriage, December 8th, in the year 1842) and family, emigrated to America in the year 1852. Brother and sister Grose, on their arrival here, united with our Society, and sister Grose became a teacher in our Sabbath-school, until the cares of her family prevented her regular attendance. She was a kind mother, and had the consolation to see four of her children made partakers of Divine grace. She was an affectionate wife, a good neighbour, and much respected by all who were acquainted with her, being consistent in her Christian character and deportment. She has left seven children, her husband, and a large circle of friends to lament her loss. But it may be said concerning her "Blessed are the dead who die in the Lord." J. MILNER.

10. MRS. MARION ASPINALL, was born at Glasgow, in Scotland about the year 1818. Her father being an engineer, his occupation rendered it necessary for him to move to Dundee, when Marion was about fourteen years of age. Her early religious training was in connection with the Kirk of Scotland, but at the time of the disruption, the family united with the Free Church. The ministry of the Rev. Mr. Bane, of Dundee, appears to have been made a blessing to her, and her union with his Sabbath School and Bible class, made her familiar with the Scriptures to an extent which, in this age of light reading, it would be well to cultivate. Her mother being the subject of long and painful affliction, the care of the family devolved chiefly on Marion, she being the eldest of four children, and after her mother's death, her duties and responsibilities increased.

She came to the colony of New South Wales about nine years since and united with the Free Church, of which the Rev. M. E. Salmon was the minister. Her connection with that Church was valued, and as a member of it she had a good reputation. Her connection with it ceased at the time of her marriage, about seven years ago, when she united with the Primitive Methodists, her husband being an official member with us.

Her attachment to the Church of her adoption was sincere. And according to her means she was liberal in the support of its funds; and when health and circumstances enabled her to attend the means of grace, she was amongst the most thoughtful and devout worshippers. The Rev. J. Sharpe was held in high esteem by her, she appreciated and profited by his ministrations both as a preacher and a class-leader. She was generally esteemed by the members, especially those in the Crown Street Society, as with it she was connected when her opportunities of association were more frequent than of late. Her character as a wife and mother was of a high order. Some of the reverses to which many have been subject in this colony fell to the lot of our departed friend; and although there was not a stoical indifference to such things, they were borne with as much patience as most could exercise in similar circumstances. Her husband states that when losses were experienced and death occurred in the family, her temptation to murmur would often be checked by the comforting declaration of the apostle, "All things work together for good to them that love God." From the time of her recovery from her last confinement she had been in her usual health till within about six days of her death, when she suffered from diarrhoea, but not to an extent to cause alarm, and for two days previous to her decease there had been a manifest improvement.

On Saturday evening, March 1st, 1862, she was more cheerful than usual, and after tea, while attending to her domestic duties, she sang some of those enlivening strains so much in use amongst us. She then went to the market and returned home without exhibiting any indications of being worse. After partaking of food at a late hour (a practice which even in health ought to be avoided) she retired to rest. At 3 o'clock her husband being awake by her moans found her unable to speak, and before he could procure a light she was dead. The writer interred her remains on the following day, in the presence of several who had been her companions in the house of God on earth, and who with him earnestly pray and devoutly hope to join her in the heavenly Jerusalem. R. HARTLEY.

11. JOSEPH LEE departed this life at Silchester, February 24th, 1862, in the eightieth year of his age. For fifty-three years he lived a stranger to saving grace. When the Primitive Methodist missionaries visited Silchester and its neighbourhood, Brother Lee heard the Gospel from their lips; its powerful truths deeply impressed his heart. He saw his condition as a sinner, and believing on Jesus obtained peace and joy in the Holy Ghost. At the second class-meeting held in this part he united with the society, and for years preaching services, and class and prayer meetings were held in his house. For twenty-seven years he stood connected with the society, and humbly endeavoured to please God and live for heaven. On May 30th, 1861, he was called to sustain the loss of his dear wife, whose obituary is in the January large magazine for this year. This loss he deeply felt, but humbly bowed to the divine will. After his bereavement, however, he sank gradually towards the grave. And since the commencement of this year he passed through a considerable amount of suffering. The writer frequently visited him and always found him relying on Jesus. In one of my visits to him he said, "I am sinking and rising. Tell the friends I shall soon be with my sweet Jesus." The last time I visited him all his conversation was about Jesus. I think he would not have made any allusion to his affliction, had I not asked him concerning it, and then he said, "My sight is almost gone, but I shall soon see Jesus in all his brightness." He also said, "I had a blessed day on Monday, but on the Sabbath I had a smart conflict." We felt it good while conversing with him, and bade him good bye, with the assurance of meeting him in a better country. A short time before his departure, he said, "I am nearly through the valley, just another step and I am through. Come Lord Jesus; come quickly!" A few hours before he ceased to breathe, he said to his daughter, "Tell George Ford—

"Angels are round my bed, and in my room,
They wait to waft my spirit home,
All is well. All is well."

After lingering a few hours in unconsciousness, he passed away from his cottage to his mansion home, leaving seven sons and daughters to lament their loss. May they and the writer meet him in heaven. Amen. W. MARWOOD.

12. JAMES BAILEY, the son of John and Mary Bailey, was born in the village of Haslington, in the county of Chester, in the year 1822, and departed this life March 6th, 1862. At the age of ten years he sustained the loss of his mother, who died in the Lord leaving a bright testimony to the survivors that she was gone to glory. His father being destitute of piety, he had not the advantage of a religious training, but lived until his fifteenth year without a knowledge of Christ as his Saviour. In the years 1834 and 1835 the Spirit was abundantly poured out at Haslington, a great revival took place, and many souls were converted, of whom James was one. James began to attend the meetings while Sister Woodhouse was travelling in the Burland Circuit, and on one occasion as she was relating her experience, he saw and felt the value of religion. He sought the Lord with all his heart, and did not rest until God, for Christ's sake had pardoned his sons. He at once joined the society, and was punctual at the means of grace, and for nine years and a half he ran well; but he then fell away, and for two years and a half was a backslider. But one night while Brother Stubbs was preaching from the words, "And they all with one consent began to make excuse," he again sought and found mercy at the hands of the Lord. From that time to the day of his death he was a consistent member of society. In the year 1861 ground was purchased and a chapel built at Haslington, and James became a trustee and the chapel steward; and when the school commenced he became assistant superintendent, and he was beloved by both teachers and children. In the spring of the same year his health began to fail, and at the end of July he was seized with the jaundice, and for thirty-one weeks was in the furnace. His sufferings at times were severe, but he bore them with patience. His soul rested on the atonement and on the promises of God. His family was his only source of anxiety, and he received grace to enable him to give them up, believing what God had said, "Leave thy fatherless children, and I will preserve them alive, and let thy widows trust in Me." The school and society lay near his heart, and he often prayed for them. Feeling that his outward man was failing and that his work on earth must soon close, he exhorted all to meet him in heaven. When asked if he should like to get better, "The Lord's will be done," said he, "He is too wise to err; for though I walk through the valley of the shadow of death, I will fear no evil, for thy rod and thy staff they comfort me." Brother Furber spoke to him about leaving his family, and in reply he said, "It is only leaving one part to meet the other. For there are mother, sister, and daughter looking out for me." Brother Furber stayed with him all the night, and at parting asked him if Christ was precious. With a smile he answered, "Yes." On Thursday morning, March 6th, death was seen on his countenance, and at a quarter past eight he fell asleep in Jesus, leaving a widow and five children to lament their loss. May they so live that they may meet where parting will be no more, and may we all meet them there.

WILLIAM WOODWORTH.

13. CHARLES PECK was born at Chediston, in the county of Suffolk, January 14th, 1815, and died recently at Walberswick, in the Wangford Circuit. He was brought to the knowledge of the truth at the age of about sixteen, under the ministry of the Rev. R. Howchin, and for nearly thirty years stood in membership with the societies at Chediston, and Walberswick. He was of good repute, hospitable, diligent in duty, and an earnest lover of the sanctuary. He was slow of speech, but there was power in the testimony he bore for Christ. Consumption, "fell waster," rapidly undermined a strong and vigorous constitution. During six months he passed through the fire of affliction, in the endurance of which he was mercifully sustained by a Father's hand, and was fully prepared for the anticipated event. He seemed every day to be "Only waiting till the shadows were a little longer grown;

Only waiting till the glimmer of the last day's light had flown."

He remarked to the writer on one occasion, in conversation, "Brother, I can see the gate of glory opened to me, and the road to it is straight. I am going to be with Jesus." He is gone to enjoy the vision of God, the society of angels, and the fellowship of the redeemed for ever. Hallelujah. That his sorrowing widow and three daughters may meet him in heaven, is the prayer of

WM. CHAPMAN.

14. Died recently at Stoven, in the Wangford Circuit, HARRIET, wife of John DAVY, in the forty-seventh year of her age. She was of good moral character from her youth up, but was led to see her true condition as a sinner before God under the ministry of Mr. James Lear, near thirty years ago. She was shortly enabled to trust in Jesus for justification and righteousness, and obtained "peace with God, through our Lord Jesus Christ." Thenceforward till her death, she was a consistent member of our society, and a burning and shining light, devoting her activities to the furtherance of the work of God.

To care for the interests of the young she felt to be a Christian duty, consequently she was for many years a diligent, painstaking, conscientious, and successful Sunday-school teacher, and she followed out her felt duty amid much physical weakness and suffering, with remarkable industry and perseverance, until entirely confined to her home and bed by the ravages of dropsy and disease of the heart, which caused her death. And from her bed of suffering she sent messages of love to the children and teachers of her beloved school. For six months she was a prisoner, often exclaiming "As the hart panteth for the water-brooks, so panteth my soul after Thee;" or like Paul, "For me to live is Christ, but to die is gain."

A little before her death she was beset with clouds of darkness, the mental and spiritual conflict was most severe; but while Christian friends pleaded with God for her, her faith fully rested on the blood of Christ, and she triumphed gloriously over sin and the world, death, and the devil.

She partook of the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper with a few Christian friends and relatives, amid revealings of glory that the survivors will probably never forget: and with whisperings and shoutings of "Bless him! bless him!" she departed to the inheritance of the glorified, to be with Jesus, which is far better.

WM. CHAPMAN.

15. Died, March 3rd, 1862, at Chesterfield, Mrs. M. A. THOMPSON, the wife of Mr. R. Thompson, in the twenty-ninth year of her age. She was born November 9th, 1833, at Dixon Green, in the Dudley circuit. In early life she attended with her father the New Connexion Methodists' Chapel, but we have no evidence that she received the truth as it is in Jesus. She lived a stranger to the saving grace of God, till the year 1850, when she removed to Chesterfield. She soon began to attend our Beetwell-street chapel, when under a sermon, preached by Mr. R. Parks, she saw herself a sinner, beheld her perilous condition, felt the sentence of death within herself, and with tears in her eyes, and sorrow in her soul, she came to Christ, the Saviour of sinners, and was enabled to rest upon the great atoning sacrifice offered by Him, for pardon, life, and salvation. She could then sing, "O Lord, I will praise Thee, for though Thou wast angry with me, Thine anger is turned away, and behold, Thou comfortedst me." From this period she cast in her lot amongst us, became a very active, pious, zealous member and teacher in the Sabbath school, and was remarkably attentive to the means of grace, and possessing a good voice, and a superior gift in prayer, she was very useful in the hands of God in leading many a weeping penitent to that fountain "opened for sin and for uncleanness." Truly it might be said of her that she wept with those that wept, and rejoiced with those that rejoiced. Her attendance at class was regular, unless detained by business or affliction; and it gave her almost unspeakable pleasure to see its numbers swelled with recruits from the enemy. Her piety was genuine, her love strong, her faith unwavering, her hopes blooming, and her prospects bright. She could sing, "Blessed be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, which, according to His abundant mercy, hath begotten us again unto a lively hope, by the resurrection of Jesus Christ from the dead, to an inheritance incorruptible and undefiled, and that fadeth not away."

About two years ago her health began to decline, a wasting consumption set in and hurried her onward towards her latter end. Many means were tried to arrest it in its course, but all in vain. Nevertheless she continued to attend the means of grace, till she was imprisoned by such a degree of bodily weakness and pain as feeble mortality could not stand under. For several weeks before she died I visited her most days, and found her, when her suffering was the most acute, with her soul in the most heavenly calm, and whilst reading to her out of Bunyan's Pilgrim's Progress, Baxter's Saints' Rest, and the sacred Scriptures—books to which she was greatly attached—her soul would often rise into an ecstasy of joy, and reminded of her old friends with whom she had mingled her prayers and praises, but who had recently left the Church militant for the Church triumphant, she would say, “I shall soon be with them, and be well-comed by them, into that house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens.” The last Sabbath she spent in time, was one of prayer and praise. She was very happy: Mr. E. Addy, one of our preachers, called to see her, and found her in a sweet frame of mind, and her confidence in God very strong. When he asked her how she felt, she exclaimed, “I shall soon exchange prayer for praise, suffering for joy, mortality for life.” Believing her end was drawing on she was anxious to see her leader, and she requested he might be sent for. He was then in the Chapel, and when he came they mingled their prayers and praises together. The room was filled with glory, and she rejoiced in hope of the glory of God. Her father said “Is all right?” and she replied, “All is well, farewell, till we meet again.” Whilst suffering great pain of body and struggling for life, I said to her,

“Through much distress and pain,
 Through many a conflict here,”

But with great earnestness she exclaimed,
 “It’s through blood I must the entrance gain,
 Yet, O disdain to fear.”

She made choice of her bearers, and those deeply affecting lines to be put upon the mourning cards:—

“I shine in the light of God,
 His likeness stamps my brow;
 Thro’ the valley of death my feet have trod,
 But I reign in glory now.
 Then, why should your tears run down,
 And your hearts be sorely riven?
 There’s another gem in the Saviour’s crown,
 And another saint in heaven.”

Her work was now done for time, her end was drawing on, nothing remained but to bid them all farewell in the room, and give them her last shake of the hand; and whilst tears were copiously flowing, and deep solemnity was felt, she bade them one by one farewell, and charged them to meet her in heaven. To her weeping husband, whilst tears flowed, and sobs were heard, she said, “God will never leave you.” She then peacefully went into Jordan’s river, and her happy spirit took its flight to the paradise of God.

PAMALA CROMPTON.

16. The late Mrs. ESTHER STEPHENSON, of Knowlwood, was born at Gauxholme-stone, on the 3rd of November, 1831. She was the daughter of the late Mr. Abraham Crossley. The Crossley family some years ago became attendants at Knowlwood Primitive Methodist chapel, about which time our departed sister, along with other members of the family, began to attend the Sunday-school. In the course of time Esther was appointed a teacher, which office she held some years. Upwards of fifteen years ago, in the prayer meeting after a lovefeast, on the circuit annual camp-meeting day, she was converted to God. She joined our society without delay, and became regular in her attendance at class. The various means of grace were highly prized by her. She was married on the 9th day of February, 1861. Her married life was short but comfortable. Her house being one of the homes for the preachers who officiated at Knowlwood and Todmorden, the writer was occasionally hospitably entertained by her. Cleanliness and comfort were everywhere apparent. Some months ago she began to have a delicate appearance, and consumption began its fearful attacks. For a short time she obtained relief, but soon the disease got the ascendancy, and triumphed over every remedy. The last week or ten days of her life the disease made rapid progress. She was at work on the 21st of February, and on the 6th day of March, 1862, she died. During the short time she was off her work, I visited her twice. The first time she lay on the sofa, and during our conversation about eternal things she said, “I am quite resigned and satisfied with what the Lord does with me.” On the 5th of March I paid her a visit, but she was unable to get up, and had scarcely strength to speak. On this occasion she said, “I am going only a short time before my sisters and brothers, to meet father and mother and sisters that have gone before.” As might be supposed, she died a happy death. May the reader and writer meet her in heaven.

GEORGE SMITH.

17. Died March 6th, 1862, at Ringolish Cottage, Donaghmore, Ireland, Miss ELIZA WILSON, aged seventy years. Very early in life she gave strong evidence that the fear of God was before her eyes, and His Holy Spirit was at work in her heart. When she was quite a little girl she took great care to teach her brother Robert (who has been our Mission Steward nearly thirty years) hymns for children and other good books, as soon as he could speak. When the Primitive Methodists missioned this part of Ireland thirty years ago, the Wilson family came to hear them, and soon received them into their house, as the servants of God. The precise time of our sister’s conversion cannot well be ascertained, but that she had passed from death unto life we had the fullest evidence.

1. She was strictly pious, and very conversable in the things of God, especially on a free, full, and present salvation.

2. She was mighty in the Scriptures. She did not attend the preaching of the word for years before her death, deafness preventing her hearing the minister, but she was a great reader of God's word. She would often repeat the following words:—

"When quiet in my house I sit,
Thy book be my companion still;
My joy thy sayings to repeat,
Talk o'er the records of Thy will;
And search the oracles divine,
Till every heart-felt word be mine."

She would generally ask where the text was: she only required the words to find the chapter and verse.

3. She was much given to private prayer. Like good Ann Cutler, she generally prayed aloud in her closet, and a sense of the Divine presence was often felt while she was pleading with God.

4. Her hospitality was in perfect harmony with her other good properties. I have known this family more than twenty-six years. Their house has always been open to our ministers, who have always received a sanctified Irish welcome. This happy retreat has often reminded myself and others of our ministers of the happy retreat of the Saviour at Bethany.

Two years before our sister's death she was afflicted with inflammation of the lungs, but by the attention and skill of Dr. McClelland she recovered considerably, but was not so strong as before. Six days before her departure she had another attack. All effort to subdue the disorder failed. Her pain was great: but her hope was full, it rested on the God of her salvation. She had the assurance that heaven was her home. She said, "My afflictions will be sanctified,

"Still Christ is my salvation.
What can I covet more?
I fear no condemnation;
My Father's wrath is o'er."

"Christ is precious." Her end was happy. JOHN LAWLEY.

18. MARGARET, wife of Thomas HADFIELD, travelling preacher, and daughter of Mr. Alexander Burnett, was born in the year 1815, in the town of Crale, Fifehire, North Britain. About the year 1829, the family went to the Point of Ayr, Isle of Man, to the light-house; her father being an officer in the Northern Light Company, at which place her dear mother died. In her last affliction her mother was visited by Mr. James Moss, then stationed in the Island. Messrs. Kaye, Townsend, and Hopkinson, were stationed in Douglas about that time, and frequently has my dear wife spoken of the good she received from the visits paid by them. Preaching was then commenced in the light house, and under the fatherly care of Mr. Hopkinson, Margaret was led to give herself to God. She then joined our people, and nothing could ever shake her from the people of her choice. In 1841 she was made leader of a class, and the good done told how well fitted she was for the work. In 1845 her father was superannuated, and he settled in Ramsey. Here she raised a new class of young people, and aided in promoting a revival in the town. Numbers were saved, some of whom will be the crown of her rejoicing in the day of the Lord Jesus. In 1849 we were united in marriage, and she at once entered upon the duties of a wife and mother, and few have discharged those duties so well. In the twelve years of our union we were stationed at Peel, Chester, Oldham, Hyde, Norwich, East Dereham, Ely, and Kelsale. In all our stations she had gained many friends, by showing the people how to live, but at Kelsale she had to show them how to die. And, oh! with what firmness she met the last foe. For some time before her death the nature of her complaint unfitted her for saying much, but what she did say was to the point. Three days before she died she called al to her bed-side, and gave her dying benediction to her family. She blessed all in the chamber, charging them to meet her in heaven. She spoke of the happy day she gave herself to God when young, and stated that for the last thirty years she had never lost her confidence in God. And in holy triumph she lifted her hand and exclaimed, "Let me be gone." In the years of her health she was never known to sing, though very fond of hearing others; but in the day of her last struggle with a voice that some seraph might have lent her she sang several beautiful hymns. She lingered from the Thursday before till Monday morning September 2nd, 1861, and about two o'clock, A.M., just as the then half-waned moon was beginning to shed light on sea and land, her spirit passed to the sunny skies, being forty-six years of age, thirty of which had been spent in the service of God. She left me with two sons and one daughter to mourn our loss. She was a good wife, a loving mother, and an humble Christian. May our last end be like hers.

THOMAS HADFIELD.

19. Died on the 28th of December, 1861, at Frilford, in the Faringdon Circuit, Ann TRUMAN, in the eighty-second year of her age. During the greater part of her life she was strictly moral in her deportment, and she endeavoured to lead her twelve children in the paths of honesty and virtue. But she was destitute of the power of religion in the soul until about fourteen years since, when through the agency of the Primitive Methodists she discovered her spiritual deficiencies, disease, and danger; and subsequently at a lovefeast, held in a barn at Frilford, she received the assurance of God's pardoning mercy. From this time to her death, she was a devoted and consistent member of our society. In her domestic trials and difficulties, when she was bereaved of her husband, and during the many years of her widowhood, she was patient, meek, and resigned to God's will. Her gratitude to friends who assisted her, the fervent devotion in which she so much delighted, and her cheerful air, rendered her society pleasant and profitable. With her Bible and hymn book before her she spent two years of affliction, (being mostly confined to her chamber,) with sweet acquiescence in God's providence. In her last hours she was calm and confident, exclaiming,

"Christ alone shall be our portion,
Soon we hope to meet above;
Then we'll bathe in the full ocean,
Of the great Redeemer's love:
All His fulness we shall then for ever prove."

Her death was improved by the writer, and one soul was converted to God.

J. WRIGHT.

P O E T R Y .

1. THE CHRISTIAN PILGRIM.

I'm a pilgrim and a stranger,
Rough and thorny is the road,
Often in the midst of danger,
But it leads to God.

Clouds and darkness oft distress me,
Great and many are my foes,
Anxious thoughts and cares perplex me,
But my Father knows.

Oh, how sweet is this assurance,
Midst the conflict and the strife,
Although sorrows past endurance,
Follow me through life.

Home in prospect still can cheer me,
Yea, can give me sweet repose,
While I feel his presence near me,
For my Father knows.

Yes, He sees and knows me daily,
Watches over me in love,
Sends me help when foes assail me,
Bids me look above.

Soon my journey will be ended,
Life is drawing to a close,
I shall then be well attended,
This my Father knows.

I shall then with joy behold him,
Face to face my Father see,
Fall with rapture and adore Him,
For His love to me.

Nothing more will then distress me,
In that land of sweet repose,
Jesus stands engaged to bless me,
This my Father knows.

2. MY JESUS I LOVE THEE.

My Jesus I love Thee, I know Thou art mine;
For Thee, all the follies of sin, I resign:
My gracious Redeemer, my Saviour, art Thou;—
If ever I lov'd Thee, my Jesus, 'tis now.

I love Thee, because Thou hast first loved me,
And purchased my pardon on Calvary's tree;
I love Thee, for wearing the thorns on Thy brow,—
If ever I lov'd Thee, my Jesus, 'tis now.

I will love Thee in life, I will love Thee in death,
And praise Thee as long as Thou lendest me breath;
And say, when the death-dew lies cold on my brow,
If ever I lov'd Thee, my Jesus, 'tis now.

In mansions of glory, and endless delight,
I'll ever adore Thee in the heaven of light;
I'll sing with the glittering crown on my brow,
If ever I lov'd Thee, my Jesus, 'tis now.

Yours truly
William Liddington
Born Oct<sup>r</sup> 11th 1810

THE Primitive Methodist Magazine.

---

NOVEMBER, 1862.

---

BIOGRAPHY.

---

1. JOSEPH GRIEVES.

RELIGIOUS biography, whether found in the elegant octavo volume, or in the pages of the monthly magazine, has been of eminent service to the church of Christ. That it is perfectly right to preserve the sayings and deeds of the pious dead, will admit of no dispute, when we consider the teachings of the Bible on the point:—"The memory of the just is blessed;" "The righteous shall be had in everlasting remembrance." The Christian biographer does not wish to canonize his hero, nor to procure for him a niche in the temple of imaginary saints, but to bring out the traits of the religious life, that the good may be instructed, and the laggard disciple stimulated.

"We live in deeds, not years; in thoughts, not breaths;
In feelings, not in figures on a dial.
We should count time by heart-throbs; he most lives
Who thinks most—feels the noblest—acts the best."

Joseph Grieves, the subject of this short sketch, was born January 11th, 1800, at Aukside, near Middleton-in-Teesdale, in the county of Durham, and died June 2nd, 1862, at Brierley Hill, in Staffordshire. His ancestors belonged to Scotland, but his father had settled in the north of England several years before the birth of Joseph. His secular education seems to have been attended to, for he was early sent to school, and he continued there until he was fourteen years of age. In this period he made considerable progress in reading, writing, and arithmetic. When young he was obliged to attend the services of the Established Church; but it is to be feared he did this with little profit, though at the time he was mercifully visited with the admonitions of the Divine Spirit, for he says, "When about ten years of age I remember being deeply affected under a sermon preached by John Hall, a Wesleyan Methodist local preacher. I went home in great distress, and resolved, with tears in my eyes, to serve God; but having no one to take me by the hand, my good impressions wore off, though I ever retained a respect for religion and the people of God." On another occasion he adds, "Returning from a long round of drinking, about four o'clock in the morning, I was struck with such deep conviction, that I thought the earth was about to open and swallow me up. I was awfully alarmed, and though the rain was coming down in torrents, I took a stone from the wall, and knelt upon it, and for half an hour I cried to God to have mercy upon me. I went home, and resolved to become a sober man; but when my next temptations came, my resolutions gave way, and I again plunged into the vortex of sin and folly." The sins to which he at this time was most addicted were drunkenness, profane song singing, and poaching. Hence, he says, "As I grew up I mingled with ungodly young men, frequenting public houses, and often sitting with my companions till morning, singing the songs of the drunkard. To detail all the plans, plots, toils, hair-breadth escapes, battles, lawsuits, and victories, that I have been mixed up with, in poaching, would fill many pages." We will furnish two or three, that the reader may see what the grace of God did for him. One day, he and a party of five others, had been on the mountains in pursuit of game, but not succeeding according to their wishes, they determined to go through a gentleman's preserves, which lay on their way home. As night came on, they resorted to a small public house in a neighbouring village to eat and drink, whither they were watched by the keepers, who at midnight made an attack upon them. One of the watchers took hold of the shot-belt of young Grieves, and said, "You are the men we want." He was pushed back from the house into the open-air; and a regular battle commenced, which was heightened by the pitch-darkness surrounding the combatants. The keepers used sticks and bludgeons freely, and the poachers the butt ends of their guns. In the confusion Grieves knocked down his own brother, and was about to deal another tremendous blow on him, when he cried out just in time to prevent it. In this melée the assailants were worsted and ran. A lawsuit was instituted against the poachers; but through a false oath taken by the landlord of the public house, and a little leniency on the part of the magistrates, the prosecution broke down.

On another occasion, in consequence of an affray he had had in a poaching excursion, he was brought before a bench of magistrates, and was not allowed to leave the court without bail. He had to appear to answer to the indictment at the next Durham sessions. The defence cost him twenty pounds, which was defrayed by a subscription made for him in his native village. When the trial came on it was found that the principal witness for the prosecution had sworn to a wrong date; the case was therefore dismissed. "My dear old father," says our late brother, "was ill when I was under bail, and often said, 'I shall not live to see whether Joseph will be transported or not.' He died before the trial came on. I have frequently thought on his words; and after my conversion, would have given all the world to see him." Other incidents, equally atrocious and wicked, might be readily supplied, to show the depth of depravity into which the subject of this memoir had fallen, were they required; but enough, holier scenes and brighter days are before him.

For more than twelve months before his conversion, he was passing through a large measure of mental anguish. The world appeared to him exceedingly vain. Pleasures, in which he had formerly delighted, lost their fascination. His favourite dog and gun no longer attracted him. He sold his dog to a gentleman for four pounds.

At this time certain Primitive Methodist preachers came into the neighbourhood where he resided, and opened their commission in the open-air. Many of the villagers were attracted by their lively singing, fervent prayers, and faithful pointed sermons. Brother Grieves heard these devoted men, and was brought into deep distress. One night he went to Mickleton to hear one of them; and, to avoid his old companions, took a back way through some fields. When he entered the house he knelt to pray: the first time he had ever knelt in a place of worship. Some of the friends, observing these bright omens in this young man, invited him after the meeting to one of their homes, that they might counsel and pray with him. They prayed, and he tried to pray; but his voice was stifled in tears and loud sobs; the floor was wet with his tears. He failed to obtain the relief sought that night. On the following Sabbath a lovefeast was to be held in the Primitive Methodist Chapel, Westgate, Weardale; being invited, he consented to go. The day before the lovefeast, such was his mental agony, that he thought he should lose the balance of his mind. Some may attribute this feeling to melancholy and ignorant fanaticism. There is no fanaticism here; a question, the most important, which sooner or later must occupy the attention of every man, pressed itself upon him.

At length the day of deliverance came. In the morning, he and the friends who had travailed in birth with him a few nights ago, commenced their journey for Westgate. On crossing the mountains, they knelt and prayed; but our brother had neither faith nor power. In the afternoon, at half-past two o'clock, the lovefeast opened; a noble band of men, whose hearts God had touched, were there. With exultant and harmonious voices they sang the first hymn—

"The day of wonder now is come:
The year of Jubilee."

The speaking was pointed and powerful, and the prayers offered afterwards, "went up before the throne like claps of thunder." In this holy scene, redolent with the richest graces of heaven, Brother Grieves passed from death to life. He says, "The Holy Ghost went through my heart like a burning flame. I cried 'Hold! hold! hold!' and attempted to stop the praying. I thought if it continued longer my soul would burst. The preacher, John Hewson, came out of the pulpit and cried aloud, 'Believe! believe!' I shouted, 'I do believe.' I thought I was believing for too much. From that hour to the present I have never doubted my acceptance with God."

Immediately after his conversion he joined the Primitive Methodist Connexion, with which he lived in uninterrupted harmony for the space of thirty-eight years. Having been made a partaker of the grace of God, he panted for others to participate in the same enjoyment. Prayer-meetings, through his agency, were instituted in various places in the neighbourhood of Middleton. In one of these early efforts he was made instrumental in the conversion of Mr. John Leekley, the founder of Primitive Methodism in the Western States of America.* Early in the year 1825, his name appeared on the local preachers' plan; and in the capacity of a local preacher, he, in connexion with others, missioned several villages, where there are to this day flourishing churches. In March, 1826, the Hull Circuit called him into the regular ministry, and stationed him in the Barnard Castle Branch, where he laboured with acceptance and success for three months. In June of this year, he was appointed for the Westgate and Alston Branch. In this station he had many seals to his ministry. In his journal he says, "December 11th, Preached at Ludwell. Two young men who were convinced yesterday, followed me to this place." "26th, Preached at Wearshead. Several new converts." "January 21st, 1827, Sunday.—A crowded chapel at Alston. Mr. Harrison, a farmer at the Nest, a small village about a mile from Alston, wished me to hold a service in his house; several young men, my former acquaintances, came to hear. While I was speaking one young man fell from his chair, and cried aloud for mercy. Soon the congregation was in tears, and cries for pardon were heard on every hand. Mr. Harrison went into the dairy, I followed him; he was on his knees in deep distress. He said, 'I fear God will not save me.' I assured him that he would. Several got converted; twenty-five joined class. The landlord of a public-house near, declared that he lost £1 a week by that revival."

The Conference of 1827, stationed him for St. Austell, in Cornwall. After a tedious journey we find him, July the 9th, in his new circuit, burnishing his weapons, and preparing to do battle with the devil and sin. The hand that had been with him in his last station, more mightily rested upon him in this. In his journal, he says, under date July 22nd, 1827. "A move at St. Austell; at night a mighty shaking took place. I had not been speaking ten minutes before the whole congregation seemed moved by the Holy Ghost. Shouts of glory and cries for mercy, both from the gallery and the body of the chapel, completely drowned my voice. I stood upon the pulpit steps, and told the congregation that God was coming down as in the North, and exhorted believers to look for entire sanctification. The number converted I cannot tell, but the day of God will declare it." Again, July 25th, "I never had such power as now; my soul is full of the Holy Ghost. I gave out my text at Downs, — 'Behold you have sinned against the Lord; and be sure your sin will find you out.' One cried out, 'Lord, have mercy upon me.' I said, 'Your sins have found you out; and they will find more of you out yet.' Then two others began to pray aloud for mercy. The cries became general throughout the chapel. Some ran away alarmed. A mighty time." See a fuller account of this glorious work than we can give, for want of room, in Petty's History of the Connexion, p. 199.

* See Petty's History of the Connexion, p. 376.

In September, 1828, he was removed from St. Austell to the Penzance Mission. One of his first acts in his new sphere of labour, was to visit the workhouse and prison, for spiritual purposes. The limits assigned for this memoir will not allow us to freely use the materials at hand, or he would appear as a very successful ambassador of the Prince of peace in this station. While here he opened St. Ives on June 15th, 1829. When he arrived at the river Hale, to cross from Penzance to St. Ives, the tide was up; under these circumstances passengers have to wait the retrocession of the waters before they can proceed. He went into an old church, nearly buried in the sand, where he spent about three hours in prayer, beseeching God to go with him. In these days Primitive Methodist missioning was rough work. A few apples constituted the dinner of our missionary. The tide having subsided, he prepared to cross. While taking off his stockings for this purpose, a strong man offered to carry him over on his back; and after a little difficulty, Brother Grieves reached his destination. He went to a "decked boat" on the Quay, and stood upon it, and there alone and a stranger, began to sing:—

"Come, O come, thou vilest sinner;
Christ is ready to receive."

The people were struck with astonishment at this strange apparition which had suddenly come amongst them. However, a large company, chiefly sailors and fishermen, with their wives, soon assembled to hear. With great liberty the preacher offered a full, free, and present salvation to the worst of sinners. Many wept, and earnestly entreated another visit, promising a place to preach in. On August 5th, our brother preached again at St. Ives; nearly 2000 persons heard this sermon. "The hearts of many were smitten; numbers dated their first religious impressions from this night. The good done will be seen in eternity." A glorious work broke out, the whole town was moved, and a great reformation effected. A large chapel was built, in which Mr. Grieves had the pleasure of preaching the first sermon. It has been the birth-place of hundreds of souls. St. Ives is now the head of a respectable circuit, numbering above 500 members, and employing two travelling preachers. For ampler details, see Petty's History of the Connexion, pp. 235-6.

In June, 1830, Brother Grieves entered St. Austell, as one of its ministers, the second time. In the interim, between the times of his first and second travelling here, this station had been completely "run down," and left a wreck; but under his labours and those of his colleagues, the good work rose rapidly, and the circuit acquired its former status. While here, January 5th, 1832, he was united in marriage to Miss Ann Lucas, of Tregrehain Mills, who, through his instrumentality, had been brought to God about four years previously.

The Conference of 1832, stationed him as the superintendent of the Cwm Circuit; here he spent three happy and prosperous years. The circuit desired his retention the fourth; but the General Committee put their veto on the application, and he was removed. A great work broke out in this station, into the details of which we cannot now enter. When Brother Grieves began his labours here he found 507 members; when he left, there were 830, and the finances had risen in proportion.

In 1835, we find him in the Birmingham Circuit. He found 667 members; and after three years of a successful superintendency, he left 800; being an increase of 133.

In 1838, he became the superintendent of the Tunstall Circuit; here he remained but two years. In this station he does not appear to have been happy; the biographer has no need to say why. The men involved are no more on earth. They have passed, we hope, to the blood-washed throng, where the misunderstandings of this sublunary world will be rectified. Here, also, he was called to bury his wife among strangers; but he was not friendless. On May 29th, 1840, a fifth daughter was born to him. The mother never recovered, but gradually sank until the following July, when she departed in triumph to heaven; leaving him with five small children. Notwithstanding these apparently unpropitious circumstances, the circuit made considerable progress. A good chapel was built at Talk-o'-th'-hill; Newcastle and Sandbach were made into circuits; and a clear increase of fifty-eight members was left upon the books.

In 1840 he removed from Tunstall to Ludlow. In this station he appears to have been much happier than he was in Tunstall. He continued here three years, and saw the arm of the Lord made bare in the edification of the churches, and the conversion of sinners. Some good chapels were built in the station; many valuable members, who are now pillars in the circuit, were added to the societies; and the numbers stood, when he removed, one hundred and eighty in advance of what they were three years before.

In October, 1842, he was united in marriage to Miss Mary Ann

Lewis, his present widow. This alliance was of the happiest character, and its dissolution bows the frame of her who is left behind in the wilderness.

In July, 1843, we find him entering on another sphere of labour, the Prees Circuit. While here, two or three local preachers introduced among the various societies discussions on a topic extraneous to the work of God; and so vehemently did they push their favourite theories, that a violent contention arose, which in many places hindered the progress of spiritual things. Yet much good was done. The circuit rose in efficiency and finances, and an increase of forty-two was reported.

After eleven years absence he returned to the Cwm Circuit, by the special request of that station. The summary—for he has ceased to keep a journal—is at this time very defective. But he says, “We realized an increase for the two years, how many, I cannot say, as the number of members is not reported in the General Minutes of the last year I was at Cwm.”

The Tunstall friends, impressed with the conviction that during his former superintendency with them he had laboured under disadvantages, in the year 1848 desired his re-station, and obtained it. He continued here two years; the good work rolled gloriously along, and our brother had the satisfaction of leaving 146 more members in the various classes than he found.

His next station was Wrockwardine Wood. In this he continued three years. Here his hitherto strong constitution began to break up. About one-third of his time here he was laid aside from active duties by pains in his back and chest. Several societies were visited with showers of blessings (see Primitive Methodist Magazine, 1851, page 625). At one of the Quarterly Meetings, in consequence of certain extra burdens, the circuit could not meet the demands made upon it by £12 9s. 3d.; and, as one or two of the preachers were about to remove, Brother Grieves resolved to lay the case before God, and to solicit His interposition. Accordingly he appointed a day for fasting and prayer, a plan he had often adopted, and which he had never found to fail.

About ten o'clock, A.M., while holding audience with the Deity, a wealthy gentleman, whom he had not seen before, rapped at his door, and desired an interview with him. The stranger made many inquiries touching the labours of the Primitive Methodists, and the methods adopted to support their ministers. The issue of this visit was, he left £12 9s. 3d. to pay the circuit's deficiency, and also gave £5 to the Preachers' Fund. About twelve months afterwards, the same benevolent individual, favourably impressed by his first visit, sought a second. He asked particularly of the London and Wesleyan Missionary Societies, and then of the Primitive Methodist Missionary Society. Having, by Mr. Grieves's advice, obtained an interview with J. Hunt, Esq., then the Missionary Treasurer, he returned home, and remitted to that gentleman £1,366 1s. 3d. for the year 1852. In the year 1853 he sent for the same purpose £1,367 0s. 4d., making a total of £2,733 1s. 7d. given in two years to our Missionary Fund. May we not say that the prayers and cogent representations of our deceased brother had something to do in bringing this timely aid to our funds?

In 1853 he became the superintendent of the West Bromwich Circuit. We find him entering upon his new station full of spiritual and moral energy, but he had experienced a very sensible diminution of physical power. His old complaint, occasioned by long and hard labour, and sleeping in damp beds, attacked him here, but not so violently as in his last station. He had the pleasure of seeing the churches growing in grace, and sinners converted; and at the expiration of two years he left seventy members more than he found.

From West Bromwich he removed to Brierley Hill in the year 1855. For an account of the great work which broke out under his superintendency here, see Primitive Methodist Magazine for 1858, page 690. The circuit increased in its manifold interests very pleasingly; in its Sunday-scholars, 601; in its teachers, 124; and in its members, 173.

The Conference of 1858 stationed him in Birmingham. But his physical power was not what it was when in this circuit some years before, and he was temporarily laid aside from his work, which interfered with the onward movements of the station. However, he left on the rolls 150 members more than he found.

His last circuit was Sandbach, which he entered July 14th, 1861. This station was smaller than that he had been accustomed to; but the kind consideration of his brethren had placed him here in a quiet retreat, and to relieve him from the toils incident to the itinerancy in larger stations. "At first," says he, "I felt somewhat lonely without a colleague, but I have sweet communion with God, and have had some glorious meetings, and seen a few converted.

"February 28th, 1862, I had a great manifestation of the Spirit of God to my soul. For a fortnight I was carried above all earthly things, and could rejoice evermore, pray without ceasing, and in everything give thanks. I not only felt peace with God, but joy in the Holy Ghost. Sometimes I could scarcely sleep for praising God. I have had to pass through a great deal of mental anxiety on account of my bodily health, the cause of God, and family matters; but the Lord has paid me for all.

'O, love, how cheering is thy ray;
All pain before thy presence flies.' "

The above extract is valuable as showing his religious state when he stood on the frontiers of eternity.

In March last he requested, on the ground of bodily infirmity, relief from the regular work for three months, and retired to Brierley Hill, where he had a daughter in business. By temporary cessation from continuous toil, he hoped to partially recruit his shattered health; and after superannuation to spend a few years in the bosom of his family, and the society of old friends. But his Master had ordered otherwise.

On Saturday, May 31st, he went to Birmingham to see Brother Pritchard, who was going to the conference. This journey was undertaken with the view of obtaining a second preachers' station for the next year, as he felt himself unequal to the superintendency of a circuit. On the next day—the Sabbath—at family prayer he was especially devout. During a great part of the forenoon, he read in the newly arrived magazines; and was deeply impressed with the biographical section. In the afternoon he was drowsy, and lay on the sofa. In the interim, between tea and chapel time, he had a sweet conversation with Mrs. Grieves on sanctification. At six o'clock he and his wife went to the chapel at Brierley Hill. In the service he became poorly, and could not stay during the prayer-meeting. On his way home he complained of a pain across the chest, and a sense of suffocation. He supped lightly, but in bed complained of a slight headache. On the following morning, after a comfortable night's rest, he rose, shaved, came down stairs, and took a walk in the garden. On his return he said to Mrs. Grieves, "I don't want to live here always; you must not think I want to live here," and made a backward movement to the sofa, sat down, his head gently inclining to the right, and expired, of a diseased heart, in the arms of his wife. Though he was not permitted to give the triumphant shout of the warrior as he left the battle field—his departure was too sudden to allow him even to raise the parting cheer to his companions, in whose serried ranks he had fought the "good fight"—his translation was, nevertheless, safe. By faith he took the blood of Jesus, and, passing the veil, appeared before the throne.

Our departed brother in his physical structure was about the average height, and had a slight tendency to corpulency. His features were bold and regular, and beamed with good will and intelligence, but we thought in later years that they were tinged with a somewhat sombre and melancholy shade, which no doubt was occasioned by the bodily anguish through which he was called to pass. He had a well-balanced intellect; his understanding was capacious; his memory retentive, and well furnished; his judgment reliable and trustworthy; his conception of things was accurate; his perception though somewhat slow was penetrating. The logical faculty, also, existed in him in a respectable degree; but in imagination he was rather defective. "The saints," as Luther said, "are not to be praised for themselves, but for their Saviour; they shine like dew drops on the hair of the heavenly Bridegroom." The moral beauty of the believer reflects the glory of the Redeemer.

Brother Grieves was a genuine Christian. Religion was to him a matter of consciousness. It was a living reality, surging in a heart full of the purest emotion. His conversion was of the right stamp; his repentance was genuine, and he tasted the sweets of pardoning love. There was the penitential struggle, and then the believing triumph; the lowering cloud of wrath, and then the bright blue sky of God's favour. He was also emphatically a man of prayer.

Every Friday, through a long course of years, he set apart as a day of special fasting and prayer. His manuscripts contain a rich mine of precious ore, through the whole of which the vein of a full salvation runs almost without a "fault." The following is a sample :—

"Oh my heavenly Father, I have not lived to thy glory as I ought to have done; but in Thy strength I resolve this day to give my all to Thee for ever. I determine, 1. To pray continually for the great salvation. 2. To believe for the full glory of the Spirit, to dwell in my soul. 3. To pray for the conversion of sinners. 4. To never use any unnecessary indulgence; but to fast and practise all scriptural self-denial. 5. To watch every thought, and keep myself free from all wrong desires. Lord help me!"

As a minister he was useful in the conversion of sinners, and the edification of the Church, as his journals amply testify. His preaching was solid, rather than showy; calculated to instruct, rather than dazzle. His sermons were well studied, and contained the pith of the Gospel. His manner was serious and devout in the pulpit; and adapted to impress his hearers with the solemnity becoming the sanctuary. His delivery was precipitate, which rendered it difficult for his hearers to catch all he said, and somewhat abated the force of his discourses. His theology was Arminian; and he had well read some of the great authors of this school, Wesley, Benson, Clarke and Watson. He was a thorough Primitive Methodist. The connexion had been instrumental in his conversion; he, therefore, under God, owed it a large debt of gratitude, which he endeavoured to pay by hard and untiring exertion in its service, during a period of about thirty-eight years. When he started in the itinerancy, he gave up the old homestead, with certain advantages, with which, secularly, he might have been comfortable. But he forsook all, and did not look back on his "stuff." He voluntarily embraced the poverty, labours, and privations, which in those days were incident to the path of a Primitive Methodist preacher. He sought not other and richer pastures, but dwelt among his own people, and was well content to do so. But had he no faults? He doubtless had; though the writer knows of none. These, whatever they were, were better known to himself than to others. He passed in and out amongst us, through a long course of years, with a blameless reputation, which is as ointment poured forth among the churches where he laboured. But we must stop. He has passed to a world where the incense of human panegyric cannot elate him, nor the censure of poor mortals depress him. He has heard the plaudit—"Well done"—from the righteous Judge, amid the smiles of angels, and the greeting of old friends who had died before.

"Farewell, dear friend, a long farewell,
For we shall meet no more—
Till we be rais'd with Christ to dwell,
On Zion's happy shore."

P. PUGH.

2. MOSES JONES, the son of John and Charlotte Jones, was born in the year 1811, at Ettingshall, in the parish of Sedgely. He lived a stranger to the saving grace of God till the year 1827, when he was induced by a friend to attend a lovefeast among the Wesleyans, where he was convinced he was a sinner; after which he, in a short time, experienced the saving power of the grace of God. He remained there about twelve months, and then came to reside at Cinderhill, where he has since been a class-leader, Sunday-school superintendent, and chapel-steward among the Primitive Methodists. His affliction was long and severe, but in patience he possessed his soul. His religious experience was clear and sound. I visited him frequently, and always found him happily relying on the merits of Christ. I asked him if he felt any fear of death, and he replied, "Fear, what have I to fear, since Christ is with me? He says, He will never leave me nor forsake me." In this happy state of mind he continued till it pleased the Lord to take him to Himself, on the 25th of December, 1861, in the fiftieth year of his age. He has left a wife and five children to mourn their loss. May they and the writer meet him in heaven.

W. PAGE.

3. JOHN BINGHAM, was born at Dronfield, July 15th, 1778, and died happy in the Lord at Killam, Marsh-lane, in the neighbourhood of Mosbro', January 18th, 1862, aged eighty-three years.

The greater part of his life was spent in actual connection with God's people, and we can believe from his own statements, and the evidence of those who knew him best, that such connection was only the result of being in vital union with Christ. Considering the public state of morals during his early lifetime, and the great dearth of religious opportunities, compared with those which we possess, our deceased brother was highly favoured. He had pious parents, and, as was their duty, they aimed at training him up in the way in which he should go. Early fruitage from such training resulted in their son giving himself to God. At the age of seventeen, he was converted to the religion of Jesus, and was wont, with peculiar fervour and real pleasure, to speak in clearest terms of the sorrow he felt while in a convinced state, and then of the joy he experienced when freed from sin. Not unfrequently, while relating an account of his conversion, the converting power has rested on the people, and glory has filled the place.

Having to live in different places, the result of circumstances over which he had no control, he united with various sections of Christ's Church. He was in connection with the Friends, the Wesleyans, the Methodist New Connexion Body; he then re-joined the Wesleyans, and stood as a local preacher on their plan for several years; coming to reside near Mosbro', in 1857, and having by choice attended our chapel for a few months, he offered himself to our people there, was duly received, and remained with us till his death. He was put on our plan, and became an efficient help to our society; took, when appointed, the leadership of one of the classes, and frequently led a class of which he was not the recognised leader. He was beloved by those who knew him, and most by those who knew him best. He was evangelical, energetic, and earnest in the performance of his public duties. If not intellectually great in his discourses, he was plain and good, and thus acceptable to the people. He lived his religion, acted consistently, and as becometh the Christian. His life preached. He was truly a "living epistle," and without doubt he will have some as the crown of his rejoicing at the coming of our Lord Jesus.

During his affliction I visited him, and found him patient, happy, and resigned. On one occasion in particular, while engaged in prayer, glory filled the room; he shouted loudly the praises of his God, and wept for joy. On my leaving him, he asked, "Where are you planned to-night?" On my answering his question, he said with peculiar emphasis and feeling, "Tell them from me, that it is the pure in heart that shall see God." A truth contained in God's word we know, and so known about long before he uttered it—the Author of it Christ Himself; and quite in keeping is that sentence with the rest of His beautiful Sermon on the Mount; but, methinks, Brother Bingham felt powerfully then, as he was at the close of life, and on the borders of another world, with soul made white in Jesus' blood, that none other than those who were pure in heart would see his face with joy.—They surely shall, but none other. This was the last time I saw him; when I went again, the first sentence that fell on my ears, as addressed to me was, "Brother Bingham's dead." "Indeed," said I. "Ah, well, he died happy." "Oh, yes," replied my friend, "he died happy, very happy." Of course, it could not be otherwise; he loved his God, and shewed his love, and having lived to Him, he died prepared to meet Him. The next day, the 22nd of January, good men bore him to his grave, and saw the last of his mortality. His spirit is safe at home for ever.

"With him,

The wish, the hope of heaven has smiled;
Life for him flows with unbounded tide.
His time-work's done.

God has rewarded him with dazzling crown,
Its frontlets stamped with heaven's own royalty ;
He is at home with those who went before,
From labour, and from conquest to their God."

J. G. SMITH.

4. JOB WILLIAMS, son of George and Ann Williams, was born April 9th, 1810, at Old Castle township, Malpas, in the county of Chester. His father died when he was about two years old, and his mother, being left very poor, was not able to procure for him an education, and his morals were much neglected. In this condition was Job brought up—in ignorance and ungodliness. He was early put to work as a farm labourer, and continued to follow that employment until the year 1837, when he was providentially led to Manchester. Meeting with an acquaintance, he was persuaded by him to attend Jersey Street Chapel, where, under the preaching of the Gospel, he was awakened to a sense of his sinfulness, and the inward depravity of his nature; and being powerfully convinced by the Holy Spirit of the evil of his past life, he was led to cry to the Almighty for mercy and pardon, and to seek by faith salvation through the blood of Jesus, even the forgiveness of his sins. His prayers and faith were not in vain, for the Lord gave him a knowledge of salvation by the remission of his sins, and blessed him with the witness of His Holy Spirit, testifying to him his adoption into the family and household of God. From a careful reading of the Scriptures, Job soon became convinced that being a citizen with the saints, it was his privilege to make his calling and election sure, and become meet to be a partaker with the saints in light of an inheritance incorruptible, undefiled, and that fadeth not away. In pursuit of his high privilege, he attained a deep union with God; and walking in the light as he is in the light, he had fellowship with the saints, and experienced that the blood of Jesus cleanseth from all sin. His motto was, "Believe on the Son, and love one another."

Shortly after he came to Manchester, he was married to Ann Hughes, by whom he had several children, four sons of whom, with their widowed mother, mourn their loss.

The employment he followed was of a laborious nature, and prostrated his strength, and even ultimately produced decline; but in his affliction he gave the strongest proof of the genuineness of the religion he professed. He was supported and sustained by that good Being he had so long served, and proved that although chastenings are not joyous but grievous, they afterwards yield the peaceable fruits of righteousness to those who are exercised thereby.

For several years he sustained the office of class-leader, and for twenty-four years the office of Sunday-school teacher, and he was often found a visitor at the sick-bed, where he was very useful. He was a man of unassuming and modest habits ; but had his utterance been equal to his sound spiritual knowledge his position in the Church would have been of a more prominent character.

As a husband and father he was attentive to the wants of his family, setting an example also of piety before them. In his situation as a servant he was assiduous in the discharge of his duties to his employers, and strictly honest and upright ; kind also to his fellow-servants ; and he was much esteemed by his masters, in whose service he continued for the space of twenty-four years.

In his different relationships Job held on the even tenour of his way, meeting with many difficulties, afflictions, trials and chastisements, and experiencing those infirmities and weaknesses which flesh is heir to, and finding his spiritual treasure was held in an earthen vessel ; and oftentimes, being burdened, he groaned for deliverance. However, in his last affliction, he testified that by believing and practising the precepts of the Gospel, he had not followed cunningly-devised fables, but he experienced the Gospel to be the power of God to his salvation.

During the many visits paid to him by members of the Church, he invariably spoke of having a calm peace and an inward joy, resulting from faith in the promises. He often desired them to read to him the 16th chapter of St. John's Gospel, which was made to him a source of great comfort.

At an interview the writer had with him, the day before his death, when he was lovingly and faithfully questioned upon the grounds of his hope of eternal life, he stated he had no confidence in himself, or in any works which he had performed, but felt himself a poor, helpless sinner ; but his hope was in Jesus, the Lamb whom the Father gave for the sin of the world, and whom God had appointed a High Priest for ever ; and by faith in him he had now a good hope of heaven.

On the 11th of April, 1862, he calmly breathed out his spirit, having assured brother Bardsly, who was present, that Christ was precious to his soul, and all was well with him.

S. LONGDIN.

---

5. JOHN BAGBE was born at Bedworth, in the year 1794, and died at Darlaston, April 29th, 1862. His early life was spent in the neglect of God and religion, and in the pursuit of worldly pleasure and amusement. A peculiar providence brought him from Bedworth, to reside in the south of Staffordshire, where he was mercifully rescued from the service and slavery of Satan, and brought into the enjoyment of the freedom and peace of the children of God. The change was so great, that he never after doubted the ability and willingness of God to save the vilest. In the year 1828, he went to live at Mamble square, where he opened his house to the Primitive Methodists. There the word of life was preached; listening crowds attended, and a great awakening took place through all the neighbourhood. With the Primitive Methodists he became a leader and local preacher, and was made the honoured means of saving many souls.

In the year 1838, he removed to Princes End. There he purchased land, and built a room at his own expense, that would hold 200 people. Primitive Methodism there took its stand, and the infant Church rapidly increased. In course of time there was a demand for a larger place of worship; he procured another plot of land, on which a beautiful Connexional chapel and school were erected. His hand and heart were always open to the cause of God, and his house was a hospitable shelter for the ministers of truth.

Through some misunderstanding among the officials, he left our Church and joined the Methodist New Connexion, and was highly respected amongst them. In 1854, he came to live at Darlaston, again united with our society, and continued a leader and local preacher till his death. The sincerity of his heart was seen in his consistent life; the uprightness of his intentions enhanced the lustre of his virtues. His morality was never tarnished with habits of dissipation or dishonest practices; and his dealings with men were governed by the rules of justice. The testimony given us by one of his workmen, who has been in his employ for many years, is that "he was a just man in all his dealings." His Christian character was unquestionable, being compatible with the principles of the New Testament. He was kind and courteous in his manner, humble in his disposition, and evangelical in his views. He was a faithful husband, and an affectionate father; his instructions and prayers will be long remembered by those he has left behind. His abilities as a preacher were very acceptable, and he was truly scriptural in his sentiments. He had read his Bible, studied it, believed it, prayed over it, and come to a right understanding of it, and he delivered its truths under a conviction of their efficiency to convert sinners.

In the earlier part of his religious life, he was abundant in his labours. When our preachers had to perform very long journeys, sometimes under very unfavourable circumstances, he did not shrink from the task; a slight pain of body did not keep him at home; through wind and rain he has often gone, and God has gone with him, and crowned his labours with success.

During the last six months of his life he was the subject of severe affliction, under which his earthly system rapidly sank; but the grace of God which he had recommended to others kept his own mind in perfect peace. With unshaken confidence he relied on the atonement, and gloried in the foundation of his hope. We frequently visited him and found him fortified against the terrors of dissolution. His words were few with men, but his intercourse with God was constant. He bore his affliction with patience and holy firmness, believing that God would do all things well. The best of means were used to prolong his life, but to no purpose ; his work being done, he must retire from this earthly scene of action, leaving behind a family and numerous friends who loved him, and a dear wife with whom he had lived happily for forty years. He died in peace in the sixty-sixth year of his age.

S. SANDERS.

6. WILLIAM LOWNDS, of Moorsbarrow, in Congleton Circuit, departed this life April 30th, 1862, having been a member of the Primitive Methodist Connexion twenty-seven years, and sustained the important office of class-leader twenty. Very little is known of his early life, until the year 1836, when he was induced to attend the preaching service held in the late Mr. Cooke's house at Sproston, where the word was faithfully preached, and came with power to his heart. From that time he became an anxious inquirer, and for some time the language of his soul was, "O that I could find Him whom my soul loves." In that state of mind he continued until a camp-meeting was held in that locality, when he was urged to cast his burden upon the Lord by faith. He did so, resting his all on the merits of Christ, and hence found peace. He forthwith joined the infant society at Sproston, where he continued a firm pillar in the cause, until the time of his departure. Often when relating his experience, and referring to his conversion, with what delight would he exclaim,

"Soon as my all I ventured,
On the atoning blood ;
His Holy Spirit entered,
And I was born of God."

As a leader, he was attentive ; and although his abilities were slender, still he was affectionate and kind, which gained him the esteem of all his members. His attachment to the Connexion of his early choice was ardent and sincere ; and in him the circuit and other Connexional funds found a friend and supporter.

About twelve months ago his health began to fail, medical aid was sought, but in vain ; he gradually declined. Being generally respected, many called to see him during his illness, to whom he bore strong testimony to the power of saving peace. My colleague and myself frequently visited him ; we found his experience clear and Scriptural, and his faith strong in the Lord. In his waking moments he communed with the Lord, and would sing,

"Thou of life the fountain art,
Freely let me take of Thee ;
Spring Thou up within my heart,
Rise to all eternity."

While the writer was sitting at his bed-side, he said, "He whom I have served these many years does not leave me in sickness, I feel he is with me; for I know that my Redeemer liveth; yea, if the house of my tabernacle were dissolved, I have a building above, a house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens." In an ecstasy of joy he repeated a part of that sublime verse,

"His name yields the richest perfume,
And sweeter than music His voice;
His presence disperses my gloom,
And makes all within me rejoice."

A short time before his death, Mr. R. Downing, of Sandbach, visited him, and while at prayer the glory filled the room, and all appeared to feel the power of God. All his family being present except one, with an unusual energy he said to his dear wife and children, "Meet me in heaven! meet me in heaven! meet me in heaven!" The charge was delivered with such emphasis that Mr. Downing was led to write me the following lines:—

"'Meet me in heaven,' a dying father said
Unto his children standing round his bed;
O this has been the burden of my cry,
That we at last may meet on high.
'Meet me in heaven,' for this my prayer ascends,
That God would be your Saviour and your friend;
And when your race on earth is run,
Your joys in heaven may be begun!"

Shortly after he departed, having before him a fulness of glory, and a blooming hope of immortality. May his bereaved widow and children meet him before the throne of God in heaven, is the prayer of

J. GRAHAM.

---

7. JOHN RITSON, son of George and Elizabeth Ritson, was born at Hawkshead, in Lancashire, in the year 1800, and died at Whitehaven, April 23rd, 1862.

While he was but a boy, his parents removed to Camerton, near Workington, in the county of Cumberland, and a few years after he was put apprentice to a painter in Harrington, where he grew up a wild and dissolute young man.

In July, 1824, he was married to her who now mourns her loss; but this was little or no check on his habits of drunkenness and profligacy, but for several years he wandered in his downward career of dissipation, and professedly, as well as practically, was sceptical as to the doctrines of religion. He was, however, led to hear a temperance lecture in Cockermouth; and from what he heard, and the entreaties of brother E. Allinson, he signed the pledge to abstain from intoxicating drinks, and ever after kept his pledge, and was for several years a member of the Rechabite Society.

When he became a sober man, and was delivered from the associations and influences connected with drinking customs, he was led to seek other society, and began to attend the preaching of the Primitive Methodists in Cockermouth; and under the preaching of a Mr. Lion, he was convinced of sin. He then earnestly sought the Lord, and found peace through the blood of the Cross. This was in 1836; and he immediately united with the church, and was for upwards of twenty-five years a member. He was soon after put on the preachers' plan, and long and numerous were his journeys, especially in the early years of his labours, and due attention to his appointments was truly characteristic of him all through life. If he was well, people were never in doubt about his attendance; and several souls under his preaching were converted to God.

During the last two years of his life, his health was much affected, and especially the last nine or ten months, so that his public labours in the church were but few. About two years ago his only son was brought to his father's house for change of air, but was a dying man. Brother Ritson felt deeply interested about his son's salvation, and had the pleasure to witness a saving change in him. Not long after this a daughter came home ill, and followed her brother to an early grave. These bereavements were keenly felt by the father, and appeared to have a gracious and sanctified influence on his mind. Shortly after this he was laid up himself with a serious affliction, which brought him very low. From this, however, he rallied, and for a short time resumed his labour, and took an occasional appointment; but he was not the man he had been; the previous affliction had considerably impaired his constitution. He soon took a cold, and for some months he endured much pain from internal inflammation, from the effects of which he never fully recovered. His bereavements and affliction he bore with Christian patience and fortitude, and was favoured with much of the Divine presence. He delighted in the visits of the travelling and local preachers and others, and enjoyed their conversation and prayers; and frequently praised God for a blooming hope. He occasionally exclaimed, "Oh, that I had a voice which all the world could hear, to tell them what I feel of the goodness of the Lord!" His physical frame was much reduced before his exit out of time, but he was more than ordinarily supported with his heavenly Father's gracious presence, and though he had suffered much he passed away without a struggle or groan, to be for ever with the Lord. His remains were interred on Sabbath, April 27th, in the cemetery at Whitehaven, in the midst of a large audience.

A. DODDS.

8. NATHAN, son of Thomas and Judith HOLDSWORTH, was born at Birks, near Bradford, Yorkshire, in the year of our Lord, 1798, of poor but industrious parents. His father was a member of the Baptist Church, and Nathan's early life was not marred by many of the extreme follies of youth. In the spring of his days he was taken to the house of God. But though moral in his conduct, he subsequently saw and felt the necessity of a change of heart.

One Sunday, in the year 1822, conviction for sin made a deep impression on his mind, and he started from home, not knowing whither he was going. As he was walking along, full of thought and gloom, he heard singing, and followed the sound till it led him into a part of the town proverbial for its wickedness, and known by the name of Devil Street (now Reform Street) where our infant society then worshipped. There he heard Brother Berry preach from "The great day of His wrath is come, and who shall be able to stand?" The word laid fast hold of his heart, especially when the preacher came to "Who shall be able to stand?" He penitently bowed at the throne of mercy, and by a living faith, laid hold on the atonement, and was enabled to rejoice, being confident that his sins were forgiven, and his soul was renewed. He then threw in his lot with our small society. The brethren soon ascertained that he was possessed of respectable mental powers, and a buoyant spirit; and they considered him adapted for usefulness, and urged him to try to preach. But feeling the vast importance of the work and his own littleness, he was years before he durst allow his name to appear on the plan; but he was very useful in conducting prayer-meetings, visiting the sick, and giving short exhortations.

In the year 1835, he made his first effort at preaching, at Baildon. And for twenty-seven years he was one of the most acceptable preachers in the Bradford Circuit. He did not study ornament, show, or dash. He was a plain man, and dealt in plain understandable things; and though he could not split a hair, solve knotty problems, nor explain unfulfilled prophecy, he could tell sinners the nearest way to the Cross. And through his labours not a few have been led to the feet of Jesus, and having found peace there, some of them have gone to the throne of glory, and are now the crown of his rejoicing in our Father's house. Brother Holdsworth was all "income" to the Church. He was acceptable in every place in the circuit; he never wilfully neglected an appointment, nor had he ever a charge proved against him of any kind during the forty years of his identification with our society. He was an industrious man; he knew "that drowsiness would clothe a man with rags;" and that "he who provides not for those of his own house denies the faith, and is worse than an infidel." He had a large family and moved in the humble walks of life, and had often hard to struggle, but he knew that God requires that all His servants should be diligent and active in that which is good : “not slothful in business, fervent in spirit, serving the Lord.” And he thus employed his time and gifts for his Master’s glory.

Nathan Holdsworth lived at home. Some men can show off at a distance, but their influence wanes considerably as they near home. Not so in this case. He was the priest of the village where he lived, and was regarded as a father in the place. No matter how dark the night, or inclement the weather, or untimely the hour, he was at the call of his neighbours, and would say, “The King’s business demands haste.” And in the sick chamber not a few broken-hearted sinners has he pointed to the Cross, not a few saints has he cheered while fighting life’s last battle.

Had he no faults ? He was human. But I never saw nor heard of any faults, so I cannot name them. His last affliction was short, but very severe ; but he bore his sufferings with Christian patience and resignation. No murmur ever escaped his lips. On being asked the state of his mind, he said, “All is right ! I feel my acceptance is clear. I am going to heaven !” And then sweetly fell asleep in Jesus, at Daisy Hill, on the 3rd of May, 1862. He was interred in our chapel yard there by his intimate friend the Rev. J. Baldwin. He has left a widow, six sons and daughters, and a large circle of friends to mourn their loss. But he has experienced a blissful translation from ignorance to knowledge, from faith to sight, from hope to realization, from warfare to triumph, from weariness to rest, from sorrow to joy, from Daisy Hill to glory !

W. JACKSON.

---

D I V I N I T Y.

---

PRESSING TOWARDS THE MARK.

A SHORT SERMON BY JOHN GRAHAM.

“Brethren, I count not myself to have apprehended ; but this one thing I do, forgetting those things which are behind, and reaching forth unto those things which are before, I press toward the mark for the prize of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus.”—Philippians iii. 13, 14.

St. Peter told the Christians to whom he wrote that he stirred up their pure minds by way of remembrance ; though their minds were pure, yet he did not think them so pure, but they needed to be stirred up. And, indeed, while we are in this world, who is there that is so holy, so heavenly, so confirmed in the faith and practice of the Gospel as to be beyond need of useful and pious exhortation ? Not St. Paul, whose word I have read as the subject of discourse. For, with all his sublime attainments (and perhaps he was the brightest mirror of holiness that ever was exhibited in our world in any mère man), he entertained no such exalted opinion of himself as to imagine all was done, and nothing was to be attempted for a farther improvement in godliness. Hence, in the text he says, "I count not myself to have apprehended," &c. Dr. Adam Clarke says, "I consider everything as incomplete until I have finished my course, got the crown, and have my body raised, and fashioned after His glorious body."

From these words we shall observe,

I. That how high soever our attainments in knowledge, enjoyment, and the practice of religion, we may rise to nobler heights.

II. Offer a few reasons and arguments for continual and ardent exertions in the way of holiness.

I. That how high soever our attainments in knowledge, enjoyment, and the practice of religion, we may rise to nobler heights. In the verse before us, we may consider the apostle as speaking in allusion to the Grecian games, especially the foot races. We, if believers in Jesus Christ, are racers in the Christian course. For the Divine glory we may have done something, we may have made considerable progress in the heavenly race. Frequently in the closet, upon our knees, have we humbled ourselves before God, confessed our sins, and pleaded with Him for His grace and Holy Spirit, the discoveries of His love, the mortification of our sins, and the strengthening and comforting of our hearts in the Lord.

We may have been often engaged in family prayer, family instruction, and family government, cultivating, watering, and watching the plantation, the young nurseries committed to our care; at the same time looking to God for success. We may have been often in the house of God, there presenting our supplications, paying our vows to the Most High, adoring, owning, and blessing Him; seeking fresh mercies and favors at His hands, hearing His word, and celebrating the supper of the Lord.

We may have been found in the duties of our calling, have been just, sober, temperate, compassionate, full of good works, and shining as lights in the world. But is all our duty over? Are we now to lie down and fold our hands to sleep? Are there no sins to be watched against, opposed, and mortified? Are there no graces to be invigorated, strengthened, and improved? Is our vineyard without one weed? Is there no bough that needs to be pruned? Or is there no plant that needs improving—no cluster that lacks growth and maturity? Are we not on enemies' ground? Is there nothing more to be done for the glory of God, and the service of our generation? Shall we, then, cease to labour? Surely while we are here there is much to be done—much to do for the suppression of sin and the improvement of holiness. How much to our purpose is the advice of the apostle Peter, "Giving all diligence, add to your faith virtue, and to virtue knowledge, and to knowledge temperance, and to temperance patience, and to patience godliness, and to god-liness brotherly kindness, and to brotherly kindness charity.”—2 Peter i., 5, 6, 7. We are the servants of God for life, and therefore our whole lives should be spent in His service; we are enlisted soldiers of Christ, and therefore we should continue in our duty till the campaign be over, and we be called home to receive our reward. Or, if we consider ourselves as racers contending for a prize, let us not cease to run till we shall have reached the goal and gained the crown. St. Paul says, “Forgetting the things that are behind.” We are not really to forget past attainments in grace and holiness, and our services for God, and our generation, but to act as thinking more of the future than the past. We find the author of the Epistle before us, when about ending his course, turning back as it were to review it, and exclaiming with sweet satisfaction, “I have fought the good fight; I have finished my course; I have kept the faith.”—2 Timothy iv. 7.

But there is a sense in which we may and ought to forget the things that are behind, we are not to view them with that self-complacency, or with such a high opinion as to grow proud of them, or as if they were the meritorious ground of our salvation, or so as to cause us to slacken in our pursuit of further degrees of holiness.

We are to do as the racers did in the famous Grecian games. Their custom was, not to turn back at every step to see how much ground they had measured, but to hold on. They used in a manner to forget what lengths of their race they had run, being all eager and ardent to accomplish the rest of their course. It should seem to us as if nothing is done while anything remains undone. The end of one duty should be the moment in which we begin another. Service should be crowded upon service; one act of usefulness upon another; devotion upon devotion. If yesterday was well filled up, let this day, too, glorify God, and be beneficial to man. Let it not be said, “Ye did run well, who hath hindered you?” but, forgetting the things which are behind, ye are reaching forth to those things which are before. Press towards the mark of holiness; say not, think not it is enough, till you have obtained the prize which is in heaven.

We see the prize before us; it is held out in the promises of the gospel, and in the hands of the faithful and compassionate Jesus. O! may the prize fill the eye of our faith, and quicken our feet to run the race that is set before us! Let us not linger, but hasten and dispatch our work, and press on with unwearied assiduity and unfainting ardour, knowing that we cannot be too humble, too holy, too useful. If the combatants in the Grecian games strove only for a corruptible crown, yet strove with all their might, surely we cannot be too earnest in contending for an incorruptible crown—a crown of glory that shall never fade away.

II. Offer a few reasons and arguments for continual and ardent exertion in the way of holiness.

1. It is the will and command of our God. We are not sent into the world to be idle, and waste our lives in vanity and sin; we are born and re-born for higher and better purposes; we are to live to the Lord, we are to glorify Him; we are to be steadfast, unmoveable, always abounding in the work of the Lord; we are to do justly, love mercy, and walk humbly with our God. We are to be zealous to maintain good works; we are to be living epistles read and known of all men; we are to be faithful in every good word and work. These are the commands of God. This is the will of God as revealed in His word, and how ready should we be to obey, and to say, "Speak, Lord, for thy servant heareth."

2. By persevering in holiness we imitate Jesus Christ. What was His life but a life of immaculate holiness, and active, unwearied benevolence? He went about doing good. It was His meat and drink to do His Father's will, and to finish His work. He said, "I must work the works of Him that sent Me while it is day; the night cometh when no man can work." And as He said so He acted; and as He was so should we be in this world. He has left us an example, that we should follow His steps. We are entreated to look to Him, not only as the Author and Finisher of our faith, and as our Head, but as our perfect Exemplar, to whom we are to be conformed, and even to be changed into the same image from glory to glory.

3. Let us be excited to diligence and perseverance in pursuit of divine knowledge and holiness, from the consideration of our former sloth and negligence. It may be, that many years of our life were spent before we set out in the Christian course, and how slowly and heavily have we moved on in it, when we should have been running the race set before us. Let us then be up and doing, redeeming the time, because the former days have been evil. Let the time past of our lives suffice for us to have been negligent and slothful; now let us be all activity and zeal, pressing towards the mark for the prize of our high calling in Christ Jesus. A far-spent day and but a small part of our race run, should excite us to improve the little sunshine of life to the glory of God, our own salvation, and the service of our generation.

4. Let the shortness of our time stimulate us to lead a life of holiness and usefulness. In a little time we shall be gone from the world; it may be this year, or month, or week, or day, or hour, that may put an end to our lives. It is high time to awake out of sleep; death may be upon us before we are aware; let us stir up the gift of God that is within us, and crowd our time with holy acts and exercises. While we live let us be careful to live unto the Lord, that when we die, we may die unto the Lord; so that living or dying, we may be the Lord's.

5. Let us not forget how dreadful will be our condition if we are found at last in the way of sin. Hell will be the portion of the sinner; and who can bear devouring flames, or dwell with everlasting burnings? O, then, begin, if you have not begun, the heavenly race, and quit the path of the destroyer.

6. The way of holiness should be pursued, because it is of all others the most comfortable. The ways of wisdom are ways of pleasantness, and all her paths are peace. What life is so happy as a life of holiness? Holiness is the health and enjoyment of the soul. Then do we begin to live when we begin to live to God. In keeping His commandments there is great reward: "Great peace have they that love Thy law, and nothing shall offend them." "Thorns and briars are in the way of sinners; but the works of righteousness are peace, and the effects of righteousness, quietness and assurance for evermore."

7. Let us be excited to seek for holiness, growing and abounding holiness, from the consideration of the prize that will crown a course of obedience. O! what a prize—nothing less than eternal life and glory. What a happy and glorious eternity shall we have in which to enjoy the presence of the ever blessed God—not indeed as the fruit of our own merit, but as the gift of the Father through the mediation of Christ Jesus. O! then, let us press towards the mark, that we may see the prize brightening as we advance nearer and nearer to the end of the Christian race! Wherefore, then, let us "lay aside every weight, and the sin that doth so easily beset us, and run with patience the race set before us." Let me give this charge to myself, and let me give the same to all who have set out, and are running in the Christian course; I give it to the young, and to the old—to the rich and to the poor; for this is a matter in which we are equally concerned and essentially interested; "Seeing ye know this before, beware, lest ye also being led away with the error of the wicked, fall from your steadfastness; but grow in grace and in the knowledge of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, to whom be glory both now and evermore." To conclude, let us learn,—

1. The Christian's life is not a life of indolence, but one of labour. Let us, then, shew that we are Christians by striving to get and do good. Our merciful God, the God of providence and grace, is giving us blessings upon blessings; and when one favour is bestowed, another immediately succeeds; nay, how often are mercies multiplied and crowded upon one another. And as it is with the goodness of God to us, let it be with our obedience to Him.

2. Every morning let us ask ourselves, What doth God require of me this day? In what way shall I glorify Him? What method shall I adopt to do good to those with whom I am connected—my family, my neighbours, or the Church of Christ? In a word, let the ever flowing stream of mercy on the part of God be accompanied with the overflowing stream of holiness on our part, till the streams of Divine mercy shall be swallowed up in the promised plenitude, the ocean of infinite and everlasting joy; and the streams of our duty terminate in the perfect, pure, and everlasting worship of Heaven! Amen.

---

WORKS OF CREATION.

---

ADAPTATION OF NATURE'S LAWS TO THE WANTS OF MAN.

BY REV. R. A. CARUTHERS.

THE leading idea which engrossed the mind of God in the work of creation was the production of a being from whom a race of similar beings might flow; who, bearing the image, might shew forth the glory of their great Originator. Not that selfish motives controlled the Creator, but that countless millions of sentient beings partaking of His likeness, filled with His glory, might enjoy the benefits of His refulgent nature.

With God, knowledge is an attribute; it is essential to His nature to know.—With man, knowledge is acquired, and the period of human life is the normal school in which the elements of a Divine education are obtained. Knowledge to be complete, must be experimental. Consciousness is the highest type of evidence. To bathe in the stream, to drink at the fountain consecrated to the memories of the past, is a source of joy unknown to such as have failed to walk that way. It is not the knowledge to which we have already attained that nerves the limbs of the eager traveller. It is the unseen—that which lies just beyond his vision, or which looms up in the dim distance—that invites him forward in the unknown path. It is the breaking in upon the soul of beauties before unseen that enraptures the heart. What an intensity of joy comes with the acquisition of a new fact—one that has not been hawked about, the common property of all, but dug fresh from its native mountain; a secret drawn from the bosom of God. Glory, the richest, gladdest word that ever created lips have spoken, means God revealed,—divinity flowing into the enraptured soul. To learn to speak it is the highest privilege of man. That it might be learned in the most effectual way, mankind are put in the school of experience, being brought into the world in the most helpless condition, ignorant of the knees which support them or the hand which gives them food.

What is man? Is he but this system of flesh and blood and bones; this walking tabernacle of clayey texture, which eats, and drinks, and sleeps, and dies, and is forgotten? Thank God, we learned in childhood to reject this epicurean faith which would bring mankind down to a level with the brutes, and send him soulless to eternal night. Man is that intellectual something—the offspring of the breath of God—a kind of half-way house between earth and heaven, formed for a living temple of the Holy Ghost.

Consisting of a body and soul, the wants of man answering to his nature are two-fold; those which immediately affect the soul, and such as reach it through the medium of the body. Ethereal bodies may live in mid air, and

"Lightly flit in the sun's bright rays;" but human flesh and blood must have something more solid whereon to rest; hence long before the occupant was formed the earth was made, and, being clothed with the paraphernalia of nature, was fitted up for the occupancy of man.

All organised substances bear the stamp of death. Dissolution is not the accident; it is the law of nature, and is made subservient to the wants of man; his internal structure, embracing lungs, stomach, lymphatic vessels, &c., is of itself demonstrative evidence of the natural tendency of the human body to dissolution.

With a natural tendency to death, mankind lived by the dissolution of the agencies by which life was sustained; his lungs decomposed the air by which his blood was purified; the water he drank and the food he ate were decomposed in his stomach, and the wisdom of God is seen in the adaptation of the fruits and vegetables of the garden to his daily recurring wants.

Man himself might not have died. Dissolution might never have taken place with any of the children of Adam; for in God they had a sufficient protection. The laws of life strictly adhered to would have secured immortality; nevertheless, the perpetual tendency of his nature was toward death, and the means by which that tendency might have been counteracted would have kept him eternally in communion with God. A liability to death is a necessity of our nature, at least until such time as we become confirmed in holiness. The fear of death is the sentinel that God has set to guard the limits of the field over which the Divine glory is revealed.

Death is a beneficent arrangement, without which no seed would have vegetated nor grain have grown, for death lies at the very threshold of vegetation. "Thou fool, that which thou sowest is not quickened except it die." And since the first crop of vegetation the earth had been an unproductive thing, eternally remaining in statu quo. Or should it be said that St. Paul refers to death as an arrangement made subsequent to the fall, and that death had no place even in the above sense before that event, then every seed would have been brought forth a tree after its kind—not one would have perished; and every egg of every kind of bird and of insect would have brought forth, and not a single spawn of any fish or frog would have failed to hatch, and the young of all reptiles would have lived for ever. Under such circumstances the earth would soon have been encircled with a belt of vegetable life, and all outside of Eden would have been one universal tangle, alive with birds, and beasts, and creeping things, but totally unfitted for its proper purpose—to wit, the use of man.

God is a great chemist, and death is His universal solvent, and generations of living things have come and gone to supply the wants of him whom the Creator set over the work of His hands.—Death imparts a real value to every department of nature. Without the law of dissolution implanted in the food we eat, it would be eaten in vain; indestructible water would impart no refreshment, and air which could enter into no new combinations could not regenerate the blood.

A living, walking Upas tree, the body of a man distils death all around him; the atmosphere in which he moves is an atmosphere of death; confined within its influence he eats himself away, but nature by the laws of death relieves those vapours of their poisonous load, and gives him back the pure air to breathe.

The water in which he bathes his feverish brow is surcharged with impurities, but nature distils it again pure from the clouds, and the decomposition of the more solid parts of the wasting body imparts vigour to the vegetation by which his barns are filled for a future supply.

Had atmospheric air been constituted a simple indissoluble element, incapable of rarefaction, the wind had never blown, ships had never sailed, fire had never burned, not a leaf would have moved in the forest, nor a rain drop have fallen from the sky; but one dreary, sickening, eternal calm would have rested upon the whole earth. Decrease the density of water, and it might not bear upon its bosom the freighted ship; increase its density, and in time it might bear its rocky bed away to the sea. Did it not admit of decomposition no steamboat, or car, or labour-saving machinery had ever blessed this fair earth.

Again; not only are the laws of nature adapted to the wants of man, but the manner in which those wants are supplied, by supplying a school for mental culture, subserves a higher purpose than merely to aid an animal nature. The veriest savage, befouled with the smoke and soot of his mud hovel, may appease his hunger with the food of the thorny oak; the man of refinement and intelligence, a student of the book of nature, can only, as the result of his own labour, partake of the golden pippin and fruits of kindred character. The power of air and of steam; the mysteries of the compass, of light and of electricity, have been the same since God made the world, but how recently have they been discovered! To-day the laws of nature are the same everywhere, yet how large a portion of mankind are ignorant still, plodding on through life as our fathers did when the world was young. How imperfect is the knowledge we possess; yet who can calculate the blessing we enjoy? How much remains to be learned, who can tell?—Surely this is a grand world to those who have skill to use it.

God has kept these things from the view of the superficial observer, not because He delights in our ignorance, but that we may be learned indeed; that our knowledge may be of the experimental sort, the achievement of intellectual labour. Brainless creatures may imagine, and dogs may dream, but it is labour to think, and few would burden themselves with the task if earth were a rose-bed, and manna came unasked-for fresh from heaven every morning. Necessity is the mother of invention. To save the hands the head has been set to work, and the laws of nature have been made subservient to the wants of man. Wheat grows taller, corn with a stouter stalk, meadows are more luxuriant, oxen of stronger frame, and wool of a finer texture, since brains have come to the aid of muscles, and the divinity that stirs within us has read the laws of nature's God.

In the days of David runners were sent. When Ahasuerus lived posts rode upon mules; next the stage coach; then came the days of steam; but now the lightning speaks, and words silently spoken are heard in every part of the globe. Armies are marshalled upon the battle-field; in dread array the engines of war are set; a voice from the clouds directs their movements, and science has far outstripped the mightiest efforts of brute force.

But to what purpose are all those blessings which are found in nature given? Is it simply to make mankind a race of happy animals? If so, the thoughtless, senseless epicure, who with great appetite and well filled board finds nothing to do but eat and sleep, would be the happiest man; but such a felicity belongs to brutes, and such a heaven befitting only to swine.

God has a higher aim in view; He would exalt the mind to think of nobler things. Reading the book of nature has led the best minds of the past to think of nature's God and long for immortality. Amid the light of revelation, for which a knowledge of the rudiments of nature has prepared him, the industrious student traces the laws of motion, cohesion, and gravitation, learns the power of heat and light and of electricity, weighs the earth in his balance, maps out the sky, and examines the texture of the sun. The spirit, from walking the various avenues of the starry canopy, seems to be weaned from earth; looks upon the body as a prison house, and rejects the grave as its home, and longs for immortality, that being released from this cumbrous clay it may walk untrammelled the fields of light.

Thus a sense of physical necessities leads to the study of nature's laws, and a knowledge of those laws creates a longing for a higher life, and prepares the mind to give attention to the voice of God. Revelation is based upon the laws of nature; their uniformity is the ground-work of miracles, and their teachings form the alphabet of the science of salvation. God was seen in the fire which, burning, still left the bush unconsumed. In majesty He thundered from the burning mountain, and swept in waves of indignation over the mighty concourse of people congregated upon the desert. His footprints were seen in the swelling waters; the Red Sea opened for Him a passage, and Jordan fled at His presence. The sun stood still at His bidding, and the shadows went back at His word. He put forth His power, and the grave unbarred her gates, and the dead of the past mingled with the living. His Spirit moved with the working of His mighty hand, and every interference with the laws of nature was accompanied with a lesson from heaven. Words full of hope and encouragement fell upon the human ear, visions of immortality were opened to his view, and a place by the throne of God appears as the home of him who began his race for life in the lowest stage of intellectual being.—From the Christian Journal.

JUNIOR PREACHERS' DEPARTMENT.

POWER IN THE PULPIT.

BY DR. FISH, OF AMERICA.

(Continued from page 600.)

II. THE MANNER.

From the matter of preaching, let us now turn to the manner. The word manner is here used both as to the structure and the delivery of a sermon.

1. Pulpit power is affected by the composition of a sermon. There is a right way and a wrong way of doing or saying anything. Every one knows that the form of a communication affects its strength. A writing containing the same matter may be either weak or strong, attractive or repulsive, eloquent or tame. And without being minute as to all the features of effective discourse, it will be found true that plainness, simplicity, and directness, are its prime qualities. The first thing is to be understood: to have the words and sentences intelligible. Paul had rather speak "five words with the understanding," that is, so as to be understood "than ten thousand words in an unknown tongue."

Some men are not plain from ignorance and indolence. It is much easier to be unintelligible than intelligible. "Ah, my brethren," said Archbishop Usher, "how much learning it takes to make things plain." And, we may add, labour, too. Some are not plain from pride of learning. Some are not plain from a desire to tickle the fancy and excite the imagination. And so they covet a "sky-rocket brilliancy," and delight in rainbows, and meteors, and earthquakes, and waterfalls, and blooming trellises, and showers of gems, and torrents of fire, and "trooping seraphim," and the "silver chiming of the spheres," and the "weltering chaos of demolished worlds." Some are not plain from a false taste and a faulty training. They think when they enter the pulpit they must be mounted on stilts; and so they give themselves laboriously to seeking out "great swelling words," and constructing cumbrous sentences; and hence become puffy, pompous, bombastic. If there is any nourishment in their productions, it is so absorbed in sponge and fungus as to be indigestible. And some are not plain from a fondness of the abstruse. From inclination or habit, they have come to deal much in what is hidden, and remote, and difficult to be comprehended; and to present things in a blind, circuitous manner. Possibly they would like to be called "intellectual" preachers; writers of "great" sermons; men of a "logical grasp" of mind. Hence their sermons are to a great extent metaphysical disquisitions; efforts

" . . . to sever and divide

A hair 'twixt north and north-west side.'

Common truths are tortured into obscure propositions, and plain terms are eschewed for those that are professional. The mind is entertained with the difference between the "immanent" and "eminent" volitions; the "relations of the infinite and the impossible," and the like. The sentences bristle with scholastic technicalities, and you are compelled to hear of "divine causation," and the "self-determining power of the will," and the "objective" and "subjective," the "governmental" view of the atonement, and of "supralapsarian" and "sublapsarian" theories; as if the production were an essay for the class-room, rather than a sermon for the pulpit.

What folly all this! CHRIST did not preach in this manner. He was the plainest preacher in the world. Nor did the apostles, who used "words easy to be understood," and avoided things which "minister questions rather than godly edifying." Nor did the earnest men of God in any time. Ask Luther how he preached—whose words were "half-battles"—and he will tell you it was not in a way to suit the "learned men and magistrates," of whom he had many as hearers, but for "the poor, the women, and children, and servants," of whom he had many more. See how the staunchest of the old Puritan divines of the seventeenth century preached, and it will be found that it was in the homely dialect of the common working people. One may read pages, and find scarcely a word of more than two syllables. Learn how the founders of Methodism preached, by Wesley's direction, "use the most common, little, easy words in the languages." It is a rule that may be everywhere observed, that whatever God makes is simple, plain, elementary. Man only complicates and obscures. The nearer we reduce things to a naked simplicity, the nearer we approach perfection. And the last place for complication and obscurity is the pulpit.

"I seek divine simplicity in him,
Who handles things divine."*

A man who cannot make things plain is not qualified to fill a pulpit. First of all, let the preacher think out his subject so thoroughly that his ideas shall lie clear and distinct like crystals in his own mind; and then let him remember that "a straight line is the shortest distance between two points," and speak accordingly. What right has he to use an involved and tortuous manner when declaring the great things of God?—"darkening counsel by words without knowledge?" What right has he to come before plain people in the strait-jacket of professional dignity, and talk of "volition" instead of will, and "intellectual processes" instead of thinking, and "moral obligation" instead of duty, and the like, as if the very use of language were, as Talleyrand suggests, "to conceal one's thoughts?" What right has he to give his hearers the hard stone of metaphysics, when they are dying for the bread of heaven? What right has he to bring forward profound disquisitions and curious speculations, when the command is, "Preach the preaching that I bid thee?" And what right has to hide that Christ whom he is to make known, amid flowers of rhetoric, as Verelat in his portrait of James II., virtually hid his majesty in a profusion of sunflowers and tulips?† When

* It was a maxim of Roger Ascham, that "we ought to think like great men, and speak like the common people;" and Milton well said that "the very essence of truth is plainness and brightness: the darkness and crookedness are our own."

† I am tormented with the desire of the late young preacher, Erskine Hawes, was dying, he said, "I wish to live to preach the Gospel more simply." How many at death's door have felt as he felt?

We would not be understood to discourage the utmost care in the construction and preparation of sermons. Man is an organ, and skill is required to touch rightly the keys. Method is important. "The preacher," it is said, "sought out and set in order acceptable words." Thoughts, however good, and words, however plain, may be thrown together in such a desultory and irregular manner as to make no impression.

"Checked reason halts, her next step wants support;
Striving to climb, she tumbles from her scheme."

The mind was not made to take in and hold a mob of ideas, a mass of unshapen materials. The thoughts of a discourse, therefore, must be "set in order." Attractiveness, too, is important. If the enemies of truth sweeten the edges of their poisoned cups with all the charms of an elegant style and lively composition, why may not ministers win men in the same way? There is force in beauty and in every variety of wise and earnest speech. The good sense, and the taste, and the imagination of hearers are not to be ignored, but rather turned to ad-preaching better than I can. But I have no wish to make fine pretty sermons; prettiness is well enough when prettiness is in its place. I like to see a pretty child, and a pretty flower, but in a sermon prettiness is out of place. To my ear it would be anything but commendation, should it be said to me, "You have given us a pretty sermon." If I were upon trial for my life, and my advocate should amuse the jury with his tropes and figures, burying his argument beneath a profusion of the flowers of rhetoric, I would say to him, "Tut, man, you care more for your vanity than for my hanging. Put yourself in my place—speak in view of the gallows, and you will tell your story plainly and earnestly."—Robert Hall vantage. Words wisely chosen are often images of things, awakening at once many ideas, and so coming with a wealth of beauty and meaning. Christ's preaching was attractive. His discourses are gemmed with beautiful metaphors and analogies, taken, however, not from the arts, but from nature, and familiar to all. Let style, then, be cultivated. More attention might well be given to it in our schools and seminaries; especially to the acquisition of skill in converting abstract truths into glowing images, and in the use of "picked and packed" words, as Bunyan calls them, and of bold, idiomatic, nervous, terse, laconic sentences.

What is complained of is devotion to paragraphs and periods; the cultivation of elegance of imagery and felicities of diction, at the expense of simplicity and pungency. "Pretti-ness is not in place in the pulpit."

It is not the highest ideal of a sermon that it is precise and dignified and offends nobody's state. Foster complained of Blair, that he kept his thoughts so long standing to be dressed, that they were chilled through before leaving his hands. Sermons may be elaborated till they are spoiled. They may be so "perfect" as to be perfectly worthless!

"They may be correctly cold and correctly dull!" [null.]

Faultily faultless, icily regular, splendidly Tholuck would call these literary proprieties, "dried sweet-meats in a glass jar." Such sermons are good enough to lay away as embalmed beauties, but they are totally unfit to be preached to a living congregation. Souls never cry out under them. When ministers are full of the Holy Ghost they do not preach thus. They cannot do it. The moment they are in earnest they preach in any way rather than this.

The eloquence needed for this age is that of Pericles, which "left stings behind." Most hearers know enough; they want to be made to feel and to do. The defensive outworks of Christianity are pretty well raised; we now need to advance on the enemy, and "shell" him out from his entrenchments, by shooting fires into the souls of men. It were a blessing to some ministers who have so much "dignity" to support, and who are so "proper," and so "precise," as to break nobody's heart with the hammer of truth, if Claus Harms were to cry out in their ears, as to some of the "fine writers" of his day, Speak negligently and incorrectly! A discourse had better be like a hetchel with the tow pulled out, than like a damask cushion for the hearer to lean a sleepy head upon. Better like lightning, darting zig-zag, and piercing, and tearing, and splitting the object it strikes, than like a letter despatched without a direction (to use John's Newton's comparison), addressed to nobody, owned by nobody, and if a hundred people were to read it, not one of them would think himself concerned in its contents. Sermons are wanted now which are made and meant to do execution—sermons which grasp, and make bare, and wield some one mighty idea, holding it up, and turning it around, and repeating it, if need be, as does Demosthenes the one main point in his oration on the crown, until it becomes a palpable thing, and the audience feel its form and pressure, sermons having the "agonistical," the wrestling element in them, as Aristotle calls it—sermons put together on the principle that "force in writing consists in the maximum of sense with the minimum of words," whose sentences are pounded together until they crack, and where figure, trope, allegory, metaphor, antithesis, interrogation, anecdote—anything that can awaken interest and deepen impression is resorted to—sermons supported and sinewed with the "Thussaith the Lord," and then charged with living truth, and aimed directly at the conscience and the heart, singling out each hearer, and saying, "Thou art the man," and "I have a message from God unto thee," and then making pursuit after that man, in clear, rapid, concentrated utterances, and pressing upon him, and narrowing his way, and hemming him in, and smiting him down with terrible volleys, until, quivering and breathless, he crouches "between the law that condemns and the cross that saves."

These are the sermons most needed to give power to the pulpit.

2. Upon the delivery of sermons, but little can here be said. God's wisdom is seen in giving prominence to preaching—to the oral communication of His word. And He did not ordain preaching to do what the printing-press could do as well. He designed that men should utter the truth, with the advantages of intonation, gesture, look. And they reflect upon God's wisdom who undervalue a good manner. It easy to sneer at oratory, and inveigh against the study and practice of the art of elocution. But why not denounce art in singing, as well as in speaking? If all must be left to nature in one case, why not in the other? Nature does not despise art. It is the office of art to lead back to nature. The rules of oratory are all drawn from nature, if they are right rules; and he who practises upon them is only conforming to nature. It is time the vulgar prejudice against ministers learning how to be public speakers were done away with. In a very important sense manner is matter. And instead of less attention being given to this in ministerial training, there ought to be very much more. Neglecting this is like teaching cadets in a military school how to make powder and swords, but not teaching them how to use them. Many a minister fails, not from want of ammunition (for he has plenty of that), but because he cannot "discharge" with effect the well-loaded weapon. His sword (to change the figure) is of the true metal, skilfully forged, and tempered and polished, but he does not know how to stand up and wield it. Let two ministers preach precisely the same sermon. In one case the hearers are cold, unmoved, inattentive. In the other they are attracted, convinced, melted. The difference was in the delivery. Who then will deny that, in some sense, manner is matter?

What power is there in the voice, when skilfully managed! M. Bridaine, a French missionary, and a peer of the most renowned orators of that eloquent nation, preached a sermon at Bagnole, at the end of which he lifted up his arms, and thrice cried in a loud voice "O Eternity!" At the third repetition of this awful cry, the whole audience fell upon their knees. During three days consternation pervaded the town; and it is recorded that, in the public places, young and old were heard crying aloud, "Mercy! O Lord, mercy!" It has been said of Whitefield that his "Hark! hark!" could conjure up Gethsemane with its faltering moon, and again awake the cry of horror-stricken innocence; and an apostrophe to Peter on the Holy Mount would light up another Tabor, and drown it in glory from the opening heavens. All the authorities agree that a principal source of Whitefield's wonderful power was a voice of the richest compass, subject entirely to his control. Much may be done towards the acquisition of a distinct, strong, sonorous, flexible voice, where it is not natural; and too much attention cannot be given, in its training, to the modulation, or inflection, or varying of the voice, to avoid monotony, and make it the docile and faithful interpreter of the thoughts. It is certainly a sacred duty of every minister to bring to their highest perfection the organs of speech.

There is power, too, in a smile, or a frown; in the "sweet, silent rhetoric; persuading eyes," and in the glow of the features, or their solemn sadness. Doubtless, it was not with the same expression of countenance that He who spake as never man spake, cried, "Woe unto you, Scribes and Pharisees, hypocrites!" and "If any man thirst, let him come unto Me and drink." There is power in gesture, to help the eye to anticipate each rapid utterance, and to deepen its effect. There is power in an animated manner. One's whole appearance in preaching may be either inspiring to an audience, or absolutely soporific; and we agree with another, that nothing can be more indecent than to hear "a dead preacher speaking to dead sinners the living truth of a living God."* So is there power in an affectionate and winning manner—a fine example of which was the late Robert M'Cheyne. And whatever pertaining to delivery, that is excellent and of good report, should be earnestly coveted, as among the "best gifts."

* Sydney Smith thus comments on the dead and formal style too often witnessed: "Why are we natural everywhere but in

the pulpit? No man expresses warm and animated feelings anywhere else, with his mouth alone, but with his whole body; he articulates with every limb, and talks from head to feet with a thousand voices. Why this holoplexia on sacred occasions alone? Why call in the aid of paralysis to piety? Is it a rule of oratory to balance the style against the subject, and to handle the most sublime truths in the dullest language and driest manner? Is sin to be taken from men, as Eve was from Adam, by casting them into a deep slumber? Or from what possible perversion of common sense are we all to look like field preachers in Zemble, holy lumps of ice numbed into quiescence and stagnation, and mumbling? There is, I grant, something discouraging at present to a man of sense in the sarcastic phrase of "popular preacher;" but I am not entirely without hope that the time may come when energy in the pulpit may be no longer considered as a mark of superficial understanding; when animation and affectation will be separated; when churches will cease (as Swift says) to be public dormitories; and sleep be no longer looked upon as the most convenient vehicle of good sense."

(To be continued.)

FAMILY DEPARTMENT.

THE SPOILED CHILD; OR, A FATHER'S PRAYER ANSWERED.

On the borders of Bedfordshire is situated a romantic and picturesque little village. It lies in a valley, through which runs a small stream, that winds its way under drooping willows at the bottom of the churchyard, and passes on thence to sing its melancholy song beneath the shade of some aged firs, at the lower boundary of the garden belonging to the parsonage house; thence it pursues its peaceful course, laving at intervals the gardens of the cottages, the road, and the fields, in its way to a more open country. I once had the happiness to spend a summer month in this delightful place, and the friend with whom I was staying being on very intimate terms at the vicarage, I became a frequent visitor there. The worthy man who then had charge of the parish had numbered his "three-score years and ten," and was hast-ing on the wheels of time to sleep with many whose bodies he had committed to the dust, and some of whom he hoped to meet in a better and happier state. As a man he was a pattern to all around; open, firm, and unflinching in what he believed to be right, but willing to be convinced of an error, and as ready to resign a wrong opinion as he would be to maintain a just one. His benefice was not a rich one, but he gave of his little to a great extent. To the poor, he was a father and a friend; to the farmers an adviser and a counsellor; to the few rich, he was a faithful monitor. All loved and feared him. If any had done wrong, his greatest earthly dread was that the vicar should know it. As a preacher, he surpassed many. His style was clear and intelligible to the meanest capacity: his delivery bold, easy, and pleasing; while he zealously and uncompromisingly preached the doctrines of the Reformation.

Of his good wife I knew nothing but by the hearing of the ear, for she was at a distance from home, visiting a sick friend. Enough to say, she was represented to me as a true Dorcas, and the fit partner of such a worthy man as her husband.

Though generally of a cheerful demeanour when in society, the vicar at times appeared strongly affected with a sadness approaching to melancholy, and would be often alone when he might have been in company. As I often spent my evenings with him, I had frequent opportunities of eliciting useful information from him; and what made his conversation the more enchanting to me, was the happy method by which he would adorn it with the most interesting and instructive anecdotes, illustrative of the matter of which we were speaking.

The evening before my departure from the village, I went to take leave of my aged friend. I found him (as was usual with him at the evening hour) alone in the beautiful bower at the bottom of his garden, from which you could see nearly the whole of that delightful spot of earth, which was laid out with considerable taste, and kept exquisitely neat. The bower was formed of garden shrubs, having a front of iron work, rising into an arch over-head, and overspread with woodbine, which was then in full bloom, and enwrapped the whole of its locality in an atmosphere of delicious perfume. To the right and left stood a moss-rose tree, gay in colour and fragrant in breath. On the farther side of each, a neatly trimmed fir raised its head, as sentinel of that peaceful retreat. Behind it was heard the music of the brook, rippling over its stony bed. Facing you, as you were seated within, was a small pond, fenced by mimic rocks, from the centre of which a neat fountain issued its varied jets. Beyond, stood the good man's house, round the porch of whose door crept a modest jessamine, and on each window-sill were placed geraniums of various sorts, boxes of mignonette, etc.

I entered, receiving a cordial welcome from the venerable man. He had been reading, but laid aside his book to chat with me. Our conversation soon turned upon this, my last visit.

"My young friend," said he, "you have heard many tales from me, and appeared pleased with them; if you have no objection, I will tell you one more before we part: perhaps it will afford you a lasting lesson through life. You are entering on the world, and I would help you, if I could, to avoid many snares into which I have fallen; for while travelling to this white head of mine, I have learned many sad truths by experience. Let me exhort you to learn submission to the will of Providence from the following account.

"Having finished my studies at Oxford, I was ordained to the curacy of the parish church of a town in Somersetshire, and some time after married an amiable young creature, whom I had loved from boyhood: the same is now my wife. At the time I was married, I was in my twenty-sixth year; my spouse had just entered her twenty-fourth. Fourteen months after our union we became parents of a son, whom we named James, after myself. He grew healthy and strong till nearly four years old, when a fever, following a severe cold, prostrated him, and there was every prospect of his being taken from us by death. I was almost distracted with the thought of losing my boy; my dear wife bore it with more patience, and exhorted me, who should have strengthened her, to hope for the best, and submit to the will of God. Her entreaties were of little use; I would not be comforted. I prayed continually, without reference to the Divine will, that God would spare the child; and at last I had the joy of seeing a favourable change. My spirits began to flow afresh, and everything was more pleasing around me. My boy recovered fast, and in the course of a month was able to take the air and be about a little. Another month made him quite strong. My wife and I were now happy with the prospect of a son who should be a blessing to our hoary hairs. Alas! we cherished hopes that were never realized.

"This was the only child we ever had; he was therefore much petted by us. Everything he wished for was granted, so far as our means would allow. Till ten years of age I instructed him myself, but was then obliged to send him from home to be educated, for

I had so much indulged him that I had no command of him, and he learned but little. When he came home at the vacation, he represented the master as a great tyrant and a cruel man. He so entreated me, that I removed him to a school where there was professedly no corporal punishment. This he liked little better than the first, but I hoped he would become more reconciled to it, and continued him there.

"While at school I often went to see him, as did also his mother. The master said but little of him, and I feared he was not going on satisfactorily. At the end of the half-year he was very earnest in asking me to remove him from the school, but I was still unwilling; when, to my surprise, the master told me he could not think of receiving him any more as one of his pupils, for he was become so uncontrollable, that he feared he would corrupt the other boys of the school. This much mortified me, and I began to think seriously of my son's future course. I resolved once more to try what could be done at home towards educating him, but found too late that my child was a spoiled one. Thus we struggled on till he was fourteen years of age.

"I had intended, should he seem likely to be a pious man, and fitted for the office, to train him for the ministry; but, seeing the untowardness of his mind, I knew it would be useless to hope for that, and thought if I could get him into a respectable business it would be the best thing I could do. After long consideration, he resolved on being a druggist, and I apprenticed him to a firm of some credit in the city of E—. He did not stay there more than half his time, for he became so unruly in his conduct that I was obliged to consent to the cancelling of his indentures, on purpose to save him from prison; for his master had determined to proceed against him for neglect of duty. He came home greatly ashamed that his mother and I should know all his misdeeds; and when he saw her tears, and heard my remonstrances, he promised to amend, and became for a time much sobered in his behaviour.

"After having been home about six months, he again became restless and dissatisfied, and wished for more money and more society. I expostulated with him, and told him he should try to obtain a situation; but he appeared to heed it not.

"One morning he was not down at his usual time, and upon going to his room to look for him, I found a note on his table, to the following effect: 'Dear parents, you appear to look on me as a burden: rather than be such to you, I have left your house, to shift for myself. James.'

"Upon reading this we were overwhelmed with grief: my wife feared he would commit suicide. Neither of us took much food that day. To search for my boy was useless: what could I do? I put advertisements in several newspapers, both in London and in the country, but to no purpose. No tidings were heard of my dear Absalom. Absalom, did I say? Yes, I had made him my Absalom.

"Thus more than twelve months passed away, and nothing was heard of him. His dear mother and I continually mourned over him, and offered many prayers that, if he lived, God would protect the boy. At the end of fifteen months a letter was brought to me, with a soldier's superscription. I looked, and could see my boy's hand-writing. I eagerly opened it, and found, from its contents, that he was a private in a foot regiment then quartered in Yorkshire. He said that when he left home he wandered about till he had spent all his money, and then enlisted for a soldier—that he had fared as well as any one in his station could do till lately, when, having had a quarrel with one who was his superior in the regiment, he struck him, and had received for it a hundred lashes. He declared his penitence in the most feeling terms, and promised far better behaviour than he had formerly shown, if I would purchase his discharge.

"Ever ready to receive my boy on any conditions, I immediately consulted with his mother, and matters were arranged that I should go and fetch him home. After a toilsome journey, I found my darling; but how changed! He was weak in body, from his late sufferings, and mortified in spirit that I should see him as he then was. As soon as matters could be settled we left for Wiltshire, where I was then living. Once more we looked forward to happiness, for my son now appeared a changed character, and I hoped he would yet be a blessing to us.

"Soon after this I removed to the city of D—, and became a minister of a chapel-of-ease. Here I made acquaintance with men of a different stamp from those I had known in the country—men of business and commerce—merchants and bankers. Through one of my friends I obtained a situation for him in a large mercantile establishment, and for a time things went on smoothly, and my dear wife, and boy, and I, were as happy as possible: but a blight was soon cast upon our hopes; for James, having plenty of money, began, by degrees, to mix in company, and remained out later at night than I wished. I talked to him upon his conduct, but to no purpose: he still persisted in his course, and at last removed from my house, and took lodgings for himself.

"I still called upon him, and so did his mother, and entreated him to amend. We urged all the arguments we could use, pointing out the probable consequences as regarded his situation; we warned him of God's judgments upon those who so sinned, and prayed him, by the love of the Saviour, to seek pardon of his sins and renewal of heart; but all in vain. He went on from one sin to another, till, at last, he would not see either his mother or me. Present circumstances appeared worse than any we had hitherto endured; but this lasted not long: a far worse trial awaited us.

"My son continued in his course till his expenditure greatly exceeded his income. Surrounded by those who were practised in every artifice of fraud and crime, he drank of their spirit, and adopted their plans. Having involved himself in debt to a considerable amount, and finding himself pressed for payment, he resolved on a fatal scheme, and forged his employer's name to a cheque for a hundred pounds.

"In the course of the following week this gentleman, when with his banker, discovered what had occurred, and immediately measures were taken to find out the offender. An officer was informed of it, and ere the day closed my son was apprehended on suspicion. I knew nothing of the affair till the next morning, when distress again compelled him to appeal to me. I procured what legal assistance I could on so short a notice, to aid him at his examination; but nothing could prevent his being committed to take his trial as a forger.

"Here was a stroke for us! To mourn then was useless: we resolved that nothing should be wanting on our part to save him from an untimely end. We retained the best counsel our means would allow, and left not a stone unturned that we thought would in any way bear upon the saving of our boy. Not one could we get to speak to the correctness of his character. All chance of affecting his position by influence was cast to the winds: we had but to pray and hope that grace might reach his heart.

"The time that elapsed between his committal and trial was about a month, during which his mother and I were permitted to see him often; and on these occasions we conversed with him on the sad prospect that was before us. He now appeared to mourn in earnest for his past conduct, and feared lest his mother and I could not forgive him; but we soon undeceived him, for still he was our son, and we loved him with a tenderness equal to that which was manifested by David to that child whose name I have so often applied to my own.

"At length the trial came on, and lasted nearly a whole day. I cannot tell how I was supported; but I stood it till the end. Throughout the entire proceeding, I could see no hope of an acquittal. The time was arrived that should decide the fate of my boy: the counsel pleaded, the judge summed up, the jury retired, and in less than a quarter of an hour returned to their place. A death-like silence prevailed. I know not how I felt; it was the worst part yet; but I was prepared for it. The verdict was given—'Guilty'—and sentence of death was passed in a very solemn manner. My boy, who had manifested the most intense grief and anxiety while witness after witness was being examined, seemed overpowered with a blank amazement, quite indescribable, during the interval in which the jury were deliberating; but when he saw them again entering the court, he seemed recalled to a sense of his position, and then, hearing the decisive word, he buried his face in his hands and wept very audibly, continuing in the same state till removed by the officers.

"It was with trembling steps I left the court with my friend and returned home. My wife understood the end of the matter as soon as she saw me. She wept sorely, but bore it better than I had expected.

"I cannot tell you how that last fortnight of my boy's life was spent by us, except that we visited him as often as were allowed, and exhorted him to penitence. We also endeavoured to obtain a reprieve, but without avail. At our last meeting we all wept bitterly. He asked our pardon, which was freely granted; and we pointed him to the only source of true forgiveness and happiness. He appeared penitent, and said he hoped in his Saviour. We left, and spent the night in prayer for him.

"The chaplain of the prison behaved very kindly to him and to us. Immediately after the execution, the good man had the corpse conveyed to my house, in a coffin I had ordered for the purpose; and in the course of the day he called upon me, according to a request I had made, to inform me of the last moments of my poor boy's existence. He assured me that the state of the poor fellow's mind was quite that which he should wish to see in any one under the same circumstances; that his last sentiments were penitence, and his last accents prayer.

"We buried him after four days, and I went up to my chamber, exclaiming in the words of David, 'O my son Absalom, my son, my son Absalom! would God I had died for thee, O Absalom, my son, my son!'

"Thus died my poor boy, at the age of twenty-two years, the victim of over indulgence; and in his death the terrible remembrances of sinful unsubmissive prayer answered. At the head of his grave I placed a small stone with his initials engraved thereon, the date of the year in which he died, and the following words: 'Thy will be done.'"

When the old man had finished his narrative, a tear stole over his cheek, and we remained silent for a few minutes. He then resumed:

"My young friend, learn one or two things from this sad tale: whenever you ask a favour of God, add—'Thy will be done.' If I had prayed thus, perhaps my boy would have died in infancy; but no, I prayed unsubmissively for his life: it was granted; but how dearly have I paid for it. You also see that God will answer prayer, according to His promises, and that one of the Saviour's especially, 'Whatsoever ye shall ask in prayer, believing, ye shall receive.' I prayed earnestly, and pleaded promises, and fully expected the answer to be according to my will, and it was so: God granted me the desire of my rebellious heart, in which I was backsliding from Him, and so He filled me with my own ways; for the same feeling that urged me to this revolt against His will also prompted me to neglect training my son with due parental authority; and so having sinned like Eli, I, like him, was punished by the untimely death of that child who had drawn my heart from God: but whether the all-wise Father will cut me off as suddenly and terribly as He did Eli, I know not: however, if such be the termination of my earthly career, His will be done."

Years have rolled into forgetfulness since I heard the old man's tale, but its remembrance has influenced me at many turns in my pilgrimage, and led me, when circumstances have seemed adverse, to pray, "Thy will be done."—From the Sunday at Home.—Sent by
J. ALLISON.

SUNDAY-SCHOOL DEPARTMENT.

EARLY AND LATE; OR, THE TEACHER ENCOURAGED.

On a Sunday 'afternoon, early in the spring, Katherine Ellis, having returned from her weekly labours in the Sunday-school, sat in a little arbour in the pleasant grounds of the old country parsonage, which was her happy and much loved home. A Bible, and two or three Sunday-school books lay on the rustic table before her; but, instead of looking at any of them, she was gazing thoughtfully on the trees and shrubs around. Presently a well-known footstep announced the approach of her father, who, in a few moments, entered the arbour.

"Kate, my love," said he, as if surprised to find her there, "sitting here? It is too early in the year for arbours. Come, put up your books, and walk with me round the garden; the clouds promise a glorious sunset. We will go to the Knoll, and see it."

She placed her books in a little bag, and they were quickly on their way to the Knoll, an elevated spot which commanded an extensive view of the whole western horizon.

"What were you thinking of just now, Kate?" said her father; "you appeared to me quite in a reverie."

"I have been thinking a good deal to-day, papa," she replied, seriously; then added, as she looked up into his face, "I hope you will not be displeased with my thoughts when you hear them."

"No, dear Katherine, that is not likely; but if they appear to me to be wrong, you know that I shall, as usual, try to set you right."

"Well, dear papa, this was the subject of them. I think, if you have no objection, I should very much like to give up my Sunday-school teaching, at least for the present."

"My dear Katherine, you surprise me; I should indeed be very sorry if you did so. What can be the reason of your wish?"

"Well, papa, I cannot get on with my class at all. I do believe that the girls who compose it are more troublesome than any in the school."

"That is quite true, my child; I gave you the class for that very reason, because I thought you would be able to manage it better than either of the other teachers."

"But I am not, papa; the girls are so careless, inattentive, and ill-behaved, that I cannot tell what to do with them. Besides which, they seem to have no feeling of affection for me—so different to the girls in my old class. You recollect poor Mary Freeman, papa?"

"Ah! yes; I often think of the peacefulness and calm of that child's deathbed. I assure you I felt it a high privilege to hear her say, that it was by your instructions she had been first led to seek that Saviour, upon whom she rested with such strong and trusting faith."

"She was indeed a dear girl," said Katherine, "and I had reason to hope that there were also others in that class equally well inclined. But with these girls it is so different. They learn their lessons, and that is all. They seem to take no interest, and indeed to have scarcely any feeling on religious subjects, even when I speak to them in the most earnest and solemn manner. It was only this afternoon that I was endeavouring to impress them with some sense of the Saviour's love, by speaking of His sufferings and death—"

"And would they not listen?" interrupted Mr. Ellis.

"Yes, they listened, or at least they appeared to do so ; but I had scarcely finished speaking before I saw them laughing and whispering together, apparently without a thought of what they had heard. I do not say that they are all alike ; some are much more giddy than others. Ann Jones is, I think, the worst ; but they all seemed unconcerned, and without a wish to become better, and really to serve God. In short, dear papa, I do not think there is one of them who has derived the least benefit from my instructions, unless it be by the mere acquisition of a little head knowledge."

"That is not for us to decide, Kate ; and, though I am not surprised at your feeling of sadness and disappointment, you must remember, that similar trials await all who seek, by whatever means, to win souls to Christ. Is it not the case with ministers ? Do they not too often see, that the effect produced by their most earnest endeavours is transient as the morning cloud and the early dew ? Do they not too often feel that they are sowing the good seed only to be trodden under foot, or to be choked by the thorns and thistles of worldly cares ? Yet it is their duty still to persevere, still not to be weary in well-doing, relying on the promise, that 'In due season they shall reap, if they faint not.'"

Katherine was silent for a while, and then replied, "I see how it is, papa ; I was wrong. I am afraid I have thought too much of my own endeavours, and have not with sufficient earnestness asked for God's blessing upon them. I will still go on planting and watering—trusting that He will give the increase."

"Do so, my dear child. One of the first, if not the very first duties, both of ministers and Sunday-school teachers, is to pray for those whom they endeavour to instruct, to pray earnestly, hopefully, unceasingly, that the light of the Holy Spirit may shine into their hearts, and teach them all things. If our efforts were always attended with immediate success, there would be no room for the exercise of faith."

They went on to the Knoll, from which they enjoyed the view of a magnificent sunset. As they returned they passed a wall, at the foot of which, in a nook formed by a large buttress, were some lilies of the valley already in bloom. Katherine stooped and picked one or two for her father.

"The lilies are early this year," remarked Mr. Ellis, as he inhaled the delicious fragrance of the delicate snowy bells.

"Yes, papa, these are. I planted them here on purpose ; where you see they have the advantage of being sheltered both from north and east winds, besides enjoying plenty of sunshine. It is extraordinary what a difference the situation makes to them."

"They shortly afterwards passed through an old gateway which led into a small flower garden adjoining the house.

"There were lilies in this border also," remarked Mr. Ellis, as they continued their walk on the other side of the wall, "but they are not coming up. I fear they must have been destroyed."

"Oh no," replied Katherine, "I had the same fear myself a week ago, but they are here still. See, papa," she added, pointing to a tiny green speck, "they are peeping up here and there."

"Well, my child, your eyes certainly have the advantage of mine, for I can see nothing. However, I am glad that they are here ; but what makes them so late in appearing?"

"It is partly owing to David having put a quantity of fresh would on the top of the border, and partly to the coldness of the situation, for this border never gets a gleam of sunshine until quite late in the evening. However, it will be all right in the end, for they will blossom late when the others are gone."

Mr. Ellis made no other remark until they reached the end of the wall; then he paused and said, "Do you know, Katherine, I think we might both learn a useful lesson from these lilies."

"A lesson in humility, papa?"

"No, not in humility, but in faith."

"In faith? How can these lilies of the valley be emblems of faith?"

"I will tell you. The contrast between this bed of lilies and the one from which you gathered the blossom in my hand, may serve to illustrate the difference between your present Sunday-scholars, and those in your former class. To those already blossoming in the sheltered nook may be compared such children as Mary Freeman, who, in addition perhaps to a naturally amiable disposition, are also placed in circumstances peculiarly favourable to the development of Christian graces; in consequence of which the good seed sown in their hearts, watered by the dew of the Holy Spirit, speedily takes root downward, and bears fruit upward. While in these lilies, which even now will be some weeks in arriving at perfection, we see, I think, an apt emblem of your present pupils, who from the adverse circumstances in which they have been hitherto placed, or from other causes, may be long in bringing any fruit to perfection, and yet in whose hearts the seed which is sown may, like these lilies be sending out many a tiny fibre, fixing it deeply there, long before there appears any external evidence of its existence. Do you think I am too fanciful, Katherine?"

"No, papa, I think that the comparison which you have made between the two cases is simple and truthful, and I hope it will be a help and encouragement to me in my future efforts. I wish, papa, that I could learn, like you, to walk by faith, and not by sight."

"Do not say like me, Kate. Recollect that I have had much more experience than yourself of the encouragements, as well as the difficulties, to be met with in fighting the good fight; yet believe me, my child, the feelings of distrust which you just now expressed, are often, alas! those of my own heart. Often do I feel impatient in having to leave God to do His own work in His own way; often do I, especially when like you, deploring the ill-success of my best endeavours, believe only because I see, forgetting that the Saviour Himself compares the Spirit's work in the heart to the wind which 'bloweth where it listeth,' and as to which, although we 'hear the sound thereof, we cannot tell whence it cometh, or whither it goeth.' Sometimes, as in little Mary's case, the fruit is produced early, and so manifest as to be seen by every eye; while in others it is late in appearing, and perhaps beheld by few but God Himself."

So Katherine still continued her labours of love in the Sunday-school. But though her prayers for the Divine blessing upon her endeavours were so far answered, that a manifest improvement took place in the conduct and demeanour of the children whom she instructed; yet there was no striking evidence, that in any one of them there had been wrought that change of heart, without which no man shall enter the kingdom of heaven; and often had she still to mourn over the indifference and coldness frequently observable among them.

Years passed on. The good old minister, after a long life spent in labouring faithfully in his Master's service, was at length called to his everlasting rest, shortly after Katherine had become the wife of one in every way fitted to succeed him in his ministerial office.

One day, about two years after their marriage, her husband on coming home, informed her that he had been visiting a young person apparently dying, but with whose happy and peaceful state of mind, as well as singularly clear views of Divine truth, he was surprised and delighted. "She told me, dear Katherine, that she was once in your class at the Sunday-school, and asked me if I thought you would feel any objection to call and see her."

"No, certainly not," replied Katherine; "but what is her name? I do not recollect having heard of any of my old Sunday-scholars, resident in the village, being ill."

"She has only come here within the last week—I suppose for change of air; her name is Ann Jones."

"Ann Jones? yes, I remember her well; but how extraordinary! She was one of the most careless and troublesome girls I ever had; and yet you say that she seems resigned and peaceful. I hope she is not, poor girl, building her peace upon a wrong foundation."

"No, indeed she is not, as you will say when you see her. Her expressions are those of humble confidence, not of presumption; and, while she speaks with much sorrow of the unworthiness of her past life, her trust in God and entire reliance upon the Saviour's merits, and the pardon which by His blood He has purchased for the most guilty, are really beautiful."

"I am truly thankful to hear you say so, and will take the first opportunity of calling to see her."

The next day found Katherine by the bedside of poor Ann, in whose pale and wasted form she would not easily have recognized the once healthy and blooming school girl. "So I suppose you are come here hoping to receive benefit from your native air, Ann," she said, after the first inquiries had been exchanged.

"The dying girl shook her head. "My friends hope so, ma'am, but I do not, for I know that no change of air will ever do me any good. But as they wished me to come, I was very glad to do so, for I have longed to see you once more, ma'am. I wished to thank you for all the kindness you showed me, and the trouble you took with me years ago, when I was in your class, and to tell you what a comfort the things then taught me are to me now."

Katherine felt her eyes fill with tears. "I am very glad indeed to hear you speak so, Ann, though I did not before know, that what I then attempted to teach you had in any special manner benefited you."

"Ah no, ma'am, it did not for a long time; but you see, ma'am, it was impossible for any of us to hear all that you said, and to mark the manner in which you used to plead with us Sunday after Sunday, never tiring, never seeming to care less for us, without receiving some good into our hearts. Very often my conscience reproached me then for doing as I did. Sometimes I made up my mind to do better; but something was sure to come, and put aside all my good resolutions. Then, ma'am, as you know, I left the parish, and went to service. I think that I improved in my outward conduct. But my heart was fixed only on the world; for I thought that as I was so young there was no hurry, and I would attend to religion at some future time. Then this illness came on, and almost at the beginning of it I overheard the doctor tell my mother that it was not likely I should ever get better. I cannot tell you, ma'am, how this made me feel; and for a time I was very wretched indeed. But after a while, many things which you had taught me at the Sunday-school began to come into my mind. At length, I think I recollected, if not every word, at least the substance of almost everything you had said, especially how you used to tell us again and again to look to Jesus Christ only for salvation and pardon and peace, and never to forget that it is by His blood alone we can be cleansed from our sins, and made inheritors of the kingdom of heaven. It was a strange thing that I should have forgotten all this so long, and then have remembered it so perfectly."

When the poor girl finished speaking, Katherine's countenance betrayed unwonted signs of emotion; and, while she lifted up her heart in thankfulness to God, for having, after so long a time, permitted her to see the fruit of her unworthy efforts, she could not resist relating to her the discouragements she had felt, partly on her account, and how, but for the good counsels of her father, it would have caused her entirely to relinquish her labours.

"Ah, ma'am, I do not wonder to hear you say so. I have sometimes thought that if many Sunday-school teachers knew my case, they would feel encouraged to go on in their efforts; for, although at the time they may seem to have no effect, it is impossible to say what good may come afterwards. If you had not so patiently taught me what you did at the time, I don't know what might have become of me; for I have had no one to instruct me since. And though I know that it is only the Holy Spirit Himself who can really change our hearts and bring us to God, yet a sick bed is not the place to begin learning."

In a few weeks poor Ann died, full of faith and hope and joy. Her grave in the churchyard was not very far from that of her old school-fellow, the gentle and amiable Mary Freeman; and often, as Katherine passed the spot, did she pause and ponder on the preacher's words:—"In the morning sow thy seed, and in the evening withhold not thy hand: for thou knowest not whether shall prosper, either this or that, or whether they both shall be alike good."—Ecc. xi. 6.—From the Teachers' Magazine.

2. TO THE OFFICERS AND TEACHERS OF SUNDAY-SCHOOLS.

BRETHREN.—To us, who for many years have endeavoured to promote the welfare of Sunday-schools, nothing is more pleasing than to hear of their prosperity and see the fruit of our labour. But we must confess that the returns for all the labour, talent, and money expended are comparatively small, much smaller than reason would suggest, with the machinery we have, and 3,000,000 of children to work upon. We are, therefore, led to ask ourselves, why is it that more absolute good is not done?

and what are the causes operating against us which, in thousands of instances, frustrate all our efforts and lead us to painful disappointment? In this short paper it is impossible for us to review all the agencies at work counteracting our efforts; but we may just glance at one which I have for years considered no little enemy, and rendered more powerful by becoming our companion and being universally or almost so recognised as a friend—I mean excursion and pleasure trips, &c. I look upon the infant mind as a garden. We are the workmen. What care and attention are necessary if we would see fruit to perfection! How cautious ought we to be that no weed remains, and that the seed has good soil and dressing! It is only a few days since the fruit in my garden was full of promise; but one cold night blasted my hopes, and a long dreary winter must pass before the blossom will again appear; so it is often with our children and the pleasures of the world.

I find no better guide in all matters of piety than the old Book. What verdict has it given in this particular? "Time is short." "The fashion of this world passeth," &c., "Thou shalt not follow the multitude," &c., "He that soweth to the flesh," &c., "Train up a child," &c., and a thousand others we might introduce showing the necessity of extra care and foresight in managing the human mind. I do not find the early Christians giving themselves up to this system. What would Wesley, Whitfield, Nelson, and Taylor say were it possible for them to be here? If we refer to that living book the "Pilgrim's Progress" there will be no difficulty in ascertaining the prevalent opinion in those days when that great man penned his immortal legacy to the churches.

But some tell us that the practice of the fathers was precise and unnecessarily strict, and can be no rule for us in these times of liberty in articles of faith, &c. It is the opinion of the writer that the nearer we keep to those holy men the better for ourselves and the children. Have we not left these amusements less inclined for the closet? Has not our piety often been endangered by them? and have not many excellent men among you protested against those yearly trips? These facts should make us hesitate, and weigh the matter year by year.

But if the advanced Christian is in danger, how is it with the young? I thank God that when I was young no such things were thought of, and let any elderly Christians say whether or not we have more real religion in feeling or practice now than then. We are the guardians of those dear children, and in many cases they pay more attention to us than to their parents; and shall we lead children to those perilous places, and into pleasures that the matured Christian will often shrink from, where not only the body is in danger but the immortal soul exposed to temptations of a ruinous nature?

I saw placarded a few days ago a Sunday-school trip—tickets one shilling and sixpence, of course open to all comers; and many do come for anything but a holy purpose, and associations are formed of the most unfortunate character. Who shall be responsible for these things occurring every day? Were it proper, I could shew you by incontrovertible evidence that souls are ruined, if not eternally lost, and thus the Church is robbed of her invaluable children. Those who are bound for heaven must swim against the stream; hence, our children must be taught the difference between the world and the Church.

True religion turns her back upon all the pleasures of this world and its fashions, and the sooner the child's mind is enlightened on this subject the less trouble will you have in leading him to Christ. Nothing is so injurious as thirst for amusement, for when this has the mastery every evil propensity is quickened. Habits once formed are not easily broken, and many, no doubt, have before this contracted the habit of yearly pleasure-trips, so that it would be with great difficulty that they could give them up. Many are the excuses for these excursions, but I do not see one to justify their use by us as Sunday-school teachers. Our duty is to lead souls to Christ, and consequently do all in our power by precept and example to check the natural impulse of the heart, instead of which we intensify the love of pleasure in the most refined manner, by throwing over it the holy vesture of religion.

Quickly the lad is drawn imperceptibly on to the fearful falls, when it is too late to cry, Stop! But some one must account for that soul, and if only one is lost in a year through blinded vision, better for these promoters that they were never born. Some tell us we take them on the day when some festivity is going on, or they would attend it. But, brethren, do you not discover that by this apology you censure yourselves, for, if your teaching will not keep children from moral wrong, it is worth very little. But suppose they do go, how much better will you appear in their eyes, and with what power can you apply the truth at your next meeting, than if you had been on an excursion with your band, dance, refreshments, sports, and, above all, that dangerous if not immoral practice drop-handkerchief, say nothing of gay dressing, foolish conversation, and drinking, all of which the youth beholds, and this in connexion with Sunday-schools.

How is the child to distinguish between the pleasures of the world and the pleasures here set forth? I confess I see no difference on these occasions. Consult your ministers as to the great impediment to the spread of truth and holy principles. Why is it that their preaching is not more effectual? They will tell you, conformity to the world. And who is to blame for much of this? Are not those who foster this depraved principle of the mind, and help to destroy that holy partition which God has built between the Church and the world? Brethren, let us defend this heaven-built wall by our life and teaching, and get back to those happy and glorious days when the Church was known by her love, and stood out in bold relief to the world, condemning her pleasures and practices.

EDWIN YELLAND.

MISCELLANIES.

1. "ONLY AN UMBRELLA."

WHAT mechanical telegraphic times we live in! Railways now seem the order of the day, in some secluded localities the stage coach or 'bus has still to do what more modern inventions have supplied for populous parts. Well, well! every place and season has some advantages, and while we much prefer travelling by railway or a steam packet, to a 'bus or stage coach, we can admire many things where walking is the rule, and riding the exception. Then the beautiful lines of Thomson sometimes raise us almost to ecstasy,

Should fate* command me to the farthest verge
Of the green earth,—'tis nought to me,
Since God is ever present, ever felt.
In the void waste, as in the city full,
And where He vital breathes there must be joy."

Yes, gentle reader, there is mercy and goodness surrounding us in every place, meeting us at every turn. "Man made to mourn!" No! No!! It is one of the foulest libels against heaven. A well-informed and once well to do man brought himself through drunkenness and other vices to a state of wretchedness, and almost idiocy. Coming home one day, we heard him long before he met us, belching out oaths and blasphemy, and crying aloud, "Man was made to mourn." We denied it, but on he went with his doleful ditty. We suppose he must have long since gone to his final account, and therefore we leave him with his Judge. Our doctrine is "Man was made to be glad," and can only be so while he seeks to gladden others, and rejoice in the God of his salvation, then he may rejoice evermore, and in everything give thanks for this is the will of God concerning him. Some features of a rural district are to a sensitive mind, revolting in the extreme. Hence wanton cruelty to animals, shocks us and leads us frequently to conclude, that the brute is far less brutal than the driver. To see a noble horse capering as he starts on his journey, or the unwieldy cow throwing up her heels in playful glee; the graceful foal or colt bounding suddenly off at the least fright, not to mention the loud bray of the ass, and the coarse bleat of the calf, contrasted with the feeble efforts of sheep, lambs, crowing cocks, and cackling ducks, all of which, hoarse music as it may be, for the time gives a charm to the lover of nature, and forms one of the sunny features of rustic life, inducing feelings of wonder, admiration, gratitude and praise. If cattle are reclining in our path, we go round rather than disturb them; otherwise, we frequently derive pleasure from sporting with them. The other day we saw a fine lot of colts, and when near to them we suddenly opened an umbrella, when away they ran, again and again taking fright, as we repeated it; at last one fine young animal straightened up, and gave a good long stare, then another, until the whole lot gazed with apparent unconcern as if they would say "Pooh, it is only an umbrella."

* Of course we cannot endorse the doctrine implied in the expressions used by Thomson, "Should Fate," &c.—Ed.

If there are sermons in stones and brooks, we think a short word of exhortation may be given from this text. We don't like sermons tacked on to odd unmeaning texts of Scripture, but we closed our bible before we opened the umbrella. Well now you timid one there, listen, perhaps you are trying to improve yourself, and others, while as you look back and around, you observe others are dreaming of the same thing, a volume of smoke envelopes them and it may be they are noisy in their dreams, and often shout "fill this jug again," or with hands in their pockets, they lounge away hours each week at the street corner, or playing like children at cricket, or some other so called manly game, and to get above and be free from the influence of these fashions, you say will cost you an effort, as some of your relatives, and many of your acquaintance devote hours to them, which if multiplied, would amount to many days annually. Look up man, don't be afraid, it is "only an umbrella." But better than all, you are perhaps trying to serve God, whose service is perfect freedom, whose servants should deny themselves of worldly lusts, and be prepared anywhere and everywhere to make a stand for the right and true, and you say I see many professors in low water, while some of them are in debt and abject poverty; meanwhile they will and do have their tobacco, drink, artificials, crinoline, and other needless, injurious, and expensive things; for the fashions of low, are as binding as those of high life, and for me to break through these trammels and say "By grace I will do what is right only, for I shall have more money for home comforts, useful books, the worthy poor, the cause of truth and education;"

to do this you will have to encounter the jeers of some, while others will gravely tell you that you may as well go out of the world as out of the fashion. Cheer up, it is "only an umbrella."—Sent by T. Doody.

2. THE OLD SLAVE.

THE nearer a man gets to heaven, the more exalted and noble become his views of property and interest.

"Happy Dick" was an old blind negro who walked with God. He was another man's chattel, but his master happened to be a kind one, and kept Dick in his old age for the good he had done, allowing a free hut and maintenance for himself and his wife. Dick's cheerful piety and invariable contentment procured him, by universal consent, the name he bore. His little cabin stood under a great magnolia-tree, and there his song might be heard from morning till night, as he sat in the door, weaving osier-baskets, or whittling tiny playthings for the piccaninnies of the plantation.

A Christian lady once asked him if he never felt uncomfortable when he thought that he was a slave; and if he never longed for the independence of other men, so that he might know what it was to lay up his earnings and have something to call his own.

"O missus, den't ask me dat," said the grey-headed negro. "Dem days is all gone by, and I's longed for freedom mightily, but I long for heaben too, and dat's a great deal better. I nebber allows myself to 'flect on de bad tings dat happen to me, nor de good tings dat I nebber had; and when I tink about somefin' to call my own, it seems as if I had a big treasure right here, dat I don't owe any man for."

"How is that Dick?"

"When all de rest ob de world, missus, are saying, 'Dis is my great cotton-patch,' I say, 'Dere is my hope and dere is my Saviour;'" and when I own de Lord Jesus, it seems as if I owned all de rest; for de cart' is de Lord's, and de fulness dereof. De air is mine, and I can bread it; de sunshine is mine, and I can sit in it; de cart' is mine, and I can lie down in it to sleep."

"But wouldn't it be nice to own a great farm like Job, and have cattle, and horses, and things to give away?"

"Ah, Old Dick couldn't take care on't. Tell ye missus—what a man has, beyond enough to take care on and look out for his own soul too, de same time, is stealin' de Lord's. But I beliebe ebery ting is ordered for de best; and I's spose de good Lord made some folks to hab de first pick, and some to take de leabins, and some to get both; and Massa Job was one of dat kind; and I's'pose de Lord made me to take de leabins. Den why shouldn't I be tankful? I get de leabins ob de tables, I get de leabins ob de time, I get de leabins ob de money, de leabins ob my strength, de leabins ob young massa's learnin', de leabins ob de camp-meetin', and de leabins ob heaben; and why shouldn't old, blind Dick be happy?" And the tears ran down his black face.

"But if the Saviour is yours, happy Dick, and He owns everything, you ought to have the first pick if you want it."

"Dear missus, I do get de first in de way I mean, but not in de way de world understands. I lib like de good old Paul, 'as habin notin', and yet possessin' all tings.' De more world I want, de less Christ Jesus I get; and de more Christ Jesus I get, den I come nearer to habin' all tings; for all tings are His, and I hab de first pick because I hab Him."

"You mean, then, my good old friend, that your interest in the world's people and property is a spiritual one, not a money one?"

"I s'pose you'd call it so. You see, men hab a conscience, and dat gibs de humble good man a power ober dem in spite ob demselves. Massa Hammond, oberseer ob de plantation, is berry proud and wicked, and laughs at my religion; but I know if de day ob judgment should come now, he'd ask me to pray for him fust."

"Do you think that this Scripture will literally come true, 'The meek shall inherit the earth?'"

"I s'pose so missus. Dere is a deep-down-in-de-heart respect, now, in de world, for de good and meek man; and by and by, when de Lord shall set forth dat man's righteousness as de light, and his judgment as de noonday, dey won't be ashamed ob dere respect, and so de meek man will get de big offices, and then pretty soon after de millennium will come."

Such was the philosophy of happy Dick, and was he not happy with reason? His substance was that dignity of righteousness which forces out of the universal conscience of men a slow but sure acknowledgment of its worth, and which finds its simple description in the proverb, "A good name is rather to be chosen than great riches." He was humble, but strong; he was ignorant, but wise. "Having nothing, yet possessing all things."—ANN.

---

NOTICES OF PUBLICATIONS.

---

1. A Voice from the Tomb: being the substance of a sermon, preached in the Primitive Methodist Chapel, Peterborough, on occasion of the death of the Prince Consort, by J. ASHWORTH. Second edition. London: R. Davies, Sutton Street, Commercial Road, East. Peterborough: W. Pentney.

This sermon is founded on Deut. xxxiv. 8, "And the children of Israel wept for Moses in the plains of Moab thirty days: so the days of weeping and mourning were ended." It consists chiefly of a memoir of the lamented Prince, and a deduction and application of several important lessons which his life and death suggest. It is no exaggeration to say the production is highly creditable to both the author and his subject. It contains some telling touches, some pathetic strokes, some eloquent passages. The following passage reminds us of some of the splendid apostrophes of Robert Hall:—"O thou pale and mighty conqueror death! how extensive thy ravages, how unblunted thy weapons, how unerring thy aim, how certain thy conquests, how unknown is the period of thy visitation! Thou regardest not the glory of ancestry, the dignity of birth, the splendour of habitations, the honour of titles, the attainments of learning, the tears of affection; but thou ridest on thy pale horse with as much boldness to the mansions of the wealthy, the castles of nobility, and the palaces of royalty, as to the thatched or tiled cottages of the poor!" The profits, we believe, are to be given to the fund of the Peterborough new chapel, and besides the value of the sermon, this is a reason why it should be extensively sold.

2. The Shortness of Time: a sermon on the death of Prince Albert, preached at Motherwell, January 5th, 1862; with an appendix, containing a short sketch of the Prince. By a Home Missionary. Paisley: J. and R. Parlane. Price sixpence.

We have here another discourse on the death of Prince Albert. It might have been better if these productions had been sent to us earlier, as they now seem rather late; but, so far as our personal gratification in their perusal is concerned, we say "better late than never." Nor is this all. There is much in this, as well as in the foregoing discourse, which is of permanent interest and importance. Our "Home Missionary" evidently is not a practised writer, but he has produced, in this instance, a very readable pamphlet. Sterling and abiding truth is the warp, and facts of more temporary interest are the weft of his little work. We trust he will have the gratification to find that his discourse sells well and is useful.

3. A Series of Sermons on important subjects, Doctrinal and Practical. By JOHN PETTY. Second edition, revised. London: R. Davies, Conference Offices, Sutton Street, Commercial Road, East. 1861.

Nor many months ago, we believe, this work was noticed by our esteemed predecessor in office; but we have no objection to adding our favourable testimony to his. We wish all our readers to know more of this book than a brief and occasional notice in our pages will enable them to know—we wish them to procure and read the work for themselves. It is the work of a sound theologian, and a writer of no meagre information on the subjects he discusses. A system of practical and experimental divinity is contained in these pages. There is no parade of learning, no affectation of elegant writing, no effort to get beyond his reader's depth on the part of the excellent author. All is simple, plain, terse, pointed, practical. Well would it be if a repeated and prayerful perusal of these sermons were practised by all our preachers—both travelling and local. It affords us no mean gratification to think that the Primitive Methodist ministry contains within its ranks some writers who are as able to expound and enforce the great doctrines and duties of Christianity as most writers of other communities. We hope that such devoted labourers in the Lord's vineyard will not be neglected by the readers of their own church. If our friends cannot procure all the books they would like to read, at all events let them procure the best which are published in their own denomination. And if they act wisely, they will not long neglect the one now before us. We rejoice to find a second edition of these sermons has been demanded—it speaks well for the Connexion as well as for the author; but we hope a third and a fourth may, ere long, be required. If the work be appreciated as it deserves, such will certainly be the case.

4. The Primitive Methodist Catechisms: compiled by order of Conference, under the supervision of the Book Committee, by JOHN PETTY. No. 1, for young children; No. 2, for children of ten years of age and upwards; No. 3 being a Catechism of Scripture History. London: R. Davies.

IN a preface to the second of these valuable catechisms, the author says he has consulted the shorter catechism of the Westminster Assembly of Divines, the second catechism of Dr. Watts, the valuable catechisms of Mr. Herod and Dr. Cooke, and the second catechism of the Wesleyan Methodists. And while he has derived some assistance from the first three mentioned, he is under the greatest obligations to the last two. From the titles, and this prefatory statement, an idea may be formed of the character of the works. Nos. 1 and 2 are doctrinal, and treat on the same subjects generally, but in a different style, according to the author's estimate of the capacities and necessities of the different classes of children for whom they are designed. We need scarcely intimate that the doctrines taught are the same as those held by all denominations of Methodists, and that the language employed is admirably adapted to convey to children and young persons the clearest ideas of the important matters brought before them. Texts of Scripture are incorporated with the answers to the manifold questions proposed, and this is done in such a manner as to aid the comprehension and the memory. The historical catechism, which is very clear and comprehensive—going from Genesis to Revelation—will be found a valuable acquisition in the Bible class, and among the senior scholars of our schools. We hope the set will soon be found in general use in the Primitive Methodist Connexion; and if the families of all our members use them, they will find their account in the increased intelligence, and, we would hope, increased piety of the juvenile branches. Let our preachers and teachers use their endeavours to get these catechisms into all our schools without delay. The price is so low as to render them accessible to the poorest.

5. The Power of Faith and Prayer, exemplified in the life and labours of Mrs. Mary Porteus, late of Durham, who for fourteen years was a travelling preacher, and twenty-two years a local preacher, in the Primitive Methodist Connexion. By the Rev. JOHN LIGHTFOOT. London: R. Davies, Sutton Street, Commercial Road.

WE have here a goodly volume in cloth, gilt edged, for eighteenpence: cheap enough, in all reason. And that is not all—the work is as good as it is cheap. It is the history of “a mother in Israel,” by one of the fathers. Her parentage and youth, her orphanage and conversion, her marriage and its results, her recovery to God and connection with the Wesleyans, her struggles and deliverances, her full consecration to God and her spheres of labour, her afflictions and her diary, her call to preach and connection with the Primitive Methodists, her toils as a local preacher and her call to the itinerancy, her labours in the Whitby, Ripon, Carlisle, Hexham, North Shields, Sunderland, and Durham

Circuits; her location, affliction, and death, and an estimate of her character, form the subjects of the twenty chapters into which the work is divided. It is a very interesting and telling piece of religious biography. Mrs. Porteus was no ordinary woman,—her piety was deep, her labours were abundant, her trials were severe, and then her end was sudden, but safe. Many were saved through her agency, and will, doubtless, be the crown of her rejoicing in the day of the Lord. It would have been unfair if the church which she so long served had allowed her career to sink into forgetfulness. Indeed, we cannot afford to allow the example she has left us to be forgotten. Many who knew her will hail this pretty volume as a meet record of her history; and many more, who knew her not, will receive valuable spiritual help from consulting its pages. The venerable biographer has rendered the church of his life's labours, another important service by devoting his days of comparative rest from other duties, to the performance of this. We hope his toils will be compensated by the intelligence that his work is highly prized, extensively read, and abundantly useful.

6. The Footsteps of Jesus; with Questions for Young People. By ABRAHAM WORSNOR, minister of the Gospel, and author of "Scripture Questions for Bible Classes," &c. London: R. Davies, Primitive Methodist Book Room, Sutton Street, Commercial Road.

MR. WORSNOR has again come forth as a caterer for the young. His field of enterprise is wide and important. We rejoice to find works for the religious instruction of the young increasing among us, and that, as is the case with Mr. W.'s productions, we can give them so hearty commendation. The present neatly got up volume is the result of a happy idea. It is well that the history of our blessed Redeemer should be unfolded to the young in such a manner as will suit their tastes and capacities. This is the very thing for them. Our Lord's pre-existence, incarnation, baptism, ministry, sufferings, miracles, death, resurrection, and ascension, are discoursed on with simplicity, pathos, and fervour; and the manifold lessons deducible therefrom are appositely presented. Questions at the close of each section of the work will aid the youthful mind to retain the information previously obtained, and the instruction communicated throughout is worth retaining. We strongly commend the work to all our young readers, and hope it will be used in Bible classes, in schools, and for family reading.

7. The Substance of an Address, delivered by PHILIP PUGH, in the Congleton Chapel, at the Tunstall District Meeting of 1862, in the presence of a large congregation, to John Goodwin and John Quarby, candidates for admission into the regular ministry of the Primitive Methodist Connexion, and published by request of the District Meeting. London: R. Davies; and may be had of the Primitive Methodist Travelling Preachers. Price threepence.

THIS able address is adapted for considerable usefulness among our rising ministry. It contains very valuable suggestions as to the subjects and style of preaching, as to the course of study young preachers should pursue, in order that they may become able ministers of the New Testament, and as to the discharge of the various duties which will necessarily devolve upon them in connection with the ministerial office. To all our junior preachers we would say, "Read, mark, learn, and inwardly digest" the wholesome and instructive counsels this pamphlet supplies.

8. The Constitution of the Primitive Methodist Connexion; or, the form of Church Government established in the Denomination: a lecture, delivered in Thornton Street Chapel, Hull, on Thursday evening, December 12th, 1861, before the Young Men's Mutual Improvement Society, connected with that place of worship. By JOHN PERRY. Published by request. London: R. Davies.

MR. PERRY has produced a pithy pamphlet on a dry subject. It is calm, comprehensive, scriptural, and, to our minds, conclusive. The different forms of Church Government in Christendom are briefly sketched; the peculiarities of each, and the resemblances of some, are touched with a master's hand. That the Primitive Methodists' form of government is both Presbyterian and scriptural, for the most part, is satisfactorily established; and some valuable replies to objections, and some useful suggestions to friends are advanced. We wish for the lecture a very rapid and wide circulation. If all our office bearers will carefully read it, and promote its sale, they will do themselves and the Connexion a service.

9. Lectures from New Zealand, addressed to Young Men. By ROBERT WARD. London: Ward and Co., Paternoster Row, and R. Davies, Conference Offices, Sutton Street. 1862.

THIS interesting volume is the production of our devoted New Zealand missionary, Robert Ward, who, for more than seventeen years, has borne the heat and burden of the day in that far-off colony. It is very gratifying to find he has been able to produce such a book under the circumstances in which he has been placed. He is himself one of the best examples of that kind of men whom, in his first lecture, he describes—namely, those who make difficulties succumb to the resistless energy of their devoted purpose. We are right glad to meet the devoted missionary in his present character, as the author of a series of popular and excellent lectures. The subjects of the lectures are—Self-education—Life a reality—The woes and wants of the world—Britons and their birthrights—Christianity in the middle ages—The acts of the apostles—and Tararaki in peace and in war. The style is easy and agreeable, the amount of information contained in the book considerable, and the tendency of all practical and good. As a book for young men, it is of a high order, and to the young men of our Connexion we most heartily recommend it.

10. A Digest of the Minutes, Institutions, Policy, Doctrines, Ordinances, and Literature of the Methodist New Connexion. By the Rev. WILLIAM BAGGLEY. London: Rev. W. Cooke, D.D., Methodist New Connexion Book Room, 31, Warwick Lane, Batemaster Row, E.C. 1962.

From the very full and explicit title of this volume, its contents and character may be readily surmised. It is a cyclopaedia of Methodist New Connexion intelligence. It comprises a history of the denomination,—an exposition of its doctrines, discipline, government, institutions and literature. In fact, on all questions arising out of the existence and position of the New Connexion, it says, "Inquire within." It is, assuredly, a most excellent aide-memoire to all the officials and members of the denomination to which the respected author belongs, and scarcely less so to persons outside that denomination, who wish to become conversant with the peculiarities by which, as a section of the Christian Church, it is distinguished. As a book of reference, it will be found invaluable. We congratulate the able author on his production; and the community he has so long and efficiently served, on the important addition to its previously respectable literature which he has supplied.

11. The Victor Overcome; thoughts on the Life, Character, and Death of the Rev. John Leifchild, B.D.: being the substance of two discourses, by Rev. JOHN GRAHAM, his successor in the ministry at Craven Chapel. London: Jackson, Walford, and Hodder.

THIS is another testimony to the truth, "The memory of the just is blessed." We last month noticed Mr. Baldwin Brown's sketch of his lamented relative, Dr. Leifchild, and we take pleasure this month in calling attention to this companion pamphlet by Mr. Graham. It was fitting that the Doctor's successor should bear testimony to the character of his honoured predecessor; and a fitting testimony has he borne. The sermons themselves are rich in thought, and fragrant with the perfume of practical piety, while the incidents in the life of Dr. L., which are interwoven therewith, will greatly add to the interest and usefulness of the publication. We have been reminded, while perusing these discourses, how true the sentiment, "The Lord removes his workmen, but carries on his work." The work is carried on by raising up workmen to take the place of those removed. In the decease of such eminent ministers among the Congregationalists as William Jay, John Angell James, and Dr. Leifchild, human reason might see ground for despondency; but in the supplies for their places which Providence has provided, that despondency must be rebuked. The work is the Lord's, and He will provide men. Mr. Graham is a man of mark, and this beautiful tribute to the memory of his eminent predecessor will raise him still higher in public esteem. We shall be glad to see the anticipated biography of the Doctor from the pen of his son, the Rev. John R. Leifchild, as having been so much interested by the short sketches of Messrs. Brown and Graham, a fuller acquaintance with his life and labours, which such biography may be expected to afford, we trust will be to us a rich treat. We conclude this notice of Mr. Graham's work by a quotation which will, we trust, whet the appetite of our readers for the work itself. Speaking of Dr. Leifchild as a preacher, Mr. Graham says:—"He was a man of power—power to carry truth deep into the souls of men—power to rebuke levity, pierce impotence, quicken torpor, strengthen weakness—power to shake sin's strongholds with giant strokes, and to lead trembling souls to approach and yield themselves to God at the blood-sprinkled mercy-seat. He esteemed polish, but he wanted for power. He did not despise literature, but he sought, with all his seeking, to be 'mighty in the Scriptures.' He could admire the art that evokes forms of beauty from dead stone, but his enthusiasm burned for the power to turn stone to flesh, to awake the sleepless energies of holy thought and love in deathless minds. He drank into the spirit of Christ, the spirit of power and of love, and of a sound mind. Oh, for such men of God in all the pulpits of our land, to preach with the Holy Ghost and with power! Amen."

12. Instrumental Strength; Thoughts for Students and Pastors. By CHARLES STANFORD. London: Jackson, Walford and Hodder.

RIGHT glad are we to meet Mr. Stanford again so soon. Last month but one we had occasion to give our estimate of his "Central Truths," and now he enables us to judge by what course of study, prayer and labour, he was prepared for the production of such a work. Doubtless, the course recommended to others in his "Instrumental Strength," himself has diligently prosecuted. He, therefore, speaks that he knows, and testifies that he has seen. The present work consists of an able and eloquent address, delivered to the students of the Baptist College, at Bristol, and is a most appropriate collection of rules and suggestions for the perusal of students in general. The motto of the address, according to which is the title of the work, is selected from Genesis xlix. 24, "His bow abode in strength;" and we have no hesitation in saying that the bow of the preacher abode in strength while delivering this address; and that if the very valuable hints and instructions of the address be adopted and practised by the young men to whom delivered, their bows, too, will abide in strength in no ordinary degree. We feel strongly inclined to select several of the author's remarks for the benefit of our junior preachers; but not only is our space limited, but the work itself is so portable and cheap, that we must content ourselves with giving it our hearty commendation, and hoping our brethren will soon obtain it and read the whole of it for themselves.

13. "Honour to whom Honour," or, the Story of the Two Thousand of 1662. A Book for the Young, by FREDERICK S. WILLIAMS. London: The Committee Room, 4, Bloomfield Street, Finsbury; and Jackson, Walford and Hodder. 1862.

ST. BARTHOLOMEW'S day is not to be forgotten. By a trio of remarkable occurrences, it has been rendered memorable. Tradition says the apostle Bartholomew, who is supposed by many to be the same as is called by John, Nathanael, was a missionary to India, and was there martyred, and that the 24th of August was the day on which this deed was perpetrated. At all events, this is the day devoted to the memory of the saint. On this day, in the year 1572, occurred the fearful massacre of the French Protestants, by the Papists. This tragic event is sometimes called the Parisian massacre, on account of its having begun in Paris; and sometimes, the massacre of the Huguenots, as this was a name commonly given to the French Protestants. Just ninety years after occurred that memorable event the bi-centenary of which has recently been commemorated in this country—the ejection of the two thousand Nonconforming ministers from the Established Church of England. To a history of this last event the present work is devoted, and a very excellent sketch is herein contained. The facts are well grouped, the spirit is Christian, the style is agreeable and appropriate, and the lessons and suggestions are valuable. We have marked several other passages for quotation, but must, for lack of space, content ourselves with the following. Speaking of the Puritans of the times of James I., the author quotes Macaulay, who says, "If they were unacquainted with the works of philosophers and poets, they were deeply read in the oracles of God. If their names were not found in the registers of heralds, they were recorded in the Book of Life. If their steps were not accompanied by a splendid train of menials, legions of ministering angels had charge over them. Their palaces were not houses made with hands; their diadems, crowns of glory which should never fade away. On the rich and the eloquent, on nobles and priests, they looked down with contempt; for they esteemed themselves rich in a more precious treasure, and eloquent in a more sublime language, nobles by right of an earlier creation, and priests by the imposition of a mightier hand."

"In the matter of dress and of manners," says Kingsley, "the Puritan triumph has been complete. Even their worst enemies have come over to their side. Their canons of taste have become those of all England, and High Churchmen, who still call them Round-heads and Cropped-ears, go about rounder-headed and closer-cropped than they ever went. They held it more rational to cut the hair to a comfortable length than to wear effeminate curls down the back. And we cut ours much shorter than they ever did. They held (with the Spaniards, then the finest gentlemen in the world) that sad, that is—dark colours, above all, black, were the fittest for stately and earnest gentlemen. We all, from the Tractarian to the Anythingarian, are exactly of the same opinion. They held that lace, perfumes, and jewellery on a man were marks of unmanly foppishness and vanity, and so hold the finest gentlemen in England now. They thought it equally absurd and sinful for a man to carry his income on his back, and bedizen himself out in reds, blues, and greens, ribbons, knots, slashes, and 'treble quadruple doedalian ruffs,' built upon iron and timber, which have more arches in them for pride than London Bridge for use. We, if we met such a ruffed and ruffled worthy as used to swagger by hundreds up and down Paul's Walk, not knowing how to get a dinner, much less to pay his tailor, should look upon him as firstly a fool, and secondly a swindler; while, if we met an old Puritan, we should consider him a man gracefully and picturesquely dressed, but withal, in the most perfect sobriety of good taste; and when we discovered (as we probably should) over and above, that the harlequin cavalier had a box of salve and a pair of dice in one pocket, and a pack of cards and a few pawnbrokers' duplicates in the other, that his thoughts were altogether of citizens' wives and their too easy virtue, that he could not open his mouth without a dozen oaths, we should consider the Puritan (even though he did quote scripture somewhat through his nose) as a gentleman, and the courtier as a most offensive specimen of the 'snob triumphant' glorying in his shame. The picture is not ours, nor even the Puritan's; it is Bishop Hall's, Bishop Earle's,—it is Beaumont's, Fletcher's, Johnson's, Shakespeare's,—the picture which every dramatist, as well as satirist, has drawn of a 'gallant' of the seventeenth century. No one can read those writers honestly without seeing that the Puritan, and not the cavalier, conception of what a British gentleman should be is the one accepted by the whole nation at this day."

Referring to the sorrows attendant on the noble sacrifices of the two thousand, who could sacrifice everything they held dear on earth, even life itself, except conscience, the author quotes Baxter, who says, "And now came in the great inundation of calamities, which in many streams overwhelmed thousands of godly Christians, together with their pastors. As, for example, hundreds of able ministers, with their wives and children, had neither house nor bread; for their former maintenance served them but for the time, and few of them laid up any for the future. Then the people's poverty was so great that they were not able much to relieve their ministers. And the jealousy of the State, and the malice of their enemies, were so great that people who were willing durst not be known to give to their ejected pastors, lest it should be said that they maintained schism, or were making collections for some plot or insurrection."

The Rev. Isaac Taylor—a clergyman—says the Church of that day "expelled from her ministry the most eloquent preachers, the most laborious pastors, the most learned divines, the most earnest Christians, the most successful messengers of Christ, who have at any time ministered in the Church of England—men such as Baxter, Flavel, Howe, Owen, Poole, Alleine, Calamy, Philip Henry, Gale, Bates,—these men, at the head of two thousand of the benefited clergy, left their flocks, their homes, their glebes, and were driven out from the Church of their forefathers, which was theirs by inheritance and by right."

Let any one who wants a bird's eye view of the stirring times and wonderful men of the early ages of Puritan Nonconformity, buy and study this thrilling narrative.

14. Bicentenary Prize Essay. Christian Churches: the noblest form of Social Life; the Representatives of Christ on Earth; the dwelling-place of the Holy Spirit. By JOSEPH ANGUS, D.D. London: Ward and Co.

15. Congregational Church History from the Reformation to 1862. By JOHN WADDINGTON, D.D. Ward and Co., 27, Paternoster Row.

THESE two respectable shilling books are essays that each obtained a prize of fifty guineas, given by an anonymous friend of Nonconformity. The offer of the prizes was made known at the autumnal meeting of the Congregational Union, held at Birmingham, October, 1861. From a considerable number of MSS., these were selected as the best by the adjudicators, who were Messrs. S. Morley, B. Scott, and the Rev. W. J. Unwin. The titles indicate the character of the works, and we only need to say the essays fully equal all reasonable expectations. Of course, we cannot go full length with Dr. Angus in his ideas of Church government—our views being more in harmony with those set forth in Mr. Petty's lecture noticed above—but we can most cordially commend the honest and able manner in which the author sets forth his opinions, and, above all, the ingenious spirit in which his arguments are stated. Dr. Waddington's is the more voluminous book, but is generally narrative rather than polemical. A large amount of historic lore is contained in his essay, and to all students of Church history we would earnestly recommend it.

16. Church Reform in the Olden Time: a Historical Argument for Congregational Principles. A Bicentenary Lecture, delivered at Trinity Chapel, Poplar; Hanley Street, Bow; and Wycliffe Chapel, June, 1862, by the Rev. WILLIAM BEVAN. London: J. Snow.

This is an able lecture, and contains, like the works above-named, a goodly share of useful information on Protestant Nonconformity. It is a digest of Congregational Church History, and may be profitably studied by all who desiderate full and correct information on the subject discussed.

17. The Episcopal State Church, and the Congregational and other Free Churches, Compared and Contrasted: a Bicentenary Lecture, delivered at the Carlton Rooms, Southampton, August, 1862, by the Rev. T. ADAMS. London: Jackson, Walford and Hodder.

THE style of this lecture is elegant, and the spirit breathed throughout thoroughly Christian. It is a model lecture for solidity of thought, chasteness of diction, and catholicity of tone.

18. Lunaria Saxifrage; or, Temper and Triumph. By the author of "Madame De Gascoigne." London: W. Tweedie, 337, Strand. 1862.

A story of deep interest, and fraught with valuable practical lessons. A good book to place in the hands of young people, especially those who may be in danger of shipwreck on the rocks of pride and temper. The dangers and triumphs herein depicted will prove a useful study for many.

19. Madame De Gascoigne: a Temperance Tale of the Present Time. London: Tweedie.

THE evils of intemperance are the burden of this story. They are pictured with considerable power, and we wish that the higher, as well as the lower orders, as they are called, would give this tale their unbiassed attention. Intemperance prevails to a fearful extent in most ranks of life, and in various countries, especially in these sea-girt isles of ours. O that the drink demon were destroyed from our midst. The perusal of this little work will, we hope, aid in exposing the evils of the drinking system, and so bringing on "a consummation so devoutly to be wished," as the annihilation of this gigantic curse.

20. Simple Questions and Sanitary Facts, for the use of the Poor: an attempt to Teach the Simplest Natural Phenomena, and to Explain the Functions and Structure of the Human Body. London: W. Tweedie, 337, Strand.

A most valuable collection of facts and hints on the concerns of every-day life. The philosophy of common things deserves a more careful study than it usually obtains. This work will aid those who are desirous to cultivate an acquaintance therewith. Both rich and poor may find their account in purchasing and pondering this two shillings' worth of instruction, on what everybody should know. We strongly recommend this work as the best of the kind we have met with.

21. Running a Thousand Miles for Freedom; or, the Escape of William and Ellen Craft from Slavery. London: Ward and Co., Paternoster Row.

THE present state of affairs in America tends greatly to increase our interest in works of this kind. The spark seems to have been applied to the train, the explosion of which we hope to see shiver to fragments the Colossus of American slavery. However the present devastating war may end, may Heaven thereby speed the everlasting overthrow of the horrible system by which the great Trans-Atlantic Continent has so long been disgraced. If any one wishes to have his philanthropic emotions against slavery excited to higher intensity, let him read the story of W. and E. Craft. The story is told with great simplicity and feeling. We hope it will have a wide circulation.

N.B. We intended to notice this month several other works: which are lying on hand, but find our space is fully occupied; and, therefore, they must necessarily wait till our next issue.

HOME RELIGIOUS INTELLIGENCE.

LAYING FOUNDATION STONES.

1. EAST RUDHAM, DOCKING CIRCUIT.—This large village, situate about seven miles from Fakenham and sixteen from Lynn, has now a population of more than nine hundred. More than thirty years have elapsed since our people first entered this place, to proclaim the "unsearchable riches of Christ." Since then, many deathless souls have been turned from darkness to light, from sin to righteousness. But our energies have been much crippled for want of a suitable place in which to conduct divine worship. A chapel was a desideratum, but, for years past, where to obtain ground for one has been the difficulty.

However, I am happy to say providence has now cleared the way. A plot of freehold land has been purchased, and on the 8th of May, the foundation stone of a new chapel was laid by the writer, and two sermons were preached by the Rev. R. Key. The friends provided tea in a spacious tent. The profits of the tea, collections, and donations amounted to the sum of £27 17s. 0d.

EPHRAIM BLAKE.

2. NEWBRIDGE, ABERDARE CIRCUIT.—The interesting ceremony of laying a foundation stone was performed on Monday, May 12th, 1862. A numerous procession of ministers, members and friends, at a quarter to three o'clock p.m., walked from the room where worship is held, to the place destined for the future chapel. On arriving at the spot, a hymn was sung, and a prayer was offered by R. Thatcher, Esq., Beaufort; after which Mr. J. Lambert, of Bristol, delivered an address. A trowel and polished mallet were then handed to Miss Brown, the daughter of the manager of Navigation Colliery, who gracefully laid the stone. Addresses were then delivered by the Revs. T. Hobson, Pontypool; T. Parr, Cardiff; and a few words by G. Johnson.

A beautiful new tray was then placed on the stone to receive subscriptions. Miss Brown generously placed thereon five sovereigns, and other friends gave of their gold, silver, and pence, to the amount of $9 7s. 0d. In a bottle, placed under the stone, were deposited a copy of the "Christian World," a circuit plan, a magazine, the names of the trustees, and an account of the state of our country, including a simple and delicate reference to the affliction of our Queen, owing to the death of the Prince Consort. Several coins of the realm were likewise deposited under the stone.

The site for the chapel is well chosen, in a picturesque situation near the new bridge, and overlooking the river Taff.

After the whole ceremony was concluded, a tea meeting was held, presided over by the ladies of the society. More than two hundred friends sat down to tea. At seven o'clock, a public meeting was held, presided over by Mr. Thatcher; and excellent speeches were delivered by the Revs. T. Hobson, T. Parr, R. Bently (Wesleyan minister), Messrs. J. Lambert, H. Davies, Dowlais; and the report was read by G. Johnson. The proceeds for the day amounted to £21 17s. 1d. To God be all the glory. The chapel will be forty feet by thirty. God is very graciously blessing our circuit; most weeks souls are being converted. May these mountains and dingles be baptized with fire! Amen.

GEORGE JOHNSON.

3. BRAINTREE, MALDON MISSION.—The foundation services for a new chapel at the above place were held on Sunday and Monday, May 11th and 12th. On the Sunday, the Rev. M. Lupton preached two sermons in the Corn Exchange. On the Monday, a bazaar, of useful and fancy articles, was opened at twelve o'clock at noon, which fully realized our expectations. At half-past three p.m., Mr. Lupton gave an address on the chapel ground, from the words, "He is my God, and I will prepare Him an habitation;" and then laid the stone, amid a concourse of at least four hundred people ; after which a collection was made, one lady placing a five pound note on the plate. The service was closed with prayer, by the Rev. J. Guy ; and the friends adjourned to the Corn Exchange, where about two hundred sat down to an excellent tea. After tea, a public meeting was held, under the presidency of the Rev. J. Guy, and addressed by the Revs. J. Nunn, J. Dinnick, S. Kelley, J. Sheale, and M. Lupton.

The proceeds of the services amounted to about £18, which, with £30 previously received, by donations, tea meeting, &c., and promises, bring the total amount to the encouraging sum of about £60.

J. SHEALE.

4. CROWLAND, PETERBOROUGH CIRCUIT.—Crowland lies about eighty-five miles north of London. It is a very ancient town, containing an old abbey and a triangular bridge. This old bridge is a great curiosity—it is the Mars-hill of Crowland, where the people meet to tell and hear some new thing. It has been the pulpit for our preachers in their open-air services for nearly thirty years, and around its old steps crowds have often gathered to listen with attention to the Word of life.

Our society in this place has been put to considerable difficulties for want of a suitable place of worship. The present rented chapel we occupy is about fifty-four feet long by thirteen wide ; it has a brick floor, with thin walls and defective roof. We have seen people with their umbrellas up during service, for the purpose of sheltering them from the rain.

A better day has already dawned upon us. An eligible site of freehold land has been secured, on which the foundation stone of a new sanctuary was laid on Wednesday, May the 21st, 1862, by Mr. Isaac Edis, of Dogsthorpe, who laid £5 upon the stone, in addition to £5 which he had previously given towards the land. In the afternoon, a sermon was preached by the Rev. J. Phillips, after which about three hundred and fifty sat down to tea. An enthusiastic meeting was held in the evening, addressed by the Revs. J. Phillips, R. Ducker, J. Ashworth, T. Wilkinson ; Messrs. F. Riches, J. Hill, H. Squire, and H. Key. The proceeds of the day amounted to £20.

J. ASHWORTH.

5. BROTHERTON, PONTEFRACT CIRCUIT.—For more than thirty years the Primitive Methodists of Brotherton have been subject to inconvenience for want of a connexional chapel. We have now a prospect of supplying this lack. On the 28th of May, 1862, the foundation stone of a new chapel was laid by Joseph Tate, Esq., of Wentbridge, when an appropriate address was delivered by the Rev. R. Smith, of the Leeds first circuit, after which tea was taken, and a public meeting was held in the Independent chapel, (kindly lent for the occasion.) Capt. J. Arnold presided, and addresses were delivered by the Revs. R. Smith, J. Tate, J. Mesby, and the circuit ministers. The collections, &c., for the day, were £10 3s. 10½d. W. BENNETT.

6. LYE WASTE, BRIERLEY HILL CIRCUIT.—The society at this place has been long inconvenienced for want of a larger and more commodious place of worship. At length the time to favour Zion has come. A site of land, at the cost of £106 8s. 6d., was offered for sale, and in about three weeks, the noble sum of £104 7s. Od. was begged, and the ground purchased. On Monday, June the 9th, 1862, the trustees, preachers, leaders, members, Sabbath school teachers, and congregation, commenced a procession through the neighbourhood, at about half-past nine o'clock in the morning; the scene was grand and imposing. Upon the arrival of the procession at the ground, the stone was laid by Thos. Wood, Esq., of Cradley, who was presented with a neat silver trowel on the occasion, and who promised a donation of ten pounds towards the erection. Addresses were afterwards delivered by the Revs. J. Arnold, M. Nicholas, T. Clarkson, Mr. J. Cartwright, and James Aston, Esq. The sum of £11 14s. 3d. was collected on the ground, besides the £10 promised by Mr. Wood.

BENJ. BROWN.

7. ROCESTER, RAMSOR CIRCUIT.—

On Thursday, June 12, a number of the friends assembled for the purpose of laying the foundation stone of a new chapel here. After the opening of the proceedings by singing and prayer, and the delivery of a short address, Miss Wood, of Beadman's Green, near Stramshall, laid the foundation stone. The chapel when finished is designed to accommodate about 130 persons. The building is to be of brick, and will be finished in a neat and substantial manner; the total cost being estimated at about £200. The lady who took a prominent part in the proceedings, has, in addition to her subscription, presented a handsomely bound Bible, and the cushions and fittings for the pulpit. It was intended to have tea in a spacious tent, erected for the occasion, in Bottoms Croft; but the rain prevented. The tea, however, was held in the Infant school, and about 200 sat down. The Rev. W. Stubbs, incumbent, efficiently presided; and appropriate addresses were given by the ministers of the Ramsor Circuit, and other friends. The Rocester saxe-horn band played a good selection of sacred music during the evening. The net proceeds to the funds, including the collection at the ceremony, will be about £9.

W. ROOKE.

8. FROGHALL, RAMSOR CIRCUIT.—

On Tuesday, June 17, the foundation stone of a new chapel, was laid at this little rising village, by W. S. Allen, Esq., of Woodhead-hall. The site, which has been kindly given by Mr. John Birch, of Frog-hall Mills, occupies a very central situation near the toll-bar, and is within a short distance of the railway station. The ceremony commenced by singing and prayer; Mr. Allen then adjusted the stone, after which in a few brief but appropriate remarks, he spoke of the usefulness of such buildings, which were much needed in that locality. Addresses were also delivered by the Rev. W. Rooke, of Alton; and Mr. G. Charlesworth, of Cheadle. A collection was made at the close of the ceremony in aid of the building fund, which amounted to £10, including £5 given by Mr. Allen. The building is to be of brick, and of the ordinary plain character. A tea party took place on the recreation ground, called the "round-hill," on Kingsley Banks, a spot which commands an extensive view of the Churnet valley, and its enchanting scenery. The weather was very unfavourable, but a spacious tent had been erected for the occasion, and about 350 persons sat down to the repast. Mr. Isaac Hammond, of Cheadle, presided, and gave a very interesting account of the operations of the Primitive Methodists in the locality for the last forty-six years. Addresses were also delivered by the Rev. W. Rooke, and Messrs. Kent, Charlesworth, Tunnicliffe, and Beach. The proceedings were enlivened at intervals by a band of music. The profits from the tea-party amounted to £6, which were added to the collection.

W. ROOKE.

9. CAMBRIDGE CIRCUIT.—I have great pleasure in handing you a Report of the services connected with the laying of a foundation stone of another chapel on this Circuit, at a place about six miles from Cambridge. The chapel will stand in the centre of the village called Toft, and will be available for the inhabitants of two or three villages round it. On Tuesday, the 17th June, at 3 o'clock P.M., a sermon was preached by the Rev. J. Phillips, of Luton Circuit, and an address was given by G. Levitt, Esq., of Cambridge, who then proceeded to lay the first stone in the proposed edifice, and a considerable amount was placed upon it in donations. About 200 friends then had tea together, which was provided in a large barn beautifully and tastefully decorated with flowers, flags, mottoes, and green boughs, the whole presenting a very happy and lively scene. After tea, a public meeting was held, presided over by G. Levitt, Esq. He called upon the Rev. T. Swindill, and the Rev. E. Howchin, to address the meeting. After some appropriate remarks by the president, the Rev. J. Phillips, of Luton, was called upon; he shewed the happy effects of the Gospel of Christ in drawing together and uniting in one spirit the different denominations of the Christian church; and while referring to the marvellous interference of the providence of God in such works as the one now in hand, he gave several instances which had occurred to him. Several others addressed the meeting, and about £17 were realized towards the building fund.

SAMUEL SMITH.

10. The foundation stone of a new Primitive Methodist chapel, at a village called OAKINGTON, Cambridge Circuit, was laid on Tuesday, July 1st, by Miss Doggett. This house of prayer will stand in a very conspicuous part of this pretty village, as seen from the Longstanton Road. In the afternoon, a sermon was preached by the Rev. J. Phillips, of Luton, and donations were placed on the stone to the amount of £7 7s. At five o'clock a tea was provided, in Mr. Chapman's barn, which had been kindly lent and prepared for the occasion, and a goodly number of friends sat down and enjoyed the good things provided; after which, a public meeting was held, and the writer having opened by singing and prayer, Mr. Chamberlain (an Independent), of Cambridge, was called to preside. After addressing the meeting briefly, he called upon the Rev. T. Swindill, who in a warm and energetic speech referred to the circumstances connected with the planting of our society, and its continuance at Oakington. The Rev. E. Howchin, of St. Ives, the Rev. J. Phillips, of Luton, and other brethren addressed the meeting. The tea, and the collection after the meeting, realised about £10 3s.; the whole services bringing in £17 10s. towards the erection of the chapel.

S. SMITH.

11. BLEDDFA, in KNIGHTON BRANCH. This is a beautiful little village in the county of Radnor, surrounded by some of the most picturesque Welsh scenery. Here we have had preaching for many years, and a chapel has long been a desirable object. We have succeeded at last in obtaining a piece of ground, at a nominal cost of £2, on which we are about to build. On Tuesday, July 1st, 1862, the foundation stone was laid by Mr. John Wilson, of Knighton, who very handsomely gave a donation of £5 to the trust funds. About three o'clock the service commenced with a prayer by the Rev. J. Huff, of Presteign; then the stone was laid in the name of the Holy Trinity; and the Rev. G. Middleton preached a sermon to a respectable and attentive congregation. This was followed by an address from Mr. J. D. Butter, high bailiff of Knighton. Throughout the whole service the greatest interest prevailed. After the collection, which amounted to £17 2s. the doxology was sung, and the service closed. The crowd then repaired to a tent which had been erected by the friends, and decorated with arches and garlands of flowers and evergreens. Here about 300 persons partook of tea and cake. About seven o'clock, a religious service was commenced, over which Mr. J. D. Butter presided; and in the course of the evening several addresses were delivered by the chairman, the Revs. G. Middleton, J. Huff, and Messrs. E. Cowdill and J. Davies. The profits of the tea were £11 to be added to the collection, making a total of £28 2s. for the trust funds.

G. MIDDLETON.

12. KIRTON LINDSEY, SCOTTER CIRCUIT.—Wednesday, July 2nd, 1862, was an interesting day to the Primitive Methodist society at Kirton. At two o'clock in the afternoon the friends assembled in the old chapel, and after singing and prayer, the congregation moved in procession to the market-place, where a brief address was delivered by the Rev. W. Sanderson. Thence the large assembly proceeded to the site of the new chapel, where in the presence of a large and highly interested congregation, the foundation stone was laid by Miss E. A. Hodge, of Hull, who kindly presented to the building fund the handsome sum of £15. After the stone had been laid in the name of the Holy Trinity, the Rev. J. Mules, of Brigg, delivered an interesting address, in which the Connexion's origin, doctrines, and mission were glanced at. After the public tea, gratuitously provided by the friends, at which over 300 sat down, an interesting meeting was held in the Wesleyan chapel. Alderman W. Hodge, ex-mayor of Hull, presided, and the Revs. J. Bywater, W. Sanderson, J. Mules, C. G. Honor, E. Talbot, and Mr. Spouncer (Wesleyan) addressed the meeting. During the public meeting, the Rev. J. Bywater, in the name of the trustees, presented to Miss Hodge a beautiful silver basket, bearing a suitable inscription. The proceeds of the day, including a donation of £3 from Alderman Hodge, amounted to £43. To all who have assisted us in this interesting service, we tender our thanks.

T. WHITEHEAD.

CHAPEL OPENINGS.

1. MARKET WESTON, THETFORD CIRCUIT.—The erection of a suitable place in which to worship the "God of our fathers" in this village, has been felt of late a great necessity. Some four or five years ago, our people missioned the village with some success, and about two years since a revival broke out, and several precious souls fled "from the wrath to come." Amongst the number was a very benevolent-minded gentleman, (W. G. Wigg, Esq.,) who has ever since been a great friend to the cause, and, by a succession of God-honouring efforts, has principally contributed towards our present standing in the place. For the last three years, preaching has been conducted in a large room belonging to him, and frequently has the room been crowded to excess. As time fled away, we found that circumstances were likely to transpire that would necessitate the removal of this friend from the village, and what might be our future lot, when such a prop should be removed from among us, was a question that caused great anxiety. A few months since, the writer, in connexion with this friend, (without giving any publicity to the matter,) secured a plot of freehold land, "beautiful for situation," on which to erect a house for God. Mr. Wigg made the very liberal promise, to give us half the cost of the chapel, whatever it might be, if we would raise the remainder. Being stimulated by such an offer, plans were soon drawn up, specifications sent out, and tenders received, and everything in readiness for commencing operations.

In accordance with the concerted plan, the ceremony of laying the foundation stone took place March 27th, when a discourse was delivered by the Rev. W. Warren (Independent), followed by W. G. Wigg, Esq., and his lady, each laying a stone in the building. A public tea was afterwards provided, when about a hundred sat down to the social cup. This was succeeded by a public meeting, addressed by the Revs. W. Warren and J. Kemish, Brothers Good, Batley, and the writer. The building went on very favourably, till at length the time arrived for the opening services. Accordingly, on Wednesday, June 11th, at three o'clock, the first sermon was preached by the Rev. W. Warren, when the writer read a portion of the divine word, and prayed that within its walls the cloud of the "excellent glory" might ever rest; after which another public tea was provided, and another public meeting held. On the following Sabbath, June 15th, the Rev. Morgan Loyd preached afternoon and evening; and on Sunday, June 22nd, the opening services were brought to a close, when the Rev. R. Davies, of London, preached three times to large congregations, who were much delighted with his pithy, pointed, powerful appeals. The total cost of the building is £114 16s. 3d., towards which about £30 have been raised by collections, cards, subscriptions, &c., which, with half the entire cost being paid by W. G. Wigg, Esq., make the total raised £87 8s. 1½d., leaving a debt of £27 8s. 1½d. on the premises, which we hope to pay off in twelve months. The building is twenty-seven feet six inches long, and twenty-three feet six inches wide, and fourteen feet from the floor (which is a boarded one) to the ceiling. It is built with red and white bricks, which give it a beautiful appearance. Many thanks are due to the friends who have assisted us in the matter, and especially to the kind gentleman who gives half the entire cost, besides carting the materials. The prayers of the church will follow him, and his excellent lady and family, to their new residence; and when the judgment shall be set, and the books be opened, we hope it will be found that "crowds were born for glory here."

JOHN ALLISON.

2. BLAGILL, ALSTON CIRCUIT.—At this village, which is situated about a mile and a half from Alston, the Primitive Methodists have ministered for upwards of thirty-five years. During this period, the services were held in the dwelling-house of Mr. Walton and his sons; and the ministers were always welcome to the hospitalities of the family. For some years, a small Sabbath School was taught in an incommodious room of a dwelling-house. After several unsuccessful attempts to obtain a connexional chapel, the circuit authorities de-terminated to have one without any further delay. A site, the lease of which has more than seven hundred years to run, was purchased, in the centre of the village; and the foundation stone was laid by Mr. Bastow, on March 7th, 1862. The friends and neighbours kindly engaged to win all the stone, to burn the lime, and to do all the leading of materials gratis. The chapel is thirty feet by twenty-one. The windows are Gothic-headed, as is also the window over the porch. The pews are elevated; and the place will seat about one hundred and twenty persons. The entire cost of the chapel, including the value of the labour given, is £150. The opening services occurred June 20—22, when we had excellent addresses and sermons from Revs. J. Harker (Independent), J. Brown (Wesleyan), and H. Phillips, of Westgate. Towards the cost of the undertaking, we have obtained by donations, including £20 by John Grey, Esq., from the Commissioners of Greenwich Hospital; a tea meeting, and the collections at the opening, £84 11s.; the value of the stone, lime, and labour given, £30 9s., making a total of £115. It will thus be seen that we have only had to borrow £35, and this, at four per cent., actually costs our friends at Blagill less by several shillings per annum than the room in the cottage where the Sabbath School was taught. This is the only chapel in the Alston Circuit settled on the Connexion, according to our printed form of title deed. May this sanctuary be a blessing to the neighbourhood. J. A. B.

3. SCALEGILL, WHITEHAVEN CIRCUIT.—This place has been lately erected for the workmen connected with the extensive iron stone mines in the locality, and is three miles south of Whitehaven. It was missioned in the close of 1860, principally by Brother J. Jopling, and the preachers appointed to it on the plan; and in the space of twenty months, we have a society of twenty members, and a Sabbath and day school taught in a new connexional chapel. The foundation stone was laid by the writer on December 25th, 1861, and the chapel was opened on June 8th, 1862, by the Rev. J. Worsnop preaching morning and evening, and Mr. J. Huggins (Wesleyan), in the afternoon. On Monday, the 9th, there were a tea and public meeting in the chapel, and addresses by the Revs. J. Harper, J. Taylor, J. Worsnop, and Messrs. Huggins, Burns, Scott, Fee, and Greenup; Mr. W. Simpson being in the chair. The chapel will seat 120 persons. The total cost, exclusive of the chapel deed, is £137. We have raised by subscriptions, £57; at the foundation stone laying, £7 2s. 4d.; and at the opening services, £9 8s.: total, £73 10s. 4d. A few more pounds are expected shortly to be realized. Our friends at Scalegill and neighbourhood have laboured well, and we are happy to add a few souls have already been saved within the walls of the chapel. A. DODDS.

4. The foundation stone of a new chapel at KIRKHAM GATE, in the Wakefield Circuit, was laid on Easter Tuesday, by Samuel Seal, Esq., of Stoneleigh House, one of our own local preachers, and a long tried and sincere friend to the Connexion. After the ceremony, the friends met for tea in the Wesleyan chapel, which was kindly lent for the occasion, when Stephen Seal, Esq., was called to preside; and effective and appropriate addresses were delivered by the Circuit ministers, and several local preachers; and besides the gracious influence which pervaded the services, upwards of £20 were contributed towards defraying the expenses of the erection. The chapel is 33 feet long by 30 feet wide out-side; its walls are of red stock bricks, 14 inches wide, and the roof is covered with blue Bangor slates, and finished with flag tabling, on the gable ends 12 inches by 2½; and it stands on the most eligible site in the village; thanks to my predecessor, the Rev. H. Crabtree, and the trustees, for securing such a plot of land for the purpose. It is lighted with four spacious windows, and a fan light over the door, which folds in the centre of the front wall, and is 7 feet by 4 in the clear, above which is a beautiful inscription stone, presented by a surviving brother of the late Rev. J. Verity. The pulpit has an octagonal front, and at the opposite end is a very neat rising gallery, five pews deep, which will seat 80 persons, leaving free sitting room for 120; making a total accommodation for 200. The land is freehold, and secured to the Connexion according to our form of title deed. The cost of the whole is £200, every farthing of which was paid to the contractors within one week after the opening services were closed.

On Sunday, July 6th, the Rev. W. Bennett, from Pontefract, and the Rev. J. Ayrton, from Horbury, officiated at the dedication of this beautiful temple to the worship of God; and on the 13th, the services were conducted by the Rev. G. Stout, from Colne, and our friend Mr. Seal, from Wakefield. On Tuesday, the 15th, another interesting tea meeting was held, and the opening services were brought to a close by a sermon from the writer. The congregations were large; a gracious influence was experienced during the services, and about £14 were raised for the chapel fund, making a total of upwards of £80 given, from all sources, and the rest has been borrowed at 4½ per cent. per annum. Where so many have done well, laboured hard, and contributed liberally, it is a difficult and delicate task to mention names at all; but perhaps I may be permitted through the pages of your magazine, to present the thanks of the trustees to L. Fernandes, Esq., and son, for a return of £107 of the purchase money at the time of payment for the land; to Messrs. Samuel Seal and Son, for the gift of £5 5s., and all the stone required for window sills and arches, spout corbills, &c.; to Mr. Blackburn for a donation of £4 and other favors; to C. B. L. Fernandes, Esq. for the reduction of £3 from the cost of title deeds; to T. Haigh, Esq., ex-mayor of Wakefield, for a present of £2 2s.; to Messrs. W. Crossland, James Chadwick, Isaac Illingworth, and Thomas Westwood for £1 each; to Mr. Hall for pulpit trimmings; to Mr. Horton for a very handsome morocco bound gilt-edged Bible; and last, but not least worthy, to the female friends who supplied provisions for both the tea meetings gratuitously; and to all who have assisted in rearing this house of God, I beg to offer hearty thanks.

J. DODSWORTH.

5. EASTLOND, EPWORTH CIRCUIT, is a neat little hamlet, in the parish of Haxey, which was, up to a very recent period, quite destitute of the means of grace. The writer having received from some of the inhabitants an invitation to give them a sermon, went on the 7th of March, 1862. Subsequently a society was formed. We were then told that there was in the village a kindly-disposed gentleman, who had previously proposed giving land to another community, on which to build a chapel. We called upon him, and the same very eligible plot of land was offered by him, and accepted by us. Preparatory arrangements were forthwith entered into, and our circuit steward, Mr. Lyon, laid the foundation stone on Thursday, April 24th. The erection of the chapel commenced, the dimensions of which are 28 feet 6 inches in length, 18 feet 6 inches in width, (inside measure,) and 13 feet from floor to ceiling. The front is red pressed bricks, except the corners and the arches over the front windows, and the door—they are white stock bricks; it is covered with blue slate. It was opened July 9th and 13th, by the Rev. Wm. Sanderson and the Rev. Wallis Andrew. The cost of the chapel will be a little under £100, towards which we have given and begged more than £40, besides all the leading. Some of the friends of the place came forward liberally to help us in this important undertaking: Mr. Geo. Moody, £5; Mr. Wm. Nelson, £5; Mr. J. Horbery, £5; but we feel ourselves the most indebted to Mr. Robt. R. Gravener, who not only allowed us the very beautiful site, but otherwise rendered us assistance. We have borrowed on a note £60 at 4½ per cent. I may also add it is the intention of the friends immediately to commence in the chapel a Sabbath School.

T. RATCLIFFE.

OBITUARY.

1. MARGARET BELL was born at Wellington, near Newcastle-on-Tyne, on the 1st of April, 1829. Her parents always felt an earnest desire for the eternal welfare of their children, and in their childhood instructed them in the principles of religion, led them to the sanctuary, and oftentimes prayed to God on their behalf: which means were afterwards proved to have been not in vain. From her youth up Margaret seemed to be the subject of good desires, and not unfrequently she made them known to her friends, and one time particularly to her sister Jane. While she was in this state of mind, it pleased the Almighty to call her father home to his reward, which roused her to a greater earnestness about her soul's eternal welfare. In a prayer meeting held at sister Ann Smith's, while singing that beautiful hymn, which was a great favourite of her father's—

"O God, our help in ages past,
Our hope for years to come;
Our shelter from the stormy blast;
And our eternal home" :—

she exercised faith in the promises of God, and realized the blessing of justification. She then felt a joy unspeakable and full of glory. She was a consistent and respected member of our society about three years. She loved her class and attended its meetings whenever she was able. When visited by brother John Dixon, her leader, she was always found resigned to the will of God, even when disease was making rapid progress, for she desired

"a better country, which is a heavenly." Often she desired her sister Jane to read to her the sacred Scriptures, from which she derived great comfort; and when she felt herself fast approaching the dark valley she prayed fervently for her friends, her husband, and her three little ones, and expressed her desire that they might meet her in heaven. She fell asleep in Jesus, Tuesday, February 25, 1862, in the thirty-third year of her age. May we follow her as she followed Christ.

R. R. PRUDHOE.

2. JAMES BROWN was born in the parish of Ramsbury, in the Newbury Circuit, in 1790, and was suddenly removed from this vale of tears, March 8th, 1862. Previous to his conversion he was a subject of a multiplicity of troubles. On one occasion he was bereaved of two of his children in one week. Some time subsequently to this of two more, who in the morning left home in good health, and in twenty-four hours had exchanged time for eternity. Also in less than a month another was taken. Through these bereavements, together with other trials, our brother was led to see his sinful and dangerous state, but he put off the important work of seeking the Lord till the year 1853, when he became one of the first-fruits of a very extensive revival which took place at Witcha, where he was then residing. Having dedicated himself to the Lord, he at once united with the Primitive Methodists, who had been the means of his conversion ; and by his consistent conduct and regularity at the means of grace, he did honour to the cause he had espoused. He continued a useful member with the people of his choice until death. Although he passed through deep waters he knew nothing of those painful sensations which are usually associated with a protracted affliction, for in the morning of the day on which he died, he left home apparently healthy both in body and soul, and at half-past 1 o'clock, while at his work, he suddenly fell upon the ground and expired. But he was ready, and therefore death to him was gain, great gain, eternal gain. "Blessed are the dead which die in the Lord, from henceforth ; yea, saith the Spirit, that they may rest from their labours, and their works do follow them."

G. BLACKWELL.

3. Died at Ashill, Brandon Circuit, March the 10th, 1862, Mary GARNER, in the twenty-fourth year of her age. Her parents being devoted Christians, she had the advantage of a religious training. Hence in her unsaved state she maintained those external proprieties, which are commonly designated morality. But she found that in that state she was neither acceptable to God, nor fit for heaven.

However, she realised a happy change at a protracted meeting at Walton, about six years ago ; and from that time, until her death, she exhibited the sweetness and amiability of the young Christian. Without parade or ostentation, by her steady piety and quiet spirit she was endeared to all.

Her attachment to the ministers of Christ was very strong ; she was never more in her element than when in their company ; she "esteemed them very highly in love, for their work's sake." She was a plodding, diligent and successful missionary collector ; our missionary revenue at Ashill this year, was considerably deficient, on account of her lack of service. The affliction which terminated her mortal existence was consumption ; her sufferings at times were very acute, but she was very patient and resigned, and in the midst of the fires often sang,

"My Jesus to know, and feel his blood flow,
'Tis life everlasting, 'tis heaven below."

While lingering on the border land of the heavenly Canaan she often wished her friends to sing,

"On Jordan's stormy banks I stand."

On the day above mentioned she crossed the river, and entered her eternal rest.

O. JACKSON.

POETRY.

EVENING HYMNS.

1.—C. M.

BEHOLD the western evening-light !

It melts in deepening gloom ;
So calmly Christians sink away,
Descending to the tomb.

The winds breathe low ; the withering
Scarce whispers from the tree ; [leaf
So gently flows the parting breath,
When good men cease to be.

How beautiful on all the hills
The crimson light is shed !
'Tis like the peace the Christian gives
To mourners round his bed.

How mildly on the wandering cloud
The sunset beam is cast !
'Tis like the memory left behind,
When loved ones breathe their last.

And now, above the dews of night,
The golden star appears ;
As faith, which springeth in the heart,
While eyes are wet with tears.

2.—6 lines 8's.

At evening-time let there be light !
Life's little day draws near its close ;
Around us fall the shades of night,
The night of death, the grave's repose,
To crown my joys, to end my woes ;—
At evening-time let there be light !

At evening-time let there be light !
Stormy and dark has been my day,
Yet rose the morn divinely bright, [way :
Dews, buds, and blossoms cheered the
O for one sweet, one parting ray !
At evening-time let there be light !

At evening-time there shall be light !
For God hath spoken ; it must be :—
Fear, doubt, and anguish take their flight ;
His glory now is risen on me ;
Mine eyes shall His salvation see :—
'Tis evening-time, and there is light !

From Hiff's Evening Hymns.

John Hollingsworth

PERF. 1897

Engraved by H. H. B. from a Photograph

Digitized by Google

THE Primitive Methodist Magazine.

---

DECEMBER, 1862.

---

B I O G R A P H Y.

---

ROBERT LANGHAM.

1. ROBERT LANGHAM was born at Leicester, on the 7th day of August, 1812. His parents were poor, but honest and industrious. For many years his father followed the profession of a soldier, and was at the celebrated battle of Waterloo. Soon after this battle he met with an accident, which so far disabled him that he received his discharge, and went to reside at the village of Wigston, near Leicester. He was a stranger to renewing grace until near the close of his life. Of his mother I have been informed it is difficult to speak too highly. She was a Christian in the fullest sense of the word. For many years she was a member of our society, and made a home for the travelling and local preachers. Her highest ambition was to train up her children for the service of God; and her efforts were rewarded by the gratification of seeing two of her sons in the Christian ministry, one of whom is a missionary in one of the Australian Colonies.

We know little of the early history of our deceased brother; so far, however, as we have become acquainted with it, there does not appear anything sufficiently remarkable to need recording here. About the year 1829, there was an unusual excitement on the subject of religion in the neighbourhood of Leicester, and one of those great revivals took place, for which our Connexion has been celebrated. Robert, along with others, went to see and hear what was going on, and was seized with an extraordinary conviction for sin. Such was his mental anguish that I have heard him say he lost his natural sight for a few minutes, and was utterly unconscious of all outward things. He had great pleasure, all through life, in dwelling upon the scenes that were witnessed at his conversion. Sobs and groans and shouts were heard, an intense feeling spread from heart to heart; a most exciting scene was beheld.

Our brother who, under strong feeling, fell to the floor, felt his burden to loosen, and roll off at the sight of the cross, rose, wiped his eyes, and bore testimony that he beheld the "Lamb of God which taketh away the sin of the world." He returned home a "new creature," and with a bounding heart told the good tidings to his family. An opportunity was soon given for those who were converted at the revival meetings to join the Church; timid and weeping Robert went forward to present himself for admission. The circumstance was soon forgotten no doubt by all but himself, or thought of as a matter of little importance; but it was a step of immense importance to him.

VOL XX. THIRD SERIES.

No sooner had he joined the society than he attracted attention by his punctuality, diligence, progress, and sweetness of disposition. The class-meeting, the prayer meeting, the public assembly of the saints, seldom missed his presence, or the rich cadence of his animating voice.

Our brother soon began to exercise his humble talent. Having entered that vineyard which is a vast field of industry, he sought out opportunities for doing good. He first took the charge of a class, then became an exhorter, and was soon raised to the list of local preachers. His stable conduct, together with his progressive knowledge and grace soon qualified him, in the opinion of the Church, for a more extensive sphere of labour. A supply being wanted in the Welton Circuit, he was recommended by the Leicester Quarterly Meeting, as a proper person to fill the vacancy. He went, God blessed his labours, and there he spent the first two years of his ministry. His next appointments were at Halifax, and the Settle Mission. From the latter place he removed to Horncastle, and after labouring there one year, he entered into the marriage state with Miss Alice Heathcote, of Wigston. This was a happy union. His partner was a deeply pious woman, accustomed occasionally to speak in public, and in all respects qualified to assist him in the subordinate parts of his duty. She was, as the Scriptures state of a good wife, "a crown of glory to her husband." His subsequent appointments were at Bridlington, Hornsea, Brigg, Pocklington, Epworth, Retford, Hornsea, (second time), Bridlington, (second time,) Alford, Winterton, Barton, and Patrington. He was a travelling preacher twenty-seven years, and a superintendent seventeen years. As far as we can ascertain, he built chapels at the following places: Wellow, Edwinstow, Spilsby, Aldborough, New Holland, Hollym, and Humbleton.

As a preacher our brother was always well received, and in some places even popular. His gift in prayer was far above the ordinary standard. He has frequently been heard to pour out his soul in prayer to God for a considerable time together in such a manner that it was evident to all that, "the Spirit helped his infirmities," with desires, if not with groanings, that were unutterable. His understanding was not above the common level of mankind. He was not a man of inventive genius. Timid in speculation, and cautious in action, had he lived to the age of threescore years and ten, he might not have brought forth any new measure. As a public speaker he wanted wealth of imagery and terseness of expression. He felt not the baptism which floats the soul on a full stream of overwhelming thought. Yet he possessed a considerable share of ready wit, which evinced itself in appropriate replies when attacked by gainsayers. His style was plain and unpolished. He never attended to the niceties of language, nor did he, perhaps, devote sufficient attention to this branch of learning, so important to a preacher, and to all public speakers.

He was fond of street preaching and home mission work, for which he was eminently qualified. He was a pastor as well as a preacher; and perhaps his most useful labour was "going about," like Jesus, "doing good," instructing the ignorant, recovering the wandering, animating the sluggish, strengthening weak hands, confirming feeble knees, ministering like a cherub at the couch of affliction, or whispering consolation into the ears of the dying. There are those who can make pastoral visits very well, but who lose the ministerial character in their social intercourse. Not so with our deceased brother. At the fire-side he shone; without affectation, without arrogance, without obtrusiveness, he poured a gentle silver stream of thought through all the fields of conversation, and turned everything around him to the advantage of religion. In this work of pastoral visitation his labours on many of the stations were very considerable, especially on the Settle Mission. Indeed, on all his stations he was enabled by grace, to discharge the duties which devolved upon him with great acceptability and usefulness.

It was his great ambition to win souls to Christ. Often have I seen his eyes sparkle with delight, whilst telling of blessed meetings in his circuit, and this was especially the case whenever he had reason to believe that some sinner had been converted to God. His favourite theme was the atonement. This gave animation to his hopes, fire to his tongue, harmony to his doctrines, and efficiency to his labours. His favourite books were the Bible and Dr. Clarke's Commentary. His favourite refreshment was prayer. To this he devoted his first moments after he rose from bed, and at frequent intervals during the day he retired for closet devotion. His family prayers were marked by all the fervour and energy of his more public ministrations. Indeed, earnestness marked all his labours, whether in private or in public, praying at the altar, preaching in the chapel, or in the open air. Love animated and sustained him; so that his zeal was tempered with sweetness, his firmness with mildness, his courage with tenderness, and his godly daring with a most subduing affection, as if, like his Master, he would "draw all men unto him."

He was not adapted to controversy. I will not say, that he was unprepared to meet an enemy: he could overcome when argument, wit, and irony, would have been of little avail; he could charm the foe away by his spirit, or burn him out by his prayers, or flood him out by his tears. In the execution of discipline, brother Langham was at once merciful and faithful. He sought to cure not to kill ; but he had not that false tenderness which refuses to separate the dead from the living.

Of his inner life I can speak with some confidence, for I was on terms of intimacy with him for fourteen years. Genuine piety was prominent in his deportment ; his religion was not in word nor in tongue only, but consisted in love, out of a pure heart, faith unfeigned, and a good conscience. His piety was no less deep than genuine. He followed on to know the Lord in the fulness of his grace, and the exceeding richness of his power. He had humble views of himself, and all his efforts ; indeed, so low were his views of all his performances and attainments, that enmity and malignity combined, could scarcely have placed him lower than he placed himself. A stranger to self-applause, and seeking only the honour that cometh from God, his rejoicing was the testimony of a good conscience.

He was honest. Of him we might say,

“ His words are bonds—his oaths are oracles,
His love sincere.”

He was ready to promote your interest, or defend your honour at the hazard of his own. He had much of that long-suffering which is required alike by Christianity and common sense. His intercourse with his friends was rarely interrupted or embittered. His friendship was sanctified. He received a friend as a boon from heaven, and prayed for increased benediction on his soul. He was given to hospitality as far as his scanty means would allow. He was never forgetful to entertain strangers, as many of my brethren can testify. Our quarterly meetings, annual assemblies, missionary gatherings, &c., bringing together large numbers of friends, have taught us hospitality. It exists among us, however, in different degrees. There are also different modes as well as degrees of hospitality. Brother Langham belonged to that class who receive you with a heart as if his house were as large as all out-of-doors. His benevolence knew no limits but his ability. His resources were expended as fast as they were received, and he died very poor. When he felt that he was approaching the verge of the grave, the sight of his wife and children, whom he so tenderly loved, and whom he was about to leave with no very bright worldly prospect, sometimes induced painful feelings, but these were soon banished by the recollection of some sweet promise of Scripture, and a view of God's tender relation to the fatherless and the widow.

It would be wrong to say that our brother was without faults, nor is it the intention of the writer to hold him up as an example of perfection. Of his imperfections he was deeply conscious, and like all good men he frequently mourned on account of them. But whatever his failings might be, his brethren believed him to be sincere and upright, aiming to glorify God, and promote the salvation of men. It may be said of him,

“But e'en his failings leaned to virtue's side.”

Firm in friendship, judicious in counsel, zealous in effort, full of faith and good works, he has been taken away in the midst of his years and usefulness, to adorn the heavenly Paradise, and blossom and bear fruit in a kindlier clime.

A little over two years ago he was seized with a stroke of paralysis, which incapacitated him for taking the work of a travelling preacher. At the Conference of 1861 he was superannuated, and went to reside at Hull, where much Christian sympathy was shown him by his brother ministers, and the members of the society. His affliction was long and peculiarly painful, but was borne with Christian fortitude and submission. Towards the close of life his speech was so much affected that it was difficult for him to articulate, which deprived him of the holy privilege of reading the Scriptures and praying with his family. At such times he entered fully into the spirit of worship, and the tears would appear glistening in his eyes or rolling down his cheeks. In all his affliction he never lost his interest in the cause of God. Such was his love for the “gates of Zion,” that when he could no longer walk, he was borne thither by his friends. At times his memory seemed to fail, but even then his talk was about the prosperity of the Church, thus shewing that he preferred the cause of God to anything else. The whole of the day before his death, he was in an ecstasy of joy. His whole soul seemed to bound away even before the hour of its departure. Heaven was ready for him, and he was ready for it. He had long been “beyond the valley of the shadow of death, out of the reach of Giant Despair, where he could no longer see Doubting Castle.” And now with rejoicing he was waiting for Israel's chariot and horses to convey him home.

On the 15th day of April, 1862, he was seized with another stroke of paralysis, which deprived him of all consciousness, and removed him, on the same day, to his Father's house, where no pain, nor even the fear of pain, is ever felt. His mortal remains were interred in a humble grave in the Hull cemetery; a spot endeared to Primitive Methodism by many reminiscences. There rest the ashes of Clowes, and a host beside, whose virtues and services are embalmed in the hearts of hundreds. The funeral sermon of our deceased brother was preached by the Rev. Henry Woodcock, in Clowes Chapel, Hull, on Sunday evening, May the 4th, to a crowded audience, where, we have reason to believe, good was done. Our prayer is that the mourning widow and fatherless children may be sustained by God's grace in their deep affliction and loss, and that they with us may meet the departed in a higher sphere where

"No parted friends
O'er mournful recollections have to weep,
No bed of death enduring love attends,
To watch the coming of a pulseless sleep.

No withered flower,
Or blasted bud, celestial gardens know !
No scorching blast, or fierce descending shower,
Scatters destruction like a ruthless foe.

No battle-word
Startles the sacred host with fear and dread !
The song of peace, creation's morning heard,
Is sung wherever angel footsteps tread !"

R. CHEESEMAN.

---

2. MARY HALL BARNES was born April 15th, 1806, at King's Lynn, and died March 18th, 1862, at St. Ives, Hunts. At the age of sixteen she was arrested in her course to perdition, under the ministry of the Rev. J. Oscroft, one of the first Primitive Methodist missionaries to King's Lynn. Having embraced the truth as it is in Jesus, she availed herself of the earliest opportunity of uniting with the people who, under God, had been the means of her salvation. She became a member of the first class that was formed in Lynn. She commenced a course of piety and usefulness seldom found in a person so young ; the love of God was manifested in all her conduct. She devoted herself to the cultivation of personal religion, and then recommended it to others by an expression of it in her own life. She and her sister were the first teachers in the Primitive Methodist Sabbath School at Lynn. Her name was put on the local preachers' plan, and she was zealous in the discharge of her duties. She was well instructed in the things pertaining to the kingdom of God, and enjoyed much of the Spirit's influence, and followed in the footsteps of her divine Master. The spread of religion was a subject that lay on her heart, and everything that contributed to man's happiness and the glory of God was highly interesting to her. She was well acquainted with the mystery of faith, and knew the benefit thereof in the hour of spiritual conflict. She was made useful in bringing many souls to Christ. She had a good knowledge of the Scriptures, and her appeals were earnest, affectionate, and powerful. Her religion taught her to weep with them that weep, and to rejoice with them that do rejoice. For many years she was a class-leader. Her attendance at the means of grace, when circumstances would allow, was punctual ; the house of God and the services connected therewith were her delight, and she would often sing,—

"Fix'd on this ground will I remain," &c.

As a member of the Primitive Methodist Connexion, she was a true lover of its doctrines, possessed a deep interest in its welfare, and in connection with her husband, who is a local preacher and class-leader, she studied to promote its interests in every possible way. She was a great comfort to her husband in the hour of trial, and never allowed him to neglect his appointments, but often said "Go, and the Lord go with you; the more you work for God, the more God will do for us and our children!"

As a wife, she was faithful and industrious; as a mother she was tender and affectionate, and took a deep interest in the salvation of her children. During the last few years of her life, she was so enfeebled by disease that she was quite unable to preach; but she continued to attend the means of grace as often as she could, and she greatly enjoyed them. About two months before her decease, the disease under which she had been labouring, became alarming, and soon baffled the skill of her medical attendants. But, notwithstanding, she was composed, and frequently exulted in the God of her salvation. When she was told that no hopes could be entertained of her recovery, she said, "Well, it is all right; I am in the hands of the Lord." At another time she said to her husband, "The Rock on which I build is firm; I have no fear of death;" and a short time after she fell asleep in Jesus. May her husband and family meet her in heaven.

THOS. D. BARNES.

---

3. ROBERT MANNING, the subject of the following sketch, was born at Westbrook, Somersetshire, February 22nd, 1799, of God-fearing parents, with whom he lived until he was about seventeen years of age. At that time, weary of parental restraint, he left home to obtain his living in the best way he could; but being disappointed in some of his plans, he enlisted into the army, and in the month of January, 1820, embarked for the East Indies.

He had not been long at sea before he was deeply convinced of the sinfulness of his past life. The advice of his parents, the parting scene with his pious mother, and the many privileges he had abused, all rushed into his mind, and filled him with remorse and shame. He says: "Nothing but death stared me in the face. I feared that I should die on the voyage, or that the ship might be lost; and I looked forward for nothing but banishment from God." During the voyage the vessel had to encounter a severe storm, in the midst of which Robert observed one soldier who was quite composed. He asked him how it was he was so calm under such appalling circumstances, and was answered in the language of the apostle, "I know in whom I have believed." Our friend now resolved to make this man his companion, for he had something in possession of which he was ignorant, but which he earnestly desired to obtain.

On their arrival in the East, they went to the house of God together; but still Robert remained destitute of a knowledge of salvation through faith in Christ. He was about this time visited with severe affliction, and had to be in the hospital many weeks, during which his mental suffering exceeded his bodily affliction. On his recovery, he found none in the barrack-room who knew anything about religion, his former companion having been removed to another place. At length, a corporal called him aside, spoke to him on the importance of seeking salvation, and advised him to join one of the religious societies which existed in the regiment. He says: "It rejoiced my heart to find that Christ had a Church and people in this land of heathenism and pollution."

Much of his time was now spent in reading and prayer; still he was not happy. He had exalted views of God, but he was not able to rejoice in Him, and eventually he gave up all hope of being saved. He was still, however, exhorted to look to Christ for salvation, and to believe and be saved through Him: but he could not see the way of salvation through faith. He now left the company of those who met together to worship God, and took his walks alone to meditate on his state. His soul was filled with distress when he heard the people beginning their services by singing the praises of God. He thought "These are the people of God, and here am I, a poor wretched sinner, an heir of hell. Is there no balm in Gilead, is there no Physician there? Is there no way for me to escape the damnation of hell?" It was now the Word of God was applied to his mind by the Holy Spirit, "Look unto me and be ye saved;" and "Him that cometh unto Me I will in no wise cast out." He came to Christ with all his sins, the blood was applied, pardon was obtained, and his soul was filled with joy in the Holy Ghost. His joy was so great that he could not keep it to himself; he went and told the people of God what the Lord had done for him, and they rejoiced together. For twenty-one years, through many trials, the Lord preserved him in India. About seventeen years ago, he became acquainted with our people in Jersey, where he joined the society. From there he removed to St. Austell, in Cornwall, where he became a great help to the cause. He also laboured for a little while as a local preacher in the Pillawell Circuit. Providence leading the way, he came to reside at Brynmaur, in the Tredegar Circuit. He was put on the plan, and laboured with acceptance as a local preacher.

His abilities were above the common order. He was punctual in attending his appointments, and peaceable in his conduct. The last time he preached he took for his text "Godliness is profitable unto all things, having the promise of the life that now is, and of that which is to come." After the morning service, he felt unwell, and returned home; his affliction increased, and after nine days of severe pain, he died in full hope of a glorious immortality. He died at Brynmaur, April 14th, 1862, in the sixty-third year of his age.

N. BROADWAY.

4. MR. RICHARD DODSWORTH, of Hull Second Circuit, was born at Willerby, in the parish of Kirk Ella, near Hull, December 11th, 1805. It was his privilege to have pious and industrious parents. John Dodsworth, his venerable father, was a man of stern integrity, of manly virtue, and of great moral excellency. His mother was an amiable and pious woman, as distinguished by feminine graces as her excellent husband was by masculine virtues and noble uprightness of conduct. For many years, they welcomed to their hospitable abode the Primitive Methodist preachers, and took a hallowed pleasure in ministering to their necessity and comfort, and in co-operating with them in their zealous efforts to spread evangelical religion in the village where they resided. They consistently and piously sought to bring up their numerous children in the fear of God, and in the practice of whatsoever things are lovely and of good report; and they had the satisfaction of seeing several of them made partakers of divine grace, and occupying positions of usefulness and honour in the denomination of their choice. Gregory, their eldest son, has long been an acceptable local preacher; Jeremiah, the well-known author of "The Better Land," and "The Eden Family," is a highly esteemed and successful minister of our community; their two daughters are consistent members of the same church, and wives of useful local preachers; and Richard, the subject of this sketch, the first of their children who has finished his earthly course, filled several offices in our denomination with much credit to himself, and to the great satisfaction and benefit of all concerned.

But notwithstanding his godly parentage and his religious training, Richard did not early become a partaker of renewing grace. At eleven years of age he went out into farmer's service, and having therein but few or no helps to a religious life, he grew up in neglect of divine things, and continued in an unregenerate state till thirty years of age. How large a portion of human life to be spent in vain, and worse than in vain! With what humiliation and regret did our brother afterwards review this godless period of his history! Happy for him that he at length became decided to give his heart to God, and to consecrate himself to the Saviour's service. Though prejudiced against the Primitive Methodists, on account of their loud responses in public prayer, and their lively mode of worship, he was brought to God under their instrumentality. On Sunday evening, December 13th, 1835, exactly thirty years and two days from the date of his natural birth, he was deeply affected under a sermon preached by the late Thomas Holliday, in West Street chapel, and remained at the prayer meeting afterwards, where he penitently sought pardoning mercy, and while Mr. Charles Bowman and others were praying with him, and pointing him to the only Saviour, he believed on Christ with his heart unto righteousness, and was made happy in the forgiving love of God. He, however, was unusually quiet and silent on the deeply interesting occasion, and immediately afterwards left the room without speaking to any one, the time having arrived for him to be at the house of his master. His quiet conversion was, however, a genuine one, and was proved to be such by corresponding fruits.

He henceforward maintained his integrity, acquired increasing knowledge of divine things, and giving promise of usefulness in the church, the initials of his name were placed upon the preachers' plan about a year after his conversion, and he began publicly to call sinners to repentance. Proving acceptable and useful, he was shortly afterwards raised to the status of an approved local preacher. He had subsequently the inestimable privilege of being associated with the late venerable W. Clowes, being his assistant leader for the space of eight years. From this association he acquired valuable religious knowledge, intimate acquaintance with the deep things of God, and much spiritual profit. But at the death of the late pious and excellent John Wallis, he became the leader of his class, and retained the office of class-leader to the close of life.

At the age of thirty-five years he entered into the married state with her who is now his mourning widow, and became one of the best of husbands. Their domestic circle was a peaceful and happy one, and their children were early taught the fear of God. If not placed in affluent circumstances, they were in possession of "godliness with contentment (which) is great gain." While health permitted, Brother Dodsworth discharged the duties of a local preacher and leader with acceptance and success. He took great interest in the erection of Jarratt Street chapel, of which he was a trustee, and rendered all the assistance towards it which lay in his power. About eight years ago he was afflicted with bronchitis, which soon afterwards became chronic. This wholly incapacitated him for public speaking, and, during the winter season, frequently unfitted him for following his employment for months together. His kind master, however, with praiseworthy generosity, which reflected great credit both on master and servant, invariably paid him his accustomed wages, as if he had been regularly in the warehouse.

During the three years in which I laboured in the circuit, he was the society steward in connection with Clowes' Chapel, the treasurer of the trustees, and the leader of a class; and as he was long afflicted during each winter, I had frequent occasions of seeing him, and good opportunities of forming an accurate estimate of his mental and moral character; and I may say, without fear of contradiction, that he had a clear understanding, a sound judgment, a good knowledge of theology, unusually accurate views of the way of salvation, a correct habit of expressing his sentiments, and a manly independence of thought and feeling. He was a man of upright principles, of unswerving integrity, and of consistent deportment. He cultivated the spirit of prayer in more than an ordinary degree; he diligently attended his religious duties in the closet, the family, and in the public assembly; he discharged the duties of his respective offices with fidelity, punctuality, and uniform prudence and discretion. In meetings of church business, he pursued a pure and upright course, seeking especially to promote the spirituality and usefulness of the society, and he might be properly considered as a pillar of the church to which he belonged.

As to his natural temperament, he probably inherited more of his father's distinguishing properties than those of his beloved mother. He was more remarkable for masculine virtues than for feminine graces. He was possessed of strong sense, and sometimes expressed himself in strong language, which might occasionally give pain to some who differed from in judgment; but the purity of his motives and the uprightness of his intentions could not be reasonably called in question.

And as his Christian course was consistent and upright, his death was dignified, glorious, and triumphant. It presented a grand and ennobling view of vital Christianity, and its ability to support and bless the soul in the prospect of eternity. On the 29th of April last, I received a message from him, conveying the intelligence of his severe illness, and a request for me to visit him. I visited him in the evening, and found him apparently near death, extremely feeble, with difficulty able to speak at all; but calm, self-possessed, exercising an unshaken confidence in the redeeming work of Christ, perfectly resigned to the Divine will, and peacefully waiting for the coming of his Lord. In prayer we had much nearness of access to God, and heavenly influence copiously descended. Next evening I visited him again. Several relatives and friends were in the room, and he was bolstered up in bed, conversing somewhat freely, much to my surprise. He was calmly arranging for his funeral, chiefly with a view to economy, for the sake of his family. When I entered into converse with him on the state of his mind, I found him in a most delightful and triumphant frame. His soul exulted in God his Saviour. He knew that he was dying, and while intensely interested in the welfare of his family and friends, he was rejoicing with exceeding joy in the prospect of speedily being with the Lord. To all my questions he replied with more than his wonted decision and unction. When I proposed prayer, he was anxious for all his family to be called up, apparently judging that that would be the last opportunity they would have of meeting together at the mercy-seat. As I prayed for him, and for his wife and his family, he took hold of the Lord by strong faith, responded with surprising fervour to my petitions, and the glory of God seemed to fill the room. Perceiving a relative present who had not come to decision to be on the Lord's side, I next began to pray for him, when Richard said, with much emphasis, "Two." I then prayed for the two, and he responded with such power that both of them sobbed aloud, and will not, I trust, forget what they felt on that solemn and deeply affecting occasion. I soon afterwards bade the dying saint farewell, and, in company with Mr. Henry Hodge, left the room,—a room full of glory and of God.

A few hours more, and the conflict ended; the battle was fought, and the victory won. About midnight he said to his weeping wife, "Hannah, I am going to leave thee, and thou art going to have a better Husband, and my children a better Father. Thy Maker is thine Husband, the Lord of Hosts is His Name. Bless Him! And Thy Redeemer, the Holy One of Israel, the God of the whole earth shall He be called. Glory be to God!" As she could not refrain from weeping, he encouraged her to put her trust in the Lord, and exhorted her to maintain domestic discipline, and keep up the altar of God in the household, repeating, "Leave thy fatherless children, and I will preserve them alive, and let Thy widows trust in Me." About an hour and a half before he died, he exclaimed, "My flesh and my heart fail, but God is the strength of my heart, and my portion for ever." Sometime afterwards he requested his brother Gregory to sing some verses of Wesley's hymns, and gave out himself,—

"Would Jesus have the sinner die?" &c.

When this was sung, he started another, though he could not proceed,

"Now I have found the ground wherein Sure my soul's anchor may remain."

And while his brother sang it, he kept waving his hand, betokening his agreement with the evangelical sentiments and pious feeling of the noble verses. He was perfectly intelligent to the last, and when unable to speak, was evidently holding sweet communion with his God and Saviour. A little after two o'clock in the morning of May 1st, 1862, he gently fell asleep in Jesus, aged fifty-six years. He was interred in the General Cemetery at Hull, near the resting-place of the mortal remains of the venerable Clowes and several others of our friends.

JOHN PETTY.

---

5. Died in the Foxhill Bank Station, May 19th, 1862, ROBERT BRIGES, in the full assurance of a glorious resurrection. His parents were not professors of religion, but he was sent by them, when very young, to our Sabbath-school at Foxhill Grove chapel. It was at a missionary anniversary that he was convinced that he was a sinner, and that without an interest in Christ he would be excluded from heaven. Brother Peet was the agent God employed to effect this good work. From that time Robert sought the Saviour with all his heart, and did not rest until he had obtained redemption through the blood of Christ, the forgiveness of all his sins. He immediately united with the people who had by God's blessing been the means of conducting him to the Saviour. His conduct was such as becometh the Gospel of Christ : he was as a city set on a hill, that cannot be hid. His way opened in the Church for being useful, and he was appointed to be a class-leader ; and this office he filled with fidelity for about thirteen years.

His regular attendance on the means of grace had a beneficial influence on the members of society. But while engaged in His Master's work, his soul imbued with Divine love, and having a cheering prospect of usefulness before him, he was laid aside through affliction. His affliction was protracted and severe, but he bore it with the utmost resignation. He constantly exercised an humble trust on the merits of the atonement. He delighted to speak of the glorious doctrines of the Gospel, and of the hope of immortality that was blooming within him. He had the abiding witness that when the earthly house of his tabernacle should be dissolved, he had a building of God, a house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens.

He was enabled frequently to say, " I have no great ecstasy of soul, but I possess a solid peace. I have confidence in the blood of Christ. He is my foundation and rock. ' He that hath the Son hath life.' " The language of St. Paul was in an eminent degree the language of his soul : " I know in whom I have believed, and am persuaded that He is able to keep that which I have committed to Him, until that day." On the last Sabbath that he was an inhabitant of this world, I enjoyed the pleasure of visiting him before I went to the evening service ; his breathing was most oppressive, his pain excruciating, and it was obvious he was on the verge of eternity ; but he murmured not. Patience had her perfect work, and as every hope of recovering had vanished, I inquired of him if all was right for eternity. His reply was, " All is right." I then knelt down and prayed with him, and he seemed, while we were engaged in prayer, to be composed, and to enter into the true spirit of the exercise ; a Divine influence rested upon all present. And as he neared death and eternity, death proved to him a harmless foe ; and as eternity opened before him, his prospect became brighter. The everlasting arms were underneath him. The silver cord was anon loosed, and he peacefully entered into rest, in the thirty-ninth year of his age, having been a member of our society about twenty-two years. He has left an affectionate and sorrowing widow. May she meet him in heaven ! Amen.

STEPHENSON STOBBS.

---

6. ISAAC DOWSON, of Harwood, in the Barnard Castle station, departed this life in the peace of the Gospel, May 27th, 1862, in the thirty-third year of his age. In early life he not only manifested a bias to evil, but plunged into the greatest depth of wickedness. In his fifteenth year he became the subject of the enlightening and renewing grace of the Gospel ; but ere long, through unwatchfulness, he lost the pearl of great price, and lived in a state of declension, until the year 1851, when in a service, conducted by Brother J. Jobling, he was restored to the joy of God's salvation, and became a steady and consistent member of society, adorning his Christian profession by walking in all the commandments and ordinances of the Lord blameless. He was a local preacher for ten years ; his abilities were not great, but his services were, nevertheless, always acceptable and profitable. He was of a warm temperament, and being under the influence of Divine grace, his preaching was lively and pathetic, moving his audience in many cases to tears.

His affliction, prior to his death, was severe and protracted ; but he realized the sufficiency of Divine grace to uphold him. At one time he was powerfully tempted to believe that he would be lost ; but he discovered the temptation to be a suggestion of Satan, and resisted it by faith in Christ, and felt that he was a conqueror. During the earlier part of the time of his affliction he was filled with peace and joy ; but as death drew near this high state of feeling left him, though still he enjoyed a firm confidence that all was well. A few weeks before his death, his medical attendant informed him that he might die at any time. A friend called to visit him, to whom he communicated the statement of the doctor, and said that he was quite prepared, that he knew that he was saved. During his sufferings and death he was graciously sustained by the comfort of religion, and enabled to bear testimony that Christ was his Saviour. Thus he died, leaving a wife and two children to lament their loss. May they meet him in their Father's house above !

H. PRATT.

7. SALLY BUCKLEY was born October 23rd, 1813. In the morning of life she paid little regard to the religion of the Bible. Like many more she was carried away by the emptiness of the world. But in the forty-second year of her age the Spirit of God convinced her of her sinful state ; she clearly saw that without a change of heart she could not enter into the kingdom of God. Hence she fled to Christ, and found peace through the blood of the everlasting covenant. The change produced by the power of the Holy Ghost was evinced by her personal piety and devotedness to God. She took a pleasure in attending the sanctuary and the ordinances of religion. A smile often sat on her countenance while she listened to the ambassadors of Christ deliver their message of salvation to guilty men. When the preaching service was concluded on the Sabbath evenings, she delighted to mingle with her brethren and sisters in the prayer meeting. Some time ago a revival of religion broke out amongst many of the young men and women in the locality of Cumberworth, in the Clayton West Circuit. Sally being a pious zealous devoted mother in Israel was made choice of as a leader to give instruction and counsel to the young. She sustained the office up to the time of her death.

The day before she died the writer called to see her, and found her calmly relying on the faithfulness of her Saviour. One of her daughters said, "She does not know you; she takes no notice! her memory is almost gone." I said to her "Do you know Jesus?" "Yes, bless Him; thank Him," she exclaimed. I said, "You are in the hands of a wise Governor, who will do right. Your affliction is for some wise purpose." "Oh bless Him, it's all right! it's all right," she said. After commending her to the mercy of God, I left her, thinking the Church could not well spare her yet. But God's thoughts are not as men's thoughts. He knows the best what to do with His people, and when to remove them to heaven. She died in peace, June 3rd, 1862.

She was a dutiful wife, an affectionate mother, a good Christian. She lived to see some of her children brought to a saving knowledge of the truth. O may the rest of them prepare to meet her in heaven!

J. BALDWIN.

---

8. SUSANNAH TURNER, of Yerton Heath, was born at Shawbury, in the Hadnall Circuit, in the year 1790, and died at Shawbury Heath, on the 3rd of June, 1862. Her first religious impressions, according to her own statement, were received from the instructions of her mother, who died when Susannah was only fifteen years old; and the impressions never left her. Early in life she became a member with the Independents at the Clive, but remained a stranger to saving grace until the year 1823. At this time the Primitive Methodist Missionaries visited the Clive, and its vicinity, and our departed sister was among their hearers; and while listening to Mr. Archer, she was fully awakened to a sense of her danger. With tears and earnestness of soul, she sought mercy through Christ Jesus, and in a short time, when in her own house, God manifested Himself unto her in an extraordinary manner. She was the first fruits of the Connexion's labour in what is now the Hadnall station; she became a member and local preacher, and continued one of its brightest ornaments until her death.

Early in life, and indeed through the greater part of it, her struggles, trials, and toils were many and great. When about twenty years of age she was united in marriage to Richard Clay, who subsequently became much addicted to drinking, in consequence of which, together with having a large family, they were frequently reduced to great straits, and were finally compelled to remove to Weston Heath, in the Prees Green Circuit. Here our sister was principally employed in a laundry, which, in connection with her domestic duties, required her to toil early and late. Her anxiety for the spiritual welfare of her family was great, nor did she labour and hope in vain, for she had the pleasure of seeing her husband converted; and after serving the Lord a few years he died in peace, in the year 1842. She used to say that his salvation alone amply repaid her for all her poverty, toil, and sorrow.

Having remained in widowhood a few years, she re-entered the marriage state with Richard Turner, a member of the Primitive Methodist Connexion, who afterwards became a local preacher and a temperance advocate. On account of her husband's refusal to attend the services of the Parish Church they had to leave their cottage, which was a severe trial to her. They then returned to this station, and became residents at Yorton Heath, where, in the course of a few years, and after a long illness, her second husband died. She had now buried two husbands, and four children; thus to poverty and toil was added bereavement, but she knew who did it, and was able to say, "He hath done all things well."

Her removal from our midst was rather sudden. Having a few days at leisure, she went, May 21st, on a visit to Mrs. S. Wright, of Shawbury Heath. On the following Sabbath evening she, in company with a few friends, was on the way to our chapel in the neighbourhood, when she had a paralytic stroke, which sent her reeling into a deep ditch, in which was a quantity of water, and but for the presence of Mr. Samuel Wright and others, she must then have perished. She was carried back to the house of Mr. Wright, and medical aid was called in, but it was of no avail.

A few days before she died she had some knowledge of her friends, and was able to articulate sufficiently to satisfy them that she was resting on the Rock of Ages. On the day previous to that of her death, Brothers Taylor and Powell, sen., called to see her, and while the latter was engaged in prayer, and quoting the words,

"There are my house, and portion fair,
My treasure and my heart are there,
And my abiding home,"

her soul fired, her countenance brightened, and she waved her left hand, the right being powerless. She lingered until the following morning, and then calmly fell on sleep.

"Her languishing head is at rest,
Its thinking and aching are o'er,
Her quiet immovable breast,
Is heaved by affliction no more."

Devout men bore her mortal remains to their resting place, and honourable women, not a few, followed. She was interred by the writer, in the Grove Chapel Yard, belonging to the New Connexion.

J. HEATH.

---

9. WILLIAM BOURNE was born February 19th, 1834. In early life he was taken to the Sabbath School held in Union Street Chapel, North

Shields. While but a youth, he became impressed with the necessity of a change of heart. These impressions were deepened by the exhortations, prayers, and counsels of his teacher, who took great interest in him, so that he was induced to seek religion in the morning of life, and to become decided for God. He united with the society, entering Brother Spencer's class, when about fifteen years of age. As he was free from those vices to which the young are often addicted, the spiritual change that passed upon him was gradual, and almost imperceptible to the eye, though genuine and permanent in its results. His pious parents, who had taken him to the house of God from his earliest infancy, had the satisfaction of seeing him become a steady and consistent follower of Christ, and continue such to the end of his days.

The leaders of the society perceiving in him the elements of usefulness, recommended him to the quarterly meeting as a suitable person to become an exhorter. He was received as such, and after the usual gradations, his name appeared on the plan as an accredited local preacher. While his health continued, he discharged his duty as a local preacher with credit and efficiency. The writer of this article has heard him preach on the New Quay, North Shields, to a large congregation, with manifest power and effect.

Mr. Parsons, his early companion, who entered society with him, and who now travels in the Newcastle Circuit, says in a note, "In my long and intimate acquaintance with him, I found little or no variation in his disposition. He was kind to those who differed from him in religious sentiment, and obliging to all who needed his counsel or assistance. His religion was rather the outgrowth of principle than the ebullition of feeling. Few changes were perceptible in his moral character. No glaring inconsistencies marked his religious profession. No angularities, produced by ignorance or temper, marred the symmetry of his Christian life. His career was an exemplification of that Scripture, 'The path of the just is as the shining light, that shineth more and more to the perfect day.'"

About eighteen months ago he was married to a pious young woman, a member of our society in Shields. Their married life, so short, alas! was one of mutual confidence and attachment, but He who doeth according to His own will, and giveth none account of His matters, saw fit to terminate their union. He had never been a robust youth, and of late he had frequent attacks of illness. When, therefore, the sickness that proved to be unto death, came upon him, no very particular alarm was felt by his friends. But it soon became manifest that his days were numbered. He expressed his profound gratitude to God that his parents had taught him religion in early life, and that he had not the requisite preparation to seek on a death-bed. On visiting him, his father reminded him that he had been a child of many prayers, and that if this sickness were unto death, he would like some clear declaration of his spiritual state and prospects. William replied that "He knew in whom he believed; Christ was all and in all. His will was lost in the will of God, and he had a satisfactory prospect of a better world."

On the Sunday before he died, he had a very happy day, and enjoyed much of the Divine presence. The day after, however, he had a strong conflict with the enemy, and was much cast down. He was much depressed on the review of his life, and expressed regret that he had not been more faithful, and done more for God; but he was speedily relieved, and graciously visited with a sense of the Divine presence. He told his wife, and his father and mother, that he had had a most pleasing glance into heaven, and had beheld glories he could not describe. * This gave him a desire to depart and to be with Christ. He said the river lay between him and that blest shore, but the Saviour Jesus would take him safely over. He then repeated part of the hymn commencing,—

"We speak of the realms of the blest."

On taking his final farewell of his dear wife, father, mother, and sisters, he urged them to meet him in heaven; and amid the peace and calm that the Gospel alone can give, his spirit passed away to Him who gave it, June 17th, 1862, in the twenty-eighth year of his age.

THOMAS SMITH.

10. MRS. CHRISTIANA SHAW PARKINSON, of Skircoat Moor, Halifax, Yorkshire, was born at Liverpool, February 9th, 1831. When fifteen months old, she was deprived of her father by that direful disease, the cholera; but she was left in the charge of a pious mother, who endeavoured to teach her "the good and the right way."

She was the subject of religious impressions at a very early age, and she "knew the Scriptures from her youth up." Before she had reached her seventh year, she had committed to memory, and was able to recite, a hundred and fifty texts of Scripture, chiefly prophecies respecting the Lord Jesus Christ. These passages she could rehearse in consecutive order, giving at the same time the chapter and verse where they might be found. She also committed to memory nearly the whole of Wesley's hymns and the Book of Psalms; so that in after years it was evident that her mind was well stored with Bible truths and Methodistical doctrines. The spirit of Christian humility was beautifully exhibited in her general deportment in life, and she had the strictest regard for honesty, truth, and justice.

† In the year 1849 she went to reside at Blackburn, Lancashire, where she first joined the Primitive Methodist Connexion, (the early part of her life was spent among the Wesleyan Methodists, at Halifax,) and in 1850 the authorities of Blackburn Circuit put her name on the preachers' plan.

She occupied the position of a local preacher for several years : but, owing to family duties, by her own request she was reluctantly taken off the plan. Her sermons were generally short, pointed, impressive, and full of instruction : she did not forget to lift up Christ, for in all things she gave Him the pre-eminence. Her love for God's house was strong, which made her a willing supporter of God's cause. She was a great admirer of the works of creation, and appeared to see God in all things.

Some months before her death she returned to Halifax, with the hope that her health might be restored ; but, alas ! her hopes, and those of her family and friends, were blasted. It is true that she seemed to rally for a short time, but it soon became evident that she was fast hastening to the " house appointed for all living." She gradually became weaker, and suffered severely through cough, spasmodic fits, &c. She would often make reference to the sufferings of Christ for her, and she said that hers were not to be compared with those endured by Christ on her behalf.

She was fully resigned to the will of Him who cannot err, and prayerfully commended her kind and God-fearing husband, and her three little boys, to the care of a loving and all-wise God. Death to her had lost its terrors, and while gasping for breath she was divinely assisted to exclaim, " Victory ! victory ! come Lord Jesus, and fetch Thy own, the purchase of Thy blood." A few minutes before her departure from earth to heaven, she said, " I have been talking to Jesus, and, oh, I am rich in faith." On June 19th, 1862, she fell a victim to death : nay, she was caught by " A welcome friend,

Whom God did send
Her pains to end.
Rude seem'd his blow
In outward show ;
Yet no doubt sent
Ills to prevent ;
And shield her in the tomb
From bitter foes,
And countless woes,
To come."

Her husband, who is a local preacher with us in the Halifax Circuit, says, " She was a faithful wife, and a judicious and loving mother." Her mortal remains rest in the Wesleyan Chapel grave-yard, King Cross, Halifax, till " the last trump shall sound, and the dead shall be raised."

WILLIAM BERKS.

D I V I N I T Y .

---

THE PERSONALITY AND WORK OF THE HOLY SPIRIT.

A SERMON, BY JOSEPH TONGUE, OF HULL.

"Nevertheless, I tell you the truth; it is expedient for you that I go away: for if I go not away, the Comforter will not come unto you; but if I depart, I will send him unto you. And when he is come, he will reprove the world of sin, and of righteousness, and of judgment: Of sin, because they believe not on me; of righteousness, because I go to my Father, and ye see me no more; of judgment, because the prince of this world is judged."—John xvi. 7—11.

A most touching and deeply interesting scene is presented in this and the three preceding chapters. Jesus, seeing that death is closely approaching Him, collects His little band of disciples, eats with them the Passover, for an example of humility washes their feet, and in the depth of His compassion spreads over them the wings of His love, and calls them His friends. He, with a gentle hand (ver. 12), slightly draws the screen from the future, informing them that the time of His departure is at hand, and that the fiercest persecution and trials are awaiting them. "They shall," says He, "put you out of the synagogues; yea, the time cometh that whosoever killeth you will think that he doeth God service." Now anguish takes hold of their spirits, and their hearts fill with sorrow. Jesus had often told them of the necessity of His sufferings, that He had "a baptism to be baptised with," even a baptism of blood, and must needs die; but they were dull in understanding, and were loth to believe these things. But now He tells them these things yet more plainly, and this harrows up their souls, and makes them "with grief run o'er." They look upon His going away as being all loss to them. But Jesus shows that instead of loss it will be gain. Notwithstanding all that is coming upon you, "I nevertheless tell you the truth, it is expedient for you," it is to your advantage—"that I go away; for if I go not away, the Comforter will not come unto you; but if I depart I will send Him unto you."

The expediency and even necessity of the departure of Christ, are clear for two reasons, one of which is the consequence of the other. 1. That the Comforter, the Holy Spirit, in His richest effusions, might be given to the church and the world. God, in His infinite wisdom, had so ordained that the fulness of the Spirit could not be given before Christ had "died for our sins." The atonement is the grand medium through which Divine benevolence reaches our fallen world, consequently it was only through the atonement the Spirit could be given. 2. That the purposes of redemption might be carried out. For, notwithstanding the sacrificial death of Christ, the salvation of man could not be accomplished without the all-important agency of the Holy Ghost.

The text directs our attention to the Personality and Work of the Holy Spirit.

I. HIS PERSONALITY.

In no part of Scripture have we so much light given respecting the Holy Spirit as in this discourse of our Lord. Light comes not in scattered rays, but in a glorious flood, revealing the blessed Spirit as a Divine person, proceeding from the Father and the Son, sent into the world, and performing various offices upon the children of men.

We conceive that the impression which every unprejudiced mind must receive from reading the Scriptures is, that the Holy Spirit is a person. The passages that teach this are numerous and clear. They are, too, of different classes, so that if one class leaves any doubt, another may remove it. Some passages call Him by personal names, and designate Him by personal pronouns; some ascribe to Him personal acts; in some He speaks as a person, in others He is spoken to as a person; and in not a few, personal relations and personal qualities are, in unmistakable language, attributed to Him. Our text affords ground for two arguments in proof of His personality.

1. He is called by a personal name, "the Comforter." The Greek word παράκλητος translated Comforter, signifies a real person, "one who is invited;" "one who is called for to assist another;" "an advocate;" "a supporter," &c. This idea is borne out by the context. Everything that is said about the Comforter, either directly teaches, or at least implies, that He is a person; a person, too, who is distinct from the Father and the Son; for Jesus says, "I will pray the Father, and He shall give you another Comforter." The word Comforter, as here used, is not the mere rhetorical clothing of something else. It cannot, without doing violence to Divine teaching, be stripped down to a mere personification of Divine power or Divine operation. For this is not the only place in Scripture (there are many others) where He is called by personal names. Dr. Cooke, after thoroughly searching the whole Bible, says, "We can confidently assert that in every instance where the word 'Holy Spirit' or 'Holy Ghost,' or 'Spirit of God,' or 'Spirit of Christ' is found, a real personal meaning is intended." He is designated by the personal pronouns "He" and "Him." Although we cannot base another argument on these, because they simply stand for the personal name which we have already considered, yet they tend to confirm what we have said. They give evidence that Comforter is of the masculine gender, and therefore impress the mind more deeply with the truth that He is a person.

2. Personal acts are ascribed to Him. Comforter implies action—the action of a person. He is spoken of as coming, and as reproving men, which imply His personality. Personal acts are frequently attributed to Him. He "moved upon the face of the waters," in the morning of the creation. "The Spirit of God hath made me." He "renews the face of the earth." He, too, "hath garnished the heavens." He descended on the Saviour at His baptism; and came down mightily on the disciples on the day of Pentecost. "The Spirit said unto Philip, go near, and join thyself to this chariot." "The Holy Ghost said, separate me Barnabas and Saul for the work whereunto I have called them;" and they were "sent forth by the Holy Ghost." "The Spirit searcheth all things, yea, the deep things of God." He moved the prophets of old, inspired the apostles, renews our nature, dwells in the believer. The acts of teaching, guiding, making intercession, bearing witness, bestowing gifts, are ascribed to Him. If such acts do not shew His personality, we can conceive of none that could.

The Scriptures teach that the Holy Spirit may be acted upon—acted upon, too, in such a manner, that nothing but one who is distinct from the Father and the Son, could be acted upon. "I will send Him unto you," saith the Saviour. "Again, He says, "I will pray the Father, and He shall give you another Comforter * * even the Spirit of truth." God is spoken of as pouring out His Spirit upon man, as putting His Holy Spirit within man, as taking His Holy Spirit from man. Now there must be a distinction between Him who sends, and Him who is sent; between Him who gives, and Him who is given; between Him who takes away, and Him who is taken away; between Him that pours out, and Him that is poured out.* To say that God sends Himself, gives Himself, takes away Himself, pours out Himself would be mere jargon. Distinction is thus clearly taught, a distinction which implies His personality.

He is also the object of the actions of men which could not, with any degree of propriety, be said to be done against any one but a real person. Peter said to Ananias, "Why hath Satan filled thine heart to lie unto the Holy Ghost?" It is written, "Grieve not the Holy Spirit of God." The prophet says, "They rebelled and vexed His Holy Spirit." Jesus said to the wicked blaspheming Jews, "All manner of sin and blasphemy shall be forgiven unto men; but the blasphemy against the Holy Ghost shall not be forgiven unto men. And whosoever speaketh a word against the Son of man, it shall be forgiven him; but whosoever speaketh against the Holy Ghost, it shall not be forgiven him." Here the Holy Ghost is referred to on the same ground as the Son, and, therefore, if the passage teaches that the Son is a person, it teaches that the Holy Ghost is, too; yea, He must be to be capable of being blasphemed. We read of the Holy Ghost being resisted, and we are exhorted not to quench the Spirit. We might conceive of power being resisted, and of influence, melting and subduing influence being quenched; but who could conceive of anything except a real, distinct, and intelligent person being "grieved," "vexed," "lied unto," and "blasphemed?" More positive evidence we could not wish. Everthing essential to personality is ascribed to the Holy Ghost. Clearer language could not be employed in setting forth any truth than the Bible employs in setting forth this truth. To consider the many personal titles that are given to Him, the personal pronouns so frequently applied to Him, the great variety of personal acts attributed to Him, the acts committed against Him, acts necessarily implying His personality, and that He is Divine, and yet is distinct from the Father and the Son; to consider all these things is to bring the scattered rays of revelation to a focus, which should be sufficient to dazzle the eyes and stop the mouth of every gainsayer, and to constrain every inquirer after truth to acknowledge, "It is enough." We do not much wonder that sceptical philosophers should deny this truth, inasmuch as it is only in keeping with their general conduct; but when divines, so called, deny it, deny it not only in the face of God's word, but even impiously employ that word to support their denial, we do wonder, greatly wonder, and can only account for it on the Scriptural ground, that "the carnal mind is enmity against God," and "the heart is deceitful above all things and desperately wicked."

* See Stowell on "The Work of the Spirit"—page 55.

II. THE WORK OF THE HOLY SPIRIT.

1. In the Church.

The Greek word translated Comforter, signifies much more, as we have already seen, than the translation expresses. "No single word in our language," says Albert Barnes, "expresses fully the sense of the original." It signifies,—

(1.) That the Holy Spirit is a "Teacher" or "Guide." The Saviour says, "He shall teach you all things, and bring all things to your remembrance whatsoever I have said unto you." These words were literally fulfilled in the apostles, and are, in a somewhat modified sense, in every disciple; for the Spirit frequently brings the truth with power to our remembrance, unfolding it to the understanding, making it to illuminate our minds, and shine down into our hearts,—thus enabling us to pursue the right way and stumble not, as do those that walk in the night. He is called "the Spirit of truth," because He is the great fountain of truth, the revealer of truth, the power of truth, the applier of truth, and because He "guides into all truth." John says, "the Spirit is truth." He testifies of Christ, glorifies Christ, takes of the things of Christ, and shews them unto us, reveals the atonement, unfolds the Saviour's love and makes known to us the Saviour's power. Without the Spirit we should be blind, being unable to see "the truth as it is Jesus," and should "stumble at noon-day as in the night."

(2.) That the Spirit is an "Advocate." (See 1 John ii. 1. παράκλητος, translated advocate.) He is the advocate of Jesus amongst men. He advocates the cause of Christianity, by giving efficiency and success to the efforts of the Church and power to the truth. Thus, though Jesus has gone away, the Holy Spirit is present to lead the armies of Immanuel on in triumph against the common foe. He is our Advocate—our Advocate at the throne of grace. It is He who kindles up our devotion, makes our desires to burn and rise heavenwards, gives fervency to our prayers, and strength to our faith. He is in all our wrestlings with God, pleading in us and for us with such holy fervour and power and fulness of meaning as is unutterable. “For we know not what things we should pray for as we ought: but the Spirit itself maketh intercession for us with groanings which cannot be uttered.”

(3.) That the Spirit is a “Comforter.” Jesus says, “I will not leave you comfortless,” I will send you another Comforter. The Christian drinks in consolation from the Spirit as from a river, receives from Him a “peace which passeth all understanding.” He has within himself a “kingdom of righteousness and peace and joy in the Holy Ghost.” “The love of God is shed abroad in the heart by the Holy Ghost, which is given unto us.” He gives us the assurance of pardon and acceptance with heaven. “The Spirit itself beareth witness with our spirit that we are the children of God.” He impresses the image of God upon our hearts, “seals” us with His own Divine signature “unto the day of redemption,” thereby giving us a meetness for heaven, and filling our souls with the joyful anticipation, that one day we shall pass through its gates. He lives in the soul of the believer as in a temple. Is ever present to cheer us on in the time of battle, to scatter the darkness in the dull and cloudy day, and let the warming, reviving rays of heaven into our hearts, to inspire us with confidence, and light up our prospects for eternity. O, how often He lifts us out of the midst of temptations, strugglings, and fears; fills our souls with joy, and brings heaven full into view. It is our privilege to have the temple of the soul filled with His presence, as the temple of old was filled with the glory of the Lord. The inspired Apostle says, “Be filled with the Spirit.” What unbounded consolation, what joy unspeakable is ours, through the Holy Ghost! It is His blessed will to raise us in the scale of holiness—to lift us up on the wings of perfect love to heavenly places in Christ Jesus; the land of Beulah, where the sun shines all the day long.

2. The work of the Spirit in the world.

The operations of the Spirit are not confined to the Church. He strove with sinners before the flood, and He strives with them now. He arrests the ungodly and struggles with the consciences of the unsaved. He sheds light into the dark understanding, and seeks to turn the attention to eternal objects, and directs the desires toward divine things. The Spirit is thus at work in the world. “He will,” says the text “reprove” or convince “the world of sin, of righteousness, and of judgment.”

(1.) He will convince the world of sin. Sin would not be seen and felt to exist as such, without the Spirit. It would be often fair in the eyes of man, and many a crime would be counted a virtuous thing. It is so even now. Many fouled with guilt, wrap themselves in the filthy rags of their own righteousness, and send the proud prayer towards heaven, "God, I thank Thee that I am not as other men are." But the Spirit takes away the veil, brings the truth into close contact with the soul, and reveals to the sinner the foul depravity of his nature, and the number and magnitude of his sins. "He will convince of sin," says Jesus, "because they believe not on Me." He convinced the Jews of sin on this ground with tremendous force. Through unbelief they were so wilfully blind and stubborn, that they with fierce malignity slew the Messiah, nailing Him to the cross. And when the Holy Ghost descended upon them with such convincing power on the day of Pentecost, they were pricked in the heart, wrung with anguish, and they clustered around the Apostles, crying, "Men and brethren, what shall we do?" And even now the great condemning sin, is the sin of rejecting Christ. The Holy Spirit commonly reveals this to the conscience of the sinner, and so fills his soul with deep regret and cutting remorse. Herein is fulfilled that prophetic declaration, "And they shall look upon Me whom they have pierced, and mourn.

(2.) He will convince the world of righteousness—of the righteousness of Christ. The wicked Jews poured upon the holy head of Jesus the foulest charges, and finally crucified Him as the vilest of impostors. But He says, the Spirit shall convince the world of His righteousness, shall prove Him to be true, "because," says He, "I go to my Father." Here He refers to His resurrection, which is the great irresistible proof of His righteousness. An impostor could not rise from the dead and ascend to heaven. Though Jesus died amidst the fiendish hatred and calumny of His murderous enemies, yet the Spirit testifies of Him—shows His righteousness to men, and thus proves Him to be "both Lord and Christ." He does it by giving convincing force to the truth of His Word, by unfolding it vividly before the understanding. This truth, accompanied by the Holy Ghost, was to many of the Jews a dagger which pierced their spirits with anguish. And a view of the same truth, the righteousness of Christ, is often to the awakened sinner a distressing spectacle. He is brought to consider that his sins have been committed against a Saviour who is perfectly holy, purely love. He has sinned against spotless excellency, against the tenderest compassion, against Divine mercy in her loveliest and most melting forms. He thus sees his own sinfulness in the light of Christ's holiness, and cries "Behold I am vile; wherefore I abhor myself, and repent in dust and ashes."

(3.) He will convince the world of judgment. The judgments of God imply His justice. Through the Spirit the conviction of Divine justice frequently takes hold of the conscience with a powerful and an awakening grasp. Justice is seen in God's dealings with the Prince of this world.

Jesus, by dying for sinners, bruises Satan's head. Judgment in its most tremendous forms settles down upon the naked fiend, and by one stroke of Divine vengeance he is swept from his throne, and he and his forces have to retreat before the cross. This strikingly shadows forth the judgment of the last day. As God has found out his great enemy, so he shall find out all his enemies, and reward them that hate him. "The Lord Jesus Christ shall be revealed from heaven with His mighty angels, in flaming fire, taking vengeance on them that know not God, and that obey not the Gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ." Few truths visit the conscience of the sinner with more awakening force than those relating to the judgment. When the Holy Spirit depicts in fearful array the dread realities of that day, and lets the brightness of the judgment-seat glare, as it were, upon his soul, it frequently bows him down into the dust, whilst with intense earnestness he breathes the penitent's prayer, "God be merciful to me a sinner."

Such being the work of the Spirit, how unspeakably important is His presence to mankind. Think, therefore, of the greatness of the gift and of the consequent greatness of our responsibilities. God has not only given His Son to die for sinners, but He has also given us His Spirit to work upon the conscience of every man, and to seek to renew and save even the most vile.

Who of us has not felt His awakening influence? and who may not feel His saving power? Some of you feel His presence now. He works, and many of you know it. Upon the sinner and in the saint He works. He works under the faithful preaching of His word. He works when you are alone. He convinces the sinner, and he becomes almost or altogether persuaded to be a Christian. He enlightens, and quickens, and strengthens, and comforts the believer. Having the Comforter we have enough; we have rich supplies of Divine grace at hand. We have not to ascend into heaven to bring Him down from above, for He is nigh, even in our hearts. For "know ye not that ye are the temple of God, and that the Spirit of God dwelleth in you?"

The Holy Spirit being given to man, what responsibilities are ours. Our responsibilities increase with our advantages. It would by intelligent minds be deemed an unspeakable blessing, if we could escape eternal punishment, by devoting a probation of ten thousand years to the heart-sickening work of recounting our sins, and weeping over each of them tears of blood, or groping our way amidst serpents, and demons, and the maddening terrors of death, to the cross, or subduing the corruptions of our nature by subjecting ourselves to torture as acute as the flames of hell. Such a probation, viewed from the awful shores of eternity, would be hailed as a glorious boon. Under such circumstances we should be held responsible, and should expose ourselves to everlasting fire by neglecting salvation, even at such a cost. Then what is our position now? We have much to do, but we have much help afforded. God has not rested satisfied with sending His angels to be ministering spirits to those who shall be heirs of salvation, but has sent the Holy Ghost to help us in every way we need, and that, too, at all times. So that being awakened, renewed, sanctified, and guided by Him through a short probation, we may in triumph reach the paradise of God, and swell the song of redemption in the kingdom of heaven. Praise God for the Comforter! Gloomy, and wretched, and hopeless would have been our pilgrimage here without the Comforter. But having Him in our hearts we can "rejoice with joy unspeakable and full of glory."

O ye, "upon whom the ends of the world are come," see your position; "exalted unto heaven," take heed and "quench not the Spirit," lest you be brought down to hell." But yield to His operations, and earnestly seek through the atonement to be saved by His power. It is for us to be zealous co-workers with the Spirit, and to yield forth abundantly all the fruit of the Spirit. O, my brethren, "beware of Him, obey His voice, and provoke Him not. For if we yield obedience to Him, He will be an enemy unto our enemies, and an adversary to our adversaries; He will go before us, and in spite of all our foes, will bring us into the promised land. Let each heart say, "Thou shalt guide me with Thy counsel, and afterwards receive me to glory." Amen.

JUNIOR PREACHERS' DEPARTMENT.

POWER IN THE PULPIT.

BY DR. FISH, OF AMERICA.

(Continued from page 673.)

III. THE MAN.

We now come to those conditions of pulpit power which pertain to the man himself—to his inner or essential being. It is common to suppose that eloquence is a thing to be put on, that it is an outward affair. No mistake could be greater. In impressive public address, it is not so much the mouth that speaks as the soul; not so much the manner as the sentiment and the thought which create the manner. The power consists in the action of the speaker's soul on the soul of the hearer. Longinus, after describing the sublime, tells us that this sublime is "the echo of inward greatness;" and hence we ought, says he, to "spare no pains to educate our souls to grandeur, and impregnate them, as it were, with generous and enlarged ideas." Style in writing is simply the inner being shewing itself externally—the sentiment and the thought becoming visible. And the same may be said of delivery. The elocutionist cannot make a preacher. The man must be made first. Behind what he can touch must be something to beget eloquence, or he might as well attempt to train an automaton. The foundation for successful public speaking. then, lies in the man himself. What is this foundation?

Goodness must lie at the bottom. The word is used in a broad sense to include piety, and moral excellence, and uprightness. The ancients had a maxim that no one could be eloquent but a good man. "An orator," said Cato, the censor, to his son Marcus, "is a good man skilled in speaking." And we read in another of the ancients, "Every man speaks as he lives." "A minister's life," says an old divine, "is the life of his ministry." The explanation is obvious. Weight of character (depending on real goodness) gives weight to words; while supposed insincerity, and known inconsistency of conduct, neutralize all that one can say. To the minister of Christ, then, pre-eminently, should apply the principle of Pope's couplet upon Longinus:—

"His own example strengthens all his laws,
And is himself the great sublime he draws."

Knowledge also lies at the base of pulpit power. How can one teach unless himself taught? How can he accomplish his persuasion without acquaintance with language, and its relation to thought, and a delicate perception of the laws of association, by which what is said shall suggest "that richer part of wisdom which must for ever remain unsaid?" A novice cannot even command respect. It is indispensable that a minister be well instructed in the Scriptures, and he should not be ignorant of the sciences. He should know men, too, as well as books. Many ministers are altogether too "bookish." They fail of influence from not knowing the material they have to operate upon. The heart of man must be interpreted, as well as the word of God, by him who would have power over an audience. He must be thoroughly acquainted with human nature—must know the feelings of men of all classes and conditions, and all the springs of action, and avenues to the soul. He is the best preacher, says one whose own success ought to qualify him to speak, "who has the best knowledge of human nature—not of the philosophy of mind in the abstract, though that is important—but of the wants, the susceptibilities, the struggles, the temptations, the reasonings, the shifts of individual minds in regard to religion." So, also, should the preacher be able to scan the material world with a keen, discriminating eye. Mr. Spurgeon affords an example of the advantage of sensibility to the visible creation. Having occasion not long ago to prepare a sketch of his life, a note was addressed to him with this question: "Where were you educated?" To which he answered, "Nominally at divers schools in Newmarket; really by summer rambles, hard private studies, and close observation." And no one can read his sermons without seeing everywhere the fruits of those summer rambles and that close observation. The prayer of Elisha for his servant might most profitably be prayed over the head of many a scholarly man in the sacred office, or about to enter it, "Lord, open his eyes that he may see!" Of analyses, and criticisms, and propositions, and "doctrines beaten out by dialectic hammers," he is not ignorant; but he is wholly insensible to the glory that encompasses him, and, by consequence, but half-educated.

Courage in a preacher is necessary to pulpit power. It was when the people saw "the boldness of Peter and John" that they marvelled, and "took knowledge of them that they had been with Jesus." And Paul desired his brethren to pray that he might open his mouth "boldly" in preaching the gospel. Our Master taught "with authority." Authority is inherent in truth. We expect one who knows he is in the right to speak with boldness; and Vinet, in his Homiletics, remarks, with truth, that the accent of authority is welcome to almost any one. We are prepossessed in favour of men who, in this world of uncertainty and perplexity, express themselves on a grave subject with confidence and command. Some preachers weaken their messages by an indecisive mode of statement, giving the impression that they are either careless, or timid, or half-persuaded. They qualify and guard everything, as if somebody would take exception. Instead of this, they should come saying, "We are the servants of the Most High! These are His words—not ours; and not one jot or tittle will we abate from them, nor give subjection to opposers, no, not for an hour!" Men dealt with thus fearlessly acknowledge the preacher's power. His courage energises and inlocks his thoughts, and gives to them decision, majesty, strength.

Experience is necessary to an impressive preacher. There are different ways of learning things. Some of our knowledge is intuitive, or ideal—a matter of pure reason. Some is speculative, gathered by deduction or inference. Some is the result of reading; some of instruction. But another kind, and quite different from all this, is that which we acquire by experience. And this knowledge is deepest and most actual. It is "burnt in," and becomes a part of our energies and powers. Now, preachers want this kind of knowledge. It is needful that they be able to say, "We have seen and felt; therefore we believe." "We speak that we do know, and testify that we have seen." It is an old saying, that the wounded is the wounding heart. One always speaks most strongly of what he has felt. Indeed, in successful discourse, one cannot go much beyond that. When the preacher is ready to cry out with Elihu of old, "I am full of matter; the Spirit within me constraineth me; I will speak that I may be refreshed"—then look out for a torrent of irresistible utterance! Could Luther have been the giant he was in the conflict with hell, had he not felt beforehand the cogs of his terrible experience, striking him through and through, and well nigh tearing him asunder? He knew what he talked about. Those inward torments, compared with which the tortures of the stake were as nothing, were an essential part of his education. Hear what Bunyan says about the way he preached: "I preached what I felt; what smartingly I did feel; even that under which my poor soul did groan and tremble to astonishment. I went myself in chains to preach to them in chains; and carried that fire in my own conscience, that I persuaded them to be aware of." And it was equally true of the blissful experiences which he describes. To take an illustration outside the profession: Could Byron have described the pangs of an accusing conscience with such awful vividness as he has done in his writings, had he not known, in his own experience, that "No ear can hear, no tongue can tell,

The tortures of that inward hell?"

And could Baxter have written his "Saints' Rest" except for that long and weary sickness of his in a solitary chamber in Derbyshire? It was a transcript of his own heart, and hence it had, as he says, "the greatest force on the hearts of others" of all his writings. Hence we see that a minister must draw from the depth of his own soul if he would have power in the pulpit. And this is why God lets so many candidates for the ministry struggle and suffer as they do. "It is of difficulties that miracles are born," says La Bruyere. And so God environs with inward and outward difficulties his young servants, that they may grow strong and know something for themselves! And this amazingly helps them to preach. Their discourses are apt to be woven and wrought out of a feeling heart, and to have definite points in them, and to come home to men's bosoms.

Industriousness lies at the base of pulpit power. We use it here as equivalent to hard study. Ordination does not bring omniscience. The pulpit has no magic to infuse wisdom. And previous culture is not a stock for a lifetime. One may have a transient popularity without study; but the cistern soon runs out, and the people get tired of drivelling and sediment. It is too late, now, to talk of God's helping those who do not help themselves. Though he made the beast of Balaam to speak, he will not countenance men in laziness. If he does not need our wisdom, he certainly does not our stupidity. It is an insult to God to go idly up and down all the week, (or all but Saturday!) and then on Sunday bring an offering to the Lord "which cost us nothing,"—"the blind, the lame, the sick,"—"a corrupt thing for sacrifice," and ask God's blessing upon it. How can such preaching have power? "Give attention to reading;" "study to show thyself approved," says Paul. Without this, a Samson in native talent will soon lose his locks. A strong preacher must keep his mental powers in working order; he must be a man of rigid, unremitted diligence; he must plough, and cross plough, and subsoil his own mind, that it may yield nourishment to other minds.†

* Live for your sermon; live in your sermon. Get some starling to cry, Sermon! sermon! sermon! The best discourses are the efflux of a man's best thoughts and feelings during the week.—J. W. Alexander.

Sympathy is an element of strength. We want to see a brother in one who undertakes to do us good: hence if a man is persuaded that you really love him, you can do almost anything with him. And sympathy is necessary to make one a man of his time. With all the allowance that ought to be made, there is much truth in the criticism of a foreign Review: "The pulpit is out of gear with the age; it is a piece of machinery wheeling away, apparently for the mere pleasure of wheeling, with its teeth fitting absolutely into nothing." There is not enough of the actual grappling of the pulpit upon society. It is too far away from the people. It does not speak enough of what concerns men, and meet them as it should, in their every-day living. It deals too much in dry theories and smooth abstractions. If those who stand in the pulpit were more skilful and ready to touch the plane of actual life in their preaching, and less given to "reaching vaguely after an indefinite something that very few can comprehend," the complaint that ministers "do not get hold of the people" were less frequently made. The preacher ought to be so much a man of his time, as really to feel the pulsations of the great heart of animated society throbbing in his own heart. Is it reasonable to suppose that men intensely interested in their pursuits, and in daily occurrences, can be reached and influenced by preachers who know nothing (or care nothing) of what agitates the common heart; whose ideas, sympathies, instincts, bearings, all belong to the fossil period? The men who are to move this age, adopting the motto of the Roman actor, "I am a man, and whatever concerns man concerns me," must lock in with the age, and be every whit awake, and make the Gospel everywhere felt.

† "If the minister labours not to increase his stock, he is the worst thief in the parish. It is wicked for a man trusted with the improving of orphans' estates to let them lie dead by him; much more for a minister not to improve his gifts, which I may call the town-stock given for the good of the souls of both rich and poor."—Gurnall.

Enthusiasm is essential to power in the pulpit. Every eminent man is an enthusiast in his profession: he thinks there is no calling like it; and he who would not esteem it a self-degradation to exchange his pulpit for a throne, is not fit to fill a pulpit. Said the venerable William Carey, when the Rangoon government had placed his son in a dignified and important office, "My son is shrivelled from a missionary into an ambassador." The dignity and magnitude of the preacher's calling should so rise upon his vision as to shut out all else. He should live, and move, and have his being for one thing—to magnify his office, to fulfil his ministry. Thus enthusiastic, he cannot be tame. Handel caught the idea of one of his great choruses from the ring of a blacksmith's hammer and anvil. Talma, the tragedian, took a hint from the impassioned, but restrained conversation, of a group of men, which changed the entire style of theatric delivery. Chalmers riding on a stage-coach, and seeing the driver whip one of the horses to prevent his taking fright at an object in the distance, resolved the matter into a principle, and upon it developed his famous sermon on "The expulsive power of a new affection." These men were enthusiasts, each in his profession, and everything subserved their ends. And so it will be found with any minister who is thoroughly absorbed in his profession. He is learning out of the study as well as in the study. When he goes abroad to breathe God's sweet air, and survey his beautiful world; when he mingles in society, and watches what is going on in the world, he is adding to his stock of ideas. Everything is feeding the sources of eloquent thought. Like the bee, he is gathering honey wherever he rambles, to bring back to his pulpit hive. Each day of the week he is preparing to feed his flock, and not the least thing, in his reading or observation, that can add to the requisite material, is allowed to escape untreasured. Thus from a living enthusiasm he waxes strong.

Earnestness, an element closely allied to the latter, is also requisite. The earnest man is intent on carrying his point. He has an aim, and his hearers feel it when he comes in contact with them. It was this that wrung from the lips of Agrippa, "Almost thou persuadest me to be a Christian." It was this that extorted sighs, and sobs, and groans from men of all ranks when Loyola was preaching. Eminent orators are always earnest speakers. When Dr. Mason returned from Scotland, he was asked wherein lay Chalmers' strength. "In his blood-eearnestness," he replied. A simple Scotch woman's description of M'Cheyne's preaching told the secret of his effective appeals: "He preached as if he was dyin' a'most to have ye converted." What an increase of pulpit power if all preachers spoke with a like earnest purpose! We need men more like Christ, whose soul was all sensibility; more like Paul, who "travailed in birth again" for immortal souls; men after the stamp of good John Welsh—son-in-law of John Knox—whose weeping would sometimes awaken his wife, and whose surprise he relieved by saying, "O woman, I have the souls of three thousand to answer for, and I know not how it is with many of them!" men who could say to their flocks with Rutherford, "My witness is above, that your heaven would be two heavens to me, and the salvation of you all as two salvations to me;" and with Brainerd, "I cared not where or how I lived, or what hardships I went through, so that I could but gain souls to Christ. While I was asleep, I dreamed of these things, and when I waked the first thing I thought of was this great work." A new day will dawn upon the churches, when, in answer to their prayers, a race of ministers thus earnest shall come into possession of their pulpits.

Passion is essential to the greatest effectiveness. Deep feeling is contagious. It melts and wins its way. Sermons from burning hearts set others on fire. One of the best definitions of eloquence is, "to have something to say and to burn to say it." If the eloquence of art be not the eloquence of the heart, it is of little worth. Sermons fabricated in the furnace are very different from sermons constructed with the cold chisel and file. Preaching should by no means be purely emotional; nor yet should it be purely intellectual. Paul will not be suspected of mental imbecility, nor of fanatical weakness; but mark what he said to the Ephesian elders: "Remember that by the space of three years I ceased not to warn every one of you, night and day, with tears." Let cold, heartless, "intellectual" preachers ponder this statement of Paul! It is manly to weep. It is a manifestation of the child-spirit, and all great men have the child-spirit in them. Quick sensibilities are of immense value to a minister. They are "the electric fluid that pervades the region of the heart, throwing its subtle influence upon the springs of thought, and shooting its lightning through every channel." Other things being equal, a man's force in this world is always just in the ratio of the force of his heart. A full-hearted man is generally a powerful man. As a rule, no man can be a great preacher without great feeling. His message, like the dart of Acestes, must kindle as it is shot forth. Examine the past and the present, and the men of mark will be found to be men of the mighty heart. Let those, then, who would have power in the pulpit, aim at a high degree of subdued passion. Let them see that their altar-candle, besides being orthodox and straight, is made to burn; that their production, besides having body, has also soul; and in delivering it, let them be sure that the heart palpitates on the paper.*

Prayer is necessary to pulpit power. It is said of Pericles, that he never ascended the rostrum without invoking the gods; much less should we without prayer. It was the deliberate opinion of an eminent minister, that even æsthetically considered, one hour of prayer is a better preparation for sermon-writing than a whole day of study. One cannot make an edifying sermon while the heart is motionless.

* Says Longinus: "The heart is the source of all true eloquence." Goethe has thus paraphrased the thought:

"Persuasion, friend, comes not by toil or art;

Hard study never made the matter clearer;

'Tis the live fountain in the speaker's heart,

Sends forth the streams that melt the ravished hearer.

Would you then touch the heart, the only method known,

My worthy friend, is first to have one of your own."

He must have the internal instruction of the Spirit, granted in answer to sincere supplication. "We will give ourselves to prayer, and to the ministry of the word," said the apostles. Prayer, as one argues from this passage, is one-half of a man's ministry; and it gives to the other half all its power and success. It is incredible how much of light, vigour, strength, sprightliness, will come to the mind from a few moments direct communion with God. Rightly spake Payson of ministers: "It is in the closet that the battle is lost or won."

Faith is essential to powerful preaching. "We believe," says Paul, "therefore we speak." He who believes implicitly, will feel deeply and speak forcibly. Chrysostom, to help him in composing sermons, imagined the communion rails around the pulpit crowded with listening angels. Charles Simeon kept the picture of the flaming Henry Martyn hanging in his study, that it might seem to say to him, "Be in earnest! don't trifle! don't trifle!" and the good Simeon would gently bow to the speaking picture, and say, "Yes, I will be in earnest; I will not trifle: for souls are perishing, and Jesus is to be glorified." But to the man of faith, there is present more than listening angels, or a sainted martyr, even the omniscient Master himself; and His voice is heard saying, "Be thou faithful! Work while the day lasts! Entreat with all long-suffering and tears!" And under its influence, how can he loiter? how can he preach but with the tenderest importunity? Summerfield, on his death-bed, exclaimed, "Oh, if I might be raised again, how could I preach! for I have had a look into eternity!" But faith affords such a look into eternity. Future things become present. The very surges of eternity seem beating against his study-door. The Judge is actually coming! The worlds are burning! The heavens are departing! The throne is set! The books are open! The questions are being put—to him, and to his flock! and the angels are placing these on the right hand, those on the left! There is heaven with its rapturous songs, and myriads of shining ones; and there is hell, with its

"... groans that end not, and sighs
That always sigh, and tears that ever weep,

And ever fall, but not in mercy's sight:"

and with all this before him, it is impossible to be unmoved. His spirit is stirred within him, and he exclaims, "No! these souls shall not commit suicide!" And, after first crying to God on his knees, he goes into his pulpit, and cries out to them; and there is nothing that is strong in argument, or sweet in entreaty, or thrilling in appeal, that he does not seize upon, and appropriate to his mighty theme. Thus does faith give him power.

Holiness is essential to pulpit power. This is placed last because most important. Our blessed Lord said to his apostles, "Ye shall receive power after that the Holy Ghost is come upon you;" and he gave command that, when he should be taken up from them, they "should not depart from Jerusalem, but wait for the promise of the Father." They were not qualified to preach until the Divine Spirit, in a special sense, had come upon them. Neither is any one. This alone can bring the preacher into such relations to God, and to men, and to his work, as will ensure success. The holy soul, only, is in close communication with the Almighty, whence all his help must come. "The secret of the Lord is with them that fear him, and he sheweth them his covenant." He who lies in God's bosom draws from "the hiding-place of his power," both the wisdom to know, and the strength to wield, the word of truth. God teaches him the deep things of the kingdom, and clothes him with superhuman energy. Some can readily be recalled who have walked among us in other days, as burning and shining lights, because of their peculiar sanctity. In one sense, they were not learned and eloquent; in another sense they were. Their fellowship was with the Father and with his Son Jesus Christ, and they were most acceptable and useful preachers. Their sermons were fetched up from the depths of their souls. They were fresh and entertaining. Even the texts they quoted seemed new, from having been steeped in their own experience. And with what unction, and pathos, and subduing goodness they delivered their messages!

It is common to disparage the present as compared with the past; but still it is a question worthy of the most serious consideration, whether the holiness of the pulpit in other days can be found among ministers now. Is there a man living that would not name, as the first requisite to increased pulpit efficiency, "a new baptism of the Holy Ghost?"

How many men, now weak and common-place ministers, would become mighty in word and doctrine, if only "filled with the Holy Ghost!" The people would wonder at them, as if made anew. Much as they who preach need many things, they need nothing half so much as more communion with God, more sympathy with Christ. They are comparatively feeble as preachers, because feeble as Christians. Their lips are not touched with "the coal from the altar;" therefore, the hearts of the people do not "burn within" them.

Let it be remembered, then, especially by those coming to the ministry, that the very first principle in the philosophy of doing good is to be good; that if one would have power in the pulpit, he must stand in the light of God's countenance, as the angel in John's vision stood in the sun. Let them be particularly watchful against a professional piety. It is easy to appear religious, to speak the language, and do the duties, and exhibit the feelings of religion, when it is merely ex officio, shadowy, mechanical. Awful thought, but true! Constant attention to religious subjects, and religious offices, is liable to induce insensibility. Professional duty becomes one's business, and spirituality in its performance is lost. Because engaged in holy things, the minister is esteemed holy; and he persuades himself that he is holy, and so lives on in this way, forgetting that a holy office does not make one holy;—forgetting that he may be spiritual in his pulpit, and not in his closet;—forgetting that he may be the keeper of others' vineyards, without keeping his own;—forgetting that it is easier to declaim against sins in others than to mortify them in himself;—aye, forgetting that he may be the instrument of grace to others, and yet himself be lost!

Let ministers take heed to these things. Let the startling language of Dr. Owen ring in their ears: "He that would go down to the pit in peace, let him obtain a great repute for religion; let him preach and labour to make others better than he is himself, and in the meantime neglect to humble his heart, to walk with God in a manifest holiness and usefulness; and he will not fail of his end." And these still more startling words from Swinnoek: "It is a doleful thing to fall into hell from under the pulpit; but, oh! how dreadful is it to drop thither out of it." Let all who minister in holy things see to it that they are thoroughly honest men, without hypocrisy. Let them taste the word before they distribute it, and be able to say with the devoted Shepherd, "I have never preached a sermon to others, that I have not first preached to my own soul." In so doing, they shall magnify their office. "Clothed with humility," "nourished up in the words of faith and sound doctrine," and "filled with all the fulness of God," it shall not be so much they that speak as Christ who dwelleth in them; and their words shall most surely be "with the demonstration of the Spirit, and with power."

FAMILY DEPARTMENT.

1. HOME INTERCOURSE.

THE difficulties in our home intercourse spring very much from our ignorance of each other. The members of a household should, therefore, become acquainted with each other. This is not the unmeaning phrase it may at first seem. It is not an uncommon thing to find those living together intensely ignorant of each other. Whole families grow up in daily intercourse with each other, yet each as ignorant of each as if a hemisphere divided them. Have you never had a young person come to you and say, "I love to talk with you; somehow or other I cannot say these things to father or mother, but you understand me?" Is there not a deal of this alienation between the members of a household—this lack of home sympathy which sends the craving spirit abroad to utter confidences which ought to be home confidences? It seems to be taken for granted by parents, and brothers and sisters, that from the fact of sharing the same blood and dwelling under the same roof, they must be acquainted with each other. They think it necessary to study the character of other men, in order to get along with them; but they suppose the home requires nothing of this. Now the home is a miniature world. Within its four walls are brought together the widest contrasts in endowment and attainment. There is every possible diversity in a family in the degrees of affection. The love of a brother for a sister is very unlike that of the sister for the brother; that of the child for the mother is very unlike his love for the father. Then there are diversities in character. The mature wisdom of the father differs from the tender affection of the mother. And among the children one is brave, another timid; one is enthusiastic, another doubting; one is thoughtful, another reckless; one overflows with humour, another is sedate. These and a thousand other differences appearing in one family are not incidents, but essential to the idea of a family. In a family you meet every variety of human character—the highest possible range of virtue, the strongest possible incentive to excellence brought into contrast and contact with almost all modes and causes of human disagreement, and these not by any perversion, but by a necessity, of which we need to be at all times aware. The family of but one sex or one pursuit, with no diversity of temper and disposition, is not a family.†

In the home intercourse, it should be remembered that each one has his place and his part. A happy and a pleasant home is an impossibility where any one slights his duty. Home is not a place where you are to indulge your own fancies, or to be entertained by the rest. You have no right to sit down, listless and dull, and say, "Come, amuse me, and see how pleasant you can make home." You have no right to complain that home is ungenial, till you are sure you have tried your best to make it genial. The men who complain of homes are mostly those men whose dignity is offended at the bare suggestion that they have something to do towards making it pleasant. Home is not a mere place of entertainment, a sort of tavern, and he who turns to it for entertainment merely, deserves to be disappointed. Hast thou nothing to do, oh, man! but to throw thyself upon a sofa, or monopolise the easiest chair, and, holding back all thine own information, demand that wife and children amuse thee? Or wilt thou go moodily out to club or to business, declaring that thou wilt not stay where so little is done for thee? And shall the young man say, "My sisters do nothing to make home pleasant to me," when he has done nothing to make home pleasant to them? I do not think the different members of a home realise how much the pleasant, profitable intercourse of home depends on each; or how hard it is, when one and another hang back, for the rest to supply the deficiency. —The Quiver.

2. SEED LONG DORMANT, BUT NOT DEAD.

MOTHERS, when the iron is entering into your soul over some prodigal son, dear to you as your own life, take comfort amid your tears from the many and cheering instances in which, after long years of folly, the seed of early instruction has germinated at last, and brought forth fruit to eternal life. Here is one of those cases. A pious mother had a prodigal son. He was about to leave her and go to sea. As a last resource she placed a Bible in his chest, with a prayer to God for his blessing upon it. Year after year passed away, and nothing was heard of the wanderer; but the eye of his mother's God was upon him. A long time afterwards a clergyman was called to visit a dying sailor, whom he found penitent and prepared for his momentous change. He had in his possession a Bible, which he said was given to him by a dying shipmate, who, expiring in the hope of the glory of God, gave it to him with his parting blessing. On the blank leaf was found written the name of John Marshall, the pious mother's prodigal son. He was the brother of Mrs. Isabella Graham, whose interesting memoirs have profited many readers. Courage, then, mothers. "In the morning sow thy seed, and in the evening withhold not thine hand; foe thou knowest not whether shall prosper, either this or that, or whether they both shall be alike good.—Ibid."

MISCELLANIES.

1. A FINAL EFFORT FOR THE JUBILEE FUND.

DEAR EDITOR,—During the last few months, three questions have pressed on my mind with reference to the Jubilee,—1st. What has been done? 2nd. What is now doing? and 3rd. What will be done by March 10th, 1863? The celebration of our Jubilee, we believe was looked upon as a joyful event by our societies generally. March 11th, 1860, was a memorable day with many thousands of our people; a day of great joy and general thanksgiving, of earnest prayer, and mighty faith. Our Minutes and Magazines had rung the bell, and given the notice to all (for be it remembered our Magazines, Minutes, and Almanacks, are our Connexional telegraph wires, and they send out the news in every direction at the same time. And our Telegraph Company is a very cheap one; we can have thousands of lines direct from London, every month for seven pence. Who would not take our cheap and excellent magazines?) Hence many thousands on that day clearly saw, gratefully felt, and truly said, "The Lord hath done great things for us, whereof we are glad." In many cases the joy was unspeakable; strong, deep, heavenly feeling rose into an ecstasy of spiritual delight, and there was no selfishness about it; all seemed to agree that while some had sown the good seed, and others had watered it, God had given the increase, and he should have the glory. The tree was evidently of God's right hand planting, or it would not have lived, grown, borne fruit, scattered seed, and been so productive as it has been. But was one day's excitement to a high state of feeling, one day's thanksgiving to God, sufficient for the great things He hath done for us? No; every day should do something at it—it should be a life-time work—nay, eternity itself will be too short to utter all his praise. But while much has been done, (and much praise is due to our God for past success,) yet there remains much more to be done, and deeply impressed with this fact, as the day commencing the Jubilee witnessed many fervent prayers, and strong cries, with tears, for a larger outpouring of the Holy Spirit, so every day should more or less be a day of prayer and faith for the same things; for there really is yet a great work to be done. Whitening fields and brightening prospects, are opening out before us in every direction, immensely large and very numerous, and the spiritual sun is yet shining high and bright in the mid-heavens; and the Master is also saying, "Work while it is day." And we have been taught to sing,—

"Our rest is in heaven, our rest is not here."

As we have, then, much more land to cultivate, more seed to sow, and more sheaves to gather, millions more immortal souls to lead from Satan to Jesus, we need much Divine help, much of the Holy Spirit; we need it now, we need it always, and everywhere, and if our 141,185 members will cry to God in faith day and night for it, we shall have it, and this winter will witness a series of revivals which will result in the conversion of many thousands of souls to God, and that would help to swell the Jubilee joy into raptures again,—and the joy of heaven too—and the Jubilee will then close as happily as it began, and heaven and earth will say it was not celebrated in vain.

And now the question comes, what have we done during the Jubilee period, and what are we doing, in our free-will offerings to the Lord? Shall we close the Jubilee honourably in this respect? Has each member and friend of the Connexion brought such an offering to the Lord as they will not be ashamed of in the day of final account, such as will ensure from the Master, "Well done"? We have had many stirring addresses on the subject, the period for contributing has been lengthened, but will soon close. Hence many a mind feels anxious about what has been done. We hope that all our friends who read the address in the large Magazine for December, 1860, page 727, by our late and highly esteemed editor, will read it again, and that those who have not read it will get to know its contents as speedily as possible. It is full of truthful statements, important questions, wise suggestions, and reasonable calculations. The question, "Is the sum too much?" has been asked in nearly 14,000 families, and yet we have not heard one person say it was too much; some have said it was too little. The dying hour, the judgment day, heaven and earth, reason, and piety; the past, the present, and the future, all with one voice seem to say it is not too much for God and for souls. Some have nobly done their part towards it, and shall others fail while they own it to be right and just? To such we say, God has been waiting fifty years for this special effort to extend his kingdom in this world, and now three more are given; and shall there be failure after all? If such persons had some special favour promised by some friend, would they have liked to wait fifty-three years for it, and then not to get it? They would not think much of such a friend. And what will God think of us? Some of our friends have thought that donations smaller than 10s. should have the donor's name published with them. We just remind our friends that the Jubilee offerings are thank-offerings for fifty years, and 10s. for fifty years is just 2½d. per year and 5d. over; and we do think that we have not a single friend that would wish his name to be published with any sum less than 2½d. per year. The people for whom the Jubilee was first established, and to whom it was made a very great blessing, were required to sacrifice the whole produce of their land, not only every Jubilee year, but every seventh year. And did God intend his people to suffer by such a requirement? Did they really lose one year's crop by it? No; but they really gained one by it; and how? See Leviticus xxv. 20, 21, 22. God said, "I will command my blessing upon thee in the sixth year, and thy land shall bring forth fruit for three years." So that there was a year's labour of ploughing, sowing, and weeding, and the cost of a year's seed saved, a year's rest enjoyed, and yet a year's produce gained by it; for it is plain that they were dependent on the sixth year's produce for a part of the sixth year's consumption, and yet the eighth year's produce was not needed during that year, for the old store of the sixth year was to last until the ninth year. How wonderful! And this was the result of God's blessing. How important to have it. A few days ago the writer was collecting for a charitable object. A poor woman, without being asked, said, I will give you 2s., for I know God can send affliction, which is expensive, and if he sees fit, he can give us health. She acknowledged the Lord, and felt the importance of having his blessing. "There is that scattereth, and yet increaseth, and there is that withholdeth more than is meet, and it tendeth to poverty."

And now, dear friends, as the Divine Being has sent us a good harvest, and has also blessed the Connexion so abundantly during its past history, and as we wish him to bless it still, and to make us a thousand times as many more as we are, and as this is our first Jubilee, and to many of us will be our last; and as it is important that we should have God's blessing on ourselves and on our families, while we feel truly grateful to those friends who have contributed liberally to our Jubilee fund, we should like to see and take a part in a general and final effort during the next three months, for gathering up the fragments of Jubilee offerings, so that when the Jubilee period shall have closed, and its accounts have been published, it may be seen that we have done something in some way worthy of the high position in which God has placed us, as a part of his militant church. Dear reader, what thou doest do quickly. JOHN BURROUGHS.

[We hope all our readers will give their serious and prayerful attention to this appropriate appeal.—EDITOR.]

2. TEMPERANCE IN ENGLISH DISSENTING COLLEGES.

At the Temperance Congress held lately in Exeter Hall, a paper on this subject was read by Mr. Robert Rae, secretary to the National Temperance League, from which we quote the following facts:—In the metropolis an association has been formed, entitled "The United Colleges Total Abstinence Society," which promises to be highly useful and effective. There are five colleges represented in this association. The students of each college hold occasional meetings, at which essays are read and discussions take place; and the whole meet together, once a year, to report progress, and encourage each other in the good work. The last yearly meeting was held a few months ago, at Regent's Park College, where there was a large attendance of students, and the success of the meeting was such as to cheer the hearts of all who feel interested in this movement. The secretary has favoured us with the following statistics of the position of total abstinence in the colleges named:—Number of students last session—Cheshunt, 20; Hackney, 22; Regent's Park, 40; New College, 50; Presbyterian College, 12; total 151. Total abstainers—Cheshunt, 14; Hackney, 15; Regent's Park, 14; New College, 22; Presbyterian College, 10; total 75. Additions this season—Cheshunt, 6; Hackney, 5; Regent's Park, 7; New College, 6; Presbyterian College, 4; total 28. Left for the ministry since last report, professing total abstinence principles—Cheshunt, 2; Hackney, 1; Regent's Park, 4; New College, 2; total, 9. These figures are highly encouraging; and we are glad to be able to give similar facts relating to other colleges, from which we have obtained information. In the Wesleyan College at Richmond, for example, there were during last session upwards of sixty students, and of these we are assured on good authority that "at least one half—probably more"—were total abstainers.

At Didsbury, too, where there is a Wesleyan college with forty students, it is believed that one-half are abstainers; while in Mr. Spurgeon's College, at the Metropolitan Tabernacle, which is attended by thirty theological students, the number of abstainers is twelve or thirteen. In the provincial colleges, so far as we have been able to ascertain, the facts are of a similar character.

The Cavendish Theological College at Manchester, had during last session twenty-five students, of whom seventeen or eighteen were total abstainers; and at the Rotherham Independent College, there were twelve abstaining students out of a total of seventeen.

There is a private theological seminary at Bedford in connection with the Congregationalist denomination, which is attended by twenty students, of whom sixteen are abstainers.

In Wales the proportion is not so large as in other parts of the country.

At the Brecon Independent College, with thirty-four students, there are at least twelve teetotalers; while at the Baptist College, Haverfordwest, only four of the twenty-seven students have declared themselves abstainers.

The Trevecca College is presided over by an abstainer, and eight or nine of the twelve students follow the example of their principal.

3. RELIGIOUS PERSECUTION.

ACCORDING to the calculations of some, about 200,000 Christian Protestants suffered death in seven years under Pope Julian; no less than 100,000 were massacred by the French in the space of three months; the Waldenses who perished, amounted to 1,000,000; within thirty years the Jesuits destroyed 900,000; under the Duke of Alva 26,000 were executed by the hangman; 159,000 by the Irish massacre; besides the vast multitude of whom the world could never be particularly informed, who were proscribed, starved, burnt, assassinated, chained to the galleys for life, immured within the walls of the Bastille, or others of the Church and State prisons. According to some, the whole number of persons massacred since the rise of the Papacy, including the space of 1,400 years, amounts to 15,000,000.

NOTICES OF PUBLICATIONS.

1. The complete Works of Richard Sibbes, D.D., Master of Catherine Hall, Cambridge, Preacher of Gray's Inn, London. Edited with memoir, by the Rev. ALEXANDER B. GROSBART, Kinross.

Vol. II. containing Bowels Opened, or, a discovery of the near and dear love, Union and Communion between Christ and the Church; the Spouse, Her earnest desire after Christ—a breathing after God—the Returning Backslider—the marriage feast between Christ and His Church.

2. Vol. III. of the same; containing a commentary on the first chapters of the second Epistle to the Corinthians. Edinburgh: James Nichol, London: James Nisbet, & Co.; Dublin, Robertson.

THESE two respectable volumes are part of Nichol's Series of the Puritan Divines, and are deserving all the patronage bestowed on former volumes of the same series. It is difficult to speak in too favourable terms of the works before us, if we except certain Calvinistic notions, and, of course, certain quaint and now-a-days scarcely intelligible modes of expression. Sibbes was a writer of good sound sense and vivid imagination, and, perhaps more than most Puritan writers, resembled the silver-tongued Jeremy Taylor in the Established Church. If our readers will make allowance for the times when he wrote, and for the defects above-named, they may derive much instruction and spiritual profit from a studious perusal of Sibbes' works. To our preachers especially they will be found a treasure, and they may be obtained through our own Book Room.

3. A Series of Dissertations on the Doctrines of the Bible; forming a concise and comprehensive system of Christian Theology. By JAMES GARNER, Minister of the Gospel. Third Edition, revised and enlarged. London: Davies, Sutton Street, Commercial Road, East, and may be had of all Primitive Methodist ministers and booksellers.

WE are glad to see that this valuable work has so soon reached a third edition, and we shall be still more glad if permitted to see a thirtieth. It was our privilege to read the work in MS., and we then expressed to the author our favourable opinion of his production. A re-examination has only confirmed our former views. The author informs his readers that he has carefully corrected the work for this edition, and on various subjects he has considerably enlarged it, so that it is in all respects superior to either of the editions previously issued. A very ample table of contents is prefixed to the work, which renders it, as a book of reference, very valuable. The volume presents externally a respectable appearance, and is altogether worthy of the respected author, and the Connexion to which he has devoted his able and successful ministry. We very earnestly commend the volume to the prayerful and frequent perusal of our junior brethren in the ministry, and to all others who wish to have sound and scriptural views of the doctrines of the Gospel. A better text book for divinity students, especially among all the Methodist bodies, we cannot mention. Let all our libraries be speedily enriched by the addition of this inestimable book.

4. Wilmshurst's Bible Exercises, or Scripture references, for schools and families. Third Edition. Price One Shilling. London: Aylott and Son, 8, Paternoster Row.

As an exercise book for young people this is excellent. All the leading doctrines and facts of Scripture are introduced, and references are given to the most appropriate texts relating thereto. Questions are given for the purpose of exciting attention and stimulating to a diligent and frequent consultation of the sacred volume; and if young persons will devote their leisure moments to the work of mastering the interesting and important subjects thus brought before them, they will assuredly become wiser and better for so doing.

5. Memoirs of Mrs. Elizabeth Fry; including a history of her labours in promoting the Reformation of female prisoners, and the improvement of British Seamen. With a Biographical Sketch of her brother, J. J. Gurney, Esq. By the Rev. THOMAS TIMPSON. Second edition. Aylott and Son, Paternoster Row, London.

THE name of Elizabeth Fry has long been a household word among all classes of Christians in England and America. And when we say that this is a touching history of her wonderful career, we hardly need say more to interest the intelligent readers of our Magazine in the work. To all who want a portable life of one of the best of England's daughters, we say, procure the volume now before us. The sketch of the life of Mr. Gurney enhances the value of the book.

6. Meliora: a Quarterly Review of Social Science in its Ethical, Economical, Political, and Ameliorative Aspects. October, 1862. One Shilling. London: Partridge, 9, Paternoster Row.

THE contents of the present number of MELIORA are, the History of British Journalism, Milton on Temperance, Bread and the Bakers, Workmen's Halls versus Public Houses, the Haunted House, International Temperance and Prohibition Convention, and Reviews of Books.

Lord Brougham has well described this Journal as "most ably conducted." And the present number is not inferior to its predecessors. There is a wide range of subjects, and a considerable variety in the handling thereof in this excellent Review. But on the whole we regard it as of equal merit to most of the six shilling quarterlies of the day. It has been a favourite with us from the beginning; and we are always glad to meet with it as it comes in our way in its successive numbers. To all temperance reformers it should be especially acceptable, and readers in general will find their account in perusing its instructive pages. Several of the papers of this number will be found of more than ordinary value, especially those on Milton and Workmen's Halls. We wish for the work enlarged success.

7. The Future: an outline of Events predicted in the Holy Scriptures; being a revised edition of "Themes of thought in the Prophetic Page." By the Rev. JOHN COX, author of "Our Great High Priest;" "Pre-millennial Manual;" "Divine Mercy;" &c., &c. London: Nisbet and Co., Ward and Co., and Partridge.

WE take it that this work is the production of a gentleman of piety and ability, but whose piety verges on fanaticism and whose ability is devoted to a somewhat questionable task. The Jews, in the time of our Lord, were on the tiptoe of expectation for a personal reign, and ever since the days of Origen there have been Christian writers who have laboured under the same delusion. Ever and anon they have been crying, "Lo here! and lo there!" forgetting very frequently that the kingdom of God is within us. The literal interpretation of texts that figuratively predict and describe the triumphs of the Gospel has led to enormous mistakes. The dates even when the Saviour should come in His glory, and ascend the throne of David, and begin His millennial reign upon the earth, have sometimes been confidently fixed, and wonderful prognostications have been indulged in by these interpreters, preachers, and writers as to what scenes and events should accompany His appearing. But the touch of time has dissolved these fabrications of fancy, and the wheel of time has ground them to atoms. One wishes that men would learn that "secret things belong unto the Lord our God," and leave Him to reveal them in His own time and manner. If good people would give diligence to promote the faithful preaching of the plain truths of the Gospel, and the conversion of sinners to Christ, instead of rambling among the hills and valleys of morbid speculation, it would much more conduce to the advancement of the true triumphs of the Saviour, and the hastening of the period when "men shall be blessed in Him; and all nations shall call Him blessed." Faith, prayer and self-denying labour will bring a larger revenue of honour to Christ than all the loads of mystified speculations on the pre-millennial and post-millennial reign. There are some good things in this book, but on the whole we cannot recommend it to our readers, because we do not see that much good can result from its circulation. The author belongs to the class of writers who form what is called the pre-millennarian school.

8. Hymns for Pastors and People. By SAMUEL DUNN. London: Hamilton, Adams, and Co. 1862.

MANY persons will doubtless be surprised to meet Mr. Dunn in the new costume of a poet and hymnologist. We have been long acquainted with him as a Wesleyan Minister, and an author and editor of considerable ability; we have known him as a friend of Dr. A. Clarke, and other eminent men in the ranks of Methodism, and of nonconformity; we have also known him in connection with the Wesleyan Reform movement, as the colleague of Messrs. Everett and Griffith, and as one of the editors of the Wesleyan Banner; we have heard of him more recently as a congregational minister at Sheffield, and finally as the pastor of a Methodist Free Church, at Camborne, in Cornwall, but, we confess, we were taken by surprise when we found that he had at last become a poet. As a prose writer and especially as a controversialist, we seemed to be at home with him, but as a poet, the author of a new hymn book, we at first felt as if he were strange to us. But here he is notwithstanding. And unless we much mistake, he will be admired in his new capacity quite as much by the generation of God's people, as in any of his former ones. Many of these hymns, if they had not come too late, might have graced the pages of our own book; and assuredly they would compare to no small advantage with many that occupy high ground in the psalmody of the Christian Churches in England generally. Many of the hymns have been composed on texts on which the author had preached, and the fervour of the pulpit is condensed and conserved within them. A great variety of subject, including doctrine, experience, and practice, will here be met with; and the author has evidently been more solicitous to develop the sense than merely to give the sound and rhythm of poetry. His hymns are sound in doctrine, clear in expression, and, on the whole, symmetrical in construction. With great pleasure we commend them to the lovers of evangelical psalmody, both in our own Churches and in all others in the land.

9. Two Lectures on the Wesleyan Hymn Book, with Tabulated Appendix of the Hymns and their respective Authors. By the Rev. JOSEPH HEATON. Published by request. London: John Mason, 66, Paternoster Row. 1862. Price Sixpence.

WHAT a mass of instruction and interest does the above title indicate! Here within the compass of some sixty-four pages, we have biography, criticism, divinity, poetry, history, and archæology. Without pronouncing the author always correct, we may venture to assert that the information he has so liberally and eloquently supplied, is generally reliable, and the criticisms in which he has indulged, are for the most part judicious and sound. The lectures were delivered to Wesleyan congregations in Birmingham, and are very properly, at the request of those who heard them, given to the public through the press. Any one wishful to possess a fund of interesting intelligence regarding the Wesleyan collection of hymns, will do well to spend sixpence on these lectures.

10. Family Prayers for Morning and Evening use, and for various special occasions; with others for children and young persons. By the Rev. JOHN SWETE, D.D., Minister of the Orphan Asylum Chapel, Bristol. Twelfth edition. London: Aylott and Son, 8, Paternoster Row. 1862.

If any of our readers need "aids to devotion," this is the book for them. Scriptural, and sweet, are these prayers. They may be profitably read by those who would not like to use forms of prayer in prayer.

11. The City of the Great King. London: F. Algar, 11, Clement's Lane, City, 1862.

THIS is an anonymous work in blank verse. But there is the ring of the genuine coin in it. It reminds us of Pollok, though we may not say it equals him. But our readers may take our word for it the book will well repay perusal. Some heavy hits are bestowed on the Papal Church, and all establishments come in for a share. True Christianity, however, is the author's pride, and the Church of the living God the city to which he belongs, and whose praises he sings. We cordially recommend to all lovers of genuine Christian poetry the perusal of this book.

12. Confessions of a convert from Baptism in water to Baptism with water. Third Edition. London: John Snow, 35, Paternoster Row.

THIS convert is no mere neophyte. He is a disciple of some advancement. His book has won for itself a name and a place. The third edition is a good credential. The author is not unacquainted with the fact that Edwards, Ewing, Wardlaw, Thorn, Halley, and Godwin, have discussed the questions involved in the aqueous controversy: but he rightly judges that for the multitude something more portable is necessary. And this he has supplied. Perhaps he might not be aware of the existence of the volume of the Rev. T. Mills, of the Methodist New Connexion, nor of the pamphlet of the Rev. W. Garner in our own; but whether he was or not, he has done well in adding his own "Confessions" to the previous works on the subject. We suppose that some of our readers may still have occasion to ponder the question whether Baptism in water or Baptism with water be the more scriptural; and if so, we commend them to these clever and candid confessions. A few hours devoted to the study of this and kindred works, might save many a young person, and some old ones, a good deal of unnecessary mental disquietude. Let all who wish for light on the subject of Baptism, besides consulting the Scriptures for themselves—which is the best course to be adopted—betake themselves also to the depositions of this anonymous but able author.

13. The A B C Church and Chapel Directory; and Visitor's guide book: showing the places where, the times when, and the ministers by whom the Gospel is preached in London and its suburbs. London: W. Kent. Twopence.

A HAPPY idea, pretty well developed. We could wish that the next edition should be carefully revised, and some items of intelligence, required by the title, more correctly given. On the whole, this little work supplies a felt want, and must be highly acceptable to many persons.

14. Our Habits, Influence, and Responsibilities. A Lecture delivered before the Young Men's Christian Association, in the Town Hall, Oxford. By W. BATEMAN. Price Threepence. Liverpool: J. Looney, South John Street, and the Author, 33, Bold Street; London: R. Davies, Primitive Methodist Book Room.

THE author of this interesting and instructive lecture is the son of Mr. Thomas Bateman, so well known in the Primitive Methodist Connexion, and himself, we believe, a useful local preacher in the Liverpool Circuit. The lecture was delivered originally, as stated on the title page, in the Oxford Town Hall, when the author was a resident in that ancient city. It has subsequently been prepared for the press at the solicitation of friends, and should any profits accrue, they will be devoted to the aid of certain chapels in the neighbourhood of Liverpool. We give the lecture our hearty recommendation, and hope the talented author will have the pleasure of learning that it has an extensive sale and does great good. To all young men we especially commend it.

15. The American War. By NEWMAN HALL. A Lecture to Working Men, delivered in London, October 20th, 1862. London: James Nisbet and Co., Berners Street; John Snow, Paternoster Row. Price Threepence.

NEWMAN HALL is so well known as a preacher and a writer, that anything from his pen is sure to command attention. The present lecture relates to a subject in which the civilized world is now deeply interested; and we rejoice to find Mr. Hall's views are so Christian and philanthropic. Certain English journalists and other parties have lately excited our astonishment and indignation by the sympathy they have shewn with the slaveholding interest in America, and we feel refreshed to meet with such an expression of enlightened sentiment in relation to this absorbing question, and the state of affairs among our American cousins, as this excellent lecture contains. Let all who wish to see the naked truth, and to ascertain what the best minds among Englishmen think on the subject of the American war, and that black root from which it springs, read Mr. Hall's timely and able lecture.

16. Old Jonathan, Nos. 77 and 79. London: Collingridge. One Penny each.

"OLD JONATHAN" holds on "the even tenor of his way;" and with a cheerful face, that contrasts strongly, just now, with that of "Brother Jonathan," he has always a kind word for us. The engravings are good, and the paper and letter press worthy of Mr. Collingridge's City Press. To our young friends of both sexes, "Old Jonathan" must be heartily welcome. To those who do not enjoy the friendship of "Jonathan," it may suffice to say he belongs to the same class as the "British Workman" and the "Band of Hope Review." The more of such publications for the old and young among the industrious workers of good old England the better.

17. Modern Atheism and the Bible. Report of the Discussion between the Rev. W. Barker, Minister of Church Street Chapel, Blackfriars, and "Iconoclast," Editor of the "National Reformer;" held at Cowper Street School Room, City Road, London, in the month of September, 1862. London: Ward and Co., 27, Paternoster Row. Price One Shilling and Threepence.

"ICONOCLAST," alias "The Image Breaker," alias Charles Bradlaugh, has here met with an antagonist worthy of his blade. Mr. Barker is a talented Baptist minister, formerly of Blackburn and of Halifax, now of London. He felt himself called upon to do what it scarcely becomes any ordinary mortal to do, to enter the arena of controversy with this vaunting secularist or atheist. Mr. Brewin Grant has always seemed to us to be the best man to deal with these secularists, and we rather regret that he has recently given them up to the hardness of their hearts and the softness of their heads. But Mr. Barker has acquitted himself in this case second to no one, except Mr. Grant. All who wish to know how a talented man can deal with these rampant atheists, may read this discussion to advantage.

18. The Liberator: June to October, 1862. London: Houlston and Wright. Price Twopence each monthly number.

As usual, full of pointed and powerful papers on the evils growing out of the establishment of the Episcopal Church. Read, mark, learn, and inwardly digest.

HOME RELIGIOUS INTELLIGENCE.

WORK OF GOD.

1. CHIPPING NORTON BRANCH, WITNEY CIRCUIT.—Recently we have been favoured with a gracious outpouring of the Holy Spirit in some parts of this branch.

A village, called Swarford, where many unsuccessful efforts have been made by our people to arouse, enlighten, and elevate its inhabitants; has now become a place of importance among us. Many of the people have been brought under the influence of Divine truth, and to drink of the pure river of Divine grace.

Within the last three months a church of sixteen members has been established, and the work is gloriously advancing, and there appears to be every prospect of its continuance.

Little Fen, a village where our society has been in a feeble and declining state for many years, God has also graciously visited by a rich baptism of the Holy Ghost; consequently the members have been aroused to their duty, and the mighty engine of all prayer set at work, so that at a camp-meeting, held June 8th, the Word of God, like a "hammer" broke, like a "fire" burned, and like a "ploughshare" turned up the fallow ground of the hearts of sinners, and a cry for pardoning mercy was heard, both from young and old; and before the meeting terminated many were enabled to rejoice in God's salvation, and to testify to the fact that "Christ has power on earth to forgive sins." Here we have joined nearly twenty to the Society, and the converting work is auspiciously progressing.

Wigginton, where our people have for years tried, (but without success,) to form a society, has just felt "the dropping of a shower from above." Thank God, the spring of spiritual life and glory has burst forth among the people, and rich grapes from the land of promise have fallen, for here we have succeeded in establishing a society of sixteen members. Also at South Newington and Barton camp-meetings several obtained mercy, and returned home rejoicing in God.

EDWARD ALFORD.

2. BIRKENHEAD CIRCUIT, CAMPERDOWN STREET.—Sermons for the school were preached here by the writer, on July 20th, when upwards of six guineas were collected, being in advance of any previous year.

South Tranmere; after preaching here on July 27, three souls were converted to God; this has long been a station for Primitive Methodism, and under the superintendency of Brother T. Jobling a chapel was erected in 1846, at a cost of £358, towards which £158 were raised at the time. Not a bad start this, but from various causes there has been no reduction since. Recently there have been vigorous efforts made to establish an annual field tea-meeting for the above desirable object, and on July 28th the second was held in a field at Bebbington, belonging to Mr. J. Thomas, a local preacher and trustee with us. To insure success, bills, announcing the meeting had been freely circulated, hopes expressed and prayers offered for a fine day; in this we were favoured, and at the appointed time help from various quarters began to arrive, among which we had a goodly import from Liverpool. About 600 took tea, the total number on the ground, after tea, must have been about 3,000.

A goodly company then engaged in camp meeting style holding a religious service, at which plain and pointed exhortations were given by J. Matheson, Esq., of Poulton, Rev. — Stainton of Huddersfield, Brothers Crompton and Bateman, of Liverpool Circuit, and the writer; our best thanks are due to Mr. Isherwood, our Liverpool friends, and all who contributed to make the evening one of profitable entertainment, the pecuniary profits of which are £12 2s.

Seacombe; a good work has been going on here for some time, and many have given themselves to Christ.

HOPEFULL.

3. WYEMOUTH MISSION.—We have recently held some excellent camp-meetings in this station.

At Portland, July 27th, 1862, the Rev. J. Rackham preached in the chapel at half-past six o'clock in the morning. At nine o'clock we met for prayer, and after having spent about half-an-hour in invoking the blessing of God on the efforts we were going to put forth, we processioned through the streets, in different parts of which prayers were offered to God, and addresses delivered to the people. Six sermons were preached on the camp-ground during the day. At half-past five o'clock in the evening, a sermon was preached in the open air near the chapel, by T. Lane. Subsequently we retired to the chapel, and held a lovefeast and a prayer meeting. The congregations on the camp ground were large; the influence which attended the word was mighty, the lovefeast was a powerful one, and one soul cried for mercy, and several were deeply impressed, and felt they were sinners.

At Dorchester, August 3rd, we commenced by prayer; afterwards we sang the praises of God through the streets, informed the people that we were going to heaven, and invited them to come with us, assuring them that Christ is a willing and an able Saviour, and that if they would come to Him, He would make them happy. Eight sermons were preached during the day; the congregations were very good, the blessing of God was imparted, and at the prayer-meeting, which was held at night, subsequently to the lovefeast, four cried for mercy, three of whom were made happy through believing in Jesus. At this place we have opposition to encounter, but our trust is in the Lord. He has blessed us with six increase of members for the quarter.

At Weymouth, August 10th, we met in the chapel at eight o'clock, A.M., and held a prayer meeting till nine. And then we sang through the town, in our usual manner. Several addresses were delivered at various parts, prayers were also offered up to the God of all grace, for an outpouring of His Holy Spirit; five sermons were preached on the camp field. At six o'clock we held a lovefeast, after the lovefeast we held a very powerful prayer meeting. One poor sinner bowed before that Saviour who is rich in mercy, and she has since identified herself with us.

At Piddletown, August 24th. Here we walked through the village, singing, "Hark the Gospel news is sounding," &c. In course of processioning two or three engaged in prayer. The writer gave two addresses to the people. Six sermons were delivered at the camp ground, and a very gracious influence was felt during the day, especially at the lovefeast in the evening, which was held in the open air. T. LANE.

4. LUTON CIRCUIT.—Dear Editor, Having been repeatedly and urgently solicited by the officials and friends to send you a few lines on my humble labours in this circuit during the last four years, I at length comply.

And I must at once acknowledge that the success which has crowned my ministrations, &c., is owing greatly to the kind co-operation of the local brethren, the circuit officials, the Sunday-school teachers, the generosity of the Christian public, and the smile and blessing of Almighty God.

In chapel matters our first undertaking was at Sharpenhoe, where a new chapel was built at a cost of £140, of which the friends raised £50. We then enlarged Toddington chapel, which cost £90, and we raised £85. Trowley Bottom was considerably improved at an outlay of £19, all paid; we then built a small chapel at Bendish, which cost £80, toward which was raised £30. Stanbridge chapel was rebuilt for the sum of £170, and about £70 was realized. At Luton spacious galleries were erected, at a cost of £404, the whole of which was paid; and last year large jubilee school-rooms were erected, capable of accommodating more than six hundred children; the cost was about £465, and the friends raised £165; since then we have held a bazaar which came off last April, and brought a clear balance of £110 to the trust fund. On the 18th of April last, the foundation stone was laid for a beautiful little chapel at Houghton Regis, which will cost about £400, the friends are doing nobly for this undertaking. The Dunstable friends have also been up and doing, and during the past year have raised more than £120 for chapel purposes; and at the time I was leaving the station they were busily making preparations for the laying of a foundation stone of a magnificent edifice to cost some eight or nine hundred pounds. May God prosper their arduous but glorious toils. Last but not least about 260 souls were added to our society during the four years. And on Sunday, July 6th, I preached my farewell sermon to more than a thousand hearers. Farewell.

J. PHILLIPS.

MISSIONARY SERVICES.

1. EDINBURGH MISSION.—Dear Editor,—We have just celebrated our missionary anniversary. The Rev. James Fleetwood, of Glasgow, preached two powerful sermons to large and attentive congregations, on Sunday, August 31st; and on the following day a missionary meeting was held in Richmond-place Congregational chapel, kindly lent for the occasion. The Rev. Thomas Guthrie, D.D., Moderator of the Free Church Assembly, took the chair, and delivered an interesting speech. The meeting was also addressed by Rev. W. Pusford (Independent); Rev. J. Watson (Baptist); Rev. T. Cochrane (Free Church); Rev. J. Fleetwood (deputation); and the writer. We are unable to give your readers an account of the exact amount realized, as several subscriptions are not yet got in, but the amount already obtained is £14 13s. 1d., being nearly double the sum realized last year. This is considered by our people to have been the best missionary anniversary ever held in this city. We give God the glory. J. VAUGHAN.

2. LISKEARD MISSION.—Dear Editor,—On Sunday, October 5th, 1862, missionary sermons were preached at Liskeard, by the Rev. G. Doe, of Taunton; at Henwood and Cheesewring railway, by Mr. M. Gay, and the writer; at Tremar, by Mr. R. Olver; and at Roseland-vale, by Mr. H. Hawkey. On the five following days, missionary meetings were held at the above-named places. The congregations were large, respectable, and attentive; the speeches were full of energy and power, and the people were pleased and profited. At Liskeard, A. Hingston, the mayor, presided; at Henwood, an influential gentleman connected with the Wesleyan Methodists. The proceeds of this very interesting course of missionary meetings amounted to £7 3s. 10d., being nearly double the amount raised last year.

J. STARR.

SCHOOL SERVICES.

1. LEAMINGTON.—On Sunday, July 20th, 1862, commenced one of the most interesting anniversaries ever held in connection with our cause in this town; two sermons were preached by Mr. G. Jackson; one at eleven A.M., and the other at half-past six P.M. In the afternoon at three o'clock an address was given by J. Green, Esq., to parents and teachers. On Monday the 21st, a tea meeting took place, at the close of which a public meeting was held, when addresses were delivered by Messrs. Garner and E. Young; the chair being occupied by J. Hitchman, Esq. Suitable pieces and dialogues were recited by the children. The amount raised at the services was £4 10s.

G. WALLIS.

2. WEST LUTTON, DRIFFIELD CIRCUIT.—Some few months ago our society at West Lutton commenced a Sabbath school; the school has prospered, and the number of scholars continues to increase. A short time ago a public tea for the benefit of the school was provided and served, and after tea a public meeting of an enthusiastic character was held. Great excitement was created in favour of a work-day school. The distance of the village from such an institution, and the great number of children needing instruction, show the necessity of a work-day school being originated here. The thought was realized, and now it is likely very soon to become a solid fact. Here we have among us a hearty son of Vulcan, a man not very large in stature, but one who has both head and heart; and one whose wife is no hindrance but a helpmeet indeed for him. He has turned his attention to the subject. Not allowing the excitement to subside which was created at the Sabbath-school anniversary, but acting on the motto of his craft, and striking while the iron is hot, he is influencing the public mind favourably, and has realized already the sum of £40 4s. 1½d. July 21st a great public tea was served in Mr. Bell's show room, and after tea a public meeting was held in his yard, in the open air, because a room large enough to hold the audience could not be obtained. Mr. Robson, of Hull, presided. The speakers were the Revs. J. Bootland, of Malton; and T. Greenbury and J. Wood, of Scarborough. They did good execution, wielding most effectually the weapons of logic and oratory. That the friends at West Lutton may prosper in their undertaking, and that the time may soon come when every Primitive Methodist Society may have the necessary appendage of a Sabbath and a work-day school is the prayer of

E. TYAS.

3. LAMBLEY, NOTTINGHAM SECOND CIRCUIT.—On Lord's-day, July 20th, 1862, two services in behalf of the above school were conducted by the Rev. J. Dickenson, of the Nottingham Second Circuit; in the afternoon at half-past two, and in the evening at six o'clock. The chapel, on former occasions being too small, a large tent kindly lent for the occasion, was set up, and we are glad to say that nearly 400 were under its covering at the evening service. The pieces and dialogues recited by the children at each service, interspersed with hymns suitable for the occasion gave great satisfaction. Collections were made amounting to £5 16s. 10d. —£2 12s. 3½d. in advance of last year. On Monday, July 21st, the children, with the teachers and friends, processioned in the village, singing at suitable places, and at five o'clock a public tea was provided in the tent for the friends of the institution, when about 120 availed themselves of the opportunity of attending. The children were addressed by Rev. J. Dickenson, Mr. Blatch (Independent), and Mr. Stathom; and thus closed one of the best anniversaries ever witnessed in Lambley.

W. ANCOTT.

4. LINSLADE, LEIGHTON BUZZARD STATION.—Dear Brother Antliff—About twelve months since we sent an account to the magazine of the opening services of our new chapel at this place; we now supply you with a short account of the first anniversary of our Sabbath school. On Sunday, July 20th, three sermons were preached by the Rev. W. Birks, the newly appointed minister to this the Leighton Buzzard Station. The congregations were large and the influence of the Holy Spirit was felt. On the following day at two o'clock the children and teachers processioned through the place, singing at different points some of their pieces, headed by a beautiful new banner. At three o'clock the children took tea with their teachers, and afterwards retired to a field provided for them. At four o'clock about 130 adults took tea. At six o'clock the friends assembled to witness the examination of the children of the day-school, which gave great satisfaction to all present. At seven we opened the public meeting; J. Wilson took the chair, and addresses were delivered by Messrs. Birks, Butler, Bradley, and Denchfield. The school numbers fifty-two girls and sixty-four boys. The proceeds of the anniversary are £6; and considering the school is in its infancy, having been established but nine months, we thank God and take courage. J. WILSON.

LAYING FOUNDATION STONES.

1. BARNINGHAM, THETFORD CIRCUI.—At this village our people opened a mission, twelve or thirteen years since, and although the good seed sown at that time did not immediately spring up and produce visible fruit on any very extensive scale, it seemed, nevertheless, to have taken root, and we are now constrained to say, "What hath God wrought!" For several years past the society and congregations have been exceedingly inconvenienced from the want of a suitable place to worship in; and, although repeated attempts have been made to obtain a piece of land for building purposes, all such efforts have, until of late, been fruitless. For the last two or three years, during the spring and summer months, the society has been accustomed to worship in two different barns, kindly lent by a gentleman of whose generosity and kindness we wish to speak in the highest terms, while during the winter we have been compelled to conduct the services in a cottage, and by these means our congregations have from time to time decreased more than fifty per cent. The recurrence of such disadvantageous circumstances in the future we were determined to prevent, if possible. At length an application being made to a lady who lived at a distance for a site of land, she wrote to say she "was not inclined to sell a small piece, but would dispose of a whole field containing four acres," and, in order to "force the blockade," the writer, on his own responsibility, accepted it at the price at which it was offered. Now we found ourselves on safe ground, and felt disposed as soon as possible to build. After preaching one evening, the writer stopped the whole congregation and told them (the thing having till now been kept almost entirely a secret) that if they felt themselves able to carry out the measure they might have a chapel as large as the "Metropolitan Tabernacle." This news fell on their ear like a thunder-clap, producing very pleasurable sensations, and soon nearly thirty pounds were promised towards carrying out the enterprise. On Monday, July 28th, the foundation of the temple was laid, when the Rev. Morgan Lloyd (Independent) preached an excellent sermon from the words, "And I, if I be lifted up, will draw all men unto me."

After the sermon, a number of friends laid a brick in the building, accompanied with donations varying from a sovereign to a sixpence, the total of which amounted to £7 10s. Od. After this a public tea was partaken of by 140 persons, who felt themselves highly delighted with what was going on. A public meeting was afterwards held, addressed by brothers T. Goodwin (chairman), Frost, Addison, and Alderton, Rev. M. Lloyd, J. Kemish, and the writer. The amount raised as profits of tea and collections amounted to £16, which we think exceedingly good. Many thanks are due to the friends who provided trays gratis, for the tea, who gave liberal donations, and who are trying in other ways to bring this much desired object to a happy issue. May they all share at last in the eternal blessedness awaiting them above the skies, is the prayer of JOHN ALLISON.

2. WESTBROMWICH SQUARE, WESTBROMWICH CIRCUIT. — For many years our preaching services were conducted in a house, and latterly in a rented chapel, which was much too small, and the cry was, give us room that we may dwell. Earnest prayer was made that a more suitable place might be secured, on which to erect a house for God. At length the opening appeared, and ground was secured for £60; and on Monday, July 21st, the foundation stone was laid by John Lees, Esq., of Hill-Top. The day was fine and everything favourable. At one o'clock the sabbath school children, teachers, and friends, met to form a procession. All the children carried flags and banners, and on moving they commenced singing,—

"Praise ye the Lord, 'tis good to raise," &c. We proceeded through Hill-Top and Gold's Green, returning with a very large number of gentlemen and friends to the site on which the chapel was to be erected. The following gentlemen very kindly took part in the ceremony: Thomas Davis, J. Grise, C. Bloomer, J. J. Bowater, W. Hodgkins, S. Lees, Esqs.; Revs. J. Morton, R. Jukes, M. Nicholas, S. Sanders, R. Jones, and E. Burton; and at least a thousand people were present, full of interest, and greatly profited. Mr. Lees gave a most excellent address, in which he remarked that he hoped when the chapel was finished it would at once be paid for; and went on to show how it may be done. A collection was made amounting to the noble sum of £50, £26 of which were given by Mr. Lees. Excellent addresses were delivered by the other gentlemen named. The Doxology, and prayer by Rev. R. Jones, closed this service. Before dismissing the children a supply of buns, given by Mr. Lees, was distributed by Miss Lees to the children of the school. The company now moved away to the Wesleyan school-room, Hill-Top, (very kindly lent for the occasion), where about 500 sat down to tea, after which the chair was taken by John Lees, Esq., and addresses were given by Revs. J. Morton, R. Jukes, R. Jones, M. Nicholas, S. Sanders, S. Lees, J. Grice and Thos. Davis, Esqs. The latter gentleman very kindly gave an additional £5 towards the chapel. I may add that the sympathy and help of our Wesleyan friends has surpassed all I ever saw. May God ever bless them, and make the chapel, when built, the birth-place of thousands. Amen. MAURICE NICHOLAS.

3. DUNSTABLE.—We have been for some time past in want of increased accommodation for our congregation and Sunday school scholars at Dunstable. Efforts have been put forth to secure this, and on Sunday, July 13, 1862, sermons preparatory to stone-laying were preached by Rev. W. Harland to attentive and delighted audiences. Monday, 14th July, the day appointed to lay the stone, was one of great expectation and anxiety to our friends. A procession was formed by the friends, headed by the Revs. W. Harland, G. Lamb, J. Langham, and J. Fuller, followed up by local preachers, members, and the sabbath school scholars. The Rev. W. Harland, after singing and prayer, delivered an enlivening and thrilling address to the vast assembly; after which Mr. H. Twelveteen, of London, laid the foundation stone ; and upon the stone he laid the very handsome donation of twenty guineas. Three other gentlemen, Messrs. G. Hunt, B. Bennett, and F. Davis laid corner stones and gave addresses, followed by brick-laying generally amongst the company. Tea was provided in the Temperance Hall, at which over 200 sat down. After tea a public meeting was held, which was well sustained by very excellent speeches and singing. The proceeds of these services at the close of the week amounted to the noble sum of £100 9s. 3d. The building is of the Italian style, designed by Mr. G. Halton, architect, Luton ; the entire cost will be about £1,000 : may many souls be born for glory within its walls. Amen.

ANONYMOUS.

CHAPEL OPENINGS.

1. BOW BRICKHILL, LEIGHTON BUZZARD CIRCUIT.—Dear Brother Antliff,—The opening of this chapel was resumed on Sunday, July 27th, 1862, when three sermons were preached, those in the morning and evening by Mr. J. Wilson, and that in the afternoon by Mr. Bradley, from Chesterfield ; and the day following a tea and public meeting was held, and well sustained. About 60 of our friends from Leighton in conveyances nobly coming up to the help of our cause and interest at Brickhill, about 150 sat down to tea in a meadow, and we had a very good meeting in the chapel in the evening, presided over by Mr. J. Hopkins, and soul stirring addresses were delivered by Messrs. Butler, Watkins, Denchfield, Marriott, Forth, Bradley, Birks, and Wilson ; the chapel is freehold, and it is 18ft. by 28, and 16ft. to the wall plate ; it is well lighted, has a boarded floor, and is furnished with rail back-seats, and a rostrum with book board, &c., and plenty of room for enlargement if required. The whole cost, including £25 for the freehold land, given by our kind friend, Mr. J. Palmer, (of London), is about £110. We leave £60 debt for the trustees, which can be met with seat rents, leaving anniversaries and special efforts to reduce the debt annually. The Lord be praised for the help afforded to the present, and many thanks to those who have worked and subscribed towards the erection of this another sanctuary for God. May many souls be converted in it for His name's sake. J. WILSON.

2. BALDERTON, NEWARK CIRCUIT. — Dear Editor,—Doubtless you and a large circle of friends will rejoice to find we have so nobly succeeded in the erection of our neat and beautiful sanctuary at Balderton, a village which stood for a number of years as the head of a very extensive circuit, and in which you spent a part of your early and successful ministerial labours.

The following article is extracted from the "Newark Advertiser," of July 23rd, 1862 :—

The Primitive Methodists belonging to the Newark Circuit after preaching and having a society in this village for the last forty-five years, opened a neat sanctuary for divine worship on Sunday, 13th inst., when the Rev. J. Boulton preached in the afternoon at half-past two, and in the evening at six o'clock to densely crowded audiences, many being unable to gain admittance. On Monday the 14th, the friends to the number of 170, sat down to an excellent tea gratuitously provided in a barn belonging to Mr. Winter, near to the chapel. A public meeting commenced in the chapel at seven o'clock, presided over by the Rev. P. Daykin. The Revs. T. B. Attenborough, J. Boulton, J. Hardy, and B. Clayton (the second minister) delivered addresses. On Tuesday evening the Rev.

W. Antliff, (the Connexional Editor, who was on his way from Caunton to London), delivered a thrilling sermon to a large and attentive audience, and on Sunday last the Rev. B. Clayton closed the services by preaching in the afternoon and evening. The chapel stands on an elevated site of land, and very comfortably seats 130 persons. The plans and specifications were presented to the Trustees by the Superintendent of the Circuit, and the work has been executed by Messrs. Lunn and Briggs, of Balderton. The total cost will be £150, towards which £60 have already been contributed. The Trustees intend to add a vestry shortly, and commence a Sabbath-school.

I cannot do less than tender the grateful thanks of the trustees and circuit to you, Sir, and the numerous generous friends who have aided us. To G. Hodgkinson, Esq., M.P., for Newark, for £2. To Thomas Chilton, (17 years of age) who has raised by subscriptions £4, which he intends to make £5. To his sister and brother-in-law, Mrs. and Mr. Garner £2. To Mrs. Chilton, mother of the above, and family, for a large pulpit Bible, hymn book, cushion, &c, £2; to Mr. W. Sharp, Newark, £1; to Mr. W. Ingledew, Newark, £1; to Mr. Thomas Ridley, Newark, £1; to Mr. Spick, Farndon, £1; to Mr. Cooper, Upton, £1; to Mr. Hipkins, Sleaford, £1; to Mr. Woodcock, Balderton, £1; to Mr. Thomas Johnson, Balderton, £1; and to the last named person for carting all the materials free of charge to the spot. To a number of friends for ten shillings each and downwards, and to those kind friends at Newark, Balderton, and other places, who have given during the last six months all the provisions required for three large public tea-meetings.

The sittings are nearly all let, and God is graciously pouring out His Spirit on the people. Our number of members at this place, is nearly three times as many as it was twelve months ago.

This is the second chapel erected and opened during the last ten months in this circuit; and although the two parishes in which they stand join each other, there has been raised by voluntary aid, (and nearly the whole by a poor, but willing, pious, and industrious people,) the sum of £115. Nor have they ceased in their "work and labour of love," contributions are still coming in.

Praying that the Great Head of the Church may more abundantly bless this circuit and the world,
I beg to remain yours in the Lord,
PAUL DAYKIN.

3. HATFIELD, HORNSEA CIRCUIT.—At this village we have had a feeble society for about forty years. Mr. W. Garner, when a young man, once spent a night in a cow-shed at this place, when friends and homes were few. Several attempts have been made, without success, to obtain land on which to build a chapel. About two years ago a camp-meeting was held here, when a young man, who had been in the habit of spending his Sabbaths in the fields, strolled on to the camp-ground, became impressed, and from that time has been one of our most regular hearers: and through his influence with an aged uncle, the owner of considerable property in the parish, a piece of land has been obtained. The foundation stone was laid by Miss Hornsey, of Hornsea Burton, May 22nd, 1862, who presented us with £1. The chapel was opened on July 20th and 27th. Mr. J. T. Robson, of Hull, preached on the former Sabbath, and T. Whittaker on the latter. The chapel is a neat comfortable structure, and will seat about ninety persons. The total cost, fixing a moderate estimate on the land, which was given by Mr. R. Jackson, and the leadings, which were done gratuitously by the farmers, will be a little over £100. We have borrowed on note £55. We are yet a few poundsshort of the remainder, which we hope soon to realize. Several souls were converted at the opening services. That the chapel may be a blessing to the place and neighbourhood, is the earnest prayer of the writer.

THOMAS WHITTAKER.

4. TOFT, CAMBRIDGE CIRCUIT.—Dear Brother Antliff,—I have great pleasure in furnishing you with a report of the opening of our new chapel at Toft, in this Circuit. On Tuesday, July 29th, Divine service was commenced here at three o'clock in the afternoon, and the Rev. George Lamb, of London, preached a sermon, forcible in argument, lucid in style, and beautiful in language.

At five o'clock a public tea was provided in Mr. Tibbit's barn, which was very neatly decorated with green boughs and mottoes. The trays were the gifts of friends at Toft and Cambridge, the provision was rich and abundant, and much enjoyed by the large numbers present. After tea a public meeting was held in the barn which was then crowded to excess. Mr. Moses Mason, of Haslingfield, presided; and upon the platform were the Revs. G. Lamb, T. Swindill, and G. Bell; and Messrs. Glew, of Kingston, J. Barton, R. Brazier, J. Mott, and G. Dewberry, of Cambridge. On the Sabbath following, August 3rd, three sermons were preached in the chapel by the Rev. Edward Bishop, of Bedford. The whole of the services were well attended and realized the most sanguine expectations of the Toft friends; the two days' services together producing about £12 to the funds. Praise the Lord. Before concluding this report allow me to say, this place of worship occupies a central position in the village, is a neat, plain, but substantial building, capable of accommodating 150 persons, well fitted up and erected at a cost of about £150; the ground being given by — Beldam, Esq., of Royston; and we are happy to say all the expense has been met, except about £50—for which we have great cause to be thankful. To God be all the glory.

SAMUEL SMITH.

5. GRASBY, MARKET RASEN CIRCUIT.—Dear Editor,—Twenty years ago our people built a chapel in this village, which was also enlarged about ten years since, but this having become too small, a few months ago we decided to build a much larger chapel. Mr. J. Barkworth, a very indefatigable leader and local preacher in the place, offered us an eligible site of land for £10, and kindly promised to return us the money. We obtained the sanction of the proper Connexional authorities, and forthwith commenced operations. Messrs. Bentons, of Grimsby, drew the plans and specifications, and being also the successful tenderers for the building, they set to work in earnest, and had it ready for opening in less than three months. The opening services commenced on Sabbath, July 27th, 1862, when two powerful sermons were preached by Mr. T. Barkworth, of Sheffield. On the following Monday we had a large camp meeting and tea meeting, when upwards of 500 persons sat down to the social repast; nearly all the provisions being given by the members and friends in the neighbourhood. We were very efficiently assisted in the religious services by Mr. T. Barkworth, the Revs. C. Kendall, H. Clark, Mr. Smethurst and Mr. Simonson, of Grimsby; and Messrs. Dunham, Wray, and Rowbottom, of Brigg, and Mr. Beels, of Scawby. Also, on Sabbath, August 3rd, 1862, two good sermons were preached by the Rev. T. Kendall, of Doncaster, which closed the opening services. The chapel fits a neat edifice, will seat about 220 persons, and the entire work is very satisfactory to the trustees and friends, and reflects great credit on the builders. The sole cost of the undertaking is £209, towards which we have realized by donations, tea meeting, and collections, exclusive of all the leadings, the sum of £92 13s. 11d. To all the numerous friends who have in any way assisted us, we beg hereby to tender our sincere thanks, and to God we give the glory.

T. NEWSOME.

6. FLIMBY, MARYPORT CIRCUIT.

—This is a large and improving village which has doubled its inhabitants in the last ten years. It is situated on the seacoast, about two miles from Maryport, and is visited in summer by strangers for the benefit of the sea-breeze and bathing. There is a large mining population in the village and neighbourhood, and it is likely to be a thriving locality for years to come. It was missioned by the preachers in Whitehaven Circuit several years ago, and for some time it was on the preachers' plan. The Wesleyans and they preached alternately in a rented room. Two or three members were united in society, but through some cause the work declined, and the place was given up. In the close of 1859 a few members and friends from other places having removed to this neighbourhood, a request was made for the Primitives to visit it; and accordingly it was re-missioned by the preachers in the Whitehaven Circuit. A month's revival services were held, conducted principally by Brother Joseph Jopling; several were converted, and soon a society of thirty members was raised. The room that had been taken was found to be much too small for the congregation, and the cry went forth, "Lord, give us room that we may worship." As other chapels were being erected in the circuit (this being the sixth that has been opened within the last three years and a half), our friends had to wait their turn. In the meantime they kept looking out for a suitable site and doing a little towards raising funds. Application was made to the Earl of Lonsdale, who granted a very eligible leasehold site. Preparations were made forthwith. The building was contracted for, and the foundation-stone was laid by R. Wilson, Esq., April 7th, 1862. The chapel is built of brick, cemented on the outside. It is 34 feet 6 inches by 28 feet inside, and 16 feet from the ground floor to the ceiling, lighted by two pointed-topped windows on each side. It has a neat porch and palisading in front, and a back-door and yard. It will seat about 230 persons; ninety-four of the sittings are in rising pews, which were nearly all let the first night of letting. The body of the chapel is spacious, affording ample accommodation for prayer meetings, and a Sabbath-school which is to be opened shortly. The preaching stand is in the platform style, with a rail in front, sloping from each side of the book-board. As a whole it is one of the neatest and most elegant and commodious country chapels we have seen. On Sunday, August 10th, 1862, it was opened for Divine worship. The Rev. A. Dodds preached in the morning. In the afternoon the company being much too large for the place, the Rev. Mr. Scott, United Presbyterian minister, Manchester, being present, kindly consented to preach, and the Rev. J. Taylor, preached in the Wesleyan chapel, which was freely placed at our service. In the evening the

Rev. R. Cannan preached in the chapel, and Mr. J. Nicholson, in the Wesleyan chapel. On Monday, August 11th, a very excellent tea was gratuitously provided by several ladies, and was served in the Primitive and Wesleyan chapels, to 300 persons. After tea it was computed that near 400 people crowded into the chapel, and several were unable to gain admission. Appropriate and impressive addresses were delivered by the Revs. A. Dodds, chairman; J. Taylor, and B. Cannan; Messrs. C. McMullen, J. Jopling, and T. Dobinson. The collections on Sunday and Monday night amounted to £4 4s. 7d.; proceeds of tea, £13 16s. 2d. The total cost of the chapel will be about £200, towards which £90 has been raised.

J. TAYLOR.

OBITUARY.

1. THOMAS HARLAND, brother of the Rev. W. Harland, ex-editor, was born at Newton, in the Pickering Circuit, on the 29th May, 1796. In 1828 he was converted to God. In the same year he entered the service of T. M. Kendall, Esq., of this town, and remained with him for the thirty-four years of his life following. His master had ample opportunity of observing his "manner of life," and speaks in terms of the highest commendation of his character. Mr. and Mrs. K. visited him in his last affliction, and showed the greatest love for him. Our brother sustained the office of leader until 1861, when he became incapacitated (owing to his ailment) for attending long at once upon a religious service: and yet his death was unexpectedly sudden. He was confined to bed but a single week. His sufferings were severe, but they were borne with becoming and Christian firmness, patience, and resignation. To friends who visited him he spoke most confidently of his heavenly rest, of the reality of the religion he professed, and of the satisfaction of mind he felt as "life sank apace and death came in view." He breathed his last at Pickering, on June 8th, 1862, aged sixty-six years, and in the thirty-fourth of his membership with the Primitive Methodist Connexion. He was interred in a part of the churchyard selected by Mr. and Mrs. K., who, along with many of our society, accompanied his widow and friends to the grave.

T. DEARLOVE.

2. ELIZABETH CARTER, of Eastfield Side, in the Mansfield Circuit, was the subject of good impressions at a very early period of life. When sixteen years of age she was identified with the Wesleyan Society, but for some time after her marriage she was not a member of any church; though during that time she did not run into sin as some do on their withdrawal from church-fellowship. She attended God's house, and read her bible; and nothing grieved her more than to hear any person attack its contents. The Primitive Methodists missioned the neighbourhood nineteen years ago; she immediately united with them, and remained a very consistent member till her removal to heaven. During the former part of her union with us she met with considerable opposition from a very near quarter, but she held on her way, darkness was made light and the rough place plain. She suffered for twelve years from an affection of the heart, but did not charge God foolishly, but bowed to his will. The Bible she loved, its sacred pages she devoutly perused, and she drew succour thence, and was able also to speak a word in season to him that was weary. She was frequently alone with God. Mr. Carter states that when he awoke in the night many times she was on her knees by the bedside. The night prior to her death she was at her class as usual, and when summoned to remove all was right; her anchor was cast into that within the veil, whither the forerunner had for her entered, even Jesus. To her daughter, who stood weeping, she said, "Don't weep for me, but for yourself; I am going home to glory." To a friend she said, "I am in the furnace now, but I shall come out purified." And to her son, she said, "Weep not for me but prepare to meet me in heaven." And thus she passed away into that rest she so ardently desired, April 1st, 1862, in the forty-eighth year of her age. May the sudden event be sanctified to the survivors, is the prayer of

T. ROBERTS.

P O E T R Y.

CHRISTMAS, 1862.

'Tis the time of merry Christmas,
True genial Christmas-time;
When the hoar-frost gems the branches,
And the panes are starred with rhyme.

When the snow is lying whitely,
And stern Winter's icy hand,
Binding up the streams and rivers,
Makes a silence in the land.

'Tis a time of recollection,
When the loved and lost once more
Walk with us, as we remember
In the Christmases of yore.

When we twine the holly garlands
With their berries gleaming clear,
And a thought comes up before us
Of the former ones now sere.

'Tis a time of happy greeting,
Bringing heart to heart more near;
Re-uniting the long severed;
Making dear ones seem more dear.

'Tis a time of kindly feeling,
Of more true and earnest heed

For the sorrows of the mourner,
For the help of those who need.

'Tis a time of backward looking
To those blessed wondrous days
When the world's All-Great Creator
Stood revealed before its gaze.

When He came, the gracious Master—
Shedding peace and pardon wide,
Broadcast, on His guilty creatures—Bringing happy Christmas-tide.

'Tis a time of onward looking
To that second Advent nigh,
When He comes, the self-same Saviour,
'Midst the armies of the sky.

When the rocks are rent before Him,
And the wicked shrink away,
But His own look gladly upward—
'Tis to them the dawn of day.

Then, beloved, merry Christmas!
'Twill be so, if we are found
Walking so we could look upwards,
Should the Advent trumpets sound

E. L.

MILTON'S HYMN ON THE NATIVITY.

No war, or battle's sound,
Was heard the world around: [hung;
The idle spear and shield were high up
The hooked chariot stood
Unstained with hostile blood; [throng;
The trumpet spake not to the armed
And kings sat still with awful eye,
As if they surely knew their sovereign
Lord was by.

The oracles are dumb,
No voice or hideous hum [deceiving.
Runs through the arched roof in words
Apollo from his shrine
Can no more divine, [leaving.
With hollow shriek the steep of Delphos
No nightly trance, or breathed spell, Inspires the pale-eyed priest from the prophetic cell.

But peaceful was the night
Wherein the Prince of light
His reign of peace upon the earth began:
The winds with wonder whist
Smoothly the waters kiss'd,
Whispering new joys to the mild ocean,
Who now hath quite forgot to rave, While birds of calm sit brooding on the charmed wave.

The stars with deep amaze
Stand fixed in steadfast gaze, [ence,
Bending one way their precious influ-
And will not take their flight,
For all the morning light, [thence;
Or Lucifer, that often warned them
But in their glimmering orbs did glow,
Until their Lord Himself bespake, and bid them go.

The shepherds on the lawn,
Or e'er the point of dawn,
Sat simply chatting in a rustic row;
Full little thought they then
That the mighty Pan [below;
Was kindly come to live with them
Perhaps their loves, or else their sheep,
Was all that did their silly thoughts so busy keep.

When such music sweet
Their hearts and ears did greet,
As never was by mortal finger struck,
Divinely-warbled voice
Answering the stringed noise, [took:
As all their souls in blissful rapture
The air, such pleasure loth to lose,
With thousand echoes still prolongs each heavenly close.

Such music as ('tis said)
Before was never made, [sung,
But when of old the sons of morning
While the Creator great
His constellations set, [hung,
And the well-balanced world on hinges
And cast the dark foundations deep,
And bid the weltering waves their oozy channel keep.

Ring out, ye crystal spheres,
Once bless our human ears,
(If ye have power to touch our senses so,)
And let your silver chime
Move in melodious time, [blow,
And let the bass of heaven's deep organ
And with your ninefold harmony
Make up full consort to the angelic symphony.

INDEX.

BIOGRAPHIES—
Armstrong, Thomas . . .	257	Pyburn, James . . .	593
Bagge, John . . .	634	Ralphes, Henry . . .	68
Bailey, Betty . . .	332	Ride, John . . .	449
Barker, James . . .	288	Ritson, John . . .	657
Barnes, Mary H. . .	710	Roberts, Elizabeth . . .	619
Baxendale, Joseph . . .	250	Robinson, John . . .	142
Beckett, Richard . . .	695	Rollason, Joseph . . .	394
Beecroft, John . . .	527	Sidwell, David . . .	323
Bembridge, Alice . . .	271	Smith, Thomas . . .	4
Bennett, William . . .	205	Smith, Sarah . . .	523
Bingham, John . . .	251	Smith, Watson . . .	517
Bourne, James . . .	513	Sparke, James . . .	461
Bourne, William . . .	720	Standrin, Susannah . . .	459
Bradley, John . . .	70	Stark, Francis . . .	139
Briggs, Robert . . .	716	Staton, Thomas . . .	136
Brindley, Joseph . . .	9	Stutchcomb, Joseph . . .	140
Brownson, John . . .	129	Taylor, Ell . . .	323
Buckley, Sally . . .	718	Turner, Richard . . .	577
Burgess, James . . .	7	Turner, Susannah . . .	719
Burrell, Anna . . .	396	Vickery, Betty . . .	11
Bushell, John . . .	75	Walker, William . . .	137
Carthy, William . . .	193	Webb, John . . .	398
Cooper, John . . .	395	Wildgoose, Samuel . . .	400
Cooper, Stephen . . .	388	Williams, Job . . .	653
Corfield, Richard . . .	73	Williams, Mary Ann . . .	266
Crosbie, Thomas G. . .	585	CHAPEL ANNIVERSARIES.
Davies, George . . .	78	Bingley . . .	53
Dean, William . . .	452	Bradley Green . . .	179
Dodsworth, Richard . . .	713	Brighouse . . .	565
Dowson, Isaac . . .	717	Cambridge . . .	179
Drewery, William . . .	461	Charlton . . .	433
Driver, Thomas . . .	260	Cockwells . . .	52
Evans, Leah . . .	208	Consham . . .	53
Frith, Joseph . . .	391	Coventry . . .	434
Garner, John . . .	386	East Knowle . . .	434
Gee, John . . .	5	Edwinstow . . .	52
Gidell, Christopher . . .	72	King's Hill . . .	368
Gledsby, William . . .	385	Lynn . . .	563
Grievs, Joseph . . .	641	Northampton . . .	118
Grimdall, Henry . . .	267	Spalding . . .	307
Guymer, William . . .	71	St. George's . . .	119
Haigh, Mary . . .	73	Swansea . . .	434
Hainsworth, William . . .	16	Swinbrook . . .	52
Hamblly, John . . .	392	Tetney . . .	119
Handsaker, John . . .	529	Thompson . . .	63
Harrison, Jonathan T. . .	588	Worksop . . .	118
Hatton, John . . .	455	CHAPEL FOUNDATION STONES
Hawkesworth, Henry . . .	206	LAYING.
Heath, Robert . . .	78	Aston . . .	500
Horrocks, John . . .	592	Balderton . . .	502
Holdsworth, Nathan . . .	659	Barningham . . .	793
Hosking, Richard . . .	331	Bledfda . . .	698
Howarth, Thomas . . .	321	Braintree . . .	696
Jervis, Jessie . . .	457	Brotherton . . .	685
Jones, Moses . . .	651	Crowland . . .	696
Langham, Robert . . .	705	Dunstable . . .	754
Lounds, William . . .	656	East Rudham . . .	694
Lusher, William . . .	336	Frogball . . .	697
Manning, Robert . . .	711	Hockham . . .	502
Marsh, William . . .	389	Kirton Lindsey . . .	699
Marshall, William . . .	72	Lye Waste . . .	696
Maylard, Elizabeth . . .	325	Newbridge . . .	696
Medd, John . . .	14	Oakington . . .	698
Moon, William . . .	263	Peterborough . . .	367
Murray, William . . .	483	Ploughfield . . .	368
Nash, Robert . . .	388	Roeester . . .	697
Newstead, William . . .	69	Selby . . .	501
Oxton, James . . .	332	Shoreham . . .	307
Parker, Charles . . .	65	Sporie . . .	365
Parker, Thomas . . .	523	Toft . . .	698
Parkinson, Christiansa S. . .	723	West Bromwich square . . .	754
Pease, John . . .	584	CHAPEL OPENINGS.
Pearce, Robert . . .	327	Apperknowle . . .	47
Pearson, George . . .	594	Ashwell . . .	113
Pointer, Robert . . .	395	Balderton . . .	755
Potts, Thomas . . .	203	Belghton . . .	563
		Bishop's Nympton . . .	396
		Blagill . . .	700
		Bow Brickhill . . .	755
		Bradford . . .	559
		Bromsgrove . . .	170
		Button Oak . . .	44
		Castleton . . .	112
		Caunton . . .	44
		Cawston . . .	171
		Charlton . . .	114
		Claxby . . .	304
		Claypole . . .	45
		Cottingham . . .	48
		Eastlound . . .	702
		Ebberston . . .	305
		Fakenham . . .	115
		Filby . . .	758
		Fosdyke . . .	112
		Frosterley . . .	173
		Grasby . . .	757
		Hatfield . . .	756
		Idle . . .	248
		Kirbymoorside . . .	173
		Kirkhamgate . . .	701
		Knighton . . .	175
		Market Weston . . .	699
		Rock . . .	115
		Sawston . . .	171
		Scalesgill . . .	701
		Shipham . . .	45
		Shoreham . . .	563
		Sporie . . .	562
		Toft . . .	757
		Warden . . .	172
		Westwoodside . . .	249
		Wighton . . .	499
		Wyndham row . . .	113
		CHAPEL RE-OPENINGS.
		Barrow . . .	243
		Fulbeck . . .	503
		Hopton Bank . . .	500
		Leek . . .	243
		Over Heage . . .	116
		Pattrington . . .	564
		Stourminster . . .	43
		CHAPEL SPECIAL EFFORTS.
		Alford Circuit . . .	433
		Barnsley . . .	432
		Clowes' Chapel . . .	116
		Gravesend . . .	503
		Greetland . . .	178
		Hallifax . . .	245
		Lacey . . .	116
		Law Laitha . . .	268
		Newlyn . . .	177
		Northampton . . .	242
		Sandwich . . .	54
		Spenny Moor . . .	177
		Toll End . . .	245
		Wallingford . . .	177
		DIVINITY.
		Faithful Saying . . .	13
		Hartley Accident . . .	210
		Lancashire Distress . . .	597
		Moral World Regenerated . . .	272
		Mourners Blessed . . .	338
		Outline by Berridge . . .	401
		Personality, &c., of Holy Spirit . . .	724
		Possessions of Christ . . .	80
		Pressing towards the mark . . .	660
		Privileges of Sons of God . . .	529

	PAGE		PAGE		PAGE
Simplicity . . . . .	603	JUBILEE MEETINGS—		Thetford . . . . .	628
Sounds of a revival . . .	465	Bagshot . . . . .	368	Whitchurch . . . . .	169
		Belper . . . . .	179	Worcester . . . . .	43
		Poole . . . . .	246
FAMILY DEPARTMENT—		JUNIOR PREACHERS' DEPART- MENT—		NOTICES OF PUBLICATIONS—
Don't swear . . . . .	92	Address by W. Antliff . . .	536	A B C Church and Chapel
Early Training . . . . .	609	An address to preachers . .	469	Guido . . . . .	747
Family, a religious insti- tution . . . . .	478	Hints to our rising minis- try . . . . .	150	Adams' Works . . . . .	359
Hints to parents . . . . .	20	How to render preaching useful . . . . .	36, 64	Adaptation . . . . .	494
Home intercourse . . . .	739	Ministerial piety . . . . .	346, 405	Alarm, The . . . . .	40
Home influence . . . . .	541	Our habits and influence . .	408	Alleine, Joseph . . . . .	299
Is there not a cause? . .	281	Plain Preaching . . . . .	219	Ambassador, Christian . .	107
Mother's example . . . .	155	Power in the Pulpit 606, 668, 721		American War, by Hall . .	747
Parental authority . . . .	476	Words to Winners of Souls .	278	Annals of the Bible . . .	463
Parental discipline . . .	28, 66			Arminianism, by P. Pugh .	39
Salvation of little chil- dren . . . . .	349, 410	MISCELLANIES—		Aylott's Irving . . . . .	390
Seed dormant . . . . .	740	A Final Effort for the Ju- bilee Fund . . . . .	740	Baggaly's Digest . . . . .	691
Spoiled child . . . . .	673	An Address to Her Ma- jesty . . . . .	487	Bastow's Dictionary . . .	418
The pious son . . . . .	223	Angels . . . . .	614	Batesman's Lecture . . .	747
To mothers . . . . .	610	Backslider . . . . .	550	Battle of Armageddon . .	223
What is the family? . . .	157	Be ye also Ready . . . . .	413	Besner's Light of the World	298
		Depraved Criminal . . . .	619	Bible Exercises . . . . .	745
		Do you love Jesus . . . . .	386	Bicentenary Essays . . .	693
		Ex-Editor's Farewell Address	478	Book for the Anniversary .	300
		Farewell Service . . . . .	31	Book that will Cheer you .	623
		Grasping the Premises 168, 226, 286		Brodie and Homoeopathy .	423
		Happy Dick . . . . .	104	Bunting's Sermons . . . .	106
		Hartley Catastrophe . . . .	293	Barnett's Funeral Services	623
		Help the Missionaries . . .	87	Central Truths . . . . .	555
		Hints on a Reading Asso- ciation . . . . .	552	Character of the Bible . .	622
		Inscribed House at Chester		Children and their thoughts	622
		Lecture by Miss Stansfield		Church's Missionary Meet- ing Report . . . . .	482
		Old Slave . . . . .	417	Church Reform . . . . .	698
		Only an Umbrella . . . . .	686	City of the Great King . .	747
		Passover at Jerusalem . .	549	Cloud of Witnesses . . .	165
		Present Salvation . . . . .	106	Coalville Discussion . . .	300
		Religious Persecution . . .	744	Confessions of a Convert .	300
		Security of the Faithful . .	553	Conflict of the Age . . . .	620
		Shoemaker in Spain . . . .	351	Cooke on Revivals . . . .	630
		Sicilian Generosity . . . . .	37	Cosmogony of Genesis . .	40
		Silchester as it was, &c. . .	480	Cross Bearing . . . . .	300
		Soldier's Advice . . . . .	417	Cox on the Future . . . .	754
		Sunday Ships . . . . .	36	Death's Bondage broken .	545
		Swearer Reproved . . . . .	164	Deity, The . . . . .	106
		Temperance in the English		Development of the Di- vine life . . . . .	107
		Dissenting Colleges . . . .	743	Dialogues for Schools . .	299
		The Prince Consort . . . .	93	Divine Fatherhood . . . .	494
		Victorian Expedition 31, 160, 181, 229, 290, 353		Divisions among Christians	484
		Visit to the Tabernacle . .	547	Doctrine of Person of Christ . . . . .	297, 624
		Where did he get that law? .	163	Doubting Christian . . . .	260
				Drunkard's Death . . . .	485
		MISSIONARY SERVICES—		Dunn's Hymns . . . . .	746
		Andover . . . . .	110	Ebenezer . . . . .	621
		Barton . . . . .	303	Elizabeth Fry . . . . .	423
		Brandon . . . . .	240	England's Flag, by T. Lowe	622
		Cambridge . . . . .	490	England's Shame . . . . .	424
		Doncaster . . . . .	241	Episcopal Church, The . .	693
		Driffild . . . . .	432	Escape from Slavery . . .	694
		Edinburgh . . . . .	751	Faith and its Fruits . . .	423
		Grassington . . . . .	239	Family Prayers . . . . .	746
		Gravesend . . . . .	43	Fathers of the Wesley Family . . . . .	484
		Grimsby . . . . .	241	First Words on Temperance	166
		Hall, End . . . . .	111, 304	Freemason's Hall Addresses	554
		Irish Missions . . . . .	365	Garner's (James) Disserta- tions . . . . .	744
		Lakeard . . . . .	751	Goodwin's Works . . . . .	232, 380
		Lenth . . . . .	229	Great Transaction . . . .	555
		Malmesbury . . . . .	48	Guile to Health . . . . .	488
		Penzance . . . . .	240	Heaton's Lectures on Wes- leyan Hymn Book . . . .	746
		Prees Green . . . . .	169	Help to Reading the Gospels	300
		Retford . . . . .	306	Honour to whom Honour .	622
		Selby . . . . .	48	House of Mourning . . .	165
		Scarborough . . . . .	110	Immanuel . . . . .	484
		Scotter . . . . .	304	Imputed Righteousness . .	555
		St. Ives . . . . .	241	Infidelity, its Causes, &c. .	107
				Instrumental Strength . .	692
				Jesus the Soul's Need . . .	554
				Junior Clerk, The . . . .	555
				Lange on Matthew . . . .	236

	PAGE		PAGE		PAGE
Langs on Lake . . .	634	Aspinall, Marion . . .	685	Harrison, E. . .	377
Leaflets for Sunday Scho- lars . . .	186	Bailey, James . . .	638	Hill, William . . .	122
Lefschild, by Brown . . .	628	Bailey, Fanny . . .	435	Hodgson, Margaret . . .	443
Lessons on Evidences . . .	800	Baldwin, Jimima . . .	571	Hogg, Joseph . . .	571
Liberator, The . . .	234, 748	Baldwin, Philip . . .	444	Holliday, Margaret . . .	183
Lightfoot's Life of M. Por- tious . . .	639	Barber, Millicent . . .	378	Hollis, Jonas . . .	511
Light of Life . . .	234	Barnett, John . . .	125	Holmes, John . . .	578
Lunaria Saxifrage . . .	634	Barron, Peter G. . .	437	Horlock, Mary A. . .	182
Madame de Gascoigne . . .	694	Beaumont, William . . .	188	Howe, Charlotte . . .	379
Meet for Heaven . . .	184	Babington, Elizabeth . . .	124	Howlett, Elizabeth . . .	318
Mellors . . .	745	Bedson, James . . .	606	Hudson, Tabitha . . .	253
Modern Atheism, and the Bible . . .	748	Beeton, Ann . . .	536	Humble, Emerson . . .	121
Modern Revivals, by J. Simpson . . .	623	Bell, Margaret . . .	703	Huntley, William . . .	261
Mother's Picture Alphabet . . .	165	Bennett, Elizabeth . . .	506	Jackson, Mary . . .	80
Mouth of the Pit . . .	234	Bennett, Lizzie . . .	675	Johnson, Jacob H. . .	448
Nation's Loss . . .	300	Birkbeck, John . . .	53	Joseph, Jane . . .	445
Old Jonathan . . .	748	Blackburn, Ann . . .	378	Keeley, Eleanor . . .	311
One Hundred Hymns . . .	622	Blackwell, James . . .	441	Kemp, Hannah . . .	315
One Lord . . .	234	Bow, John B. . .	187	Kennerley, Eliza . . .	808
Ordination Charge . . .	40	Blyth, Sarah . . .	61	Kennerley, Margaret . . .	68
Our Principles . . .	485	Brammer, William . . .	255	Kingsley, Sarah A. . .	86
Passing Events . . .	483	Brookshurst, Ann . . .	126	Kings, Ann . . .	437
Pentecost . . .	223	Brown, James . . .	703	Lambert, Mary . . .	190
Petty's Lecture . . .	690	Brown, Mary J. . .	319	Latewood, Mary . . .	308
Petty's Sermons . . .	299, 689	Burgess, Susan . . .	58	Lawton, Thomas . . .	57
Philosophy of Divine Ope- rations . . .	235	Burrows, Rhoda . . .	182	Lee, Ann . . .	306
Popery, by Woodcock . . .	621	Carter, Thomas . . .	318	Lee, Ann . . .	61
Prayer Meeting Hymn Book . . .	107	Carter, Elizabeth . . .	759	Lee, Elizabeth . . .	319
Primitive Methodist Cate- chisms . . .	689	Chandler, Sarah . . .	60	Lee, Joseph . . .	635
Psalmist, The . . .	556	Chapman, Elizabeth . . .	247	Lewis, Eliza . . .	137
Progress . . .	555	Cheeson, Robert . . .	126	Long, Rhoda . . .	510
Prophetic Question, The . . .	423	Chellow, John . . .	319	Longly, John . . .	442
Providence, by Jackson . . .	432	Clark, Jane . . .	68	Lucaas, Maria . . .	314
Pugh's Address . . .	696	Clayton, William . . .	53	Lucaas, Sarah . . .	441
Quiver, The . . .	234	Cockerott, Thomas . . .	511	Lund, Jane . . .	246
Ralph Saunders . . .	234	Codman, John . . .	510	Lyman, Thomas . . .	394
Report of Metropolitan Meeting, (1861) . . .	300	Coley, Sarah . . .	440	Maddess, Elizabeth . . .	187
Reed's Sermons and Charges . . .	359	Collins, Richard . . .	438	Marfleet, Eliza . . .	132
Revival at St. Ives . . .	360	Cook, Rebecca . . .	265	Marshall, William . . .	505
Revival Truths . . .	554	Coper, Jane . . .	247	Mayer, William . . .	186
Samuel Drew's Life . . .	39	Cottrell, Jonah . . .	316	Mole, Tamer . . .	232
Sanitary Facts . . .	694	Cosins, Robert . . .	384	Mole, William . . .	446
Shadow of the Almighty . . .	107	Cowling, Mary A. . .	308	Monaghan, James . . .	439
Shortness of Time . . .	683	Crawford, Rachel . . .	373	Moore, Frances E. . .	250
Sibbes' Works, vols. II. and III. . .	744	Croxshall, Sarah . . .	573	Morgan, Mary . . .	59
Sights in the Pit . . .	622	Dalkin, Robert . . .	312	Morgan, Thomas . . .	315
Soul of Man, by D. Sheen . . .	621	Davy, Harriet . . .	637	Morris, William . . .	183
Steinburg, C. . .	209	Dawson, Edward . . .	316	Mowbray, Jane . . .	633
Teetotalism . . .	435	Day, Stephen . . .	254	Moxham, Charles . . .	124
Temperance Almanack . . .	165	Dixon, Margaret . . .	253	Neale, Elizabeth . . .	190
Temperance Dictionary . . .	165	Dixon, Sarah . . .	375	Noble, Thomas . . .	189
Timpsen's Life of E. Fry . . .	745	Dowell, Isabella . . .	248	North, Leah . . .	571
Troublesome Times . . .	484	Drake, Winifred . . .	252	Norton, Charlotte . . .	509
Victor Crowned . . .	691	Dyson, Elizabeth . . .	570	Nunn, Mary . . .	374
Voice from the Tomb . . .	688	Eatch, Mrs. . . .	442	Oglesby, Elizabeth . . .	633
Wanderings of a Bible . . .	360	Egleshaw, Rebecca . . .	60	Owen, Jane . . .	508
Ward's New Zealand Lec- tures . . .	690	Elmer, Esther . . .	128	Owen, William . . .	183
Words of Comfort . . .	38	Farr, Sarah . . .	435	Pain, Elizabeth . . .	507
Words to the Wise . . .	555	Feltham, Elizabeth . . .	510	Parry, Martha . . .	312
Worsnop's Footsteps of Jesus . . .	690	Fisher, John . . .	187	Pearce, Anne . . .	383
Young England . . .	168	Fletcher, Rowland . . .	447	Peck, Charles . . .	636
		Furness, George . . .	123	Powell, Mr. . . .	280
		Galbraith, Isabella . . .	374	Powell, Sarah . . .	311
		Garner, Mary . . .	704	Pugh, Charles . . .	376
		Gathercole, William . . .	249	Pugh, Martha . . .	310
		Gelder, Alice . . .	632	Rains, Hannah . . .	505
		George, Susan . . .	507	Raisbrack, Matthew . . .	258
		Gibson, Ann . . .	376	Rankin, Daniel . . .	375
		Gibson, George . . .	381	Riddle, Catherine . . .	191
		Gilbert, Emma . . .	569	Robinson, Ann . . .	249
		Giles, Mary . . .	376	Robinson, Robert . . .	184
		Gill, Hannah . . .	570	Rogers, Caroline . . .	632
		Godfrey, Susannah . . .	569	Rose, Susanna . . .	56
		Gough, William . . .	128	Sadler, Nathan . . .	247
		Goulder, Jane . . .	376	Sellwood, Eliza . . .	381
		Gregory, Thomas B. . .	55	Sharpe, Edward . . .	57
		Grose, Ann . . .	684	Sheppard, James . . .	186
		Gull, William . . .	575	Stimill, William . . .	382
		Gumbley, Thomas . . .	633	Stimill, Ann . . .	189
		Hadfield, Margaret . . .	639	Simpson, Hannah . . .	379
		Hales, Elizabeth . . .	443	Smallwood, Catherine . . .	383
		Hargreaves, Mary . . .	188	Smith, Ellen . . .	121
		Harland, Thomas . . .	759	Smith, Ellen . . .	317
		Harper, Ann . . .	126	Smith, Jane . . .	283
OBITUARIES—
Ainslie, Elizabeth . . .	377
Alnsworth, Ann . . .	445
Allen, Thomas M. . .	440
Anderson, Jane . . .	506
Armstrong, William . . .	634
Arnold, Mary . . .	574
Ascroft, John . . .	248
Ashton, Margaret . . .	184

PAGE		PAGE	PAGE
Sowter, Mary A. . . . .	444	Poetry.
Spence, Mary . . . . .	189	A Hymn . . . . .	320
Stephenson, Esther . . . .	638	A Prayer . . . . .	192
Stevens, Matthew . . . . .	508	Carpenter's son, The . . . .	192
Stratton, Ann . . . . .	59	Choice of the soul, The . . .	128
Stretch, Harriet . . . . .	443	Christian Pilgrim, The . . .	640
Tasker, Martha . . . . .	317	Evening Hymns . . . . .	704
Taylor, Jane . . . . .	317	Fading away . . . . .	320
Teesdale, Matthew . . . . .	633	Happy Cottager . . . . .	64
Thomas, William . . . . .	319	Judgment, The . . . . .	512
Thompson, M. A. . . . .	637	Lines on the Death of the
Toy, Catherine . . . . .	572	Rev. W. Carthy . . . . .	256
Trevorror, Elizabeth . . . .	383	Lines on the Death of the
Truman, Ann . . . . .	639	Rev. J. T. Harrison . . . .	448
Tubby, William B. . . . .	442	Music . . . . .	576
Vaughan, Sarah . . . . .	317	My Jesus, I love Thee . . .	640
Verity, Mary . . . . .	191	Silent life . . . . .	578
Vigers, Mary . . . . .	186	Star of Bethlehem . . . . .	64
Wadsworth, Caroline . . . .	379	Vision of Heaven . . . . .	448
Walker, Louisa A. . . . .	446
Walker, Margaret . . . . .	436	PROVIDENCE DEPARTMENT.
Waller, William . . . . .	373	Divine Providence Illustrated	215
Walton, Jane . . . . .	377	Poor Caleb . . . . .	24
Watkins, Eliza . . . . .	508	Remarkable escape from peril	533
Weatherby, Elizabeth . . . .	186	Retributive Providence, A	153
Wedlock, Martha . . . . .	314
Whitehead, Ann . . . . .	438	SCHOOL SERVICES.
Whitehead, Mary . . . . .	56	Balby . . . . .	504
Whyett, Mary . . . . .	572	Bishop's Nympton . . . . .	504
Wiles, Elizabeth . . . . .	125	Bollington . . . . .	668
Wilkinson, Sarah . . . . .	631	Bradley Green . . . . .	504
Willis, Mary . . . . .	382	Bradshaw . . . . .	504
Wilson, Eliza . . . . .	638	Broadwaters . . . . .	369
Wilson, John . . . . .	435	Brownhills . . . . .	568
Wood, Elizabeth . . . . .	380	Camden town . . . . .	54
Woodward, Ann . . . . .	574	Charlton . . . . .	504
Worrall, William . . . . .	254	Chippenham . . . . .	504
Wright, Elizabeth . . . . .	251	Cookham Dean . . . . .	504
Wright, Ellen . . . . .	59	Cotehill . . . . .	504
Wright, William . . . . .	252	Doncaster . . . . .	504
Youngs, Sarah A. . . . .	126	Fakenham . . . . .	504
		Greetland . . . . .	504
ORGAN OPENING—
Old Hill, Dudley Circuit . .	500
		Halifax . . . . .	369
		Haslingden . . . . .	54
		Haslingden . . . . .	504
		Hindringham . . . . .	504
		Hollinbank . . . . .	504
		Lamblay . . . . .	752
		Leamington . . . . .	751
		Linslade . . . . .	752
		Moreton . . . . .	504
		Monkwearmouth . . . . .	504
		Morley . . . . .	504
		Mytholmroyd . . . . .	504
		Penzance . . . . .	504
		Pickering . . . . .	308
		Roby Mill . . . . .	504
		Round Hill . . . . .	504
		Sheerness . . . . .	504
		Sowerby Bridge . . . . .	504
		Stafford . . . . .	504
		Wells . . . . .	504
		West Lutton . . . . .	751
		SUNDAY SCHOOL DEPART- MENT.
		Auxiliaries to successful teaching . . . . .	474
		Best means of retaining elder scholars . . . . .	284
		Early and late . . . . .	679
		Lines by the way . . . . .	87
		Ragged boy, rich merchant	221
		Reward books for scholars	413
		Salvation of the young . . .	612
		Senior scholars, how to train for teaching . . . .	543
		To the officers and teachers of Sabbath schools . . . .	633
		WORKS OF CREATION.
		Adaptation of nature's laws to the wants of man . . . .	665
		Vastness of the universe . .	402

THE PRIMITIVE METHODIST
Magazine,

FOR THE YEAR OF OUR LORD

1863.

VOL. I. OF THE NEW SERIES.
VOL. XLIV. FROM THE COMMENCEMENT.

LONDON :
PUBLISHED BY RICHARD DAVIES,
AT THE CONFERENCE OFFICES,
SUTTON STREET, COMMERCIAL ROAD, ST. GEORGE'S-IN-THE-EAST.

	PAGE		PAGE		PAGE
Bowler, Mary A.	444	POETRY.		Halifax	369
Spence, Mary	189	A Hymn	320	Haslingden	54
Stephenson, Esther	638	A Prayer	192	Haslingden	504
Stevens, Matthew	508	Carpenter's son, The	192	Hindringham	504
Stratton, Ann	53	Choice of the soul, The	128	Hollinbank	504
Stretch, Harriet	443	Christian Pilgrim, The	640	Lamblay	752
Tasker, Martha	317	Evening Hymns	704	Leamington	77
Taylor, Jane	317	Fading away	320	Linslade	77
Teesdale, Matthew	633	Happy Cottage	64	Moreton	77
Thomas, William	319	Judgment, The	512	Monkwearmouth	77
Thompson, M. A.	637	Lines on the Death of the		Morley	77
Toy, Catherine	573	Rev. W. Carthy	256	Mytholmroyd	77
Trevorrow, Elizabeth	383	Lines on the Death of the		Penzance	77
Truman, Ann	639	Rev. J. T. Harrison	448	Pickering	77
Tubby, William B.	442	Music	576	Roby Mill	77
Vaughan, Sarah	317	My Jesus, I love Thee	640	Round Hill	77
Verity, Mary	191	Silent life	576	Sheerness	77
Vigers, Mary	188	Star of Bethlehem	64	Sowerby Bridge	77
Wadsworth, Caroline	379	Vision of Heaven	448	Stafford	77
Walker, Louisa A.	446			Wells	77
Walker, Margaret	436	PROVIDENCE DEPARTMENT.		West Lutton	77
Waller, William	373	Divine Providence Illustrated	215
Walton, Jane	377	Poor Caleb	24	SUNDAY
Watkins, Eliza	508	Remarkable escape from peril	533	MENT.
Weatherby, Elizabeth	186	Retributive Providence, A	153	Auxiliaries
Wedlock, Martha	314			teaching
Whitehead, Ann	438			Best
Whitehead, Mary	56	SCHOOL SERVICES.		elder
Whyett, Mary	572	Balby	504	Early
Wiles, Elizabeth	125	Bishop's Nympton	504	Lines
Wilkinson, Sarah	631	Bollington	566	Rev.
Willis, Mary	382	Bradley Green	504	Rev.
Wilson, Eliza	638	Bradshaw	504	Rev.
Wilson, John	435	Broadwaters	369	Rev.
Wood, Elizabeth	380	Brownhills	566	Rev.
Woodward, Ann	574	Camden town	54	Rev.
Worrall, William	254	Charlton	504	Rev.
Wright, Elizabeth	251	Chippenham	504	Rev.
Wright, Ellen	59	Cookham Dean	504	Rev.
Wright, William	252	Cotehill	504	Rev.
Youngs, Sarah A.	126	Doncaster	504	Rev.
ORGAN OPENING—		Fakenham	504	Rev.
Old Hill, Dudley Circuit	500	Greetland	504	Rev.

PREFACE.

---

"Tempus Fugit" is an old motto that often recurs to one's recollection in journeying through life. "Time flies," O how rapidly! Another year has passed away since we penned our preface to the Magazine of 1862. And what important events have crossed the field of our vision during the twelve months now gone! The year opened in the midst of one of the most appalling calamities that ever befel the operative population of a large district of our country, caused by one of the most fearful civil wars that ever desolated any of earth's regions. Intense were the sufferings endured as well on this side the Atlantic as on the other, during the winter of 1862—1863. But an unprecedented liberality was called forth by those sufferings, which has led to the conclusion in some minds that on the whole the humanity and piety of men have been stimulated to a higher tone and pitch by the things which were suffered. At all events, in the abundant generosity displayed in almost all civilized portions of the world, one cannot but recognise the providential hand of our heavenly Father, who makes the wrath of man praise Him, while the remainder of the wrath will He restrain. We rejoice in the anticipation that brighter days still will soon dawn upon our suffering fellow-countrymen, and that trade will again find its old grooves, and flood its former channels. May the beneficial lessons learnt in the school of suffering long be remembered! Among the favours which we ought also to acknowledge before our great Benefactor, is the bountiful harvest of the past summer. Provisions are now good, plentiful, and cheap. How fearful to think of what would have been the state of multitudes of our countrymen, but for the generosity of men in better circumstances, and the gracious providence of God which has sent us such abundant supplies! The trade of our nation has been unusually good on the whole, and the health of the population has been mercifully preserved.

The year has been distinguished by an outburst of loyalty, on the occasion of the marriage of the Prince of Wales, such as we suppose was never witnessed before, either in England or elsewhere. Our Queen must have been delighted to see how her people rejoiced in her joy as they had sorrowed in her sorrow.

Many of the great ones of the earth have been called away during the year from the stage of their exploits to the inexorable tribunal of the Judge who will do right. Death has taken, also, many of our friends and beloved relatives.

"Friend after friend departs,—
Who hath not lost a friend?
There is no union here of hearts,
That knows not here an end.
O were this world our only rest,
Living or dying none were blest!"

But, thank God, we know this is not our rest; but we seek a nobler country, a brighter sky, a healthier clime, a better land! O may we who survive ever stand ready for our Lord's appearing. "Be ye also ready, for in such an hour as ye think not, the Son of Man cometh."

America still struggles in the throes of an unparalleled convulsion; but slavery we cannot but hope is tottering to its fall. We think we see the sweeping whirlwind of revolution carrying the gigantic institution of slavery resolutely away before it, and pray, that however may terminate the present convulsions, that at least, after the war, slavery may be found numbered among the things of the past. Let such be the prayer of all lovers of freedom and of man. Poor Poland is engaged in an apparently hopeless task ; but He who has the hearts of all men in His hand, can overrule the conduct of nations, so that good shall be educed from evil, and light may yet arise out of darkness. The state of things in New Zealand is at this moment very distressing. We tremble for our dear brethren and sisters there ; but we will not forget to pray that the pillar of a cloud may go before them by day, and a pillar of fire by night. May wars soon cease to the ends of the earth, and the kingdom of peace be established widely as the world, and permanently as time ! If the recent move of the French Emperor is not "a mockery and a snare," we may surely anticipate much good from it. Let us hope the kings and great men of the nations of Europe will listen to placid counsels and that broad and deep will the foundations of peace be soon laid in the earth.

As a denomination we have much reason for devout gratitude to God for the prosperity of the past year. Our peace has been but little broken, our increase of members has been considerable, our missionary and other moneys have come in well in general, and our literature has had a good circulation. We have reason to rejoice that the Magazines have been so well supported in such times. And we indulge a hope that we shall be more successful in our efforts for an increase of subscribers this year than we were the last. It is highly gratifying to us to receive assurances from our friends that our labours are appreciated, and that we have the hearty sympathy and earnest prayers of multitudes of readers. We trust the improvements which next year's issues will exhibit will justify the promises we have ventured to hold out, and the expectations friends have been pleased to indulge. Let us still have the zealous co-operation of all our preachers and people, and the Primitive Methodist Magazines may become more than ever a power for good in our midst. We cannot close these lines without saying there are two things which somewhat trouble us : First, the state of our Jubilee movement, and second, the non-commencement of our African Mission. We feel that unless our numerous readers do something to improve the position of the former question before the first of next March, the hearts of many of our true friends will be sadly discouraged, and unless the Connexion take up the question of the mission to Africa, as yet it has certainly not been taken up, we shall stand humiliated among the churches. In our chapel building, school instituting, tract distributing, missionary contributing, and other active labours and cheering successes, we see cause for rejoicing ; but looking on these other matters we are constrained to rejoice with trembling. We seem to hear a voice saying, "This ought ye to have done, and not left the other undone."

Well, let us yet "redeem the time, for the days are evil." "It is now high time to awake out of sleep." "Arise, shine, for thy light is come, and the glory of the Lord has risen upon thee !" O may the next year be one of great faith, great love, great peace, great generosity, great soul-saving success, and great general prosperity, both among ourselves and "all the churches of the saints." Amen.

W. ANTLIFF, EDITOR.

London, December 1st, 1863.

ered rec-ask:
duct arise very will and
and ently
and e the unmade
in the

ed for ur in-conveys
n. We such n our
It is bours ers of issues
nd the have imitive
in our things
t, and unless former r true up the en up.
ilding,
other ooking
We ft the s now

e, and one of ccess.
bes of
OR.

*Yours Truly
Robert Parks*

Born, Feb 12, 1816.

THE Primitive Methodist Magazine.

---

JANUARY, 1863.

---

A NEW YEAR'S ADDRESS.

“COME, let us anew our journey pursue,
Roll round with the year,
And never stand still till the Master appear:
His adorable will let us gladly fulfil,
And our talents improve,
By the patience of hope and the labour of love.”

EIGHTEEN HUNDRED AND SIXTY-THREE! All hail! We rejoice to see thee as the messenger and medium of mercy. Since thy predecessor first looked in upon us as thou art doing, many things have remained much as they were from the beginning, but not all. The law of change remains as of old, the law of life; and among the most changeless things of earth, is the law that requires most earthly things to change. Since we welcomed the year of grace eighteen sixty-two, how many changes have we witnessed! Many of our friends who rejoiced to see its commencement have passed to their account ere its close. Hundreds, yea thousands of immortal spirits have crossed the line that separates time from eternity, between the first day of 1862 and this of 1863.

How many who read the first lines of this periodical for last year are now reading the wondrous lessons of an eternal world. Multitudes who appeared then as likely for life as we, are now where the wicked cease from troubling and where the weary are at rest. The short span of their probationary state is passed; the race with them is run; their die is cast, their doom is sealed. The place that did know them, will know them no more for ever. How many, alas! who were unprepared have been hurried to their long home, and how many have been gathered as a shock of corn into the garner! Others have had to wade through deep waters of affliction and sorrow; and many will, while life shall last, always remember the scenes of the past year. But what abundant and manifold mercies have others experienced! Blessings temporal and blessings spiritual have strewed their path. The hand of Providence has lavished on their heads mercies more than they can count; and obligations to deeper consecration have been contracted from day to day. Such may sing—

“When all thy mercies, O my God,
My rising soul surveys,—
Transported with the view I'm lost,
In wonder, love, and praise.”

And who that now welcomes the year 1863 has not felt during the lapse of its predecessor, that the time past ought to suffice to have lived in negligence of God and eternal things, and that he was resolved, by God's help, thenceforward to live a godly, righteous, and sober life, in order to a preparation for life everlasting! O may all who read these lines come to such a conclusion at the beginning of the New Year, and never forget it while the year is passing away! May we all be so taught to number our days that we may apply our hearts to wisdom!

Two or three subjects have occupied a large space in public attention during the past year. The terrible civil war in America, and the fearful commercial distress, as a consequence of that war, in which a great portion of our countrymen have been involved, being among the chief. And the new year opens upon us in the midst of gloomy forebodings. At the time we write, there appears no sign that a better state of things will soon be realised. The future of course is dark to us, but so far as we can “discern the signs of the times,” lamentation and woe are likely still to be witnessed at home, and carnage and destruction across the seas. Would that a brighter horizon may soon be seen, and that our starving countrymen may have work to do, food to eat, and raiment to put on, and our fellowmen in the “land of liberty and slaves,” find other employment than that of hacking each other to pieces on the banks of the grandest rivers, and in the midst of the finest fields in the world.

Of the American war, now raging, it is hardly our province to give an opinion, excepting in very general terms; but we cannot forbear saying that we regard slavery as the root of bitterness whence it has sprung, and the revolt of the Confederate States, would not, so far as we can see, have taken place, but for the existence of antagonistic views, feelings, and purposes among the States of the Union on this important question. Hence, we feel, that as England inoculated America with the virus of which the existing war is the result, we must regard ourselves as only experiencing the just reward of our National sins, in the distress that has now overtaken us. We had to pay twenty millions of money to procure the freedom of our West India slaves some years ago, and now we have to pay if not in cash, yet in suffering, our quota of the emancipation price of the American slaves. Let us hope that we shall read another lesson in this distress on that text which tells us “the way of transgressors is hard.” “I will visit the iniquity of the fathers upon the children unto the third and fourth generation," seems to be sounding in our ears as if but just proclaimed from the top of the Mount. Truly, "the Lord our God is a jealous God." Let us then purge ourselves by every possible means, as a nation, from all complicity in the crying sin of slavery, and pray God to turn again our captivity, and cause His face to shine upon us once more. By no palliation of the horrors of slavery, by no maudlin sympathy with slave-dealers or slave-holders, let us ever compromise our philanthropy, our character as the friends of the slave, nay, our very Christianity; but, at whatever cost or sacrifice, let us be willing to aid, directly or indirectly, in the demolition of that abomination of desolations, which, alas, has long stood even in holy places. In the meantime, the question presses for consideration, at the opening of the New Year, what can be done by Englishmen generally, and by Primitive Methodists as well as others, to mitigate the sufferings which now press with fearful and unequal weight upon a portion of our countrymen? Forasmuch as the Government of England is implicated in the existence of the present blockade, (the American Government having proposed some years ago to this nation and others, to abandon the practice of blockade in times of war, and our Government having opposed the scheme,) some persons hold that the Government must make early provision for the relief of our distressed cotton operatives; but whether this be done or not, it does seem unquestionable that the Christian patriotism of the people of all denominations is providentially called to great exertion and incessant self-denial to aid those on whom this calamity presses with so crushing and augmenting a force. Most of the churches of the land, as well as the general public, have put forth noble efforts already in this behalf, and the Primitive Methodists have not been unmindful of their duty in regard thereto. But will our friends at this season of the year bear in mind that very much yet remains to be done, and that what is to be done should be done quickly?

"The quality of mercy is not strained;
It droppeth like the gentle rain from heaven
Upon the place beneath: it is twice bless'd,
It blesseth him that gives, and him that takes."

While we rejoice in what our stations have done already, we venture to inquire if nothing further can be accomplished by us? Have any of us who are living outside the suffering districts shared the sufferings of our brethren? Have we denied ourselves any of the luxuries of life that they may have necessities? Have we relinquished superfluities that others may enjoy the commonest requisites? Some of our friends have proposed that such things as sugar, and other luxuries, should be sacrificed during "the present distress," and that weekly savings should be placed to the account of the sufferers, so long as the distress continues. At all events we beg to ask our readers, whether tobacco and strong

PAGE		PAGE	PAGE
Sowter, Mary A. . . . .	444	POETRY.
Spence, Mary . . . . .	189	A Hymn . . . . .	320
Stephenson, Esther . . . .	638	A Prayer . . . . .	192
Stevens, Matthew . . . . .	508	Carpenter's son, The . . . .	192
Stratton, Ann . . . . .	59	Choice of the soul, The . . . .	128
Stretch, Harriet . . . . .	443	Christian Pilgrim, The . . . .	640
Tasker, Martha . . . . .	317	Evening Hymns . . . . .	704
Taylor, Jane . . . . .	317	Fading away . . . . .	320
Teesdale, Matthew . . . . .	633	Happy Cottager . . . . .	64
Thomas, William . . . . .	319	Judgment, The . . . . .	512
Thompson, M. A. . . . .	637	Lines on the Death of the
Toy, Catherine . . . . .	673	Rev. W. Carthy . . . . .	256
Trevorror, Elizabeth . . . .	383	Lines on the Death of the
Truman, Ann . . . . .	639	Rev. J. T. Harrison . . . . .	448
Tubby, William B. . . . .	442	Music . . . . .	576
Vaughan, Sarah . . . . .	317	My Jesus, I love Thee . . . .	640
Verity, Mary . . . . .	191	Silent life . . . . .	578
Vigers, Mary . . . . .	186	Star of Bethlehem . . . . .	64
Wadsworth, Caroline . . . .	379	Vision of Heaven . . . . .	448
Walker, Louisa A. . . . .	446
Walker, Margaret . . . . .	436	PROVIDENCE DEPARTMENT.
Waller, William . . . . .	373	Divine Providence Illustrated 215
Walton, Jane . . . . .	377	Poor Caleb . . . . .	24
Watkins, Eliza . . . . .	508	Remarkable escape from peril 533
Weatherby, Elizabeth . . . .	186	Retributive Providence, A 153
Wedlock, Martha . . . . .	314
Whitehead, Ann . . . . .	438	SCHOOL SERVICES.
Whitehead, Mary . . . . .	56	Balby . . . . .	504
Whyett, Mary . . . . .	572	Bishop's Nympton . . . . .	504
Wiles, Elizabeth . . . . .	125	Bollington . . . . .	568
Wilkinson, Sarah . . . . .	631	Bradley Green . . . . .	504
Willis, Mary . . . . .	382	Bradshaw . . . . .	504
Wilson, Eliza . . . . .	638	Broadwaters . . . . .	369
Wilson, John . . . . .	435	Brownhills . . . . .	568
Wood, Elizabeth . . . . .	380	Camden town . . . . .	54
Woodward, Ann . . . . .	574	Charlton . . . . .	504
Worrall, William . . . . .	254	Chippenham . . . . .	504
Wright, Elizabeth . . . . .	251	Cookham Dean . . . . .	504
Wright, Ellen . . . . .	59	Cotehill . . . . .	504
Wright, William . . . . .	252	Doncaster . . . . .	504
Youngs, Sarah A. . . . .	126	Fakenham . . . . .	504
		Greetland . . . . .	504
ORGAN OPENING—
Old Hill, Dudley Circuit . . .	500	Halifax . . . . .	369
		Haslingden . . . . .	54
		Haslingden . . . . .	504
		Hindringham . . . . .	504
		Hollinbank . . . . .	504
		Lamley . . . . .	752
		Leamington . . . . .	751
		Linslade . . . . .	752
		Moreton . . . . .	504
		Monkwearmouth . . . . .	504
		Morley . . . . .	504
		Mytholmroyd . . . . .	504
		Penzance . . . . .	504
		Pickering . . . . .	308
		Roby Mill . . . . .	504
		Round Hill . . . . .	504
		Sheerness . . . . .	504
		Sowerby Bridge . . . . .	504
		Stafford . . . . .	504
		Wells . . . . .	504
		West Lutton . . . . .	751
		SUNDAY SCHOOL DEPART- MENT.
		Auxiliaries to successful teaching . . . . .	474
		Best means of retaining elder scholars . . . . .	284
		Early and late . . . . .	679
		Lines by the way . . . . .	87
		Ragged boy, rich merchant 221
		Reward books for scholars 413
		Salvation of the young . . . .	612
		Senior scholars, how to train for teaching . . . . .	543
		To the officers and teachers of Sabbath schools . . . . .	683
		WORKS OF CREATION.
		Adaptation of nature's laws to the wants of man . . . . .	665
		Vastness of the universe . . . .	402

THE
PRIMITIVE METHODIST

Magazine,

FOR THE YEAR OF OUR LORD

1863.

VOL. I. OF THE NEW SERIES.
VOL. XLIV. FROM THE COMMENCEMENT.

LONDON :
PUBLISHED BY RICHARD DAVIES,
AT THE CONFERENCE OFFICES,
SUTTON STREET, COMMERCIAL ROAD, ST. GEORGE'S-IN-THE-EAST.

convulsion
among the dom and o
but He who of nations out of dark distressing.
not forget to a pillar of fir
the kingdom as time! If a snare," we kings and grea and that broad earth.

As a denot
the prosperity
crease of mem
have come in wel
have reason to re times. And we efforts for an inc highly gratifying are appreciated, a multitudes of rea will exhibit will j expectations frien
the zealous co-oper
Methodist Magazin
midst. We cannot which somewhat tr
second, the non-com
our numerous reade question before the friends will be sadly question of the missi
we shall stand humil school instituting, tr
active labours and che on these other matters seem to hear a voice sa other undone."

Well, let us yet "r high time to awake out the glory of the Lord ha great faith, great love, gr and great general prosper the saints." Am

London

THE Methodist Magazine.

JANUARY, 1863.

THE EDITOR'S ADDRESS.

our journey pursue,
this year,
will till the Master appear:
as us gladly fulfil,
approve,
"hope and the labour of love."

THY-THREE! All hail! We rejoice to medium of mercy. Since thy predecessor art doing, many things have remained ning, but not all. The law of change and among the most changeless things most earthly things to change. Since eighteen sixty-two, how many changes friends who rejoiced to see its com-account are its close. Hundreds, yea crossed the line that separates time of 1862 and this of 1863.

lines of this periodical for last year is of an eternal world. Multitudes as we, are now where the wicked weary are at rest. The short span the race with them is run; their the place that did know them, will many, alas! who were unprepared and how many have been gathered ers have had to wade through deep y will, while life shall last, always
But what abundant and manifold ings temporal and blessings spiril of Providence has lavished on be sounding in our ount. Truly, "the ourselves by every

the crying sin of e His face to shine of slavery, by no
let us ever com-
of the slave, nay,
let us be willing mination of deso-

In the meaning of the New d by Primitive high now press countrymen?
the existence proposed some e of blockade cheme,) some ision for the s be done or otism of the xertion and ses with so the land, as dy in this f their duty ear bear in to be done

we venture ave any of fferings of of life that ities that ends have be sacri-should be continue ad stro.

convulsions, that at least, after the war, slavery may be found numbered among the things of the past. Let such be the prayer of all lovers of freedom and of man. Poor Poland is engaged in an apparently hopeless task ; but He who has the hearts of all men in His hand, can overrule the conduct of nations, so that good shall be educed from evil, and light may yet arise out of darkness. The state of things in New Zealand is at this moment very distressing. We tremble for our dear brethren and sisters there ; but we will not forget to pray that the pillar of a cloud may go before them by day, and a pillar of fire by night. May wars soon cease to the ends of the earth, and the kingdom of peace be established widely as the world, and permanently as time ! If the recent move of the French Emperor is not " a mockery and a snare," we may surely anticipate much good from it. Let us hope the kings and great men of the nations of Europe will listen to placid counsels and that broad and deep will the foundations of peace be soon laid in the earth.

As a denomination we have much reason for devout gratitude to God for the prosperity of the past year. Our peace has been but little broken, our increase of members has been considerable, our missionary and other moneys have come in well in general, and our literature has had a good circulation. We have reason to rejoice that the Magazines have been so well supported in such times. And we indulge a hope that we shall be more successful in our efforts for an increase of subscribers this year than we were the last. It is highly gratifying to us to receive assurances from our friends that our labours are appreciated, and that we have the hearty sympathy and earnest prayers of multitudes of readers. We trust the improvements which next year's issues will exhibit will justify the promises we have ventured to hold out, and the expectations friends have been pleased to indulge. Let us still have the zealous co-operation of all our preachers and people, and the Primitive Methodist Magazines may become more than ever a power for good in our midst. We cannot close these lines without saying there are two things which somewhat trouble us : First, the state of our Jubilee movement, and second, the non-commencement of our African Mission. We feel that unless our numerous readers do something to improve the position of the former question before the first of next March, the hearts of many of our true friends will be sadly discouraged, and unless the Connexion take up the question of the mission to Africa, as yet it has certainly not been taken up, we shall stand humiliated among the churches. In our chapel building, school instituting, tract distributing, missionary contributing, and other active labours and cheering successes, we see cause for rejoicing ; but looking on these other matters we are constrained to rejoice with trembling. We seem to hear a voice saying, " This ought ye to have done, and not left the other undone."

Well, let us yet " redeem the time, for the days are evil." " It is now high time to awake out of sleep." " Arise, shine, for thy light is come, and the glory of the Lord has risen upon thee !" O may the next year be one of great faith, great love, great peace, great generosity, great soul-saving success, and great general prosperity, both among ourselves and " all the churches of the saints." Amen.

W. ANTLIFF, EDITOR.

London, December 1st, 1863.

real ree-
ask ;
duct arise very will
and
and ently
r and e the nails n the d for ur in-onays

n. We such n our
It is bours
ers of issues
d the have imitive
n our things
t, and unless ormer true p the n up.
ing,
ther
king
We
ft the

s now
e, and one of ccombes of
OK.

drinks may not be safely relinquished in aid of the funds for relief? In the eye of heaven it will surely appear a fitting thing to make some personal and family sacrifice to meet the urgent claims which Christian charity now presents. If besides contributions of money, any of our readers are in a position to contribute clothing, for night or day, how gratefully will it be received by those who have been used to having the comforts of Christmas and the New Year, but are now literally starving for the merest necessities of existence. We are sure our friends will share with us in the anxiety we feel while we write, that our brothers and sisters in Lancashire, Cheshire, and elsewhere, may not starve to death in this Christian land, while many of their brethren have enough and to spare.

We have already apprised our readers whither their gifts of money or clothing, may be prudently sent, and we now urge upon them to show, as far as practicable, their willingness to co-operate with other churches, especially at this season, in relieving the sufferings they cannot entirely remove, and cheering the hearts of those who might otherwise faint in the day of adversity. Many of our hearers and members, it is said, are under strong temptation to forsake our sanctuaries and societies, and many of our Sabbath scholars our schools, in order to obtain the assistance they absolutely need, and which can only be elsewhere obtained on such condition. Shall we allow this temptation to gather strength, or endeavour to destroy its power? Assuredly we may do which we will. If each Sabbath scholar in our schools, and each member of our societies outside the distressed localities will give or raise one penny each per week, while the occasion exists, about ONE THOUSAND POUNDS A WEEK will be secured. Can our friends in the different stations do nothing like this? Let them try—and we shall see! And, oh, let us all hear the Master saying “Whoso hath this world’s good and seeth his brother have need, and shutteth up his bowels of compassion from him, how dwelleth the love of God in him?” “Let us not love in word neither in tongue, but in deed and in truth.” And then shall we hear the King say, “I was an hungred and ye gave me meat: I was thirsty, and ye gave me drink, I was a stranger, and ye took me in; naked, and ye clothed me: Verily, I say unto you, inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these my brethren, ye have done it unto me.” And let us remember if we who give were in the circumstances of those who have to receive, we should be much worse off than when we have done all that is asked of us; and let us try to believe “it is more blessed to give than to receive.” Let our New Year’s gifts flow this time in an unwonted channel, for special claims are now upon us, which we pray God may not exist at the beginning of another year.

And now for one word of encouragement to our suffering brethren. We beg them to remember that they may be going through this fiery trial to purge away the evils of slavery and to mitigate the future horrors of war. May they not indulge a hope that however this rebellion may terminate—whether in the slave party gaining an independent government, or in the free soil men maintaining the union—at least, slavery is doomed? If this prove to be the case will there not be cause of devout thanksgiving to God, notwithstanding the terrible afflictions this nation has to endure, ere the consummation be reached? And in the widely spread sympathy for their sorrows, and abounding liberality displayed for their relief, will not our brethren see cause of encouragement under their trials? And, above all, while they know that thousands and tens of thousands of prayers are daily ascending to our heavenly Father in their behalf, and that those prayers cannot fail to be successful through the mediation of our Lord Jesus Christ, who Himself is touched with the feeling of the infirmities of His people, will they not repair in faith to the throne of grace, and rest on the arm of the Beloved while passing through the wilderness? O, dear brethren, lift up your heads, your redemption draweth nigh! Christ Jesus ever liveth to intercede, and He will give you grace according to your day. And now, let all our readers enter on the manifold duties of the New Year nerved with Divine strength, and resolved to spend all their energies in the promotion of the Divine glory and the good of our fellowmen. Let us consecrate time, talents, money, influence, body, soul, prayer, faith, labour, all we have and all we are to the highest ends of existence; and then, if spared, we shall have in the best sense of the words, a happy new year, and if removed hence, we shall prove that “to die is gain.”—EDITOR.

---

B I O G R A P H Y.

---

MEMOIR OF THE REV. JOHN COULSON.

THE REV. JOHN COULSON was born December 14th, 1777, at Calow, a small village near Chesterfield, Derbyshire. His parents were respectably connected, strictly moral, and religiously disposed. His maternal grandmother was the daughter of a West of England clergyman, and was a devout and godly woman. To her many prayers to God for him, when but a child, he believed himself indebted for most of the mercies and blessings that he received during his long and useful life. He never lost the remembrance of the earnest manner in which she conducted family devotion, or how in times of trouble she would gather her household around the family altar for prayer. The reproof which this godly woman administered to the vicar of the parish, made a lasting impression upon the mind of her little grandson. His uncles, who were fond of fishing, were at work one Sabbath afternoon, making bait to fish with, and the vicar sat with them rendering them assistance. But as soon as the old lady saw them, she went to them, and addressing the vicar, said, "Oh, Mr. B——, are you a clergyman, and setting so wicked an example!" To this he replied, scoffingly, "Oh, you are a West of England woman, get away with you."

In that dark time, and yet darker neighbourhood, this ancestor of our departed brother was a "burning and shining light." Having her in his mind, he would often remark, "What a blessing it is to have at least one pious person in a family."

When only a child, Mr. Coulson had serious thoughts of God, heaven, and hell; and in boyhood, on his way from school, he would kneel down in the fields to pray. At the age of fifteen he left the parental roof for business, and was placed with a manufacturer in the iron-trade. His master was kind-hearted, but careless about religion, requiring from those under his charge, so far as religion was concerned, only the text of the sermon preached on the Sabbath morning, and the reading of a chapter in the Bible in the afternoon. The men on the works were irreligious, and their example and conversation had a bad influence upon the mind of the subject of our sketch. Finding himself sliding away from seriousness, he began to pray earnestly to God for guidance and help. Nor was he long left to himself, for about this time he had a remarkable dream which was never erased from his memory. While sleeping, he was made to see himself in dying circumstances, and quite unprepared for heaven; he saw there was nothing for him, but the "lake of everlasting fire." From that hour he began to seek the kingdom of God. At that time Chesterfield, where he resided, was a part of the Sheffield Wesleyan Circuit, and the chapel was not far from the house in which he dwelt. A revival of religion broke out under that eminently holy and useful servant of God, the Rev. William Bramwell; and one week-night the cries of sinners in distress, and the shouts of believers were so great, that the whole street was raised, and it was said the Methodists had gone mad. Our brother was just about going to bed, but he immediately dressed, and went out to see the cause of alarm. Following the crowd, he urged his way into the chapel, and, not knowing it was a visitation of the Holy Ghost, he felt a little ashamed at first, but he was soon convinced that he was in the very midst of the people of God. He there and then promised Mr. Burton, a class-leader, that he would attend his class the following Tuesday evening. The time having arrived he went to chapel, but such were his fears, he dared not enter at first; however, putting his ear to the keyhole to hear what was said, the door suddenly opened, and he was obliged to enter. When the leader came to him, he burst into tears, for his soul was overflowing with godly sorrow. He did not then, however, obtain the pardon of his sins; and the cause he afterwards thought was in the leader, who did not explain to him the way of faith. Like many more, he had the notion, "he must first feel and then believe." In a few weeks afterwards, the Rev. W. Bramwell preached again, and while Miss Rhodes was praying, the power of God came down, and our dear brother stepped into glorious liberty, and shouted aloud the praises of God.

And now this great change having taken place in him, though but seventeen years of age, he became deeply concerned for the salvation of his father, mother, and sister, and he prayed to God for the conversion of the world. He joined his leader in visiting the surrounding places, praying with the people, and exhorting them "to flee from the wrath to come." One Sabbath morning, his father said to him, "John, I hear you pray without a book; you must now do so here." He did pray, and his father's heart was broken, and he soon found peace, and after being a Wesleyan class-leader thirty years, he died happy in the Lord. The next to find mercy was his mother, and she too died in the Lord. Then his sister rejoiced in Christ, and subsequently walked many miles with her brother in his excursions to preach the Gospel. It is only a few years since she finished her course with joy.

When the holy Bramwell was on his rounds in the Circuit, he held morning prayer-meetings as early as five o'clock, and those at Chesterfield Mr. Coulson always attended. His master, who was opposed to Methodism, resolved to prevent him from attending; and one night he locked the doors, and put the keys in his pocket on retiring to rest. But our brother was not to be kept away, for in the morning, on finding the door fast, he made a way for himself through the window; and on finding this out, his master said, "Well, let him go, for go he will." His master always found him attentive to business, and respectful to himself and family.

Soon after this he was advised to take regular appointments as a local preacher, but he pleaded his youth. Retiring to a field to pray to God for direction, he sat under a hedge, and opened his Testament on 1 Tim. iv. 11, 12, "These things command and teach, and let no man despise thy youth." Now he bowed to the will of God, and began his labours at Winsters, in Derbyshire, preaching from Acts iii. 19, "Repent ye, therefore, and be converted, that your sins may be blotted out, when the times of refreshing shall come from the presence of the Lord." From this time he walked many miles preaching the word of life, and saw many souls brought to God. He preached his trial sermon before the Rev. John Nelson, and from this excellent servant of God, and also from the Rev. Richard Reece, and the Rev. W. Bramwell, he received most fatherly counsel and assistance. For the Rev. Richard Reece he preached one Sabbath morning at eight o'clock, in the Norfolk Street Chapel, Sheffield; and for the Rev. William Bramwell he took a month's appointments in Derbyshire. It was the particular wish of these good men that our brother should enter the regular ministry, but becoming engaged to a pious, intelligent, and respectably connected young person, who, although she was a Methodist, was averse to the itinerant life, he did not avail himself of the openings of Providence. This he afterwards deeply lamented, and he believed God showed His displeasure by permitting him to connect himself in business with a person through whom he lost a considerable part of his wife's fortune. Difficulties springing up on all hands, he was led to seek by earnest prayer for fresh openings, and God heard and answered him from His holy place.

At the beginning of the present century, Mr. Coulson removed to Sheffield, where he had the honour to entertain at his house that extraordinary minister of God, Lorenzo Dow, one of the originators of the American camp-meetings, and whose preaching, writings, remarkable hymns, and lively tunes, were of so much service to the Rev. Hugh Bourne at the beginning of Primitive Methodism. About the same time he heard Mr. Bramwell shout from the pulpit of Norfolk Street Chapel, "O ye Methodists, if you are not more in earnest, God will raise up a people who will more earnestly engage in His work." "Some years afterwards," says he, "I heard from a person passing through Sheffield, of a new religious sect—a people who had much of the Holy Ghost amongst them, and who were working wonders in the name of Jesus." As he thought these might be the people Bramwell prophesied of, he resolved to find them out. Being at Belper, in Derbyshire, on business, he saw a small chapel, with a stone over the door, upon which were inscribed the words, "Primitive Methodist Chapel." At this he stood in perfect amazement, having never heard of such a people. Calling upon a Methodist friend in the town, he asked, "Who are these Primitive Methodists?" "Oh," was the reply, "they are not Primitive Methodists, but Ranters, the offscouring of the town." Calling upon another Methodist, he made a similar inquiry, and the reply was, "They are good people, and I have been at their meetings, and find God is amongst them." Brother Coulson then got the chapel opened, that he might look in : a woman had the care of it, and on his remarking, "I see it is not under-drawn, and is yet unfinished;" she instantly said, "I hope we shall never have a grand chapel like the Methodists." He said, "I suppose you will as soon as you can get one."

Although living at Sheffield, twenty-eight miles from Belper, he resolved he would hear this people. On his way to Hull on business, he stopped at a public-house in Worksop, for refreshment; several persons were present, and in the corner of the room, a sweep sat turning over the pages of a dirty pamphlet. The landlady came in, and addressing the sweep, said, "Robert, you must sing that hymn, with the Hallelujahs at the end of it, for the children won't go to school till they hear it." Robert stood and sung—

"Come, O come, thou vilest sinner,
Christ is ready to receive."

Robert had joined the Primitive Methodists, and living at a distance, was waiting there for his boy. This was the first hymn our brother heard from a Primitive Methodist. Reaching Retford, he called upon a Methodist friend, Mr. Gervase Watson, who said at once, "Friend Coulson, since you were here last, I have turned Ranter, and you must come with me this evening to a prayer meeting; but observe we have only new converts to pray." But pray the new converts did; blessing and praising God for opening their blind eyes. Mr. Watson gave our friend a note of introduction to Mr. and Mrs. Robinson, of Gainsborough, and said he would find there the travelling preacher, from whom he might obtain all possible information. Mrs. Robinson was a zealous local preacheress, and begged Mr. Coulson to stay Sunday over and preach, as the travelling preacher was lame, and could not come. He consented to remain, and preached from Matt. vi. 6, "When thou prayest, enter into thy closet." He had a blessed time the first time he preached from a Primitive Methodist pulpit. He then went to the inn to sleep, and while there the son of the landlord came in, and told his father the Ranters had been to their place, a village near Gainsborough, and completely spoiled their wakes; "and," he added, "they are going to hold a camp-meeting and pray all day." "I think," said the landlord, "such things are very unbecoming a religious people; they have no business to shout, and pray, and make so much confusion." Brother Coulson told him he would have said more against Peter and the disciples at the day of Pentecost, had he heard them shout, especially the three thousand who were pricked in the heart.

On reaching Hull, Mr. Coulson met with the Rev. W. Clowes, and from him he obtained a brief history of the Primitive Methodists. Mr. Clowes invited him to attend Nottingham Quarter-day, about to be held, and said there he would see and hear all he wished to know. When he named his purpose to do so to his wife, she really thought he must be taking leave of his senses, in going amongst such a people. But to Nottingham he went, and at the door of the chapel shouts of praise met his ears, for God was amongst them, and many souls were that night converted to God. Here he met for the first time with Mr. Hugh Bourne, who was a delegate from Tunstall. At this time there were only three circuits—Tunstall, Loughborough, and Nottingham. He there heard how God was blessing and owning the labours of this zealous people, and there and then he took a ticket, and united with them; he was, therefore, the first Primitive Methodist in Sheffield. And what did he live to see! At the Nottingham Quarter-day, he obtained a promise of a preacher to labour out of doors during the summer months; and just at the conclusion of the meeting, a young man who had been rejected by the Wesleyan District Meeting, but who appeared to be full of faith and the Holy Ghost, offered himself to the Primitives. This was the late Mr. Jeremiah Gilbert, whose praise is in all the churches. He was at once appointed for Sheffield, and he began his mission on his way thither at Bolsover, where he was sent to prison for preaching the Gospel. He appeared before Sir William Bagshaw, the mayor of Chesterfield, and other magistrates, and, having a license, they were obliged to let him go. It is a melancholy fact, that the chief opponent of the Primitive Methodists, a magistrate, soon afterwards was thrown from his horse on his way from Chesterfield, and smothered in a ditch. Previously he had broken his collar-bone, and on Mr. Coulson calling upon him to say, that with his consent he would preach at Bolsover that day, he replied, "You may do as you like, I will have nothing more to do with your people." Brother Coulson now accompanied the missionary to most of the places in and about Sheffield, "the Lord working with them."

A small body of Christians who had seceded from another 'Connexion, and who worshipped at Watson's Walk, in this town, followed their leader, who had joined the Primitives, and here, while Brother Coulson was in the pulpit, Mr. James Bourn came into the room, and he rendered the society great and necessary help. While Mr. Coulson was a local preacher at Sheffield, he aided Brother Gilbert in opening Botherham, Doncaster, and many other places, now the heads of Circuits.

At the close of the year 1819, he felt it incumbent on him to consider the propriety of devoting himself to the work of a travelling preacher. His relatives were opposed to the Primitives, and said they were "a rope of sand." The salary was only 12s. per week, and no house, and little else, indeed, but toil and persecution. As to the salary, however, he thought he could manage, for his wife had an annuity, and this would support and educate his children, and she gave her full consent to his going out, although it would involve his absence from home for months at a time. Then as to labour, he was a strong, powerful man, and had walked fifty miles in one day while on his heavenly Master's work. Everything giving way, and the path becoming clear before him, he resorted to prayer, after which he opened the Bible for God's direction, and these words met his eyes, Job xi. 15, &c., "For there shalt thou lift up thy face without spot; yea, thou shalt be steadfast, and shalt not fear; because thou shalt forget thy misery, and remember it as waters that pass away; and thine age shall be clearer than the noonday; thou shalt shine forth, thou shalt be as the morning. And thou shalt be secure, because there is hope; yea, thou shalt dig about thee, and thou shalt take thy rest in safety. Also thou shalt lie down, and none shall make thee afraid; yet many shall make suit unto thee." Here he saw the hand of God, and now he dedicated his all to the blessed work of saving souls. From that moment he never doubted his call to the ministry, but for thirty-three years laboured hard therein.

to promote the glory of God and the welfare of souls. The Lord revived the work of religion in all the circuits in which he travelled, save one, and thousands were brought to God under his ministry. In Newcastle-upon-Tyne during the prevalence of contagion, as many as 700 were brought to God.

In May 1820 he went to the Malton Mission, and he then missioned Bridlington, in which field of labour he continued till May, 1821. Then he was stationed three years at Leeds, at Keighley one year, at Carlisle two years, at Brompton two years, at Winstan and Newcastle three years, at Hexham two years, at London one year, at Louth three years, at Pontefract two years, at Malton two years, at Retford three years, at Scotter two years, at Bridlington two years, and at Driffield three years—settling down as a supernumerary at Sheffield in July, 1852.

Mr. Thomas Ratcliffe writes, as follows:—

“I became acquainted with Mr. Coulson in the year 1835, when we were stationed together for London Mission of Hull Circuit. The station extended over the principal parts of the metropolis, Sheerness, Faversham, and several villages in Kent. But we met occasionally and had interchanges of personal friendship.

“In the year 1837 I found my old friend labouring where I am now stationed (at Alford) and under his superintendence many sinners were converted, and on this Circuit, then attached to Louth Circuit, not less than six or seven chapels were built.

“In 1849 we were stationed together at Driffield, and although our standing on the plan had been reversed (he being advanced in years, &c.) he told me it was all right and God would bless us; and a better colleague I could not desire. His labours here were duly appreciated, a mighty influence attended him, and great good was done. His whole soul was absorbed in the work of God. Individual consecration, entire sanctification, was the object of his pursuit. He was a very early riser. He spent hours wrestling with God in prayer before breakfast. At the means of grace of whatever kind, and however numerous, he was present. The Bible was his sketch, skeleton, and sermon book, in fact his everyday book. He read the lives of eminently good men, such as Wesley, Bramwell, Bourne, Clowes, John Smith, &c. John Coulson was a holy, happy, and useful minister of the Gospel, and is now reaping his reward in the paradise of God.”

Mr. R. Parks, of Lincoln, writes:—

“With the early life and public ministry of the late Rev. John Coulson, I am not much acquainted, as my knowledge of him commenced with my entrance on the Sheffield First Circuit in 1857, and he was then a supernumerary on that station. During my three years stay in that circuit, I was brought into frequent and profitable association with him, both publicly and privately, and as the result, I formed a very high estimate of his character, and still cherish a deep veneration for his person. He was a thoroughly religious man. Taking him as a whole, I have never met with his superior, and but seldom his equal. His deep-wrought convictions of human depravity, and moral pollution, his broad and expanding views of the vicarious sacrifice, and atoning blood of the Divine Redeemer, associated with his confiding reliance on, and his appreciating faith in, all that God has done, and promised, for fallen and redeemed man, exerted a vital and sanctifying influence over his spiritual and entire being, and rendered him a holy and consistent man. He professedly lived in daily converse with God, and the rich enjoyment of purity of heart; and his actions, words, and tempers proved that he was truthful and sincere. I have often admired, and felt too, the clearness and power with which he spoke of his unwavering faith, and supreme delights. He was indeed a living epistle, read and known of all men.

“He was a lover of God’s house. In this all-important particular, he was an example to believers. His intimate acquaintance with God, and his lengthened experience in Divine subjects, had not placed him beyond the reach of instruction, or above the advantages of public worship; but, as is always the result in such cases, these had increased his appetite, and intensified his desire, for the provisions of God’s house, and the communion of saints. It mattered comparatively little to Brother Coulson, who was the occupant of the pulpit, his own deep earnestness and religious conviction led him to his seat in the sanctuary; not as a sermon-hearer, but as a devout worshipper, not as a misanthropic critic but as a hungry man, eager for the bread of life. The prayer-meetings, both regular and special, were rendered more blessed by his unremitting attendance and earnest pleadings. His exercises in these services were not eloquent speeches addressed to the Deity, and designed to charm his fellow worshippers, but they were heart-thoughts, earnestly expressed in simple words, and pointing as direct to the contemplated object as the needle to the pole. They were amongst the purest and most approved models of public prayer it has ever been my privilege and happiness to listen to. I must confess to feelings of personal humiliation, and self-abasement, as I have knelt and listened to the childlike simplicity, the holy familiarity, and the confiding faith with which the venerable saint has expressed the yearnings of his loving heart, when pleading at the mercy-seat. Oh! how exceedingly little and utterly contemptible did unmeaning words and complimentary phrases appear, as contrasted with these natural and life-like utterances? In the Weekly Band Meeting too, he stood as some tall pyramid, reminding us of the age of giants: when men of stalwart powers had performed herculean labours, won world-famed victories, and reared sublime, but imperishable monuments, for the admiration and instruction of coming ages. His remarkable experiences of the past and the present, will be long and profitably remembered, by those who regularly met him in those delightful meetings. Well would it be for the churches generally, and for our rising sons and daughters especially, if all the elders amongst us would imitate the example of this faithful servant of our Lord, by giving their attendance and influence to similar meetings. Nor were his class-meetings omitted, although increasing deafness prevented him from taking that active part in them, which would have been alike pleasurable to himself, and to those associated with him. Indeed, the sublime aspirations of his ripe old age, were like those of the warrior king, when he retired from the head of his invincible troops: "One thing have I desired of the Lord, that will I seek after, that I may dwell in the house of the Lord all the days of my life, to behold the beauty of the Lord, and to enquire in his temple.

"He was ardently attached to the Connexion of his choice. He felt for it a more than patriotic love, and watched it with a father's jealous care. As an aged man, he had his peculiarities and his crotchets in this department, but his strong attachments and deep concern, were singularly pure and disinterested; and while he strove not for mastery, and rendered not himself unpleasant to his toiling brethren, he was ever at his post in the official meetings, rendering efficient aid by his judicious counsels, or well-timed remonstrances. He was deeply solicitous for the efficiency of the ministry; and ever manifested intense anxiety that the Connexion should retain its original simplicity. Justice compels me to say, that I sometimes thought his rebukes, in reference to external developments, a little too severe, as he seemed to labour under the idea peculiar to aged persons, that a thing could not possibly be done rightly, unless it was done in precisely the same way as it was done fifty years ago; but he was a good man, and full credit was always given him for pure and honourable intention.

"He conscientiously abstained from evil and its appearances. He walked in wisdom towards those who were without, and was an example of purity unto those who were within the church. For many years he had been a conscientious abstainer from intoxicating drinks, and a zealous advocate of abstinence principles; and there can be little doubt, that his unusual length of days, and his remarkably healthful old age were partly attributable to his abandonment of the fascinating and destroying cup, in comparatively early life. The advantages of his abstinence were felt by the community as well as by himself, for when he laboured on a part of this, the Lincoln station, twenty-four years ago, he held a temperance meeting at Potter Hanworth, and drunken John Blow, of Norton, attended and signed the pledge. Subsequently John gave his heart to God, and joined the Connexion. He has now been one of our local preachers, and a temperance advocate for a number of years.

"I pray that our young men, with their many and great advantages, may enjoy the piety and exercise the powers of our fathers, who one by one are passing from our midst."

Mr. Hirst, of Sheffield, says:—

"I had frequent intercourse with the Rev. J. Coulson, during the last twelve months of his life. He met in class at the house of Mrs. Sivill, to which class Mrs. Hirst was appointed leader, and I often attended there, and we had many hours of refreshing from the presence of the Lord. He was accustomed to pray at class, that God would bless the heralds of his grace, sanctify the churches, revive religion, and convert the world. Holiness was the theme of his soul, and the business of his life. He was a burning and a shining light. His light was not transient, and occasional, like the comet's glare, the meteor's flight, or the lightning's flash, but his path was that of the just, which, as the shining light, shineth more and more unto the perfect day. As a preacher he employed no classic eloquence, nor studied oratory, but he had what was far more excellent, much manly sense and Divine influence. He preached the simple unadorned truth under which men often wept and were led to pray. As a private Christian, his praise is in all the churches.

"For some months previous to his decease, it was evident that his body was fast ripening for the grave, and his soul for glory. Thus his life gradually wasted away, till the powers of nature were worn out, and at last the feeble taper that had glimmered for some time in suspense, became extinct. But he is, we believe, where he will spend a day without a cloud to darken it, and without a night to end it. Happy soul!

—"Called from exile home,
And led to nature's great metropolis;
And re-admitted through the guardian hand
Of elder brother to thy Father's throne."

"Blessed are the dead who die in the Lord." Yea, 'precious in the sight of the Lord is the death of His saints.'

"On the day before that on which he died, Brothers Cutts and Gilbert visited him, and when conversing and praying with him, he waved his hand in token of victory. He died on the 30th June, 1862, aged eighty-four years. His end was peace. In his last moments he gave evidence to his friends that for him death had no sting, the grave had no dread, and the future had no terror. Indeed it was clear as noonday that to him death was the pathway to eternal blessedness. Previous to the removal of his remains from the house, a hymn was sung, and another over the grave, when Mr. Cutts delivered an appropriate and impressive address.

"The circuit ministers and a number of local preachers and friends composed the funeral procession, and paid the last tribute of respect to departed worth. The good man on his bright ascent has left relations and friends who will long regret his decease. "The memory of the just is blessed."

"Blest be the memory of the dead !
 They rest in Christ, their living Head ;
 Then let the tear be mixed with joy,
 That o'er their hallow'd dust shall flow,
 While faith beholds their spirits nigh,
 The throne of Him they lov'd below ;
 Sweet be the sleep that rests their head !
 Blest be the memory of the dead."

A MEMBER OF THE FAMILY.

MEMOIR OF JOHN NORTH, ESQ.

MR. JOHN NORTH was born at Huddersfield at the close of the last century, and died at the same place on Sabbath morning, July 6th, 1862, in the sixty-fourth year of his age. His parents were employed in the woollen manufacture, but were not religious. Indeed, his father was much given to intemperance for many years, which entailed upon the family much suffering. At a proper age he was sent to learn the business of cloth-finishiug. On Sabbath days he was taught the principles of the Christian religion at the parish church, in the Sabbath-school connected with which place he was first a scholar, and afterwards a paid teacher.

When a boy he was fond of giddy society, but not so much so as to prevent him from yielding to the promptings of his tender nature by doing all he could to aid his mother in her struggles to maintain her family. After the expiration of his apprenticeship he began to attend the services of the Independents in the Highfield Chapel, but he remained a stranger to experimental religion, seeking his pleasures, whenever time permitted, in the gaieties of the world.

Happily for him the earnest pioneers of Primitive Methodism visited his native place at this time, and took their stand in the most eligible parts of the town, where in an earnest manner, and in impassioned tones, they held forth that gospel which first arrests and then transforms the human heart. Amongst those early missionaries were the late Jeremiah Gilbert, William Taylor, and Thomas Holliday. Under the preaching of the last named brother, our departed friend was brought to see his sinfulness, which led him to cry mightily to God for salvation. Soon his fearful heart was pervaded with the calm of gospel peace ; and having received with meekness the engrafted word, he began to develop the fruits of righteousness and good living, to the praise and glory of God.

The tendency of his early religious training was naturally calculated to foster a partiality for the more regular and quiet mode of worship characteristic of Church-of-Englandism ; but to his mind the rugged style of preaching adopted by a Holliday and others, as well as the unformal and hearty mode of worship practised by the early Primitives, and which still continues to be a leading characteristic of the entire body, was more agreeable. Hence he at once became a member of that church which was at that time and for many years afterwards accounted the offscouring of all things.

It will not be deemed out of place here to add that while rude and uninformed minds continue to grow up around us, to reach and arrest which such a preaching and such a worship as those before named seem to be the best adapted, may Primitive Methodism never, as a rule, especially in open-air services, be distinguished for any other!

The change which had been effected in our friend North was so striking that it had a powerful effect on the minds of many of his sinful associates, some of whom began to attend the same religious services, and were ultimately converted to God.

The year before his conversion, being then twenty-two years of age, he was united in matrimony to Miss Johnson, of Huddersfield, whose father was a respectable tradesman, and with whom he had served his time. Some time afterwards his father-in-law found him implements of trade, and gave up to him some of his own workmen, and thus started him in business as a cloth-dresser, to which he afterwards added that of merchant, and subsequently that of a manufacturer.

Possessed of a sound and discriminating judgment, of a patient and persevering temperament, and of steady and orderly business habits, he soon began to secure a respectable business, which in a few years placed him, not only in a state of competency, but of affluence. As his wealth increased, and his position in society became more elevated—ranking as he long did with the thriving merchants of the town—he did not desert as some do, the church which had been the near or remote means of all his blessings; but he clung to it with an unwavering grasp through all its vicissitudes and trials, and loved it to the last.

From shortly after his conversion he was an efficient class-leader. His business habits of punctuality and order were brought to bear on the discharge of the duties of this important office. Except when absence from home, or personal affliction, prevented, he was at his post, and that, too, at the proper time. This in addition to his spiritual qualifications, rendered him highly serviceable to the cause of Christ.

For many years, the cause of Primitive Methodism in Huddersfield was burdened with a heavy chapel debt, which it required strenuous efforts, and many monetary givings to sustain. Of these things Mr. North took his share, giving at one time, in 1846, when it was my pleasure to labour for the first time in concert with him, the sum of £80; and when in 1847 the old chapel became the property of the London and North Western Railway Company, his influence and energy did not a little towards effecting a happy transfer, and securing the more ample and costly premises in which our institutions in Huddersfield are now sustained. To the erection and support of the other chapels in the station, brother North contributed of his substance. It is the duty of all Christians to contribute, according to their means, to the various branches of God's cause, of which the relief of the indigent and the support of the afflicted form a not unimportant part. To what extent Mr. North engaged in these Christian acts I know not, neither can it be known in this world. But the unanimous testimony of those who best knew him is to the effect that he gave largely, but that in giving he did not "let his left hand know what his right hand did."

For many years, while his children were young, he had unmingled pleasure in their society. Sabbath after Sabbath they might have been seen with him in the family pew in the chapel, giving promise of a future devoted to Christian principles and practices. For several years indeed his eldest daughter was a decided follower of her Saviour, which gave him joy; but in the midst of bright hopes and joys her reason tottered, and at last fell. This was the first dark cloud which came over the domestic horizon of our friend, and it ever after dimmed all his joys. After this, death removed some of his younger children to the house appointed for all living. These afflictions, together with those arising from losses in business, some of them under circumstances of peculiar trial, and others which shall not be here named, greatly distressed his mind, but he still clung to the Saviour, and to the church of his early choice. More sorrows awaited him.

In 1859 his eldest son, the partner and chief stay in his business, was suddenly struck down by death; and only a few short months afterwards, Edward, his youngest son, a promising young man, was followed to the tomb. This weight of sorrow was almost more than our poor friend could sustain; he began to stoop and falter, and it was evident that ere long the head of the family would have to join his departed ones. So it was.

On Thursday, June 26, he had become so ill that he left his warehouse, and went home. The crisis of an insidious and long existent disease, unseen, unfelt, was now reached. The best medical skill which wealth, prompted by affection could secure, was called to his aid. But the united experience of four eminent doctors failed to arrest or even to identify his disease. A postmortem examination, yielded to for the public good, brought it to light. For years our friend's days had been numbered. An excrescence had grown around one of the larger bowels, which gradually tightening, ultimately closed up the member, thus ending his life.

The Rev. J. Snowden, late superintendent of the station, says:—

"In reply to my inquiries respecting the state of his mind, he said, 'I have solid and abiding peace.' I prayed, he heartily responding, and praising the God of his salvation.

"On Friday the 3rd of July, I found him very ill. He said, Christ is all in all to me.' I again visited him on Saturday afternoon. It was then thought by his family that his disease was abating, and that he might recover. But ah! how soon were these hopes to be blighted. The same evening about eleven o'clock, I was sent for; he was then very restless. Wishing to know if he was conscious I asked if I might pray with him: he said 'Yes.' I talked much, but 'yes' was all I could understand him to say. Soon he sank into a state of unconsciousness, and then gradually breathed away his life."

Mr. Zachariah Drake, of Paddock, near Huddersfield, one of his early companions in the Lord, says:—

"Mr. North was kind, frank, and peaceable, and given to hospitality. His private charities but few persons knew, beyond those who received them. Several parties now in respectable life, myself among the number, owe their commercial origin to the counsel and aid afforded them by Mr. North."

Mr. Ingham, of New Mills, formerly of Huddersfield Circuit, says:—

"For more than forty years I have been an intimate acquaintance of the late John North, Esq. In religion he made no great show. Boasting with him was out of the question. His walk was steady, his steps were firm. He was the same man at all times, and in all companies. Attaching himself to our cause at a time when it was regarded with suspicion and treated with reproach, he had the happiness of living to see himself in it honoured and beloved. His elegant abode was for years a comfortable home for both travelling and local preachers. He was at all times willing to meet cases of distress, and many a widow has had cause to rejoice through his Christian benevolence. The last time I was in his company I informed him that we were making an effort to remove the debt from off our New Mills Chapel. He gave me £5."

Mr. Ingham concludes with this appropriate wish:—

"Would that one of his sons would step into his place in the church, thus filling up the gap his removal has occasioned."

The Rev. W. Antliff, writes as follows:—

"I entertained for Mr. North a very high regard. He was, in my opinion, a deeply pious man. A man of high integrity of character, and of a noble disposition. He was a friend to me when I was in the Huddersfield circuit, from 1841 to 1844, and I have registered him on the list of my best friends ever since. He was very modest and retiring, and therefore could not take the position in society to which he would otherwise have attained. But those who knew him best, I am persuaded, loved him most. I have no doubt his absence will be much felt at the family altar, in his class, and at the business meetings of Huddersfield circuit. He was very devout and very anxious for the salvation of his family, and men in general. For many years he rendered great service to the Primitive Methodist cause. He was very useful as the general treasurer of our connexional chapel fund, and I was sorry he could not longer consent to retain the office, though a very excellent successor has been found in the person of Mr. Alderman Meek, of York. Little did I expect so soon to hear of Mr. North's death, when he was relieved of the duties of the above named office. But I hope we shall meet our dear friend in a better clime."

The Rev. T. Newell, says :—

"I knew the late Mr. North for about ten years, and during three of those years I had frequent opportunities for acquiring a knowledge of his spirit and character. I soon learnt to feel for him very great esteem; and that feeling grew as our years increased, and our acquaintance extended. He was one of the most humble and unpretending men I have ever known. Willing to serve the Church of his early choice, he never, so far as I either saw or heard, sought honour or office, or, when these things were given him, manifested any elation of mind. He was a lover of good men, kind, obliging, ever respectful. He sought to promote peace by both example and teaching. As class-leader, steward, trustee, and member of most of the official business meetings of the circuit, I found him judicious in counsel, and prompt and diligent in action. Plodding industry was one of his most striking characteristics. As a worker who sought the shade, and desired not the applause of men, he was all the more valuable as a fellow helper, and I am persuaded that the station he so long served will for many years to come remember him gratefully, and deeply feel and mourn over his loss."

To these honourable expressions of opinion respecting the departed one, I have but little to add. During the four years that I was officially connected with our esteemed friend, I had frequent opportunities of ascertaining his character and judging of his piety; and I can honestly say that I have found no man in his station in life more humble, more approachable, more hospitable, or so devotional. Affluence did not puff him up, or as in many cases make him testy and overbearing. He had more love for devotional than for official meetings; hence while latterly he seldom attended such meetings, he was nearly always to be found taking an earnest part in after preaching prayer-meetings. When he used to take his place in the official courts of the circuit, his great aim was to secure and promote peace. Although he had frequent provocations to desert the people with whom he was religiously connected, I am not aware that he ever seriously entertained even the thought of so doing. I deeply regret his removal hence, but rejoice in the sweet assurance that he is with Christ, which is far better. Our Huddersfield chapel was crowded, when his death was improved by the writer from 1 Thes. iv. 13, 14.

JOHN SIMPSON.

MEMOIR OF JOHN MILLS.

JOHN MILLS was born at Yardley, near Birmingham, in the year 1819. His mother died when he was only nine years of age. After his mother's death he removed from Yardley to Darlaston, where he attended the Wesleyan Methodist Sabbath School, and where he became a member of their society. After living at two or three places, and continuing in the Wesleyan society, he fell away through intemperance. He lived in a backsliding state for six or seven years. He then cast in his lot with us at Princes End, and also became a member of the temperance society, in which he laboured with untiring zeal.

The Circuit Quarterly Meeting put his name on the preachers' plan as a local preacher, which office he sustained for more than eighteen months with acceptability and success. The last time he was at his class, which was the Sabbath previous to his death, he expressed himself in the following language, "I feel that this is the house of God, and the gate of heaven." It was evident to all present that he had had a stormy voyage in the week that was past. He said, "I feel that I am on the Rock, which is Christ Jesus; and I am glad that it is not God and man that will judge me at the last, but God only. And I know in whom I have believed; and know and feel that I have an interest in the blood of Christ." He then repeated with an unusual ecstasy of joy—

"There I shall face
And never, never sin,
There from the rivers of his grace,
Drink endless pleasures in."

At the close, his soul was melted into tenderness; and with tears in his eyes he gave expression to his happy feelings, by saying

"O may I bear some humble part,
In that immortal song,
Wonder and joy shall tune my heart,
And love command my tongue."

He met with his lamentable and untimely death, on Wednesday, the 14th of May, 1862, between seven and eight o'clock in the morning. He had got upon a wagon as it was started from a marl pit, to ascend an incline, and on getting within about ten yards of the top of the incline, where the wagons have to pass under an archway, instead of alighting, he continued on the wagon, and his body coming in contact with the archway, he was severely crushed between the wall and the wagon. Assistance was promptly rendered, and he was removed to his home, where he died in a few minutes. The last words he was heard to say, were "Bless the Lamb!" Thus did our dear brother finish his course. He has left a sorrowing widow, but she sorrows not as those without hope. It is the prayer of the writer, that she and all her friends may be brought to that world where "sickness, sorrow, pain, and death, are felt and feared no more."

THOMAS MORRALL

MEMOIR OF JOSEPH CROWTHER.

JOSEPH CROWTHER, of Westgate Circuit, was born Oct. 3rd, 1803. He heard the first Primitive Methodist missionaries who preached in this dale, and by their instrumentality, in 1824, he was brought to know God and Jesus Christ whom he hath sent. The love of God and man, shed abroad in his heart, led him to exercise the talents entrusted to his care for the spiritual good of the young and old who lived around him. Immediately after his conversion he became a Sunday-school teacher, was soon engaged as an assistant class-leader, and in 1845 he was appointed the principal leader of the class with which he had been associated during the previous twenty-one years. He continued to teach in the school, and to lead his class with great regularity and usefulness, until the commencement of his painful and protracted affliction, which he bore with patient submission to the will of his Heavenly Father. He departed this life on the 24th of June, 1862, leaving his family and friends consoled with the assurance of his safe arrival in the land of the blest.

Our esteemed friend was a sincere Christian, warmly attached to the church of which he was a consistent member; and zealously and faithfully he discharged the duties he undertook to perform. It is no slight indication of the consistency of his religious life, and it was no small consolation to him that his wife and children were found in the way of righteousness, and united with the Church he had so long loved and served.

HENRY PHILLIPS.

---

 D I V I N I T Y.

---

THE CHRISTIAN'S NEED, AND THE PROMISED SUPPLY.

A SERMON BY THE REV. JOHN PETTY.

"But my God shall supply all your need, according to His riches in glory by Christ Jesus."—Phil. iv. 19.

THE Christian church at Philippi had a strong and ardent affection for the Apostle Paul. From the sixteenth chapter of the Acts of the Apostles, we learn that he was the chief founder of that church, and that he endured much suffering and imprisonment while endeavouring to establish Christianity in that city; which naturally contributed to increase the affection of the infant church for him. The strength of their affection was displayed in the liberal manner in which they ministered to the relief of his temporal necessities. Not only did Lydia exercise great hospitality towards him during the short time he laboured with them at the first, but after his removal from them, and while engaged in evangelistic labours elsewhere, the church more than once sent to supply his wants. In this they excelled all other churches which he established.

"Now, ye Philippians, know also, that in the beginning of the Gospel, when I departed from Macedonia, no church communicated with me, as concerning giving and receiving, but ye only. For even in Thessalonica ye sent once and again unto my necessity." (Verses 15, 16.)

And now that he was a prisoner at Rome, they again interested themselves in his welfare, and sent Epaphroditus, one of their devoted and esteemed ministers, with a plentiful supply of all things necessary to his comfort. This fresh token of their affection filled the suffering apostle with exceeding joy. "I rejoiced in the Lord greatly, that now at the last, your care of me hath flourished again." (Verse 10.) "I have all," or, as it is rendered in the margin, "I have received all," "and abound; I am full, having received of Epaphroditus the things which were sent from you, an odour of a sweet smell, a sacrifice acceptable, well-pleasing to God." (Verse 18.)

His heart glowed with gratitude for this additional instance of their kindness, and as he was unable himself to return them a suitable recompense, he derived satisfaction from the assurance expressed in the text that the all bountiful Being, whose he was, and whom he served, would amply reward them by the supply of all their necessities, "But my God shall supply all your need, according to his riches in glory by Christ Jesus."

These comprehensive and encouraging words are as applicable to all genuine believers in Christ as they were to the believers at Philippi; to those believers at least, who are like the Philippians in Christian excellency and cheerful liberality. Let us then consider the Christian's need and the promised supply, to which the text directs our attention.

I. THE CHRISTIAN'S NEED.—"All our need."

Man is a needy creature. His wants are numerous and pressing :

1. There are the needs of the body. We need food and raiment for the maintenance of life, and the preservation of health. We need houses to dwell in, that we may be sheltered from the inclemency of the weather, and beds to repose upon, that we may recruit our strength, and refresh exhausted nature by requisite rest from labour and toil. Our real bodily wants, however, are but few. Fancy may create a multitude. Through the refinement and habits of civilised life we may imagine numerous necessities. We may fancy we need not only plain and wholesome food, but also luxuries; not only comfortable clothing, but costly and superb garments; not merely suitable dwellings, but splendid mansions. But neither luxuries, costly and fine clothing, nor splendid habitations, are among the necessities of life; and should not be eagerly coveted. "Having food and raiment, let us be therewith content." These are essential; but luxuries and abundance are not, and often prove ruinous to peace of mind and prosperity of soul. "They that will be rich fall into temptation and a snare, and into many foolish and hurtful lusts, which drown men in destruction and perdition. For the love of money is the root of all evil; which while some have coveted after, they have erred from the faith, and pierced themselves through with many sorrows." (1 Tim. vi. 9, 10.) The real wants of the body are few and simple, and are readily supplied.

2. There are the needs of the soul. These are far more numerous, and incomparably more important, than the needs of the body. In our natural state, we need knowledge to enlighten us, mercy to pardon us, and grace to renew our hearts. And after conversion, our necessities are neither few nor small. In particular, we need—

(1.) Wisdom to guide us. We are often placed in circumstances of a perplexing character, when it is difficult to determine what measures we should adopt or what course we should pursue. At other times our duty may be clear enough, but the best way of performing it so as to bring most glory to God and do most good to man, may not be easy to decide. Shortsighted, and ever liable to err even in the most important affairs of life, we have constant need of heavenly wisdom, that we may be guided aright in all things.

(2.) We need power to enable us properly to discharge our respective duties, to surmount the numerous difficulties which obstruct our path, and to overcome the foes which oppose our progress. We have duties to perform towards our Maker, our neighbours, and ourselves; and these duties we cannot properly discharge without Divine assistance. "We know not," even "what we should pray for as we ought" without the teaching and help of the Divine Spirit. "The Spirit helpeth our infirmities, and maketh intercession for us with groanings which cannot be uttered." (Rom. viii. 26.) We have difficulties to surmount in our Christian course, which we should be utterly unable to overcome without Divine aid. We have enemies to contend against which are both numerous and powerful, and well skilled in the arts of deception and strategy. "For we wrestle not against flesh and blood, but against principalities, against powers, against the rulers of the darkness of this world, against spiritual wickedness in high places." (Eph. vi. 12.) How are we to contend alone against enemies so numerous, strong, and skilful! Left to ourselves in the combat we should be utterly undone, and even instantly fall before our conquering foes. We have need to be daily upheld by an Almighty arm, and to be constantly "strengthened by the Spirit's might in the inner man." Every believer may truly say,

"Weaker than a bruised reed,
Help I every moment need."

(3.) We need consolation to sustain us under the numerous sorrows, and bereavements which befall us. Sorrow and grief make a portion of our lot in this world. They happen to all; to the rich, as well as to the poor, to the worldly as well as to the pious. Who has not sometimes to complain of the unkindness of friends, or the provocation of enemies? Who has not to sustain the loss of beloved relatives, near and dear to them almost as their own souls? Revered parents, affectionate brothers and sisters, lovely and promising children, are removed from our domestic circles, by fatal maladies, or calamitous occurrences, and we "go to the grave to weep there" over the bitter losses which their removal has caused us. Or, "the desire of our eyes is taken away with a stroke," and we are suddenly brought to feel a desolation of spirit and an agony of soul which no language is sufficiently forcible and expressive to describe. What can afford us adequate support and consolation under bereavements so distressing, and events so overwhelming? No earthly friend, however kind and sympathetic; no worldly good, however varied and abundant. Divine support, religious consolation, alone is equal to our necessities. All other support is poor, insufficient, and uncertain; this alone is requisite comfort and strength.

But we cannot enumerate all our necessities. We are full of wants. A proper view of them is well-nigh overwhelming. But while the view of them should humble, it needs not discourage us. We are indeed "poor and needy," and no created being can fully supply our necessities; yet we need not despond, there is a source whence our necessities can be met. We have glanced at our need; let us now consider—

II. THE PROMISED SUPPLY.

"But my God shall supply all your need according to his riches in glory by Christ Jesus."

Here we have the source of our supply, "God;" the medium through which it is communicated, "Christ Jesus"; and the proportion in which it is bestowed, "according to his riches in glory."

1. The source of the Christian's supply—"God." The source is not human, nor angelic, but Divine. No human being, however pious and devout, can supply the spiritual necessities of others; every believer is, as we have seen, dependent upon God for the supply of his wants. No glorified saint on high can supply our need. No angelic being, however dignified and lofty, is equal to the task. Those pure and exalted intelligences above who have "kept their first estate," and have never sinned, are, as well as we, dependent beings, dependent on him for constant blessedness, by whom they were brought into existence, and through whom they have hitherto been preserved. The source of our supply is Divine—it is God, the Creator and Upholder of all things. Earthly friends may minister to our temporal necessities, as the pious Philippians did to those of the apostle, and they may be the means of communicating spiritual blessings to others, as the apostle was to the Philippians; but the efficient and original source of supply is God himself. He is—

(1.) The God of Providence. It is his rain that descends to water the earth, his sun that shines to render it fruitful, his eye that watches over all his creatures, his hand that supplies their daily wants. "He watereth the hills from his chambers: the earth is satisfied with the fruit of thy works. He causeth the grass to grow for the cattle, and herb for the service of man: that he may bring forth food out of the earth, and wine that maketh glad the heart of man, and oil to make his face to shine, and bread which strengtheneth man's heart." (Ps. civ. 13-15.) Hence both man and beast, and every living thing are graphically represented by the inspired writer as looking to God for the daily supply of their necessities. "These all wait upon thee, that thou mayest give them their meat in due season. That thou givest them they gather: thou openest thine hand, they are filled with good." (Ps. civ. 27, 28.) From God's providential goodness to the inferior creatures, our blessed Lord derives an argument for trust in Divine Providence by his people. "Behold the fowls of the air, for they sow not neither do they reap, nor gather into barns, yet your heavenly Father feedeth them. Are ye not much better than they?" (Matt. vi. 26.) And after cautioning his disciples against anxious care respecting temporal things, he assures them that if they trust in God, he will provide for their temporal necessities. "Therefore take no thought, saying, What shall we eat? or, what shall we drink? or, wherewithal shall we be clothed? For after all these things do the Gentiles seek; for your heavenly Father knoweth that ye have need of all these things. But seek ye first the kingdom of God and his righteousness; and all these things shall be added unto you." (Verses 31, 33.) God is therefore the source whence our temporal wants are supplied.

(2.) He is the God of grace. It is he who enlightens sinners, and pardons penitents. It is he who gives wisdom to the ignorant, power to the weak, and consolation to the sorrowful. "If any of you lack wisdom, let him ask of God, that giveth to all men liberally, and upbraideth not, and it shall be given him." (James i. 5.) The weakest believer may become strong in the Lord, and in the power of his might." (Eph. vi. 10.) And through "the exceeding greatness of his power," may surmount the most formidable difficulties, and overcome the mightiest foes. "I can do all things," says the apostle, "through Christ which strengtheneth me." (Verse 13.) And the sorrowful may find in him the richest consolation and support. He is "the God of all comfort," and "comforteth them that are cast down," usually in proportion to the measure of their sorrow and distress. Such, at least, was the measure of consolation he communicated to the apostles: "For as the sufferings of Christ abound in us, so our consolation also aboundeth by Christ." (2 Cor. i. 5.) And so, doubtless, will he impart what is needful to us, if we, like the apostles, look to him by faith for support and consolation in all our sorrows and distresses. Do you feel yourselves unworthy of such favours, wholly undeserving of such rich and invaluable blessings? So you are indeed; and yet you need not despair of being thus favoured, for consider:—

2. The medium of communication. "By Christ Jesus."

Man is a sinner, a rebel against the government of God, and therefore needs a mediator ; for the Divine Being could not pardon and save a rebel, in harmony with his immaculate purity and perfect justice, without a mediator. But in his boundless mercy to fallen man he has provided an all-sufficient Mediator in the person of his own Son. "There is one God, and one mediator between God and men, the man Christ Jesus ; who gave himself a ransom for all, to be testified in due time." (1 Tim. ii. 5. 6.)

(1.) It is through the mediation of Christ that temporal blessings are bestowed upon our guilty race. Health and strength, food and raiment, and all social comforts and enjoyments, are among the fruits of his mediatorial work. All these blessings were forfeited through the sin of the first Adam, and are restored to us through the obedience and death of Christ the second Adam.

(2.) It is through his mediation that spiritual blessings are communicated to man. There is no other way of access to God but through his merits. "I am the way, the truth, and the life : no man cometh unto the Father but by me." (John xiv. 6.) "Neither is there salvation in any other : for there is none other name under heaven given among men whereby we must be saved." (Acts iv. 12.) But he is an all-sufficient Mediator. Through the boundless merits of his death, and the infinite prevalence of his intercession, the guiltiest of our apostate race may draw near to God with a penitent and believing heart, and meet with a gracious reception. The claims of divine justice and holiness are met, and the honour of the divine government is maintained, through the obedience and death of Christ, "whom God hath set forth to be a propitiation through faith in his blood, to declare his righteousness for the remission of sins that are past, through the forbearance of God ; to declare, I say, at this time his righteousness ; that he might be just, and the justifier of him which believeth in Jesus." (Rom. iii. 25, 26.) Such is the perfect and all-sufficient medium through which God communicates his blessings to fallen man, and such the encouragement afforded to solicit all needful blessings at his hands.

3. Lastly, consider the proportion according to which the supply is afforded. "According to his riches in glory ;" or, according to his glorious riches treasured up in Christ. There is a glorious plenitude of grace provided through Christ for believing souls ; "unsearchable riches," an unlimited fulness. "He is before all things, and by him all things consist : and he is the head of the body, the church : who is the beginning, the first-born from the dead ; that in all things he might have the pre-eminence ; for it pleased the Father that in him should all fulness dwell." (Col. i. 17, 18.)

And according to this glorious fulness of grace God bestows his blessings upon believers; he gives in harmony with the plenitude of his resources. Among men we expect persons to give according to their rank and dignity. We look for a nobleman to give a noble contribution, and a prince to bestow a princely donation, for a benevolent or praiseworthy object. And this principle obtains in reference to the divine Being. He gives like a God! He communicates an abundant measure of his grace according to his boundless and inexhaustible resources.

Hence the rich supply promised in the text, "My God shall supply all your need." Not a portion of your need, nor the greater part of it merely, but all your need. Men may contribute to the necessities of their poor and afflicted fellow creatures to the best of their ability, and yet the contribution be not equal to the necessities of the persons concerned, because men's resources are in most cases very limited; but as the resources of the divine Being are boundless, he is as able as he is willing to supply all our need.

(1.) He will supply all our temporal need. We may not all expect to become rich, or to enjoy abundance of the comforts and conveniences of life, for the salvation of many of us would be endangered thereby. "How hardly shall they that have riches enter into the kingdom of God!" (Mark x. 23.) Comparatively few are proof against the temptations arising from affluence. When Jeshurun "waxed fat," he became unmindful of the Author of all his mercies; "he forsook God which made him, and lightly esteemed the rock of his salvation." (Deut. xxxii. 15.) A few of the pious we admit are favoured with riches, and make a good use thereof. They retain their spirituality of mind and holy deadness to the world, and employ their wealth for the glory of God, the extension of his kingdom, and the benefit of man. But riches are not necessities, and all believers may not therefore expect them. But they may expect that their need shall be supplied. Their bread shall be given them, and their water shall be sure.

(2.) God will supply all their spiritual need. He will grant wisdom direct them, grace to strengthen and sustain them, and consolation to cheer them under all their sorrows and bereavements. If he does not see good to remove at once their afflictions and sufferings, he will give them grace to support and comfort them. "My grace is sufficient for thee." (2 Cor. xii. 9.) According to their days their strength shall be. All they need to enable them to discharge their duties aright, to overcome every difficulty in their Christian course, to conquer every spiritual foe, and to save their souls, shall be graciously bestowed upon all faithful believers. Let them cultivate the spirit and follow the example of the pious Philippians, to whom the words of the text were originally addressed, and the comprehensive promise here given shall be fulfilled in their experience.

Christian brethren, are you full of wants? An inexhaustible source of supply is open to you. Are you poor in spiritual things? Your God and Father is infinitely rich; giving does not impoverish him, nor withholding enrich his hands. Are you ignorant? He can give you all needful wisdom. Are you feeble? He can strengthen you with all might. All, ALL you need is in him. He is an all-sufficient and never-failing source of goodness and mercy, and is "able to do exceeding abundantly above all that we ask or think." (Eph. iii. 20.) What a fulness of gospel blessings may we therefore look for! What a plenitude of grace may we expect! Let us not content ourselves with small measures of grace, when such a plenitude is within our reach. Let us seek to enjoy all which Christ has purchased, and which God has promised to bestow. "Being rooted and grounded in love, may we be able to comprehend with all saints, what is the breadth, and length, and depth, and height; and to know the love of Christ which passeth knowledge, that we may be filled with all the fulness of God." (Eph. iii. 17, 19.)

But what shall we say to those who totally overlook and neglect this beneficent Source of all our mercies? Alas! brethren, how great your ingratitude! How aggravated your sin! What mercies have been showered around your path all your lives long until this day! and what blessings are still daily bestowed upon you by your all-bountiful Creator and Preserver! What rich spiritual benefits are also offered for your acceptance! Yet you overlook all these tokens of the Divine regard, sin against this boundless goodness, and neglect to apply for the spiritual benefits provided for you. How base your ingratitude! How deplorable your folly! Oh! let me now prevail upon you to rebel against infinite goodness no longer, but to come at once to God through Jesus Christ. The Source of infinite supply is accessible to-day: it may not be to-morrow. "Behold, now is the accepted time; behold, now is the day of salvation." "To-day, if ye will hear" the gracious voice of God, "harden not your hearts," but haste to the mercy-seat, and find salvation there.

WORKS OF CREATION.

FASCINATING POWER OF THE SERPENT.

I WAS riding one day along the skirts of the Barabool Hills, in Australia, trying to shoot some of the birds called "mountain ducks" by the colonists, the plumage of which is remarkably beautiful. Like the turkey, this bird is more easily approached on horseback than on foot. All at once my attention was attracted by a small bird which was fluttering at a height of from fifteen to twenty feet from the ground, and uttering sounds of the greatest distress. I pulled up my horse and watched it, but could not at first distinguish what was the cause of its perturbation. It seemed endeavouring to soar, but to be incapable of doing so. Slowly, but gradually, the poor thing came nearer and nearer to the earth, its wings all the time moving rapidly, but apparently too feebly to remove it from the locality, until in a minute or two it sank down to within a few feet of the ground, its plaintive note becoming fainter and fainter. As my eye followed it down to the spot it was approaching, I all at once became aware of the cause of its terror. Projecting upwards from a tuft of grass, was the head and half of the body of a black snake. Its mouth was open, and its forked tongue played and glittered, as, with eyes fixed with baleful power on its victim, it awaited its descent. I had approached within three or four yards, but the reptile was apparently too much absorbed in its task to notice my presence. I quickly levelled my gun and shot the snake, and at the same moment the bird fell to the ground within a foot or two of its dead enemy. I picked it up and found it uninjured by the discharge, but nearly lifeless. After an interval, however, it rallied, and presently flew away.

I afterwards regretted having fired so soon, as I was uncertain whether the final collapse of the bird was due to the shock of the report, or to the power of the snake. The nest and eggs were close to the latter.

On another occasion, a friend who was riding briskly along, came upon a serpent extended at length on the ground. Surprised that the noise of his approach had not disturbed it, he dismounted, and, with a stick, disabled it with a blow. Another blow or two killed it; and then, for the first time, he became aware of the fact that a small bird was fluttering on the grass a short distance from where the reptile's head had been. After several unsuccessful attempts, this bird also succeeded in flying away, but it was evidently much enfeebled.

Many naturalists affirm that the serpent does undoubtedly possess the power of disabling its victim, by the exercise of its volition—by the exertion of a kind of mesmeric force, by which it quells the inferior volition of the bird, and renders it a prey. Others deny this altogether, and assert that simple terror is the only disabling agent in the matter. I am myself inclined to the former opinion, and that chiefly from the evident and entire absorption of the reptile in the process, whatever be its nature, in both the above cases. That they were engaged in some operation which required a concentration of all their faculties upon one object, is plainly shown by their not heeding interruptions, which, under ordinary circumstances, would have quickly startled them away. Moreover, it seems almost incredible that terror should act in a manner so different in birds, from what it does in other animals. When fear does not all at once paralyse, we know that its effect is to accelerate and intensify the motive powers; and in the case of the bird in the air, vainly struggling to fly, it seems hard to accept this explanation, or to account for its terror not urging it to quicker flight. Its powers of resistance seemed to me to become gradually exhausted. I met with two instances of a temporary loss of power in the human subject, from the sudden and unexpected sight of this reptile—both being women. For these cases, mere terror is, perhaps, sufficient to account; but it is singular that in both, the eyes of the serpent were fixed upon the individual overpowered, as it stood erect and threatening; and one of them, in describing her sensations, said, "she felt as if in a dream, unable to move or cry out." In the other, after a pause of rigid fear, the individual fascinated actually advanced a step, as if irresistibly impelled towards the venomous beast by some controlling power she could not resist. But this strange impulse to approach its cause is a phenomenon often observed in cases of extreme terror. Sudden external interruption broke the charm in both instances.

To the power of music on serpents travellers in the East have often referred ; and the operations of the snake charmers, who profess to entice them from their retreats by this means, have been often described. Nevertheless, this affirmed susceptibility to sweet sounds has been repeatedly denied by others, who insist that the reptiles thus apparently caught were serpents previously captured and tamed, and taught to follow the sounds, and then turned loose in the house to be operated upon. The reader need not be referred to the many writers of travels who have touched upon this subject. That the belief in the power of the snake charmers is universal in the eastern populations is certain ; and the following fact will show that there is some foundation for the credence ; although imposture might justly, perhaps, have been suspected in many of the instances given by travellers. Some kinds of serpent also may possess this susceptibility, and others not.

A friend of the writer, resident on a farm near Bathurst, had received from England a set of musical glasses, and one afternoon he arranged them on a table and proceeded to play upon them. The door of the room opened upon the back-yard, in which, at a distance of ten or twelve yards, was a wheat-stack. With both arms reached across the table, he had played some time, when he became annoyed by receiving repeated blows on the leg, which he for a time disregarded, thinking they proceeded from his dog. For awhile he played on, occasionally thrusting at the supposed animal with his knees, to make him move further off, when it gave him a harder blow than usual, until at length, surprised at the animal's persistence, and at the rapidity and number of the strokes he received, he paused and looked over his shoulder, and there witnessed a most extraordinary sight. Erect on a coil of its tail, spinning round and round, and swaying its head and body to and fro, and evidently in a state of the most ecstatic delight, was a huge snake. The blows had proceeded from the folds of its body, as it danced hither and thither close to the chair of the unconscious musician. It did not stop its motions immediately on the cessation of the sounds, and, seizing a stick, which luckily stood handy in a corner, a few blows terminated at once its dance and its life. It had probably inhabited the wheat-stack, and been attracted thence by the sounds.

Many travellers and writers have spoken of a constitutional susceptibility to the presence of snakes, the result of a sensitive condition of the nervous system, by which certain substances, animate or inanimate, make their presence known to and felt by some individuals, when all others are unconscious. A remarkable instance came under the observation of the brother of the writer, Mr. George B., a squatter of Moreton Bay.

One day he was walking on his cattle-run, accompanied by two men, with whom he was arranging the price to be paid for enclosing an additional portion of ground for a paddock for the head station. Their route led them through some thickly-timbered ground, and while busily engaged in discussing the matter in hand, one of the men suddenly stopped, and motioned for his companions to do so likewise.

"What is the matter?" they asked.

"There is a snake somewhere hereabouts," he replied.

Alarmed, they looked round, but could see nothing ; there was no fallen timber or other material in their immediate neighbourhood which could conceal one.

"What makes you think there is a snake near?" asked Mr. B., after he had looked round in vain for one.

"Because I know there is; I can feel him," answered the man, stepping a few paces first in one direction, then in another. His face was turned upward somewhat, and his head and body projected forward; and, noticing this, Mr. B., who had somewhere read of a power said to be possessed by some of the negroes in certain of the West Indian islands, of smelling the presence of a serpent, asked him if it was through that sense that he acquired his knowledge.

"No," replied the man; who, after moving in various directions, now selected a path and moved on before them slowly and cautiously, "I can't tell you how it is; I only know that when I am near one I somehow feel it. He is in this direction, I am certain. I was never mistaken," he continued; and, finally, after winding amongst the trees for about a dozen yards, he again stopped.

"He is close to that tree in front. I shall be sick if I go any further; I feel quite faint now;" and indeed the man looked pale and ill. With sticks in their hands, Mr. B. and the other man advanced to the tree pointed out, and on going round the trunk they found some sheets of bark which had been stripped and left there to dry.

"They are under the bark," cried the man, who had shifted his position so as to command a view of it; "either it is a very large one, or else there are two or three;" a prediction which was verified the moment the bark was raised. There were two whip-snakes lying coiled up beneath, which were killed.

Very much struck by this incident, Mr. B. endeavoured to obtain a more satisfactory explanation of the modus operandi of this singular gift or faculty, but the man could give no other than that which he had already given. It was not by means of his external senses, most certainly, he said, not by smelling that he became aware of their presence. When in the vicinity of one of these reptiles, he felt an indescribable sensation "all over him," as he expressed it, which increased or diminished as he approached nearer or went further from it.

It must be to the existence of some such inexplicable condition of nerve, that we must refer those extraordinary and well-authenticated cases we read of, of people gifted with the faculty of discovering springs of water and veins of metal, by certain bodily sensations. The feeling of antipathy or repulsion induced by the presence of certain animal or vegetable substances on some constitutions, must be also due to some similar peculiarity. Cases of this kind are sufficiently numerous; as, for instance, that of the gentleman who, though a brave officer, would turn pale and perspire if a cat approached him; or that of a person who would faint outright if a basket of raspberries were suddenly presented close to his face. These feelings, varying from simple dislike to profound horror, are often unjustly looked upon as mere affectation, which might be overcome by a strong effort of the will on the part of those exhibiting them. I know two gentlemen, brothers, who cannot sit down to a table where there is mutton, without experiencing feelings of great misery and disgust. How disguised soever it may be by cookery, they instantly detect it, and they have repeatedly made efforts to overcome this peculiarity, but without success. Another individual of my acquaintance has a similar repugnance to walnuts. If, by a strong effort of his will he overcomes this (as he did one evening in my presence) so far as to force himself to swallow a minute portion of one, a violent eruption spreading over the face and hands, attended by great heat of the whole body, quickly follows. He is confident that a larger quantity would prove poisonous.

Some analogous susceptibility, existing as a normal condition in the lower animals, has been supposed to account for phenomena which, common as they are, have often excited the wonder of the sportsman and the naturalist. The manner in which dogs so unerringly trace out their lost masters, and cats and horses find their roads back to some former place of residence, across districts they have never before traversed, is due to some faculty never yet satisfactorily explained. It is perfectly certain that neither the senses nor the memory can be concerned in the common case of a cat shut up in a basket, and carried to a great distance from the house where it had spent the whole of its life, yet returning by the shortest route straight home again; or in that of the mule, which, born and brought up in one part of Spain, was taken to the coast and embarked for Gibraltar. The vessel was wrecked on the opposite side of the peninsula to that where it had been taken on board, and reaching the shore safely through the surf, the animal made its way over mountains and torrents for two hundred miles in a straight line home, which it reached in an incredibly short time. The fact of its ears being pierced, showing it to have belonged to the public executioner, preserved it from being appropriated by any of the superstitious peasantry of Galicia, through which it passed, as they have a horror of such animals. In the case lately recorded, of the dog which, embarking with his master at an English port for a summer's shooting in the western wilds of America, there lost him, and returned to New York alone, and thence, selecting an English steamer, came on to London—the memory doubtless played a prominent part; but, even allowing this to be so, it will not explain the fact. To say the faculty is instinctive, is simply to confess our ignorance of its nature.

FOR PREACHERS AND CLASS-LEADERS.

COPY OF A LETTER WRITTEN BY MR. CLOWES, in 1835.

Newcastle.

MR. EDITOR,—The following letter I have copied from the original, which was written by the venerable William Clowes, to the Rev. E. Cornwall, who was then residing in Scotland, and just entering on the Christian ministry. He had heard of Mr. Clowes' success as a servant of Christ, and made free to write to him to be instructed in the way of faith, and in the blessed work of turning men to God. The letter was much blessed to Mr. Cornwall's soul; and after reading and shewing it often to his friends, it has been often copied and read in private circles, in the higher classes of society, (to my own knowledge) as well as sent to clergymen in the Establishment. J. Lamb, Esq., kindly allowed me to copy it from one which his sainted wife had obtained a short while before she passed away to the skies. I have no doubt you will give it a place in our magazine.

JOHN CHARLTON.

Hull, Sept. 19, 1835.

DEAR BROTHER IN THE LORD,—You will think it strange that I have been so long before I have answered your letter, but as your letter came just before our conference, and our quarter day at Hull came the week after, then our camp-meeting at Hull followed upon that, the fatigues of these made me unwell. Then came different calls for me to several places to open chapels, and hold missionary meetings, together with press of business that comes upon our circuit, and my backwardness to writing letters,—these have been the causes of my delay, and not an unwillingness to condole with you in your distress, neither has it been a neglect to pray for you, for this has been done with all the fervour and faith, I, and a friend or two more, possessed; insomuch that we were persued the Lord both heard and answered our cry in your behalf; and we rejoiced together under a weight of glory and Divine power. And if you are not delivered it must be because you did not grasp that with your hand of faith, that was within your reach. For we know that the salvation of God went out from the throne of grace. Not that we suppose that you were saved by our faith, without a concurrence of your own,—that cannot be. You say in your last to me, that in answer to our prayers, you felt a rich breathing of spiritual influence suddenly pass over your mind, and a deep sense of nearness to God was realized. But, alas! the Lord was to us as a way-faring man who taketh up his abode only for a night. But, my dear sir, should you not have believed at that time that your salvation was come? (though our faith then had not taken so fast hold upon God in your behalf as it did the last time;) was it not an excitement to believe, did it not say, "Here am I, what is it that I should do unto you? Be it unto thee even as thou wilt; be it done unto thee according to thy faith." Perhaps you will say you did believe while you felt; yes, and it is our duty to believe as well as our privilege, when we do not feel. Permit me to say that faith has two evidences, whereby it is regulated, one is fluctuating, the other is fixed. What are they? why, the one is that rich spiritual breathing, or influence, you talk of, which you felt in answer to prayer; this ebbs and flows in the best and holiest of men; the other is the immutability of God our Saviour, who has said, I will never leave thee nor forsake thee. This stands fast, unalterable. And when I have not the one in all its strength (which fluctuates) to live upon, I always have the other, upon which I can stand unshaken, fixed, and firm, at all times and seasons. And therefore I must believe with all my heart, this is a work I must do myself. But I think, dear sir, we sometimes miss our way in looking for God to do that for us which he looks for us to do for ourselves, namely, believing. The principal fault (mark that) the Lord found with his disciples in the days of his flesh was, not believing: "O fools and slow of heart to believe." Jesus said unto Martha, "If thou wouldest believe thou shouldest see the glory of God." He could not do many mighty works, because of their unbelief. "Believe ye," said he, to the blind men, "that I am able to do this for you?" "Fear not, only believe," said he to Jairus, respecting his daughter, "and she shall be made whole;" though Jairus, no doubt, might have had his daughter healed before that time, had he not laid his faith to take our Lord home to his house to heal his daughter. The centurion respecting his servant who was sick of the palsy, made a shorter work of it, who said to our Lord, "I am not worthy that thou shouldest come under my roof, only speak the word, and my servant shall be healed!" The one laid his faith for a present salvation, the other for a long or delayed salvation, the latter is too much imitated with us, or otherwise there would be more good done than there is. Are not all things possible to God? and are they not possible to somebody else—namely, to them that believe? You solicited our prayers for more than a hundred persons, you say, that met you the other day in your chapel, that had a concern for their souls; but at the same time you call in a doubt whether it be a real work; for you say, “If this is really a commencement of a work of God, it is only in blossom.” But, my dear sir, is it the best way to doubt of it, if we see nothing to the contrary? Does not this doubting hinder us from glorifying God in their behalf? Does it not weaken the strength of our energies to spend upon them? Would it not be a better way to pray and believe down from heaven the power of God upon them, till not only blossoms appear, but also the fruit? Are not all the promises of heaven suspended upon our faith? Does he not say, “Go, and lo I am with you!” and what for but to turn the world upside down? Does he not say “Compel them to come in that my house may be filled?” But why do I say this to you, my dear friend? Why, because I fear not only you, but all of us, as ministers of the Gospel, are in danger of not preaching in faith, we do not lay sufficient stress upon that part of our ministry. If we are ordained to preach, we are ordained to believe for the end of preaching, which is the salvation of sinners; and he that does not preach in faith for that end, does not preach at all, as God would have him preach. Whatever time we take up in studying and arranging our sermons for the pulpit, we should take time to go to God in faith and prayer, to get our souls clothed with the power of God, that when we go to deliver them, we may go in confidence of success; for the end of the Gospel shall be answered in them that believe. Were this the study of the day, the productions of our labours as ministers of Christ, would appear in all the glory and grandeur of heaven-born souls, and would increase the kingdom of God upon earth. Excuse, sir, my plain, strong way in writing to you; for my eye is single to God, and to you also. And if any good be the result thereof, I pray that he may have all the glory.

I am yours, in the Lord,

WILLIAM CLOWES.

---

EXTRACTS.

A GENUINE PREACHER.—A preacher of the Gospel should be a man of the soundest sense, the most cultivated mind, the most extensive experience, one who is deeply taught of God, and who has deeply studied man; one who has prayed much, read much, and studied much; one who takes up his work as from God, does it as before God, and refers all to the glory of God; one who abides under the inspiration of the Almighty, and who has hidden the word of God in his heart, that he might not sin against him. No minister formed by man can ever be such as is required here. (2 Tim iii. 17.) The school of Christ, and that alone can ever form such a preacher.—Dr. Adam Clarke.

WISDOM NEEDED IN REVIVALS.—How often is a work of God marred and discredited by the folly of men! for nature will always, and Satan too, mingle themselves as far as they can in the genuine work of the Spirit, in order to discredit and destroy it. Nevertheless, in great revivals of religion it is almost impossible to prevent wild-fire from getting in amongst the true fire; but it is the duty of the ministers of God, to watch against and prudently check this, but if themselves encourage it, then there will be confusion and every evil work.—Dr. A. Clarke.

PRIVILEGE AND DUTY.—Have you heard the blessed sound of the Gospel? Then you are bound to repeat it. Have you received it as your salvation? Then by the very act of receiving it you are bound to bestow it. Has it brought life and peace to your own heart and home? Then you must labour to convey it as life and joy to others. The rule has no exception. Lay agency is as extensive as lay piety.—Reed's Advancement of Religion, the Claim of the Times.

FOR THE FAMILY.

THE SILENT POWER OF WOMAN.

OF WOMEN IN GENERAL: OF SISTERS IN PARTICULAR.

A WOMAN'S true power seems to lie in the fact that she does not even know that she possesses it. Her influence, if, while she exercises it she will but consent to be blind to it, is the most tremendous of all the motive powers that are busy at work in the world of men. It is the woman after all that moulds the character of the man. She is doing it daily, hourly, every moment of her life; doing it the better and more truly just because generally she knows it not. Ladies are closely watched; not a deed, not a word, not even a look is lost. We men cannot turn our eyes away—no, do what we will we cannot—and even as they say that the child unconsciously assumes and retains the expression of its nurse's face, so are we, whether we will or not, influenced directly or indirectly by every action of woman's life. In spite of our ourselves, if we live in their company, we must grow in their image. It may be called an awkward predicament, that one half of the human family should live under the spell of a charm so subtle as this; but then it is a law of our being, and what can we do? We may do whatever we like, but the fact remains with us, and much of the responsibility rests with them.

After all too, I often think that it is a very good thing for us that we are not by any means, at all times, alive to this truth. It would be very uncomfortable, to say the least of it, if we were; but a woman's power is unconscious on both sides. I repeat that a woman's power is the greatest even when she knows it the least. No true man, from his very heart, loves a "strong-minded female," in the popular sense of that term. And why? Just because she is so fearfully demonstrative, and demonstrativeness is not a female's forte. To brag, and to bully, and to bluster, and to force their fellows to do what they do not wish; this seems to be the especial and delightful prerogative of "The Lords of Creation," falsely and stupidly so-called. Hence to them is allotted the task of mixing in the tumults of the world, where a thousand differing interests clash in conflict. Not such is the sphere of a woman's power. She may bite her lips with her pretty teeth, and beat the ground with her little foot; she may preach persistently to her obstinate husband, even till doomsday, and she may read him all kinds of lectures, till she grow weary herself, and yet she may not move him an inch. Why is all this, do you ask me? I shall answer that question by adopting the good old fashion of asking another. Why is it that you may pound away at yon giant rock with a battery of Armstrong guns, and yet leave it unbroken, while these gentle waters that are playing around have furrowed it deeply, written wrinkles on its brow, and may finally eat it away? Why is it that all the mightiest powers of nature work unheard and unseen? The morning light breaks in on the world while it is asleep, and the world slumbers on, so noiseless is its tread, so gentle its coming; but the thunder comes roaring, and pealing, and crashing through the skies with the din of a thousand torrents. Yet the absence of light were death, while it seems to us to be a matter of the merest indifference whether it thunder or not. The little streamlet scarcely free from its fountain, leaps and tumbles along its way with noise and tumult, while the giant river, whose powerful currents a thousand bulwarks could not stem, pours its floods into the ocean as if it poured them not.

There is a voice in woman's heart that says I am right. She cannot lecture a man into thinking as she thinks, or force him to do whatever she would have him—no, no more than we can split yon rock even with a sixty-pounder—nevertheless she can soften his nature, change him, subdue him, bring him round after all. She cannot drive him, but she can draw him, and that is better by far; she can draw him by the cords of love, and lead him by the force of sympathy whithersoever she would. In a single word, let woman honestly live out her life before man, and she must prevail. I have seen the stoutest heart bend like a reed before the holy life of a loving mother. I have known of a heart of stone that broke to become Beauteous in a sister's presence. The Judgment alone will reveal how much of good a woman's love has wrought in this weary sinful world of ours.

Sisters beware! You who have brothers have an awful power in your hands. Perhaps hitherto you have thought little or nothing about the matter; at any rate there can be no ill in thinking about it now. Unconsciously it may be, yet not the less surely hour after hour, for good or for evil, for weal or for woe, you are working mightily on your brother's heart, and he does not know it; by every act that you perform before him, you do something to give form, and meaning, and mould to his character, and that very character he is destined to bear throughout the endless ages of his endless life. Is all this idle dreaming, or it is sober reality? I shall leave your heart to say. How deep, and how real, and how strong is the power that a sister has over a brother's life is not easily told. The household that has not sisters in its fold is but half a household; my innermost heart weeps for the sisterless boy. Oh, he sees but the one side of life after all; he sees enough and to spare of boisterous mirth, and buoyant spirits, but alas for all that is tender, and beautiful, and true! Oh, how my heart has yearned for a sister's love; to be lost in her love, to live in her life; but it was fated otherwise, and now I have toiled alone on my journey far enough to feel that, day after day, I am growing more cold, and more dead, and more heartless to all that is tender and truest in life—and this because I found not the love I had eagerly sought. And yet I too had a sister once—it is many long years ago—a beauteous bud that was crushed ere the summer came, and I know that she blooms in a better clime. Wearly years have rolled heavily on since she drooped and died, yet she is not forgotten; and even now as I sit and ponder amid the ruins of my fondest hopes, and mourn over a bereavement more bitter still that has well nigh laid me low, I shed a tear betimes when I think of the winning ways and the silver laugh of the little one whose love was my own in the early time. And I love even now to cast a flower over the head of the lowly sleeper. If then the deadening rust of time has not yet prevailed to eat away that tender image from its hold on my heart, if too that image still lives as a power within me, think, oh think, I pray you, what a tremendous influence you must exercise over a brother's life—a life that is lived in the very atmosphere you breathe. For, just as truly as the seal leaves its shape on the tender wax to which it is applied, so shall you, whether you will it or not, engrave your image on your brother's heart, and that image shall "grow with his growth, and strengthen with his strength." Eternity itself cannot root it out. Nothing that any one does, it is true, is ever altogether lost—it cannot be wholly forgotten; yet somehow there is that about a sister's life that works with a double charm.

And, oh, you must not allow yourself to think for a moment, because a brother may seem careless and indifferent to you and your love, that he is so at heart. I know a young man who has a very ugly practice of vexing his sisters in all kinds of trifles, and I don't like him the better for that; but I know that he would work for these sisters, fight for them, live for them, die for them. Now, would you question the truth of my statement, if I were to tell you that such a man is by no means an exception to the ordinary run of man? Not he; somehow or other it does not seem to be in the power of man to prove the strength of his affection by little offices of kindness. This is the woman's part, whereby she charms the thorniest way into a path of roses, and turns the weariest desert into a paradise of bliss.

"Then gently scan your brother man," and forgive him for failing to do what he cannot. Whatever that brother may say, whatever he may appear, he is no more dead to you than he is to himself; to be so were to lie against the nature that God has given him. He may not know it; you may not know it, as I have said before; but what of that? There are a thousand subtle bonds that bind you together, and you cannot move to the right hand or to the left hand, without drawing him with you; his nature lies open to your tender influences at a thousand points, and day by day the gentle spell is doing its work in his youthful soul. His life, evermore, shall abundantly tell how deeply it has wrought.

And now, at this very moment, I fancy that I hear the voice of some tender sister upbraiding me—some gentle heart that wishes to do well by a brother whom she loves. "If, then, our greatest influence be wholly beyond our willing," that sister says, "why do you grieve us by telling us of the ill we may do, yet cannot avert?" I shall answer that question best by advising you to read a sermon of Horace Bushnell's, which he calls "Unconscious influence;" to which if you read it, you will readily see that I am much indebted. You will find it in "The New Life," a volume of discourses which, next to my Bible, I value the most. The moral of that sermon seems to be something like this:—We cannot destroy our power; we cannot cease, by any effort of our will, to influence our fellows while we live amongst them; but we can render our influence a good one in the main, by being good ourselves. If the fountains be clear the stream must be pure. But, alas! for us whose hearts are so cold, and so wicked, and so dead! If, then, we could only find a religion, if it be a religion that we need, that shall enter our hearts and purify our natures, and make them wholly clean—that shall render us just, and generous, and true in all our desires, so that the powers of our life shall be wholly good, and shall lighten our darkened souls, so that, even when we know it not, the light of a holy life shall shed forth its rays to the world around, in our every act. Oh, if we could only find such a boon as this! Behold, it is nigh at hand. "Ask, and ye shall receive; seek, and ye shall find; knock and it shall be opened to you. For he that asketh receiveth, and he that seeketh findeth; and to him that knocketh it shall be opened."

I begin my last paragraph, then, in some such way as I began my first;—A woman's power, and it is a tremendous one, is for the most part an unconscious one. The adage holds good with all, that example is better than precept; but with the ladies especially. A man may convert by preaching, and roaring, and reading long and terrible lectures; a woman never. One tear of pity glistening in a sister's eye and fresh from the wells of a loving heart, may do, has often done, what a thousand sermons could not accomplish. Does it seem, then, to any "gentle reader," that the tendency of this paper is to exclude the softer sex from participating in all active labour for the good of our sorrow-stricken world? I abhor the thought. That were to dash the "Missing Link" to the ground just when the world had seemed to find it; and well do I know, and readily will I grant, that that link is sorely needed. It is woman alone that can deal with sorrow aright; and many a bleeding and broken heart has been led to thank our Father in heaven for solace sent through a sister's hand, when a brother's help had availed it nothing. All this is true, and very much more; still it is within the circle of the family after all where the power of the woman is truly felt. Let, then, the self-called lords of creation bluster away to their hearts' content; let them flatter their lordly spirits with the pleasing thought that their active exertions are the springs of a world's motion; but, removed afar from the din, and the toil, and the tumult, amid which they seem to revel with delight, be it yours to be living out your lives peaceably and quietly, therefore the more truly in the eyes of those who watch your every movement with an intensity you dream not of. And—

“This above all : To thine ownself be true,
And it must follow, as the night the day,
Thou canst not then be false to any man.”

FRANK.

WHATEVER you think proper to grant a child, let it be granted at the first word, without entreaty or prayer; and, above all, without making any conditions. Grant with pleasure, refuse with reluctance, but let your refusal be irrevocable; let not importunity shake your resolution; let the particle “no,” when once pronounced, be a wall of brass, which a child, after he has tried his strength against it half a dozen times, shall never more endeavour to shake.
—British Workman.

POETRY.

SYRIA.

WHAT memories cluster round thee, glorious land,
Thrice hallowed realm of prophecy and song !
Mountain and dell, and slope, and pealing strand,
Dark olive grove, bright founts thy hills among,
Deep woods and waters—each hath thrilling tongue
Of strange wild mystery, and records hoar
As the pale snow-wreaths on crowned Lebanon,
Or echoing murmurs on thy sounding shore.

Upon thy purple hills the light is streaming,
There trod the patriarchs in their stainless might ;
Where Hermon's dew in golden light is gleaming,
There held they converse with the Infinite !
Beneath the splendour of thy star-gemm'd night,
Breathed out the shepherd-bard his songs of flame,
And swept his lyre to strains of living light,
Till earth resounded with one glorious Name !

“Pearl of the East !” Damascus ! at thy shrines
What myriad hearts their offerings have laid !
Rare gifts and fragrant incense, wealth of mines,
Gems, treasures countless ; monarchs proud have paid
Their homage at thine altars, 'neath the shade
Of gorgeous mosque and temple, whilst on high,
From choir and nave, and echoing colonnade,
Uprose the song triumphal to the sky.

Land of proud cities ! how hath Sidon stood ?
And queenly Tyre, fair empress of the sea ?
Phœnicia's glory, basking in the flood,
Of golden sunlight's radiant witchery !
Yon crested billows, glad and proudly free,
Ere bore the wealth of nations to her side ;
There Cross and Crescent strove for victory—
There steel clad warriors for their altars died.

Yet deeper memories are thine, O land
Thrice hallowed by Incarnate Deity !
Judea's hills in solemn grandeur stand,
Their pines are vocal with love's mystery !
Yes, He, who loved thy wandering sons and thee.
Who trod thy vales and sanctified thy fanes,
There wrestled sore in mortal agony—
There spurned triumphantly the spoiler's chains.

O loved Jerusalem! O Zion fair!
 Immortal visions of the past are thine!
 Unutterable glory and despair
 Thy wild waste places echo from each shrine
 Of desolation! Memories divine
 Around thee gather of thy suffering Lord,
 His cross and passion—tears for thee and thine,
 His quenchless sympathy, his love adored.

* * * * *

Forsaken land! how gaze we on thee now?
 Alas! the blood of thousands steeped thy sod!
 City and hamlet, vale and mountain brow,
 Alike have quailed 'neath persecution's rod;
 Carnage and rapine cry aloud to God!
 Shall he not visit with avenging fire?
 Doth Islam reign where kings and prophets trod;
 Where angel's hands have swept an angel's lyre?

Amid the cedar groves of Lebanon
 Thy slaughtered thousands rest in gory sleep,
 'Neath ruined piles touched by the setting sun,
 Ten thousands writhe in agony and weep!
 Yon snow clad ridges, gorges wild and deep,
 Have heard the wail of anguish and of death:
 Through fragrant vales, where gushing waters leap,
 Flows the red life blood, blasts the spoiler's breath.

When shalt thou wake, and from the earth arise,
 And clad in beauteous garments own thy king?
 'Neath the rich glory of thy sapphire skies
 Arouse thee from the dust, rejoice and sing?
 Oh haste the day when Judah's hills shall ring
 With glad hosannas to the Prince of Peace!
 When Druse and Moslem shall their offerings bring,
 And streams of love refresh the wilderness.

ADELINE.

THE SABBATH SCHOOL.

THE HISTORY AND INFLUENCE OF SUNDAY SCHOOLS IN ENGLAND.

A Paper read by Mr. Watson, at the General Sunday School Convention, September 1st, 1862.

THE history of Sunday-schools in England is now well known, and the only difficulty which will arise on that subject will be to condense it within the limits by which this address must be bounded. The influence of Sunday-schools in England is not so easily dealt with. In order to ascertain what influence they have had, it may be desirable to cast a glance backward to the condition of England, intellectually, morally, and religiously, prior to the establishment of Sunday-schools. A great change will be found in all these respects, a change which will be universally admitted to be for the better; and it will then remain for consideration whether that change may be attributed, in any and what degree, to the establishment and progress of that Sunday-school system, the origination of which we cannot but attribute to that good man, Robert Raikes.

The history of England, for some years prior to that event, presents a very painful picture as it respects the intellectual cultivation of the people. The two universities of Oxford and Cambridge were then the places where those who were to be the governors and instructors of the people completed their education, and it will be readily perceived that the discipline exercised there would influence all their previous studies. But, says Dr. Swift, "I have heard more than one or two persons of high rank declare they could learn nothing more at Oxford and Cambridge than to drink ale and smoke tobacco ; wherein I firmly believed them, and could have added some hundred examples from my own observations in one of these universities"—meaning that of Oxford. Gibbon, the historian, who was a member of Magdalen College there, says he was never once summoned to attend even the ceremony of a lecture, and in the course of one winter might make, unproved, in the midst of term, a tour to Bath, a visit into Buckinghamshire, and a few excursions to London. Dr. Johnson gives the following account of his outset at Pembroke College :—"The first day after I came, I waited on my tutor, Mr. Jordan, and then stayed away four. On the sixth, Mr. Jordan asked me why I had not attended ; I answered I had been sliding in Christ Church meadow." This apology appears to have been given without the least compunction, and received without the least reproof. While such laxity existed in the oversight of the students, it became a matter of necessity that the examination for degrees should be correspondingly easy, and such was the case. Lord Eldon gives the following account of his examination in 1770 :—"An examination for a degree at Oxford was, in my time, a farce. I was examined in Hebrew and in history. 'What is the Hebrew for the place of a skull ?' I replied, 'Golgotha.' 'Who founded University College ?' I stated (though, by the way, the point is sometimes doubted) that King Alfred founded it. 'Very well, sir,' said the examiner, 'you are competent for your degree !'" In 1780, Dr. Vicesimus Knox says, "The greatest dunce usually gets his TESTIMONIUM signed with as much ease and credit as the finest genius. . . . The statutes require that he should translate familiar English phrases into Latin, and now is the time when the masters show their wit and jocularly. I have known the questions on this occasion to consist of an inquiry into the pedigree of a race-horse." It could not be expected that the examination would be very strict, as the examiners were chosen by the candidate himself from among his friends, and he was expected to provide a dinner for them after the examination was over. Lord Chesterfield, in his Essays, speaking in the character of a country gentleman, satirically observes, "When I took away my son from school, I resolved to send him directly abroad, having been at Oxford myself."

These facts will give some idea of the training to which the upper classes of society were subjected, and will show how little, intellectually, could be expected from it. With respect to the middle and lower classes of society, the educational institutions founded in prior ages had become the subject of great abuse, and had been, in a great degree, diverted from the objects for which they were designed, while the parochial charity-schools afforded but a modicum of instruction to a very small portion of the population.

It will not be thought surprising that the moral condition of the people was not more satisfactory than their intellectual. It would, perhaps, be unfair to rely on the pictorial representations of Hogarth, or on the fictitious narratives of Smollett and Fielding, because it may be apprehended that their desire to produce effect may have led them into exaggeration, if not into caricature. Still, the probability is that these works would not have attained their celebrity had they not given something like a fair representation of the existing manners of the people. Had their pictures of the grossness and vice which characterized the period now under review, been destitute of truth, surely the feelings of the nation would have revolted against such an exhibition, the only justification for which was to be found in its general truthfulness. But without depending too much on this evidence, there are, in addition, facts on record which show too conclusively that ignorance and vice were too closely associated. To refer again to Oxford. Lord Eldon stated that he had seen there a Doctor of Divinity so far the worse for a convivial entertainment that he was unable to walk home without leaning for support with his hand upon the walls, but having, by some accident, staggered to the Rotunda of the Radcliffe Library, which was not then protected by a railing, he continued to go round and round, wondering at the unmeasured length of the street, but still revolving and supposing he went straight, until some friend—perhaps the future chancellor himself—relieved him from his embarrassment and set him on his way. Even where there might be no such excess as this, the best company of the day would devote a long time to the circulation of the bottle. With such examples before them, it is not surprising that drunkenness should be found to prevail amongst the lower classes. In the year 1736 there were in London 207 inns, 447 taverns, 551 coffee-houses, 5,975 ale-houses, and 8,659 brandy-shops, making a total of 15,839. The population at that time was about 630,000. In a century afterwards, 1835, the population had advanced to 1,776,500, but the number of houses where intoxicating liquors were sold had greatly diminished—not then exceeding 5,000; so that, in proportion to the population, there were at the former period nine times as many such places open as at the latter.

Another feature of the period of English history shortly previous to the establishment of Sunday-schools, was the prevalence of gaming. It was discountenanced by both the second and third Georges, but flourished notwithstanding. There is one case recorded of a lady who lost 3,000 guineas at one sitting, at loo. Among the men, Brooke's Club and White's are mentioned as more especially the seats of high play. Mr. Wilberforce coming up to London as a young man of fortune, says:—"The very first time I went to Boodle's, I won twenty-five guineas of the Duke of Norfolk." Many in that age were the ancestral forests felled and the goodly lands disposed of to gratify this passion. The discovery of a new game in the last years of the American war, tended greatly to diffuse the spirit of gaming from the higher to the lower classes. This was the E. O. table, which was thought to be beyond the reach of law, because not distinctly specified in any statute. In 1782, a bill was brought in providing severe penalties against this or any other new game of chance. The bill passed the Commons, but the session closed before it had got through the House of Lords. In the debates upon this subject, Mr. Byng, the member for Middlesex, stated that in two parishes only of Westminster there were 296 E. O. tables. Another member stated that E. O. tables might be found at almost every country town. Servants and apprentices, it seems, were drawn in to take part in these games, cards of direction to them being often thrown down the areas of the houses, and the comers in were allowed to play on Sundays as freely as on other days. Sheridan, who, from his own private life, could not be expected to view the new bill with any great favour, said against it with some truth, that "it would be in vain to prohibit E. O. tables, while a more pernicious mode of gaming was countenanced by law—he meant the gaming in the lottery." Private lotteries were indeed prohibited, but State lotteries had long been ranked amongst the ordinary sources of revenue. This "lottery madness," as it has been truly termed, was, it seems, indulged in by night as well as by day. A traveller to London in 1775 observes that he could not help looking with displeasure at the number of paper lanterns that dangled before the doors of lottery offices, considering them as so many false lights hung out to draw fools to their destruction.

If we inquire further into the moral habits of that age, the result will be such as might be expected from the prevalence of such ill practices as drinking and gaming. We may guess the customary nature of the talk and songs after dinner, when we find that in great houses the chaplain was expected to retire with the ladies. But in many cases we find this want of moral refinement extended even to them. Sir Walter Scott records that his grand-aunt applied to him in his young years to obtain for her perusal the novels of Mrs. Afra Behn, some of the most licentious in the language. Scott, though not without some qualms, complied with the request. The volumes were, however, speedily returned. "Take back your bonny Mrs. Behn," said Mrs. Keith, "and if you will follow my advice, put her in the fire." "But is it not a strange thing," she added, "that I, a woman of eighty, sitting alone, feel myself ashamed to look through a book which, sixty years ago, I have heard read aloud for the amusement of large circles of the best company in London?"

In those days, also, the high roads leading into London were infested by robbers on horseback, who bore the name of highwaymen. Private carriages and public conveyances were alike the objects of attack. Thus, in 1775, Mr. Nuthall, the solicitor and friend of Lord Chatham, returning from Bath in his carriage with his wife and child, was stopped and fired at near Hounslow, and died of the fright. In the same year, the guard of the Norwich stage was killed in Epping Forest, after he had himself shot dead three highwaymen out of seven that had assailed him. Nor were such examples few and far between; they might, from the records of that time, be numbered by the score, although, in most cases, the loss was rather of property than of life. Horace Walpole, writing from Strawberry Hill, complains that, having lived there in quiet for thirty years, he cannot now stir a mile from his own house after sunset without one or two servants armed with blunderbusses. But what is most important to us, as illustrating the general state of morals, is the astonishing fact that some of the best writers of the last century treat these acts of outrage as subjects of jest and almost of praise. It was the tone in certain circles to depict the highwaymen as daring and generous spirits, who "took to the road," as it was termed, under the pressure of some momentary difficulties—the gentlefolk, as it were, of the profession, and far above the common run of thieves.

But it may be asked, Were there not some controlling religious influences at work to counteract these results of ignorance and immorality? Doubtless there were, but to a lamentably small extent. John Newton, who laboured at St. Mary Woolnoth's, Lombard Street, declared that when he came to that church, he was nearly, if not quite, the only clergyman in the City of London who preached the gospel. This may have been like the despairing language of Elijah, "I, even I only, am left;" and yet it could not have been used if the religious character of the clergy had not fallen very low. There is other evidence to this lamentable fact. Dr. Thomas Newton, Bishop of Bristol, thus complains of the neglect of duty on the part of the cathedral clergy:—"Never was church more shamefully neglected. The Bishop has several times been there four months together without seeing the face of dean or prebendary, or anything better than a minor canon." And as, in some cases, there were undisguised neglects of duty, so in others we may trace its jocular evasion. On one of the prebendaries of Rochester Cathedral dining with Bishop Pearce, the Bishop asked him, "Pray Dr. S., what is your time of residence at Rochester?" "My lord," said he, "I reside there the better part of the year." But the doctor's meaning, and also the real fact was, that he resided at Rochester only during the week of the audit. Among the laity, as might have been expected, a corresponding neglect of church ordinances was too often found. Bishop Newton cites it as a most signal and unusual instance of religious duty, that Mr. George Grenville "regularly attended the service of the church every Sunday morning, even while he was in the highest offices." Not only was Sunday the common day for cabinet councils and cabinet dinners, but the very hours of its morning service were frequently appointed for political interviews and conferences. Nor was the state of religion more satisfactory amongst those who did not conform to the Established Church. The successors of the Puritans had sadly fallen away from the fervour and soundness of religious principle of their ancestors, and from many of their pulpits the doctrines of Socinianism were preached, while the minutes of the Methodist Conference in May, 1765, contain the following entry:—"Do not our people in general talk too much and read too little! They do."

(To be continued.)

MISCELLANIES.

AT THE EXHIBITION.—THINGS NOT TO BE FORGOTTEN.

EIGHTEEN SIXTY-TWO, like Eighteen Fifty-one, will be long remembered as the Exhibition Year. The glass hive of human industry, which, eleven years ago, attracted so many visitors to Hyde Park, has disappeared from its old position, but still, in a measure, survives in the Crystal Palace at Sydenham. The International Exhibition at Kensington will ostensibly have closed when this paper is in the hands of the reader, but the building, more permanent than its fairy-like predecessor, will long remain, in part at all events, to remind us of the gathering of the nations. A great event like this, continues to occupy a conspicuous place in the annals of progress, and is one of those events which posterity may regard with admiration, even while other events of the same year of grace are remembered only with pity or indignation.

England has been invaded; armies of foreigners have landed, unmolested, on our shores, have marched upon the capital, penetrated to our arsenals and dockyards, and not a shot has been fired, not a blow struck. To be sure, all the country has been raised; every county has contributed to increase our forces, without a hint at conscription; Lowlands and Highlands of Scotland have sent their levies—Wales has poured forth the very flower of the Principality—and the Sister Isle, “the jewel set in the silver sea,” has despatched its troops to our aid. But there has been no fighting—no battle, triumph or defeat—no charge of squadrons—no deadly struggle—no miles of slain—no wreck of surging agony; all the world has met in peace—the oldest empire of earth and the newest colony fairly shaking hands with one another, and giving each other God speed in the work of peace and progress.

In how many homesteads, far and near, will the story of the Exhibition be told, over and over again, during the coming winter—in how many strange tongues; in Russia, where family groups shall be entrenched against the boisterous bleak wind, by flues and stoves; in Italy, where winter is scarcely known, and a dish of charcoal at any time takes off its sharpest edge; around the blazing logs of an English farm-house fire; or by the peat fires of Scotia, and Wales and Erin; or by coal fires, ruby glowing everywhere, shall it not be told what we saw, what we did at that sight of sights—the International Exhibition of Eighteen Sixty-two.

Talking to a man the other day on this very subject, he said to me, “I have tried to see all I could, I have not stopped to think about it, I left that for another time; but I have grown so accustomed to the place—the nave, the transepts, the courts—that I can shut my eyes and see it at any moment.” And so it will be with very many: many who have not stopped to think much about the objects presented to their gaze, while they were looking at them, will recall those objects in the future, and think about them then. Think about them, and talk about them, and compare notes, and grow wiser and better, unconsciously almost, from being brought into contact with things of beauty and worth.

How shall we forget the first overwhelming scene of grandeur and glory that flashed upon us, and flooded over us, when we stood, for the first time, beneath the Eastern dome, and looked up the thronged nave, dazzling, beautiful, bewildering—all tints of colour, all kinds of form—the sound of music sweeping through the sunlit air—odorous, melodious—not to be described by tongue or pen? An awful scene of grandeur and vastness; for we looked, in a certain sense, upon all the kingdoms of the world in a moment. People of all climes brought together, bent on one object, meeting in one place as one day we shall see them—yonder—sitting with Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, in the kingdom of God.

Who can forget the first walk up the main avenue of the Exhibition, when everything was new and strange, before the eye had grown familiar with the place? There was the gilt pyramid which represented, by its bulk, the quantity of gold received from Australia since Eighteen Fifty-One—more than eight hundred tons’ weight, and worth upwards of £100,000,000. How many people gathered about this obelisk, ignorant of its purpose, and speculating on what it was intended for; others simply admiring its representative grandeur, and rolling the words, “a hundred millions,” from their tongue with a truly metallic unction. Some people who did not know anything about it, were of opinion that it was designed as a cover to some gigantic jewel case : others, that it was the receptacle for all the money taken in the Exhibition : some were of opinion that it was solid gold, and would joke about liking to have it all to themselves ; they little thought that the glittering object was but gilt canvass stretched on laths ! Mistakes of this kind are not uncommon in every-day life. How much gilt canvass is taken for pure bullion ; how much true metal passed over as common worthless ore ! To myself, this gold trophy possessed a somewhat melancholy interest ; and I saw a woman in mourning looking at it with a pensive face, thinking probably, as I thought, of some dear friend who had gone over the blue sea to search for yellow gold, and had found a grave—who had stumbled and fallen in the race for riches, the greed of gain.

Who can forget the small arms trophy—a thing of dreadful meaning—pistols, swords, rifles, revolvers, daggers, side-arms, guns, a fringe of bayonets, a back-ground of ramrods, everything deadly, everything murderous—a trophy that sent the mind wandering back to a time when there were but two brothers in the whole wide world, and one slew the other. Those black muzzles—those suspicious looking tubes, in which gunpowder and ball lurked covertly—those keen-edged weapons, ready to drive out the trembling soul from its house of clay—those swords and pistols, beautifully adorned with gilding, ivory, mother-o'-pearl—murder elegantly mounted—were enough to haunt the mind for many a day. They suggested pictures of slaughter, which were painted up-stairs on acres of glowing canvass—the human butcher-work which men have agreed to call glory, and which has dyed crimson so many pages of history. And this is the last appeal of nations, as intelligent and civilized an appeal as the “good custom” of Dahomey. Money is said to be the sinews of war, and one naturally turns from the stand of arms to the gold trophy. If that trophy were of solid gold many times told, it would not cover the cost of our national battle-field triumphs or defeats in the old Georgian period. Costly ! Money is not the most serious cost of war—human hope, human life, human progress—here are all these things sacrificed on the blood-stained altar of martial glory. It is pleasant, after looking at these grim-death engines, to recall the old promise of a better time to come, when men shall learn war no more.

Who can forget the food trophy ! Its singularity of form, and the miscellaneous nature of the objects exhibited ; the familiarity of almost all, and the apparent incongruity of arrangement ; all these will be remembered ; but it was worthy of notice, and of more attention than it often obtained—pickled onions and apple jelly—Glenfield starch and patent corn flour—wedding cake and food for cattle, are all very common and familiar, but they are characteristic signs of the progress of civilization—they are among its curiosities. What shall I eat ? what shall I drink ? are physiologically, important questions. The cook and the kitchen are more agreeable than the doctor and the dispensary ; and the former may often preserve us from the latter. The choice and measure of what we take daily by pounds, is surely of as much importance as what we take seldom, and only by grains and spoonfuls. Cookery, indeed, is one of the greatest essentials of health ; and what triumphs are there which it cannot achieve over the strangest elements, and turn them to palatable food ! There is a story told of a shoemaker in Scotland, whose wife had been a cook in a family, and who, upon being asked by a friend, how he was pleased with his spouse, replied, “Eh, man, she's a prime ane ! I believe she could make a stew out o' bend leather, and a hashie out o' insoles !”

Leather—there's nothing like leather ! Who can forget the famous leather trophy in the Nave, with the heads of animals ranged round it, and a stag on the summit ! It was not remarkable for elegance, but it was full of interest to all who care for the progress of our manufactures. Then there was the fur trophy, the most of which we remember is a sagacious ferret walking off with a rabbit, while his less sagacious brothers are struggling for its possession in mortal strife with one another ; an epigram in a glass show case ! Trophies—all up the Nave. When first the Exhibition opened they were as plentiful as flags in a Lord Mayor's show ; good taste reduced their size and number, else had the finest sight in the Exhibition, the view from end to end, been hopelessly destroyed.

Who can forget the jewels? Jewels are the stars of the mine, shining with an unborrowed lustre, owing little to the skill of man, but in all ages and all countries maintaining a fast hold on public estimation. There was the famous koh-i-noor, and its rival the star of the south. This diamond, set in the midst of a magnificent star of brilliants, each of which, though large and valuable, sank into insignificance before the glory of the central stone. Its estimated worth is a million sterling. The koh-i-noor, "Mountain of light," has been recut since its appearance in 1851, and the alteration is all for the better. It is worth about two millions sterling. Then there was—who can forget it?—the emerald which once adorned the turban of the Lion of the Punjaub, and a pearl pendant, large as a plover's egg, and brilliant diamond stars, and rubies, and amethysts, and sapphires of entrancing beauty and enormous worth; jewels of all colours, and all sizes, and all shapes, bright red, dark green, clear blue, rich purple, yellow, pink, orange; light sea green beryl, that is often seen on Oriental stilletos; blue sapphires from the sands of Ceylon rivers; brooches, rings, necklaces, chains, bracelets, earrings, tiaras—every imaginable form of beauty, every variety of tint; pearls that might have served Cleopatra, or contented Augustus. It would be strange if so much costly jewellery should be forgotten; there is a singular fascination in looking at what is worth so much. Yonder diamond, that has flashed its lustre in the eyes of myriads—that has been the occasion of intrigue and violence as it passed from hand to hand—what would it not produce? How many destitute families in the North would it not relieve; how much depression and anxiety would it not dispel; banish want, and baffle sickness, and defeat death; there it remains, cold, bright, beautiful, the representative of so much value, so much money, so much money's worth; a koh-i-noor of bread and blankets in the winter time would be a sight to see!

Who can forget the metal and minerals in the Eastern Annexe? White, cold, silvery aluminum, new to the kingdom of metals since 1851, that is to say, new as an article of commerce. Glittering golden ores from Devonshire and Wales. Iron from Weardale, Cleveland, Lincolnshire, Somerset, Devon, Cornwall. Coal from all the large collieries, not in immense lumps, like that which figured in the first Exhibition, but sample blocks of eighteen cubic inches. And in connection with the coal who can forget the frog which caused an animated controversy as to his age, and finally died, either from the weight of years or confinement in a bottle; a preadamite frog, it was by some asserted, who had lived in the heart of a coal for thousands and thousands of years; and whose presumed age made some people laugh, and others serious, and all argumentative, leaving out one little point of consequence, namely, that the frog was obviously a modern frog, and had no more connection with extinct animals than man himself. The chemical substances comprised a collection unequalled of its kind; the rich crimson, obtained from coal tar, but fugitive as a blush, attracts notice not only from the brilliancy of its colour, but from the material from which it is drawn—coal tar; from this same substance, dirty and offensive as we know it to be, aniline is obtained, and mauve and magenta dyes in consequence. Then the crystals, gorgeous yellow, brilliant red, made from old skins, and bones, and woollen rags; and then oxalic acid, made from sawdust; and innocent looking phosphorus, made from burnt bones, ready to blaze into mischief at the first opportunity. Then the medicines, colchicum, and colocynth, and aconite; belladonna, and hemlock, and henbane, and jalap, and rhubarb, and camomile; all waiting patiently in their cases for an opportunity to be used either for the killing or the curing of the sick. All these things are to be remembered as seen in the Exhibition, along with pigments of the brightest hues, and sperm oil, and wax candles, and statuettes in soap.

Who can forget the articles of food exhibited, and their adulteration? A sight of these adulterations fills us with suspicion of everything. What are we eating and drinking? are things what they seem? Is tea of Chinese growth, or is it sloe leaves? is coffee the aromatic plant of India, or burnt beans and chicory? Is bread made up of wholesome wheat, or is it a strange compound of foreign substances in which ground bones and potatoes are items? And then, who can forget the agricultural and horticultural machines,—ploughs, scarifiers, pulverizers, grubbers, dibblers, and drillers; hay-making and reaping machines, horse hoes and mowing machines, winnowers, root cutters, pulpers, crushers, grinders; churns, and cow cribs, and apple mills, and cider presses, and everything suggestive of quiet country life. There rose before us as we walked amongst them a vision of an old homestead,—a thatched house, an old barn and granary, a gate partially covered with moss, leading out upon a paddock, a bright sunny landscape, green meadows, yellow uplands, with cattle resting in the shade, and reapers at their work; an old market cart comes trundling along a shady lane, and there is an old familiar face in it, and a pleasant voice calls, as it will never call more; it is a picture of a pleasant memory, and if the memory be pleasing, why should not the “dead past” sometimes yield its dead?

And then, who can forget visits to the English and Foreign courts? The stained windows, glowing with Bible pictures; the chandeliers, and girandoles, and candelabra of the glass court; the pottery and porcelain, from common earthenware to daintiest China, from clay pipes to parian statuettes; then the precious metals and jewellery; and furs, and feathers, and leather, and hardware—not forgetting locks and keys; then the furniture, such as we have in our modern drawing-rooms, and such as our great grandfathers had in their state parlours; then gilt chairs, studded with ecclesiastical devices, and carved oak prayer-desks, and spread eagle reading-desks, and other church furniture of the mediæval pattern. Who can forget the sculptures of the Roman court, where Gibson's tinted Venus has excited so much criticism, the golden apple which she holds, the very apple of discord; and then the French department with its textile fabrics and beautiful porcelain; then the Zollverein with its crystal and leather work; and Austria rich in raw materials; then Russia, also with its furs and cereals, its seal skin carpet, and Siberian trophy of black lead; then Turkey, gorgeous with all the glory of silk and velvet, gold embroidery, and cashmere; and Egypt, making the Egypt of to day stand side by side with Egypt of the past, ere Memnon ceased to sound, or Nile heard strange voices; then China and Japan, alike curious and interesting! Visits to all these courts will be long remembered, and form the topic of many a cheerful and instructive conversation.

Who can forget the pictures speaking the universal language, and telling of quiet homes or noisy markets, of village festivals and state processions, of battle, murder, and sudden death; and of pastoral delights, and green fields, and standing corn, and angling under the shadow of leafy trees. And who can forget the machinery; the iron bodies living and moving with the breath of steam, and with a strength and force that mocks at the puny might of man; labouring obedient to his will,—the passive bond-servant of a potent master!

Who can forget the music? for Jubal's children had their place as well as those of Tubal Cain. There were organs and pianos, and all sorts of music to make the air vibrate to the waves of sound, and gratify the ear with all imaginable changes of the diatonic scale. In looking at one of the grand organs in the Exhibition, or in listening to its solemn voice, we think of the organs which are named in the Old Testament and the Psalms; but these references must by no means be confounded with the modern instrument. Gamut, who is not only musical, but learned in musical lore, informs me that this word organ is taken from the Septuagint, and that no instrument like our organ was known to the Greeks; what they meant by an organ, was a “work,” or “instrument;” that it referred to all sorts of musical instruments, and other instruments of human labour. But though the first organ was not like what we call by that name, it is probable that it formed the rudimentary idea. It was a pipe made of a reed or stalk; this would subsequently lead to the union of seven or eight pipes of different lengths, forming a kind of mouth organ; Pan, the great Sylvan god, is represented with one of these instruments. To abridge human labour, and extend the power of these pipes, was the work of successive generations. There was a box added, the pipes being inserted at the top; another pipe communicating with the wind box was blown into with the mouth, which of course made all the other pipes speak at once; this was obviated by silencing those not required, by the fingers, a troublesome and laborious process; to accomplish this by a mechanical arrangement was the next step, and so the work proceeded. The monks of the middle ages contributed to the improvement of the organ; it was called by them the king of instruments, and Theophilus, a holy brother, wrote a treatise on its manufacture in the eleventh century. Gamut is great on the subject of organs, and enthusiastic in their praise; he told me so much about wind chests, and sound boards, tables, sliders, upper boards, bearers, pipe racks, grooves, stops, claviars, couplers, and sporzando pedals; ran over the names of the stops as rapidly as his fingers run over the keys of a pianoforte, that I became dazed—blinking as an owl with too much light, and I was not sorry when he came to a full stop. But the subject of the organ is really interesting, and Gamut promises to favour me with very much more about it at an early opportunity.

Organs were not the only musical instruments in the Exhibition; who can forget the pianos that all day long were being tried by amateurs, skilled, or unskilled? An imposing looking young man marches up to one of the most beautiful instruments, and strikes a few chords,—half a dozen people stop to ascertain what he is going to do; a dozen more stop to ascertain what the half dozen are stopping for; a couple of dozen more stop for nothing particular; the young man dashes off the prelude, raises expectation, and disappoints it by playing "In my Cottage," about as ably as little Miss Minim, who has taken her first quarter at a Peckham boarding school. That young man played that same prelude on several pianos on other occasions, but he judiciously left out the air.

In the musical department there was something very interesting in observing the gradual improvement in pianoforte manufacture. There were the old virginals of the time of Queen Elizabeth; the spinet, the harpsichord, the grand piano, and so on to the latest improvement of the modern maker. The harmoniums also were conspicuous; one, the wind for which was supplied by clock work; and most attractive of all, a self-acting organ, which imitated the melody of a full orchestra, and was called the orchestrian.

Who can forget more than all the sights, the sightseers; the moving mass that every day and all day long thronged avenue, and court, and gallery,—people of all conditions, from all parts of the world, that were making the most of a shilling's worth, that were lounging out three guineas' worth, that were interested in everything, that were enthusiastic about nothing, that were wearied with labour, that were worn out with leisure, that were enjoying the roughest fare, that were complaining of the daintiest,—who can forget those crowds! The flutter, the colour, the subdued murmur—the unutterable sense of grandeur of the world's wealth, of the immense capabilities of humanity—who can forget it, even though the sight was seen but once?

Everything has a result. Nothing is isolated in this world; all things all events act and react on each other. One of the results of this Exhibition will be the improvement of art and manufactures. Comparison is the only way by which advancement can be ascertained. Here is the weaver, whose days have been passed among the whirl of wheels and shuttles; his mind is contracted in a factory, but expanded as he gazes on the production of foreign looms. Here is the poor village stone-cutter, whose highest employment has been to carve "Hic jacet" on a tombstone; he gazes on the forms of beauty—and a high hope, a noble ambition is kindled within him. Man sees man's work; nations observe the strength and activity, and intelligence of other nations, and a laudable emulation is excited. "Glimmes are half red embers laid together, get into the brightest white glow."

Another result is the fresh impetus given to education. The Exhibition teaches how much there is to learn; how many lessons yet untouched there are that human intelligence must conquer ; how much there is to gratify and enrich the toiling learner ; how much to elevate him above the sordid, or the sensual ; how much to quicken the desire to improve, and how the acquisition of to day but impels to fresh conquests to-morrow.

Another result is the recognition of the advantages of peace. Wars and rumours of wars have occupied this year a large share of attention ; the daily papers have detailed the progress of the peaceful rivalry at Kensington, and the hostile rivalry on the other side of the Atlantic ; how different the pictures : look on the one, look on the other ; what need of comment ? And, as the most important result of all, we look for increased energy and zeal in sending forth God's truth. All truth is God's truth ; but there is a sense in which we apply that term to truth higher than all other truths—the truth of Christianity ; the Gospel ; the story of the Cross. That, looking at the energy and enterprise displayed in this Exhibition of human labour, Christians should bestir themselves more actively in the divine work, is what may reasonably be expected ; it would be strange indeed if they forgot their responsibility, and neglected to persevere in the Master's cause ; earnestly, faithfully, by life and by labour, by precept and example ; by cheerfulness, consistency, hopefulness, and confidence ; a brave work,—bravest of all the brave things done under the sun—to make the earth yield back the echo of the angels' song, of glory to God, peace and good-will among men.

CHRISTIAN KEN.

CONNEXIONAL INTELLIGENCE.

HOME DEPARTMENT.

NEWPORT, LINCOLN CIRCUIT.—On the 6th and 7th of April, 1862, we held our anniversary services. On Sunday two excellent sermons were preached to crowded congregations by Mrs. Johnson, of Lincoln. On Monday we held our tea meeting, most of the provisions were given by our kind ladies, whose labours were duly appreciated. In the evening a very interesting service was held. The amount cleared by the anniversary was £8 11s. 0½d., being £5 18s. 2d. more than was cleared the year before, for which we feel thankful to our kind friends, and ascribe the praise to God.

JOHN CHENEY.

CAGEBROOK CHAPEL, CWM CIRCUIT.—Our chapel at this place was opened for Divine worship, May 4th and 5th, 1861 ; and we held our first anniversary May 18th and 19th, 1862. No account having been sent to the Magazine at its opening, allow me to say that the land was given by Mr. G. Jones, of Preston Mill ; and through the diligence of the collectors and society generally, upwards of £100 were cleared towards its erection, leaving a debt of about £40 at the close of the opening services ; and on Sunday, May 18, three sermons were preached ; those in the morning and evening by Mr. J. Davies, of Hereford ; and that in the afternoon by the Rev. R. Brown, of Ringstone. The services were well supported, and the collections moderate. On Monday, May 19th, tea was provided, when upwards of three hundred sat down, after which a public meeting was held, presided over by W. Gibbert, Esq., of Madley. Addresses were delivered by Messrs. J. Quarmby, H. Hassock, J. Gwillim, J. Davies, and R. Brown. We judge that the proceeds of the tea, collecting-books, donations, &c., will amount to near £30. Thus this neat little house erected to the honour of God's name, will be nearly free from debt.

JOHN QUARMBY.

CARLISLE.—The anniversary sermons connected with the Primitive Methodist chapel, Carlisle, were preached on Sunday, May 25th, 1862, in the morning and evening by the Rev. Joseph Spoor, of Durham ; and in the afternoon, by the Rev. W. R. Percival. On all three occasions the congregations were very large, and the collections in proportion. Both in the chapel and in the school-room below, considerable improvements have been lately made, and the entire building has undergone a salutary internal renovation. The schoolroom has been drained, a partition wall has been erected, and deal boards have been substituted for flags on the floor, thus materially increasing its comfort and convenience. In the chapel, the downstairs wings have been set with handsome seats, in place of what were previously loose forms : and the whole has been tastefully painted in oak,—so that the chapel has now an exceedingly neat appearance. The cost of the work is estimated at about £90. While it was progressing, the Sunday services were held for three weeks in the school-room below, which had been completed before the other was commenced. The annual tea party was held in the school-room the following night, when a pretty large company partook of the exhilarating infusion. After tea, W. Browne, Esq., presided, supported by the Rev. W. R. Percival, the Rev. H. Hirst, the Rev. W. A. Wrigley, the Rev. T. Southron (minister of the congregation), the Rev. W. Baitey (junior minister), the Rev. Joseph Spoor and the Rev. J. A. Bastow. The Rev. T. Southron said that, at their last anniversary, the chairman at that time suggested that they should try, in the next twelve months, to reduce the debt then existing on the chapel; but he (Mr. Southron) thought they ought first to put the place into something like a comfortable condition. This they resolved to do—the result of which they saw. He read a long list of donations which kind friends had subscribed, amongst whom were Sir Wilfrid Lawson, £3; the Earl of Lonsdale, 2 guineas; Edmund Potter, Esq. M.P., £5. T. SOUTHRON.

LONGWORTH, FARINGDON CIRCUIT.—On Sunday and Tuesday, June the 8th and 10th, 1862, we celebrated the first anniversary of our chapel at Longworth. On the Sunday three powerful sermons were preached to crowded congregations by the Rev. T. Kench, of Hindon. On Tuesday afternoon Brother Kench preached another sermon to a large number of people in the open air, after which upwards of 200 persons sat down in Mr. Prince's barn to an excellent repast. After tea a public meeting was held and addressed by the Rev. J. Wright, the writer, and the Rev. T. Kench. The meeting was good and a blessed and holy influence rested upon the audience, and we trust that good was done. The proceeds of the services amounted to £5, for which we give thanks to the great Giver of all good.

In the beginning of the year 1861 an old cottage with the land on which it stood, were purchased for the sum of £40. The cottage was taken down, and a beautiful chapel was erected on the site at a cost (including £40 for the land and cottage), of £158 16s. 7½d.; towards this we have raised £55, and have other subscriptions to come in, which will bring the debt on the chapel down to £100. The chapel is built of stone, with brick quoins, and is 23 feet by 17; and 14 feet to the wall-plate; it has four windows

8 feet by 3 feet, with gothic heads; it is also well ventilated and covered with blue slate. It stands in a pleasant part of the village, and is admired by all who see it. We are also happy to state that since we opened it the Lord has graciously made known his power to save in it, a blessed revival has been going on during the last nine months, and a number of sinners, mostly young men, have been converted to God, and the society has risen from fourteen to above fifty members. One young man who was saved and joined us has since died, saying, "I am going to heaven, because Christ has pardoned my sins. The angels are in my room to carry me to glory. Hallelujah." JOHN TUCK.

PETERBOROUGH CIRCUIT.—Werrington.—We held our second anniversary of this chapel on the 29th and 30th of June, on which occasion we were favoured with the valuable services of the Rev. R. Church, from Wisbeach. The proceeds of this anniversary amounted to the pleasing sum of £10 10s., and a blessed influence rested upon all the services.

J. ASHWORTH.

Glington.—We held our first anniversary of Glington chapel on the 6th and 7th of July. The sermons were preached by our going-off preacher the Rev. T. Wilkinson, who has laboured on this station with great credit and acceptance during the past year. The congregations were crowded, God was graciously present in the midst of the people, the collections, &c., amounted to £10 8s., which sum was considered very satisfactory. We rejoice to say that both these chapels are very well attended, and we trust they will be the birth-place of many souls. J. ASHWORTH.

LOUTH.—The first of a series of services in connection with the anniversary of the Primitive Methodist Chapel at Louth, was held on Thursday, July the 3rd, on the beautiful grounds of W. Byron, Esq., Stewton House. Mr. Byron, we believe is one of the oldest members of the Connexion, and a deed poll member of the conference. His name has long been known throughout the entire community as one of the most liberal supporters of its institutions. At an early hour in the morning many persons were seen wending their way to the place of meeting, who came in waggons, carts, gigs, and vehicles of almost every description. Two large banners were suspended at an immense height, indicating the place where the services were to be held. It was a day calculated to inspire deep reflection, and no doubt many a fervent prayer ascended from the hearts of several on the load, for the presence and outpouring of the Holy Ghost.

The services commenced a little after eleven o'clock, by the Rev. R. Cheesman announcing a hymn, and engaging in prayer. Sermons were preached during the day by the Revs. J. Burroughs, of Alford; C. Kendall, and H. Clark, of Grimsby; J. W. Howell, of Ashby-de-la-Zouch, and—Sharrah, sailor's missionary. The various sermons were characterized by great ability, zeal, and energy, and listened to with deep and lively interest. Tea was provided at two o'clock, in a large marquee, thirty yards long and ten wide, which was decorated by evergreens and flowers of various hues and forms, being so disposed as to give a truly floral aspect to the interior. At four o'clock the marquee was literally crowded with persons, who did ample justice to the good things provided. The sight was truly grand, and calculated to inspire the deepest feeling and most ecstatic joy. By the kindness of Mr. Byron, the visitors were allowed, at pleasure, to rove about the walks and pleasure grounds, and appeared highly delighted with the privilege. Such, indeed, appeared to be the satisfaction of the company, that we doubt not, if a similar meeting be held next year, (as is proposed), the number of visitors will be much larger than this year.

At seven o'clock in the evening a public meeting was held in the chapel, which was crowded in every part. Henry Hodge, Esq., of Hull, took the chair, and expressed himself highly delighted in visiting his old friends at Louth, a town where he had spent eight of the happiest years of his life. He expressed his obligations to the community, and the noble men who, under God, had founded it. He thought he could never do enough for it in return, and was sure that whatever he had done had been returned to him with a large amount of interest. To have the same return he urged the meeting to a like willing consecration of their wealth upon this occasion, assuring them that although he might be said to have contributed largely to various chapels and other objects, yet so far from regretting what he had done he was determined to do more than ever he had done. After stating that he never looked upon himself as a speaker, he said he should have much pleasure in giving them a speech, worth at least five pounds, when the collection was made, and sat down amidst great applause. The meeting was subsequently addressed by the ministers who had preached on the grounds, and J. T. Robson, Esq., Mr. Hodge's son-in-law, who delighted the audience with a humorous and stirring address. The whole of the speeches were received with the highest enthusiasm, and many of the sentiments were greeted with marked and vehement applause. The thanks of the meeting having been given to Wm. Byron, Esq., for the loan of the grounds, the ladies for presiding at the trays, and to H. Hodge, Esq., for his able conduct in the chair, the meeting separated, highly delighted and encouraged by the day's services.

On Lord's day, July 6th, sermons were preached in the morning and evening by the Rev. J. W. Howell, and in the afternoon by the Rev. R. Cheeseman. The services were well attended, and in the evening there was a rush for seats, and many had to occupy the school-room adjoining the chapel. The series of services was brought to a close on Monday evening, by a public meeting held in the chapel, presided over by W. Byron, Esq., who opened the meeting with some very appropriate observations. The Rev. R. Cheeseman followed, and gave a brief history of the chapel, and the state of its finances, which showed that it was in a very prosperous condition. He also announced various sums that had been promised to the anniversary. One of the trustees (Mr. Allison) had promised ten pounds provided any two persons could be found to give twenty pounds each, which offer had not only been met, but exceeded by two persons promising twenty-five pounds each. Another friend, who on Thursday night had promised to give a thank-offering of five pounds, had promised to double it, so that the present anniversary was likely very far to exceed any former one. Mr. Cheeseman stated he had no doubt the present effort would enable the trustees to reduce the debt on the trust premises, to the amount of one hundred and fifty pounds. The Rev. J. W. Howell followed with an eloquent lecture, the subject of which was "Young men—what society demands of them." Mr. Allison, and J. Maltby, Esq., followed with some very seasonable and pertinent remarks. A vote of thanks was proposed to the lecturer and chairman, and the meeting was brought to a close by the Rev. R. Cheeseman engaging in prayer. We understand the proceeds of the tea meeting amounted to about thirty-five pounds, the collections to fifteen pounds, and the donations to seventy-five pounds. As other donations have yet to come, we cannot state the total amount of the anniversary.—Louth Advertiser.

HAWKESBURY UPTON, MALMESBURY CIRCUIT. — Primitive Methodism was introduced into this large village about nineteen years since, and sinners were converted to God. An old barn was then taken and fitted up for a place of worship. In this place the people worshipped for some years, and then they began to think they ought to have a chapel; accordingly some cottages with gardens attached to them were purchased, and the friends set about the work in earnest, and a beautiful chapel has been built which is second to none in the neighbourhood; it is an ornament to the village and a credit to Primitive Methodism. It was opened for public worship about twelve months since, and has already been the birth-place of many souls; it will seat comfortably about 180 persons, and we very frequently have it filled. We have the largest congregation in the place; there are two other chapels and a church, but our congregations are larger than any of the others. Primitive Methodism takes the lead of other denominations at Hawkesbury Upton. The first anniversary services connected with this house of prayer were held on Sunday and Monday, July 6th and 7th, 1862. On the Sabbath the Rev. G. Beal, of Highworth, preached morning and evening, and the Rev. J. Waters, (Independent) in the afternoon; the chapel was filled to overflowing in the evening. On Monday afternoon the Rev. H. Jones (Independent) preached a sermon in the Independent Chapel at 3 o'clock to a good assembly of persons, after which we adjourned to our chapel, where a tea had been gratuitously provided by the friends, and about 80 persons gathered round the social board and partook of the cheering repast. After the tables were cleared the public meeting commenced, which was presided over by Mr. J. Knapp, and interesting and instructive addresses were delivered by Messrs. H. Heys, J. Waters, H. Jones, — Rossiter, and G. Beale. The chapel was well filled, and peace and enjoyment prevailed throughout the meeting. The collections, donations, profits of tea, &c., amounted to nearly £18, including £5 which was sent by a gentleman of the Church of England to one of our friends for the anniversary. The proceeds of this anniversary we think are noble, when we take into consideration the position of the friends, most of whom are agricultural labourers, and the numerous appeals that have been made to them since the commencement of the chapel. N. WATTS.

EDINBURGH MISSION.—I beg to say the Lord is blessing our efforts on this station; the hall in which we worship is nearly always filled at the Sunday afternoon service, and on Sunday evenings it is often packed. The Sabbath before last, in the prayer meeting after the evening service, six persons were found weeping for mercy, and two of them professed to find salvation before they left the hall. On Sabbath evening last the hall was again crammed, and at the close of the service two more gave their hearts to God. Our income at the September quarter-day was found to be £2 more than double the sum realised the September quarter-day previous; and by the blessing of God upon our efforts we hope to prosper yet abundantly. Many have been added to our ranks during the past nine months.

JOHN VAUGHAN.

HOPTON BANK, LUDLOW CIRCUIT.—Our chapel at this place was erected in the year 1837, and was enlarged in the year 1841; its total cost was about £160, and it is capable of seating about 150 persons. During the last fourteen years we have reduced the debt £65, and in the year 1860 we bought a plot of land, about 100 square yards, of the value of £20, and had a new set of trustees appointed. The expenses in connection therewith were £12 13s., all of which has been paid. We have since had the chapel closed for repairs, and on Sunday, April 6th, 1862, it was re-opened, when three sermons were preached—those in the morning and evening by Mr. Theophilus Edwards, of Malvern, and that in the afternoon by Mr. F. R. Andrews, our circuit preacher. £5 6s. was collected, which is as much as we expected. On Easter Sunday we held our chapel anniversary, when our superintendent preached two sermons. On Easter Monday we held our annual tea-meeting and upwards of one hundred sat down to tea, after which a public meeting was held, and addresses were delivered by Mr. T. Edwards and Mr. C. Smallman, and some pieces were recited by the school children.

WILLIAM FREECE.

STOKE, NEWCASTLE-UNDER-LYME CIRCUIT.—On Good Friday, April 18th, 1862, we held our annual tea meeting for the benefit of our chapel in this town, at which which upwards of 350 persons attended. After tea a public meeting was held in the chapel, when the chair was taken by the writer, and addresses were delivered by Messrs. Mayer, Weaver, Jarvis, and Lewis. The profits amounted to £13, most of the trays being given. This was one of the largest and most interesting tea-meetings we have held in this town. We are happy to say we are doing well in this circuit, we have had above one hundred souls converted the last year. Glory to God.

JOSEPH HUTCHINGS.

BARTON-ON-HUMBER.—We have been making an effort for the reduction of the debt on the Barton chapel. On Sunday, June 8th, we held a camp meeting at which about 2,000 persons were present. Interesting and useful sermons were preached by the Revs. T. Whitehead, of Scotter, J. T. Shepherd, of Winterton, and Mr. Stanwell, of Hull. On Monday, June the 9th, it was very wet, so we were obliged to leave the open air stand for the Temperance-hall, where the Rev. W. Sanderson, of Kirton, preached a very appropriate sermon. About 200 persons sat down to tea, after which a public meeting was held of a very exciting and profitable character. The hall was crowded; J. Nowell, Esq., solicitor, presided, and addresses were given by the Revs. W. Sanderson, T. Whitehead, J. T. Shepherd, G. Shaw, the circuit ministers, and J. Winship, Esq.; who gave £5 to the collection. In addition to the money raised on this occasion, we have received the sum of £4 13s. from the ladies of the Sewing Society, so that after paying expenses we shall pay £30 off the debt on the chapel. D. INGHAM.

ALSAGER, in Tunstall Circuit, is situated about midway between Tunstall and Crewe. It contains upwards of 300 inhabitants. We have preached in this place about three years: the requirements of the congregation demanding a larger place than we occupied, it was resolved to build a chapel; land was accordingly purchased, plans and specifications prepared, and the building let. The style is Italian, the entire length within the walls is 44 feet, and the width 27 feet. The chapel will comfortably seat about 200 persons. There are two entrances from the front through porches about seven feet square. The vestry is in front of the chapel, between the entrances, and projects two feet before the main building. Over the entrance and vestry is a gallery for the choir, the pulpit being fixed at the entrance behind the vestry. The level portion of the floor is filled with forms for the school children. The chapel is a very neat erection, and the total cost, including land, will be about £650. The chapel was opened on Sunday, July 13th, when three sermons were preached: those in the morning and evening by the Rev. S. Andiff, of Derby; and that in the afternoon by Mr. R. Mayor, of Newcastle; and on Sunday, July 20th, when Mr. T. Bateman, of Chorley, preached morning and evening, and the writer in the afternoon. The congregations were good, and the united collections amounted to about £50. On Tuesday, July 22nd, the opening services were brought to a close by a public tea meeting, which was held in a large marquee, when about 400 sat down to the social repast. Several interesting speeches were delivered on the occasion. The profits of the tea meeting will be about £20. P. PUGH.

COLONIAL DEPARTMENT.

NEW PLYMOUTH MISSION, NEW ZEALAND.—Our place of worship in this town being too small to contain those who wished to worship with us, a strong desire has been felt for some time to build a new chapel. But as the province, despoiled by war, is still under martial law, and many respectable farmers are obliged to work on the roads for a morsel of bread, we trembled at the idea of having to raise the necessary funds. At length the way became plain, an excellent site was secured, and properly conveyed to the Connexion: plans and specifications were selected, estimates were invited, and contracts for the erection were signed. On January 1st, 1862, the foundation services were held. From this day to the completion of the building the blessing of God rested on the undertaking: not an accident occurred, not an unpleasant word was spoken. The chapel was opened for divine worship on Sunday, May 18th, 1862, by the Rev. J. Whiteley, Wesleyan superintendent, and the Rev. J. Long, from Auckland, when the handsome sum of £63 7s. 4d. was collected.

The chapel stands in a good situation, only a few steps from the spot where I preached my first sermon in New Zealand, nearly eighteen years ago. It is well finished in every respect, and is an ornament to our town. We have lighted it by fourteen paraffin lamps. In the front elevation there is a handsome tower, whose basement story forms a small vestry. A beautiful iron and wood fence, with folding gates, has been erected in front. The cost of the chapel, including all et ceteras, except the site, amounts to about £667.

The money raised towards this amount, as nearly as we can at present ascertain, is as follows:—Collection at the foundation services £10 2s. 7d.; proceeds of soirée £9 13s. 6d.; balance in hand belonging to the old chapel, £23 1s. 7d.; sale of lease of old chapel, £50; subscriptions £294; opening services £63 7s. 4d.; first-quarter's seat rents advanced £19 15s.; special subscription for Mr. Long's expenses from Auckland and back, to open chapel £10; total amount raised, £480. In addition to this goodly sum, the conveyance deed was made gratis; plans and specifications were presented by two builders without charge; much of the casting was done free of cost; and a few days ago a gentleman presented us with a handsome chapel clock, value £10 10s. The debt remaining on the premises is about £187, a considerable portion of which we hope to pay off by the first anniversary.

The Tuesday evening after the opening services was appointed for the letting of the sittings, when nearly all the sittings were taken. The new chapel has placed us in an improved position in New Plymouth. May God grant peace to our troubled colony, and revive his work among the souls around us.

Mr. Long was warmly welcomed by his old friends, and his preaching was attended by crowded congregations, both in our own chapel and in that of the Wesleyans. As we stood together in the pulpit on this interesting occasion, it was pleasing to remember that eighteen years ago we met in London in order to sail, as the first Primitive Methodist Missionaries, to the Southern hemisphere, and having obtained help we continue to this day, testifying both to small and great that Jesus is the Lord. May we have grace to be faithful unto death, and may the house now dedicated to God be the birthplace of many souls. Amen.

ROBERT WARD.

SYDNEY, NEW SOUTH WALES.—We have held our first bazaar during the past week in the Temperance Hall, Pitt-street, in aid of the reduction of the debt on the Primitive Methodist chapel, Kent-street. There was a good show of articles, and the useful exceeded the merely ornamental, many being for household purposes. A new feature in bazaars was observable in this, friends furnished such things as the following: one stall was provided with poultry, pigeons, ducks, and vegetables, of which the cabbages and carrots were very fine:—these sold well and rapidly; also a gigantic pumpkin, of the squash kind, weighing one hundred and thirty-nine pounds; and one friend, connected with another denomination, sent a pig, which was soon disposed of. Another stall was occupied with ironmongery, another contained a supply of tea and coffee in canisters, jams, bottled fruits, Indian condiments, pickles, toilet soaps, &c. Passing on to the next stall, there was food for the mind in a large collection of valuable books, many of which found purchasers; then there were glass ware and saddles, fancy goods of all kinds, to suit the ladies, and toys for the children, while a large space was occupied with sweetmeats and pastry. A tea meeting was held in the same place on Thursday evening; the attendance was remarkably good, and proved an entire success. The bazaar decorations, consisting of flags, festoons, and evergreens, remained, which, with the great number of "happy human faces," gave the hall an animated appearance. At the public meeting after tea, in accordance with previous announcement, J. Caldwell, Esq., M.L.A., occupied the chair, and addressed to us a few prefatory remarks. The Rev. R. Hartley gave a brief outline of the past and present state of the chapel, and some particulars respecting the bazaar. He said that at a critical stage in their preparations, they were greatly encouraged by a promise from a gentleman then present, that he would defray all the expenses connected with the hall; and the amount realized had exceeded the anticipations of those who had laboured with zeal and perseverance, to attain their object. It may be stated that this object has been attained principally through the indefatigable efforts of Mrs. Hartley and Mrs. Goold, who in the midst of much discouragement have persevered with a determination worthy of the cause they had espoused. He also stated, that nearly £300 had been paid off the chapel debt during the past two years and a half; leaving £398 as the amount of the mortgage and borrowed money, besides about £80 of outstanding debts, interest, &c. It is the object of the present effort to reduce the debt to the amount of the mortgage (£700), an earnest determination is manifested to persevere till it be accomplished. The meeting was also addressed by the Rev. G. Nairn, Rev. J. Eggleston, Rev. S. Humphries, Rev. W. Robinson, and Mr. S. S. Goold; the Rev. A. Thompson, Rev. J. Voller, and Dr. Neild, were also on the platform, which presented an Evangelical alliance, there being Wesleyans, Independents, Baptists, and Primitives. Various sums of money were promised, and a collection made, which, together with the proceeds of the bazaar, and the profits of the tea will produce about £150 towards the above object. A vote of thanks was given to the chairman, and thanks were expressed to all who had aided in this effort; the doxology was sung, and the Rev. A. Thompson concluded with prayer. Since this meeting £80 has been paid off the debt. Praise the Lord. R. HARTLEY.

Sydney, N. S. W. June 16th, 1862.

LITERARY NOTICES.

English Nonconformity. By ROBERT VAUGHAN, D.D. London: Jackson, Walford, & Hodder, St. Paul's Churchyard. 1862.

It is now many years since a bright-eyed boy, rejoicing in the possession of a few shillings of pocket money, wandered into a grim looking building in which a sale of old books was going on; and a volume or two of ancient history being under the hammer, he made a bid at a venture, and soon had the satisfaction of finding himself the purchaser. This apparently trivial incident (as has often been the case in human affairs) proved of great importance in its results. He pored over his treasure with abounding zest, and anon decided that the study of history should form a chief pursuit of his life. He rested not until his attainments became so respectable as to secure for him the professorship of history in the University of London. Subsequently, he became the Principal of the New Independent Lancashire College, the Editor of the British Quarterly Review, and the author of works bearing the stamp of a mind of vast resources, and giving evidence of sterling piety and unwavering honesty of purpose, distinguished withal by lucidity and cogency of style, and an unblenching advocacy of truth and righteousness. Among his works are "The Modern Pulpit," "The Age and Christianity," "A Monograph on Wycliffe," "The Causes of the Corruption of Christianity," the "Revolutions in English History;" and last, but not least, he has produced the beautiful volume before us, on English Nonconformity. When the committee of the Congregational Union of England and Wales had decided to celebrate the Bicentenary of the exodus of the illustrious 2,000, of whom the then Established Church of England "was not worthy," it wisely resolved to arrange for the publication of a memorial volume, bearing proper relations to the antecedents, the concomitants, and the sequences of that great event. Nor would it have been easy to find more worthy hands to which to entrust the task of its preparation than those of Dr. Vaughan.

The appointment of the learned doctor was alike honourable to him and creditable to the judgment of the committee. Few men in England are more thoroughly conversant with the events of what we may term our National Ecclesiastical History than Dr. Vaughan. The subject has been to him a life study. And the ripe fruits of early and continuous labour are presented in meet form and measure in the able volume now published. This is truly a noble contribution to the religious history of the English nation. Those who have read Macaulay's brilliant sketches of some of the more notable men, and some of the more salient points of the history of the times of the Tudors, the Stuarts, and the Commonwealth, behove also to read the equally able, and the much more devout and reliable narrative supplied by the present publication. Wide as is the field over which the author takes us, we find him equally familiar with all the different parts of it, and always prepared to communicate stores of information which we should be sorry to be denied. Nor does he convey us so rapidly across his territory, that, as when travelling by express, we have not time to make our observations, and secure a proper impression of the landscape; but, travelling more rapidly than the Elizabethan coaches would have carried us, we nevertheless seem to see everything as clearly and distinctly as though we were astride a pack-horse. We have intimated above that the doctor is distinguished as a writer for honesty of purpose, and the present volume substantiates our estimate. He writes not as a mere partisan, all that may by some, who are of the contrary part, be said to the contrary notwithstanding. Indeed, the thoroughly trusty character of this memorial volume we hold to be among its principal recommendations. While the writer cannot avoid describing in detail many of the enormities perpetrated by the High Church party of the times of which he writes, he also takes prudent care to show that he is by no means insensible to the delinquencies of their opponents. The decidedly party views of Lord Macaulay have seriously vitiated some of the most glorious pages in the English language, and "the fly in his pot of ointment," sends forth to many "a stinking savour;" but fastidious indeed must be that Churchman even who cannot read with a relish these pages of Dr. Vaughan. It may be confidently affirmed that no man can be considered well up in the Ecclesiastical History of England now, who does not read and study this memorial of Nonconformity, and no one can lay claim to much liberality of sentiment, to whom the work is not felt to be a welcome treasure.

Our readers will form their own opinion of the comprehensiveness of the work from a brief summary of its contents. It is divided into three books, each of which is again divided into several chapters. The first book treats of Religious Life in England before 1660, the second of Confessors of 1662, and the third of English Nonconformity since 1662. In the first book the chapters are devoted to a consideration of Religious Life in the Early Church, Religious Life in the Middle Ages, Religious Life under the Tudors, Religious Life from the death of Elizabeth to the death of Cromwell. In the second book the causes of the Restoration, the concessions of the Nonconformists, in 1660, the Ground taken by the Bishops in 1660, the Concessions from the King, the Nonconformists at the Savoy Conference in 1661, the Policy of the Bishops, and its Exposure by the Nonconformists at the same Conference, the Convocation and the Prayer Book, Parliament and the act of Uniformity, the Independents in relation to the same act, and the Church and State before the exodus of 1662, are fully discussed ; and the third book follows with an able account of bad treatment and a good Confession, the Progress of Religious Liberty and the Progress of Religious Life. The whole is followed by an excellent Appendix in explanation of some dark points in relation to the founders and founding of the New England States, and a most complete Index of the work. The exposition of the state of parties in the time of the Stuarts is particularly valuable, exhibiting as it does, from the stand-point of a devout liberty-loving Christian and Protestant of this latter half of the nineteenth century, what were the relations of the different religionists from two to three centuries back. The Conservatives or stand-still party, the Progressionists or go-a-head party, and the Re-actionists, or turn again party, may all be estimated in the light of this excellent work. Those who regretted that the Reformation had gone so far, those who thought it had not gone far enough, and those who thought it had just reached the point of perfection, all turn up before us. The two great antagonist principles of the time stand out, also, in bold relief—the principle of law and the principle of life. Law claiming to control the life within men as though it were some mere mechanical power, and life demanding the right inherent in it of giving proof of its reality by what have often been deemed its irregularities. Men have often shown their ignorance of the vitality of true religion by trying to cut it into certain set shapes and figures,—as though a gardener should try to compel the mignonette, the daffodil, the rose, and the lilac, to be of the same shape, the same colour, and the same odours,—while it has always spurned such unnatural attempts, because of the nature of it, it must be free. If men want to stereotype religion they will never succeed, and they may as well throw away their apparatus. Genuine Christianity abhors mere mechanical and external control, while dead formality may submit thereto very well. "The kingdom of God is within you." It does not come with your "lo heres!" or "lo theres!" Law-makers may control a ritualistic system, they may tell you what to do, and what not to do ; but let the power of the Holy Ghost take hold of a man's conscience and heart, and, like Samson putting forth his strength against the cords and the green withs, all mere external human appliances will be shaken loose and trampled in the dust. True religion is a thing of life and power, it dwells in the recesses of our nature, and works outwardly ; while false religions begin their dealings outside a man and try to work their way within him, God's order is first the heart, then the life ; man's order first the conduct, and then perhaps nothing else. Such principles are amply developed in the history of Nonconformity. Would that more of the vitality and energy of Scriptural Christianity may be exhibited by all the churches of these days as the result of the movements that have recently taken place in celebration of the times of the sturdy old giants of the early years of British Nonconformity.

Many portions of the work before us tempt to quotation, but our limited space for the present forbids, except that towards the end of the work the doctor gives his views of Methodism, in language we will not delay to cite : "English Puritanism made George Whitfield and John Wesley what they were, and in so far Puritanism was the parent of Methodism. Not that Methodism, even in its evangelical sense, was simply a perpetuated Puritanism. It had a phase of its own. It may be called a second Reformation ; but its great doctrine was not the great doctrine of the first Reformation. In the place of justification by faith came the doctrine of the new birth. Luther had to take the soul out of the hands of the Priest, by giving it a sense of pardon and safety independent of the services of that functionary. But the evil spirit to be expelled by Whitfield and Wesley was formalism. One was a Calvinist, the other an Arminian ; but their aim as preachers was the same, to vitalize an admitted creed, to ensure that Church-going shall lead to the Church of Christ. They left metaphysics to philosophers, and history to historians, and preached the means of a great moral and spiritual renovation to those who needed it. That was 'the present truth for their time, and it did its work.'"

On this portion of his work we may just remark that the doctor has, as it seems to us, presented the doctrines of Justification and the New Birth, in a position towards each other, that we think not the happiest. Our idea is that they are not characteristic, one of one age, and the other of another, but that they go rather hand in hand. The new birth was surely not unknown to Luther, nor was justification by faith ignored by Wesley and Whitfield. We quite think that the two forms of the one truth (for really this is pretty much the fact), were differently exhibited by the immortal men here named, and supposing this to be about the doctor's meaning, we have no further objection to offer. Perhaps some readers may think metaphysics and history were not wholly neglected by Wesley whatever was the case as to Whitfield. These things however, are trifles, compared with the substance of the work, while the valuable information, the cogent reasoning, and the zeal for truth, and for freedom to worship God according to our own conscientious convictions, which are herein found, merit our hearty thanks, and have our very cordial commendation. Long may the excellent author be spared to bless the Church and the world by his talented and devout productions.

The publishers of the memorial volume deserve well of the public for the superior paper, typography, and general getting up of the work, and the price being but seven and sixpence cannot reasonably be complained of.

An Exposition upon the Second Epistle General of St. Peter. By the Rev. THOMAS ADAMS, Rector of St. Gregory's, London. A.D., 1668. Revised and corrected by JAMES SHERMAN, minister of Surrey Chapel. Edinburgh: James Nichol. London: James Nisbet and Co. 1862.

HERE is a beautiful edition of the commentary of Adams on the Second Epistle of St. Peter; it belongs to the series of Mr. Nichol, and is offered to subscribers at ten shillings! Think of a large Imperial Octavo, of some nine hundred pages of letter press, on good paper, and beautifully bound in cloth, and lettered, by such a writer, and on so important a subject, at such a price! To say the least of it, the work is to theological students an immense boon. What a treat one find sit to plunge into the pages of such a writer as Adams. What ingots of golden thought turn up in every direction. The laminæ of modern writers, as a class, contrast strangely with the nuggets of these old Puritans. Truly great changes have been wrought within 200 years!

"Pigmies are pigmies still though placed on Alps,
And pyramids are pyramids on plains!"

The late devoted James Sherman revised and republished this work some years ago, and on his death-bed gave the plates to the present publisher, thus enabling him to sell the work at the present low figure. We hope the work will have, what it richly merits, an extensive sale among the readers and thinkers of this generation.

A Theological and Homiletical Commentary on the Gospels of St. Matthew and St. Mark. Specially designed and adapted for the use of ministers and students. From the German of J. P. LANGE, D.D., Professor of Divinity in the University of Bonn. Volume III. Edinburgh: T. and T. Clark. London: Hamilton, Adams and Co. 1862.

THIS volume contains Lange's commentary on the latter part of the Gospel by Matthew and the whole of the Gospel by Mark. The learned and able author gives a due admixture of critical exposition, doctrinal reflection, and homiletical suggestion. It is highly gratifying to find that notwithstanding so many German theologians still occupy a prime place in cloud-land, there are to be found among them writers like Lange, who hold a firm footing on the solid rock. If Strauss and others of the same class have done much to damage the cause of truth in this generation, Neander, Tholuck, Lange, and men of similar talents and character, have done much in its behalf. The law of counter-vailing forces which holds in the natural world seems to have a counterpart in the moral. Hence, when special agencies come into operation to sap the foundations of truth and righteousness, other agencies anon appear to fortify and strengthen them. The same Divine ruler who controls the outer world of matter, shows his presence in the affairs of the inner world of mind. "This also cometh from the Lord of hosts, which is wonderful in counsel, and excellent in working."

We hope the purchasers of the former volumes of the Messrs. Clark's library will early avail themselves of the opportunity now afforded them of enriching their book shelves with this.

History of the Development of the Doctrine of the Person of Christ. By Dr. J. A. DORNER, Professor of Theology in the University of Göttingen. Division second, from the end of the fourth century to the present time. Volume II. Translated by Rev. D. W. Simon. Edinburgh: T. and T. Clark. London: Hamilton, Adams and Co. 1862. THE present volume of Dörner gives a good view of the notions prevalent, respecting the person of Christ, at the commencement of the German reformation, of the teachings of Luther and other reformers, and of the leading theories indulged and developed since. It is a repertory of varied and valuable information on one of the greatest and grandest themes that can occupy the minds of men or angels. It touches the foundation of much of the heterodoxy prevalent in the present day. For Christ is the central object in Divine revelation, and whatever of heresy prevails in the Church, does somewhere, usually stand connected with false and humanizing notions of him. In the socialism, secularism, spiritualism, socialism, transcendentalism, Mauriceism, Essay and Reviewism, Colensoism, and all other isms of modern scepticism, many of the principal shafts are aimed at the person and redeeming work of our adorable Saviour. It is very refreshing therefore to find a man like Professor Dörner boldly standing forth, and from the vantage ground of high literary and theological attainments, hurling back on the presumptuous heads of such aggressors the weapons of a trenchant logic, a profound research, and a triumphant vindication.

Let our readers who have the time and the means show their appreciation of the enterprise of the spirited publishers by the purchase and perusal of this and the preceding volumes. It is a credit to the age that such works can be produced, but it will be a great discredit if they be not extensively and speedily purchased.

A Collection of Tunes, adapted to the Primitive Methodist Hymn Book. Compiled by G. W. and S. L. ARMISTAGE. Harmonized by F. W. HIRD, Esq., Leeds. London: Richard Davies, Sutton Street. Price 7s. 6d.

THE very respectable volume here named is published as a private enterprise by two excellent members of a well-known Primitive Methodist family in Leeds. It was long expected from one quarter or another before it actually made its appearance. Many persons felt that such a work was really a desideratum, and considerable expectations were excited ere it was ready.

We are bound to say, that, so far as we can judge, most that was reasonable in such expectations has been fully met. Of course it would be chimerical to expect, in such a production, to meet the opinions and tastes of all parties, and hence we do not wonder that some objection is taken to the work in certain quarters. We have heard for example, that the tunes are old and common place, and that the indexes are complex and of little service. Now we venture to say, that the fact that the tunes are well-known, is just one of the best things that can be said for them. We should have considerable hesitation in recommending for congregational use a collection of tunes in which the old favourites did not occupy a large portion of space. It pleases us therefore to find that the young gentlemen who have provided this work for us have allowed their better judgment to prevail against what we opine would be their own natural inclination, to present a work of startling novelty and brilliant display. We beg to thank them for the rich old tunes their work contains. "Irish," "French," "Arabia," "Bennett's," "Justification," "Martyrdom," "Rockingham," "Sprowston Lodge," and "Tranquillity," not to mention others—have long been favourites with us; and meagre, indeed, would any book of Psalmody appear where they could not be found. Here they are, however, and many others of intrinsic excellence. The work contains, too, so great a variety that none of our choirs need fear any deficiency. And if the indexes be properly studied, they will be found a great acquisition. Right glad should we be to find the work in general use in our congregations, and we hope the day is approaching when no choir in a Primitive Methodist chapel will be content to be without it. We should not omit to mention that separate vocal part books are also issued, so that our musical friends can either have the score book, or the parts, or all. As a valuable and timely aid to the singing portion of public worship among us we give the work a hearty welcome.

The Spiritual Hero; or The Life of the Rev. W. Green Belham, one of the Pioneers or early Ministers of the Primitive Methodist Connexion. By OLIVER JACKSON, Minister of the Gospel. Second Edition. London: R. Davies, Sutton Street, Commercial Road, East; all Booksellers, and may be had of the Primitive Methodist Ministers. 1861.

IT is now between four and five years since the first edition of this memoir was given to the public, and it has had time, therefore, to become extensively known and appreciated. And the fact that a second edition has been called for is a satisfactory proof that the work has not been overlooked. The numerous and valuable testimonies in its favour which the author has printed at the end of this edition, show that among persons qualified to form a sound judgment the volume is highly prized. It is due to the author to say that this edition is elegantly got up, and will be a meet adornment of the library or table of any of our readers. Of the lives of such men as W. G. Bel-ham the more the better. He was one who will not soon be forgotten; and his biographer, in the volume before us, has very aptly embalmed his memory, and that of many of his noble doings. We were recently in a locality where many of his triumphs were achieved, and were glad to learn that his name is "as ointment poured forth." We pray that many such "heroes" may still be raised up in the Primitive Methodist Ministry.

The Happiness of the Pious Dead. A Sermon preached at Denmark Place Chapel, Camberwell, Oct. 12th, 1862, on occasion of the death of Mrs. Mary Steane, wife of the Rev. E. Steane, D.D. By JOHN HOWARD HINTON, M.A. London: Jackson, Walford, and Hodder, St. Paul's Churchyard. 1862.

THE text of this discourse is taken from the 13th verse of the 14th chapter of Revelation:—"Blessed are the dead which die in the Lord." The sermon is characterized by the preacher's usual force of thought, and felicity of expression. The sketch of the departed one is touching and impressive.—A model for funeral sermons.

The Salvation of the Soul, an Important Subject. Coggeshall: A. H. Coventry. 1862. 14 Copies for 1s.

THIS is a neat little book, consisting chiefly of extracts from various authors, from Martin Luther to Rev. J. C. Ryle. It is evidently designed and adapted to do good, and hence has our best wishes.

Our Moral Relation to the Animal Kingdom, being a Digest of the Statements of the Bible in respect thereto. Fourth Thousand. London: Morgan and Chase, Amen Corner, Paternoster Row.

AS the title announces, this tractate is chiefly a Digest of Scriptural Teaching in regard to the Animal Kingdom. The object appears to be to show that man holds certain relations to the lower animals, by virtue of which, and of Divine injunction, he is bound to promote the well-being of those animals to the extent of his power.

The Two Apprentices. By Rev. J. T. BARR. London: Partridge, 9, Paternoster-row.

THE career of the two youths, which terminated very differently, is sketched with great graphic power. The results of bad company, profligacy, and their concomitants, are depicted to the life; while the happy effects of early devotedness to the service of the Saviour, as seen in the honour and happiness which are the present reward of the righteous, are likewise described in telling story. A very appropriate present for a youth leaving the parental roof for that of a master. The pictorial illustrations are good, and tend to find a reader's road to the heart for the narratives they adorn.

The Governess; or, the Missing Pencil-case, and the Country Churchyard. By the Rev. J. T. BARR. London: Partridge.

MR. BARR has well done in producing the old story of the missing pencil-case in this new dress. It is a story of touching interest, and can scarcely fail to draw a tear from the reader's eye, while at the same time, it affords another illustration of that sweet text, "Commit thy way unto the Lord; trust also in him, and he shall bring it to pass. And he shall bring forth thy righteousness as the light, and thy judgment as the noonday." (Ps. xxxvii. 5, 6.) The heroine of the narrative, left an orphan by the ravages of the Asiatic cholera, was engaged by a lady as governess; but a jealous servant plotted her ruin, and ultimately induced her mistress to believe she had stolen a gold pencil-case, which was found secreted in her trunk. This led to her banishment from her comfortable situation. However, sickness seized her malicious trader, and on her deathbed she confessed her guilt. This led to the mistress seeking out her innocent governess, who was by this time also on the verge of the grave. Her justification, however, from the painful charge, came in time to make her deathbed more comfortable; and her mistress now did all in her power to atone for the injury she had unwittingly done her. The Country Churchyard is another story of similar interest. Both are given in appropriate language, and with chaste illustrations. The book is creditable to the author and the publisher; and placed in the hands of young persons can scarcely fail to be both interesting and useful.

John Hobbs: a tale of British India. By GEORGE DRAGO. With a preface by Archdeacon JEFFREYS. Third edition. London: Partridge, Paternoster-row.

ANOTHER beautiful and well-told story for our young friends, especially for those who believe, as we trust most of our readers do, that total abstinence from intoxicating drinks is conducive to health, wealth, and happiness. The plot is well laid, and the filling-up in excellent taste. Truth, stronger and stranger than fiction, forms the substance of the story. "There is a way that seemeth right unto a man, but the end thereof are the ways of death." (Prov. xiv. 12.) How the truths of the "blessed book" start up before us as we peruse the records of human experience. Talk of the Bible becoming antiquated! No; never. So long as truth is allowed a locus standi among mankind, so long will the bright gems of it, embodied in the sacred volume maintain for themselves a place by their incessant appeals to the every day heart and life of man. "All flesh is grass, and all the glory of man is as the flower of grass. But the word of the Lord endureth for ever." (1 Pet. i. 24, 25.)

The Wearmouth Abbots: a tale illustrative of Saxon Christianity. Second edition. London: W. Freeman, 102, Fleetstreet. 1862.

It is one of the redeeming features of the present age, that even fiction, which is so much in request, is now made tributary to the illustration and enforcement of scriptural Christianity. Mrs. Hannah More rendered good service to her country by the efforts she put forth to create a taste among the people for the religious element in fictitious books. Pity would it have been if this fascinating style of writing had been left to the sole use and behoof of sentimentalists, sceptics, and sensualists. In our day, certainly, such is not the case. And within reasonable limits it is well that religious writers should lay fiction under tribute to teach fact: for the flowers of prose and poesy are never better used than when they adorn the table on which is presented the substantial viands of Gospel truth. We are gratified, therefore, to find that the Author of "the Rationale of Justification by Faith;" and of "the Philosophy of Evangelicism;" and similar works, has come forth as the writer of a truly admirable story illustrative of Saxon Christianity. The book is beautifully written, and affords considerable light on an early and important period of our national religious history. Experimental truth is prominently exhibited, and in a twofold sense Saxon Christianity is ably illustrated. We desiderate a very extensive revival of this said Saxon Christianity: we are surrounded, now-a-days, with too much of the Latin and Anglo-French, and Anglo-German Christianity: let us have more of the thorough-going Saxon. The finicking, lackadaisical style of religion we nauseate, the earnest, heartfelt, hard-working, masculine, Saxon religion, we desiderate. O for a baptism of the true soul-stirring religion! This excellent book, we trust, will help to bring about this consummation so devoutly wished. Hence we bid it God-speed.

A Version of the whole book of Psalms in Various Metres; with pieces and hymns suggested by New Testament quotations; also an appendix on various translations, &c. By the Rev. W. C. YONGE, Henley-on-Thames. London: Jackson, Walford, and Hodder. 1862.

ISAAC TAYLOR's dictum, that "The world has never yet seen a translated poem, or a translated oration; for the best of these attempts has been such, that the poet or orator would have died of vexation, if he could have seen his mind reflected in such a mirror," will not hold in regard to the translations of David's psalms. For whatever may be thought of Sternhold and Hopkins, or of a certain old Scotch version, and indeed of several others, we cannot believe that David would have died of vexation, if he had seen the version of his Psalms with which Dr. Watts has made Englishmen and others familiar, or even the one now placed on our table. We think Mr. Yonge has achieved a decided success. The volume is quite a treasure; and for family use, it will surely be in great request. From the title it will be seen the author has not confined himself entirely to the Psalms, but he has dipped as well into the truths of the New Testament, and there found material for his muse. A large amount of useful information is appended, and very complete indexes render the work all the more valuable to the reader. The translation, so far as we can find time to examine it, appears of a superior order, and we wish for the work a wide circulation.

Familiar Colloquies between a Father and his Children. By JOHN MIDDLETON HARE. London: Ward and Co., Paternoster Row. 1862.

Those of our readers who know, "Conversations for the Young," by the late Rev. Richard Watson, may form a pretty good idea of the character of the present volume. Not that this is a servile imitation of Watson's work or even an imitation at all; but the resemblance is somewhat striking—and this is great praise. Mr. Hare, son of the author of one of the best works in our language, on "Justification by faith," well understands methodistic theology, and he has laid his rich stores of Biblical lore before the readers of this work, in choice and beautiful language. The work is designed for Sabbath reading, and is admirably adapted to fill up the interstices of the time devoted to public Sabbath duties. The expositions of Scripture are sound and useful, and the interest of the colloquies is well sustained throughout. We hope our young friends will avail themselves of the earliest opportunity of procuring and perusing this handsome book.

Musings with Paul; or an Exposition of St. Paul's Epistle to the Ephesians, with practical remarks. By SILAS HENN, author of Heart Yearnings, &c. Dudley: J. W. Henn.

AN interesting and devotional production. It is pleasant to wander with a judicious writer over the Pauline Epistles. A good companion is Mr. Henn. Let those who wish to see the beauties of this Epistle to the Church at Ephesus, step into Mr. Henn's, and take an hour with him for a tête à tête on the subject.

Tracts for the Thoughtful, on Matters relating to the Religious Condition of the Age. No. 5. God's Work and Ours. London: Published for the Editor, by Wm. Freeman, 102, Fleet St. E.C. 1862.

TALLEYRAND's definition of language, as "an invention to enable men to conceal their thoughts," has been much on our mind while perusing this anonymous pamphlet. The writer must surely be some Anglo-German, whose prerogative it may be to sit above the clouds, and allow us terrestrial mortals to see nothing of him but his dangling heels. We really do not understand him. Whether he be a secularist, a deist, a fanatic, or enthusiast, or what else, we cannot undertake to say. This we know that we lay down his pamphlet with different views of it from those with which we began its perusal. The title is taking, but the production is disappointing. It is not without reason that some writers prefer an ambuscade to the open field. True there are what seem to be some good sentiments expressed here, and expressed in such language that now and then makes us feel we are reading after a man of education; but ere we have well made up our minds to believe he is going to say something worthy of reading, he throws out some coarse slang, or some dark inuendo, that makes us doubt after all what he intends. We are sorry to find that, what we hoped from the title would prove a judicious and useful tract, is really nothing better on the whole, for any practical purpose, than a collection of confused common-place contradictions.

Arbitration and a Congress of Nations, as a Substitute for war in the settlement of International Disputes. By JOHN NOBLE, jun. London: Henry James Treddiger, 17, Ave Maria Lane. Sixpence.

AN ably written pamphlet on a very important subject. The horrors of war, and the expense and mischiefs of our bloated armaments are well described; and the desirableness of an appeal to reason and justice, instead of to passion and force, is clearly and strongly urged. The objections to the scheme of a court of international arbitration, are honestly and eloquently answered; and we think the reasonableness and Christianity of the proposal advocated are placed beyond dispute. We wish the pamphlet were in the hands of every Englishman, and that every reader would do his utmost to accelerate the approach of the period when the sword should "be beaten into a ploughshare," when "nation shall not lift up its sword against nation, neither shall they learn war any more."

Africa: its Extent, Physical Characteristics, Population, Wants, and Claims. A Lecture by JOSEPH WOOD, Primitive Methodist Minister. London: R. Davies, Sutton Street, and may be had of the Primitive Methodist Ministers. Fourpence.

MUNGO PARK, Campbell, Vanderkemp, Barth, Moffat, and Livingstone, are names worthy of our respect, because of what has been accomplished by their owners, in the way of enlightening Africans on the claims of Christianity, and more especially, in the way of enlightening Englishmen on the claims of Africa. But notwithstanding their labours, how little has been done for that great continent, and how little do our countrymen know respecting it. We are surprised that our nation is so wilfully ignorant of so vast a portion of the world. Thanks to Mr. Wood for bringing before us within so small a compass, and at so low a price, such a fund of African intelligence. We wish all our preachers, leaders, Sabbath-school teachers and missionary collectors would give this Lecture an early and careful reading.

We hope our next Conference will be able to enter on the African missionary work at once, and in earnest; and we opine the reading of this little work previously may help the brethren who shall be delegates to come to a wise and unanimous decision.

We presume this is Mr. Wood's maiden effort in the line of authorship, and we have great pleasure in giving it a hearty recommendation to all our readers; but at the same time we may be permitted to say that when the author shall be called upon to prepare for the press a second edition, which we trust will be very soon, we shall be happy to offer him, if spared, a few suggestions, which, we think, he will be willing to adopt.

OBITUARY.

Died in the Lord, at Woodnesborough, Ramsgate Mission, Mrs. ELLEN SPICKER. Some time ago she was united in church-fellowship with us on the Deal and Dover Mission, but through some cause, with which we are not acquainted, she lost her confidence in Christ, and afterwards lived destitute of saving grace until affliction befel her. During her affliction I had frequent opportunities of conversing with her on spiritual matters, and endeavouring to lead her to the cross. Ultimately, she was enabled to regain her confidence in the Saviour, and rejoice in the knowledge of sins forgiven. She desired her name to be placed in the class-book, fully intending, if restored to health, to unite with us in the services of God's house. But, alas! death claimed her as his prey. I visited her a few hours before she expired, and her answers to my interrogations fully satisfied me that she was resting on a sure foundation; the fear of death was gone, the grave was illuminated with hope, and with Paul she expressed a desire to "depart and be with Christ which is far better." On Saturday morning, March 22, 1862, she sank peacefully into the arms of her blessed Saviour, without a sigh or a groan, aged twenty-three years.
J. DAISH.

HENRY GUEST was born July 6th, 1839, in Dawley Circuit, and departed this life March 2nd, 1862. From a youth he was inclined to be virtuous, and did not (like many) run into excess of sin. His mother being a member with us, tried to induce him to attend regularly our services, but he remained a stranger to God until August, 1858. At that time he went to our camp-meeting at Madeley, and in the love-feast he found salvation. He immediately joined our society at Hinksay, and continued a consistent member until death. As a son, he was kind, obedient, and affectionate. As a member, he was pious and earnest, punctual in attending the various means of grace, and zealous to spread the kingdom of Christ. Such were his piety and talents that the quarterly meeting, held December, 1861, resolved to give him appointments on the preachers' plan. During the last two months of his life there was a revival at Hinksay, and he was very anxious for this good work to continue and spread. He therefore dedicated himself afresh to God, lived in the atmosphere of heaven, and laboured assiduously. On Friday night, March 1st, 1862, after attending a prayer meeting, he spent a few hours in his study, and in part prepared the sermon he intended to deliver on the following Sunday. On Saturday morning he went as usual to his employment, but before noon a railway carriage came upon him unawares, and he was soon hurried into the eternal world. The sorrowful tidings were immediately conveyed to his pious mother, and of the greatness of her sorrow I leave the reader to judge.

J. P.

MARY EDINBOROUGH, died at Thoroton, in Bottesford Circuit, March 17th, 1862, aged eighty-one years. She had been a widow thirty years, and for the last seven years of her life she was confined to her bed. She was converted in 1850, under Mr. R. Pool, from which time she has been a consistent member of our little cause at Thoroton—though sometimes strong inducements were thrown in her way to lead her from our society. A lady in the neighbourhood was in the habit of distributing certain charities to the poor, but our sister was told by her, "Mary, I will never give you ought while you go amongst those bad people." Though a poor widow, and principally dependent upon her kind daughter, Mrs. Saunders, of Aslockton, she persisted in regularly paying her quarterage, and in sending her contribution when a collection was appointed; and on one occasion, through some little disturbance occurring in the society, her quarterage was the only money that arrived at the quarterly board from the place. It was a great pleasure to her that she was permitted to live until a Primitive Methodist chapel was built in the place, and the society brought up into prosperity. To obtain the chapel was a fearful struggle; the travelling preacher had to appear several times before a bench of magistrates; the chapel was fired, though not burnt down; the chapel door was injured; lock after lock was broken, &c.; and had it not been for the legal knowledge and the unconquerable energy of the late Rev. W. Carthy, the case would have been lost altogether.

The uncomplaining resignation with which our sister bore her very protracted affliction was very striking. The prayer meeting by her bed side at five o'clock on a Sabbath was invariably refreshing to her and all in attendance. She was truly "a ripe shock of corn ready for the Master's garner."
J. NORTON.

MONTHLY SUMMARY.

ON commencing a New Series of our Magazine, we have to commence a new department in its contents under the above title. We hope to be able, by Divine assistance, to render this portion of our serial both instructive and interesting. Doubtless we shall need the sympathy and charity of our readers in this effort, but fully relying thereon, and on the arm that is able to help us, we shall essay to do our best. We purpose, from time to time, to present, within reasonable limits, a bird's-eye view of the state of affairs, both at home and abroad, chiefly in relation to the cause of the Redeemer, and of his glorious gospel. Our remarks this month will be discursive and general, as we have to cast a glance beyond the boundary of the past month, in order the better to prepare our way for the future.

It seems natural to begin our survey at home, and to notice first what has most conspicuously claimed public attention. Twelve months have now elapsed since the death of the illustrious Consort of Her Gracious Majesty the Queen. His Royal Highness has been extensively styled "ALBERT THE GOOD," which is quite as honourable a title, we judge, as even "Alfred the Great." The nation at large has shared the grief of the Royal Widow and her fatherless children, and many fervent prayers have been presented before the mercy seat in their behalf. We trust the Primitive Methodists have not been forgetful of their duty in this respect. Her Majesty continues to give unmistakable evidence of the depth and intensity of her grief, and to afford proof that in regard to human sympathies and sorrows, "the rich and the poor meet together," and share the same common inheritance.

The marriage of the Princess Alice, during the summer, and the coming of age of the Prince of Wales, in November, as well as the arrangements being made for his approaching nuptials with a Princess of Denmark, of whom all men seem to speak well, must have somewhat relieved the monotony of the grief which the Queen has had to experience; and our prayer is that in these events her maternal heart may find no occasion for anything but joy and gladness. The Address of Condolence presented to Her Majesty by our last Conference bears testimony that the Primitive Methodists are as loyal to the person and government of the Queen, as other branches of the church of Christ, and other portions of Her Majesty's subjects. May Heaven bless and protect her person, and her royal household, and grant them a crown hereafter, that will never fade, and a kingdom that shall never be moved.

The prevalence of distress in the cotton districts calls for the sympathy of all classes of Christians; and while their prayers ascend to heaven in behalf of the sufferers, their contributions to aid them in their dark day should not be lacking. Very creditable is the liberality which all parts of the country, and all classes in society, have displayed; and it is gratifying to find that from our colonies, and other countries, large contributions are forthcoming. Some reference to what the Primitive Methodists are doing may be found on our wrapper.

The Great International Exhibition has been closed, and many of those who "came from afar" to see "this great sight," have returned to their own lands to report their impressions of it, and of this Protestant nation in which it took place, and to retain, we may suppose, throughout their future days, pleasing reminiscences of their visit. Some six millions of visits were made to the Exhibition during the time it was open.

On the approach of the new year, the Evangelical Alliance has again called on all Christians to devote to special prayer and religious service the week from January 4th to the 11th. Humble confession of our manifold sins, as individuals, families, churches, and nations—prayer for the pardon thereof, and for the conversion of sinners, for the increased spirituality and holiness of the children of God; for the conversion of the Jews; for the prevalence of Divine truth, and the better observance of the Lord's-day; thanksgiving for our mercies; and supplication for a richer and universal outpouring of the Holy Spirit—these are some of the points indicated in the circular the Alliance has distributed, as being specially appropriate for devotional regard at the time named. The Committee of the Anti-slavery Society in London suggests that to the above list should be added prayer for the speedy and universal overthrow of slavery. Of course all Christians may pray for other things which to their own minds appear specially interesting and important. We hope that the prayers offered will be "effectual, fervent" ones, and that speedy and gracious answers will be abundantly vouchsafed.

That there is still need for earnest prayer is evident from the fact that even among the professed ministers of the Gospel a semi-infidelity exists. Dr. Colenso, Bishop of Natal, has recently published a book to show that the Pentateuch and the Book of Joshua cannot be historically true. Before the "Essays and Reviews," and MacNaught's book on "Inspiration," have been forgotten, forth comes another dignitary of the Church of England to contend against not for "the faith delivered to the saints." Well may the sceptic sneer when he sees that even the professed preachers of the truth are volunteering to aid him in his inglorious task of seeking its overthrow. But "he that sitteth in the heavens shall laugh: the Lord shall have them in derision."

A clergyman in Norfolk has recently been snubbed by his diocesan, for his refusal to inter the corpse of a child of some Primitive Methodists in that county. The pious Bishop of Norwich has very courteously written a letter to one of our excellent superintendents, in which he expresses his regret at the conduct of the clergyman referred to; and by the Christian spirit his letter breathes, he has done much to heal the breach which that conduct had occasioned.

We rejoice to find that the London Missionary Society is putting forth very energetic efforts to establish Christian churches in the island of Madagascar, whither the Rev. W. Ellis and others, have been sent since the accession of the new King Radama II. Four chapels are intended to be raised on the identical spots where years ago martyrdom was patiently encountered by Christian converts. We trust this noble effort will be crowned with success. The Church of England, too, contemplates opening a mission in the same island, and the Bishop of the Mauritius has been inspecting the country, and has held a fraternal correspondence with the Rev. W. Ellis on the subject. May we hope to see the day when Primitive Methodism shall have a footing in Madagascar as well as in Natal? It is somewhat mortifying to find that Popery, true to her old instincts, is plotting in this noble island. But we trust that the various Protestant churches will be so wide awake to their duty as to prevent their antagonist from stealing a march upon them, as was the case in Tahiti some years ago. Popery cannot desist from persecution wherever she can find the means. Hence certain recent occurrences in France and Spain, in which pious Baptists have been, in the one case refused the rites of Protestant sepulture, and in the other cast into prison "for the Word of God, and the testimony of Jesus Christ." ITALY is still "the observed of all observers." The Pope is still the protégé of the faithful son of the church who reigns over France. Pity he is not allowed to imitate the Bavarian Otho, and seek for an asylum elsewhere. Greece is without a king, and unless a better than the last be found, her loss is not intolerable. Prince Alfred is in request, but "two are required to make a bargain." And in this case three or four would need to be consulted. It is more than doubtful whether his Royal Highness will step into the empty Hellenic throne. Ecclesiastical troubles are rife in the countries of Europe. Many of the priests are said to be excommunicated in Italy for memorializing the poor old Pope to lay down the sceptre and be content with the crozier. Hanover has recently been the scene of a case of combined Popish and ultra-Lutheran persecution of a Genevan congregation. The details we cannot stay to narrate, but an appeal is made to English Protestants to render them aid in preventing a house of prayer being forced out of the hands of its rightful possessors. The Methodist missions (both Wesleyan and New Connexion) in China, seem to be succeeding beyond what might have been expected; and the Free Churches contemplate following in the wake of those bodies to the same scene of toil.

America is still in the throes of a civil war, but while philanthropy weeps at the woes there witnessed, the bow in the cloud begins to appear, and the death-knell of slavery seems to come booming high above the roar of artillery from beyond the Atlantic. May every son of Adam soon be free. Our Canadian missions are prospering. About 150 increase in membership, for the last quarter, is reported. Our long-trying Brother Adams has sustained a severe shock in the death of his estimable wife, who was a native of the Isle of Man.

We have only space to say further, a case has just been decided in our law courts in regard to a Baptist chapel at Ramsgate, which may be of consequence for many years to come; it is to the effect that where nothing exists to the contrary in the deeds, members of other churches may be allowed to mingle with Baptists at the Lord's table, without endangering the position of either minister or trustee.

POETRY.

AMERICAN SLAVERY. Written in 1835.

'Twas ev'ning, and solar beams danced on the ocean,
 The Emigrant follow'd the lord of the day;
 In thought I went with her across the wide waters,
 And hover'd with wonder on lands far away,
 Where the star spangl'd banner of liberty waves
 O'er traitors, and tyrants, and heart-broken slaves.
 I gazed on the mountains in grandeur majestic,
 I gazed on the vales—they were fruitful and fair;
 I gazed with delight on the lakes and the fountains,
 I gazed on the banner—the eagle was there.
 "E pluribus unum" exultingly waves,
 E pluribus unum! what freemen and slaves?
 The genius of liberty, maiden celestial,
 Sat nigh that gay banner, attempting to smile;
 Alternately gazing on eagle and fetters,
 The tears from her eyes trickled down all the while,
 And she sighed where the banner of liberty waves,
 O'er traitors, and tyrants, and heart-broken slaves.
 With a voice that at once was both awful and tender,—
 Her mien to pourtray the best painter would fail,—
 She spoke, and I listen'd with breathless attention;
 The waving woods murmur'd assent to her tale:
 O waft it, ye winds, where the knotted-scourge waves,
 Or hangs in terrorem o'er heart-broken slaves.
 "Though pure be the air on these pine-cover'd mountains,
 Extensive these prairies, and verdant these plains,
 Though national pride beam in rosy complexion,
 'Tis the pride of the despot, while thousands in chains,
 Ask, in groans, shall the misnomer'd banner still wave
 Where the tyrant exults o'er the wrongs of the slave?
 "Though sounds of salvation are borne on the breezes,
 Though Jesu's mild law sweetly floats in the air;
 'As ye would be done to, so do unto others,'
 Is heard in the woods and the temples of prayer,
 Where the banner of mercy, unfurl'd, sweetly waves;
 But O! where is pity for heart-broken slaves?
 "Gath, hear it not; these inconsistent professors
 Of Jesu's religion have slaves of their own;
 Their fellow-immortals, for whom bled the Saviour,
 Writhe under their lash, in their manacles moan,
 Where the banner of mercy in mockery waves
 O'er hypocrites, tyrants, and heart-broken slaves.
 "But tell me, ye hard-hearted, faithless, pretenders,
 Who boast of equality, bow at my shrine,
 Yet trade in flesh of your brothers and sisters,
 And ne'er feel a spark of my spirit benign,
 Do you think my bright banner much longer shall wave
 Where the tyrant is rampant and tortures the slave?
 "Nay, mark that dark cloud on your nation descending,
 'Tis big with events which soon time will reveal
 For on that dark cloud sits the angel of justice,
 Whose dread retribution you quickly shall feel;
 Then shall my bright banner victoriously wave,
 When the tyrant is crush'd, and unshackl'd the slave."
 She ceased. With a sigh from my reverie starting,
 Gay streamers still gilding the unbroken waves,
 Where the white cliffs of Albion my dear native island,
 Majestically bend o'er the ocean's dark cave,—
 I prayed that this home of the free and the brave Might never be stained with the blood of a slave."
Dar ingt ..

Charles Robbins

THE Primitive Methodist Magazine.

---

FEBRUARY, 1863.

---

BIOGRAPHY.

MEMOIR OF MR. W. ARMSTRONG.

THE sudden departure of a man, whose services in the Church or in the commonwealth seemed all but indispensable, is one of those mysteries of Providence which the light of eternity will be required to make plain. Yet, with the aid of revelation and of ecclesiastical history, we may read in such a Providence some useful lessons. We are thereby reminded, in the first instance, of the Divine sovereignty. "Behold, He taketh away, and who can hinder Him? who will say unto Him, What doest Thou?" "I was dumb, I opened not my mouth, because Thou didst it." May we not often recognize the justice of God in these solemn, afflictive providences? His representatives, His witnesses, do not receive the attention that, as such, He justly demands for them; and so they are hastily re-called. Suddenly are we deprived of those counsels, prayers, and public services, which we had failed rightly to appreciate. In some such cases, however, we may behold the goodness of God; both in relation to the individuals themselves, who are "taken away from the evil to come," and also in relation to survivors, who may derive most important benefit therefrom.

And such providences, in many instances, illustrate the power, wisdom, goodness, and faithfulness of God, in admirable harmony. He takes away His servants, and yet carries on His work, perhaps even more rapidly. He takes one away, and raises up several others; nay, more, he makes that very loss, which has filled our eyes with tears and our hearts with sorrowful misgivings, the means of resuscitating a languishing church and of augmenting her agencies. The precious Gospel treasure is placed "in earthen vessels,"—mean and fragile vessels—"that the excellency of the power may" be seen and acknowledged to "be of God." The chief improvement that we should make of such is, to "humble ourselves under the mighty hand of God," and plead with Him earnestly and perseveringly for so abundant an out-pouring of the Holy Spirit, as will result in the conversion of numbers of sinners, and the raising up of other faithful labourers who shall more than fill the places of those whose decease we have been called to mourn.

Our account of Mr. W. Armstrong, of Newcastle, who has been suddenly removed from us, must be imperfect, from the fact that he has left nothing among his papers to aid us in this essay, which we ascribe to his characteristic modesty, rather than to negligence, or any want of industry, as he made good use of his pen. It would have been instructive and edifying, as well as interesting, if we could have seen more clearly than we can, in the absence of any diary or journal, the connection between his outer and his inner life—if we had had some record of his intercourse with God, of his spiritual conflicts, and of the how of his growing faith and abounding charity. We are not, however, without satisfactory evidence that he "had been with Jesus"—that "the life which he lived in the flesh was by the faith of the Son of God."

William Armstrong was born at Morpeth, Northumberland, on the 25th of May, 1805. Neither of his parents was decidedly pious. He had not, therefore, the early religious advantages with which some are favoured. His father dying while he was of tender age, he had to begin early to work with his hands. But self-tuition in after life made him a good plain English scholar, or he could hardly, with his good sense and humility, have undertaken to address the public, as he did occasionally, on the elevation of the working classes. For some time after his coming to Newcastle, as an apprentice to the baking business, he attended the Sabbath-school in connection with High Bridge Chapel.

In 1823 he was attracted by the open-air efforts, especially the singing, of the Primitive Methodists, who had commenced their evangelistic operations in the North of England the preceding year; and receiving great spiritual benefit under their plain, unctuous preaching, he voluntarily espoused their fellowship. So that he was nearly one of the first members of the Primitive Methodist Church in Newcastle, which he continued to adorn and support till "God took him."

We cannot give any detailed account of his conversion, of the way in which he became a Christian indeed. It appears that, notwithstanding the comparative disadvantages of his early training, he feared God from his youth; and that, like Lydia and some others, his heart was gently opened by the Holy Spirit, so that he attended to the things—the grand truths, spoken by "the servants of the living God." Without question, there was a time when he was "born from above"—when, as a penitent sinner, he first trusted in Christ for salvation, and yielded himself unto God; but he could not sing with so deep and lively a feeling as many of his brethren,

"I never can forget that day,
When Jesus wash'd my sins away."

This, however, is a matter of minor importance, as we are directed to examine ourselves, not how we were brought into the faith, but "whether we be in the faith." "Every tree is known by his own fruit."

In 1829 Brother Armstrong was chosen for the local ministry; and such was his attention to reading and study, in connection with public religious exercises and closet prayer, that his profiting soon appeared to all. Though he was comparatively deficient in some of the elements of popular address, yet he was everywhere well received, from the commencement to the close of his public labours, both in the pulpit and on the platform. Not only was the matter of his discourses good, presenting just and lively views of Divine truth, but the style and arrangement were excellent, and delivered with a sweetness of tone and a gracefulness of manner, which cannot be learned in any college. For about eighteen years he was immediately associated with the parent church in Newcastle, which met in Butchers' Hall, Sallyport, Silver Street, and Nelson Street successively, during part of which period he was the leader of the Sunday morning class.

Early in the year 1842, Mr. Armstrong, together with the late Mr. T. Parker, (whose memoir was published on page 523 of last year's Magazine), was appointed to take charge of a newly established interest in the west part of the town, which for the last fifteen years has been known among us as Arthur's Hill Society. This was an occasion of self-denial to him, as he would have greatly preferred, on his own account, worshipping and hearing the Word at Nelson Street. A disposition to give up our personal advantages for the common good is one of the best evidences of grace. How apt are we to indulge self under the pretence of seeking our spiritual edification! But personal holiness, and comfort too, can be found only in the way of duty. Having nothing of peculiar interest to narrate in connection with our friend's conduct and labours at Arthur's Hill, it must suffice to say, that, as a Christian, a class-leader, a preacher, a member of the Circuit Committee, and a Sunday-school teacher and superintendent, he acquitted himself worthily, taking a leading part in whatever concerned the welfare of the good cause, rejoicing in its advancement, meekly enduring the trials arising from Satanic influence, human infirmity, and the opposition or indifference of the ungodly; being daily "an example of the believers in word, in conversation, in charity, in spirit, in faith, in purity."

Mr. Armstrong showed his attachment to Primitive Methodism by consenting to become a trustee for several chapels, including Nelson Street and Scotswood Road, for the latter of which he acted as treasurer, much to the satisfaction of all parties concerned therein. In one such case he suffered a considerable loss, along with other brethren ; but though he felt it for a time, that unhappy case did not deter him from undertaking a similar responsibility some years afterwards. And if his life had been prolonged, we believe he would have been more than willing to take an active and responsible part in the erection of a more commodious place of worship at Arthur's Hill, which is much needed. He was in various ways a public benefactor. We may just mention that, in addition to his visits to the chambers of the sick and the dying, his services were for many years frequently in requisition, and voluntarily rendered, at the cemetery, near to which he lived. Hundreds of families were thus freely ministered to in the time of their trouble.

This brief memoir would be justly open to some complaint were we to omit saying something about the part which Mr. Armstrong took in connection with the temperance movement. A movement so philanthropic, so Christian, was, we think, sure to win the sympathy and co-operation of so thoughtful and well-disposed a man. On the sole principle of abstinence from all appearance of evil—of giving no offence, or of putting no occasion to fall in his brother's way, willingly would he have made the required sacrifice. But he did not take this restricted, though the highest view of this matter. He looked upon teetotalism as a physical as well as a social and moral benefit. Accordingly, he early took his mild but unswerving stand against the hydra evil of drinking, in all its deceitful, ensnaring forms. And if he appeared less frequently before the public, on this great question, than some of his brethren, it was because of other necessary and still more important engagements. It was pleasing to see this trait of our dear friend so faithfully reflected on the occasion of his funeral.

Mr. Armstrong was twice at the hymeneal altar. In May, 1831, he was married to Dorothy Holmes, of Newcastle, by whom he had five children, only one of whom has grown up, and still survives. May she have grace to be faithful to her father's God, till she meet him in the better land. In 1839, that strong but tender bond was broken by death, which afflicted him deeply for many days. After living in widowhood for ten years, he was united in marriage, in Nelson Street Chapel, by the hand of the late Rev. H. Hebborn, to Jane White, who is the chief sufferer from his sudden decease. While many have lost, in the death of William Armstrong, a beloved friend, she has lost a dear and inestimable husband. But "the Lord liveth," in whom the "widow indeed" trusteth ; who has said, "I will never leave thee nor forsake thee."

The last sermon Brother Armstrong preached, on the last of his earthly Sabbaths, was delivered in Scotswood Road Chapel, on a characteristic text—Col. iv. 5—"Walk in wisdom toward them that are without."

His health had not been very good for the last few years (although having become somewhat corpulent, he generally looked pretty well), suffering occasionally from chest affection, especially on taking cold, to which he was very liable, no doubt from the nature of his calling. He was nearly as well as usual when he retired to bed on Wednesday night, July 2nd, 1862. About three o'clock next morning, Mrs. Armstrong awoke, and hearing her husband make a peculiar noise with his throat and lips, anxiously inquired, "What is the matter, William?" but received no answer. Before medical skill could attempt anything for him, he quietly breathed his last—departed, as we doubt not, "to be with Christ, which is far better."

ADDITIONAL OBSERVATIONS ON HIS CHARACTER.

Mr. Ralph Cook, one of his oldest Christian friends, has supplied the following remarks, slightly altered:—"My friend, William Armstrong, was one of those characters that do not present any very striking features. He moved on so calmly and unobtrusively, that he was not calculated to attract the attention of the unthinking crowd. He required to be well known to be duly appreciated. I became acquainted with him before either of us had grown up to manhood, in 1823. When quite a lad I was impressed with his steadiness, circumspection, and consistency. His first society ticket contained the following text: 'The hoary head is a crown of glory, if it be found in the way of righteousness.' And, certainly, from youth to hoary age, William Armstrong was never found in any other than the way of righteousness. During the many years of my acquaintance with him, I never heard even a suspicion of anything wrong in his conduct. Intelligent piety, a strong sense of duty, kindness, and courtesy were observable in all his behaviour. As a preacher, he had not much physical energy, but his sermons were, nevertheless, sure to arrest attention, being of a high order, as literary compositions: such care did he bestow on his pulpit preparations, that nothing mean or crude was ever heard from him. In the Sabbath-school, among the children, he was quite at home. I preached the Sabbath-school anniversary sermons at Arthur's Hill on the first Sabbath in June. William was at his post, as superintendent, hearing the children's recitations. He was evidently in his element. When I took supper with him that night, I little thought it would be the last time of our meeting on earth. Mr. Armstrong, by steady perseverance in his worldly calling, raised himself from a position of comparative poverty to one of comfort and respectability. In aiding the cause of God from his purse he was liberal. Having often had occasion to apply to him on behalf of chapels, schools, and cases of individual distress, I always found him ready with a good donation. As a hearer of the Word he was worthy of imitation. He was a good judge of sermons; but whoever was the preacher, he never failed to give respectful attention."

Mr. Armstrong was a man of rare moral worth—an ornament, not to the Primitive Methodists only, but to humanity and religion. If the light he reflected was not brilliant, it was clear, mild, steady, permanent. If his piety was not of the highest type, it was of the genuine mould—it was seen in connection with many universally admired virtues, and the sphere of its exercise was sufficiently wide and elevated to draw the attention and provoke the emulation of numbers for a comparatively lengthened period. If his life does not supply any striking incidents—what is more important, it was all over amiable. He was not a great man, except on comparison with those of his own class; but he was singularly good—emphatically, “a good man.” He was not, so far as we knew him, wanting in “whatsoever things are true . . . honest . . . just . . . pure;” but in “whatsoever things are lovely and of good report,” he excelled. A right sort of man for a world like this! His temperament, no doubt, was comparatively favourable to the cultivation of the milder virtues; but, with humble gratitude, he ascribed all the good that was in him to the grace of God. He was a Christian; his goodness, therefore, was not merely negative or sentimental, but vital, practical. He was not only harmless, but benevolent; he showed mercy with cheerfulness. In him the fatherless and the widow found a friend, while his reading and studies were chiefly, if not entirely, subordinated to the best employment of his talents in the several positions which he occupied in the Church. While diligently pursuing the business of his calling, he quietly, but successfully, sought the highest interests of his fellow men for considerably more than a generation. He was “given to hospitality.” One case of recent occurrence may be mentioned to show his conscientiousness in giving of his money to the poor. Two friends waited upon him on behalf of a brother in need. After making some inquiries into the circumstances of the case, he was requested to look at the list of contributions to the same object by other parties. “No,” he replied, “it is no matter to me what others give; I must give what I can afford;” and then cheerfully offered what was considered by the parties a handsome sum. This is the chief test of good feeling. Many are cheerful up to the point of being called upon to contribute of their property to some pious or charitable object, when immediately their countenance is observed to fall, as if the words of the Lord Jesus were not true: “It is more blessed to give than to receive.”

Mr. Armstrong's kindly disposition came out with advantage in social converse. His conversational powers were good, and his friendships warm and abiding. He showed himself friendly, and so had many friends. His knowledge of Christianity and of human nature was such that he could readily distinguish between the constituent elements of character and accidental graces or defects; and this contributed to the permanence of his Christian attachments.

He was remarkably unassuming; could easily take the lowest place; in honour preferring others before himself. Greater energy of character would, perhaps, have modified, at least in appearance, his deportment in this respect; but without question, it was, in the main, the result of enlightened brotherly love. Hence, he was "a man of peace," following peace with all men, and especially seeking the peace of the Church, so essential to her credit and efficient operations. Humble love, in connection with knowledge, Scriptural knowledge in particular, is an infallible peace conserver, "the bond of peace." He was uniformly courteous. His reverence of God had its counterpart in gentleness towards his fellows. Yes, he was a true gentleman, and, therefore, was morally qualified to enforce the apostolic precept from the pulpit, as he sometimes did: "Be courteous."

We have no reason to think that our friend lacked decision, that he was at all unstable, either in his thinkings or his conduct; certainly he was not open to the charge of stubbornness. He was "easy to be entreated" in matters requiring no moral compromise. This, indeed, is an attribute of love closely allied to humility and gentleness. A man of so excellent a spirit was eminently qualified to teach and preside in the Sabbath-school. Authority must, by all means, be maintained there, as in the family and elsewhere; but it is love, on the part of the teacher, that disposes the child to hearken to instruction, without which every important lesson will be unheeded or hated. We are thankful, therefore, that our departed friend gave so much of his Sabbath time and labours to that institution; and do not wonder that his services were so acceptable and useful. His characteristic goodness of heart was very observable in the pulpit. He was "a son of consolation;" he knew how to "speak a word in season to him that was weary." Hence, he sought to persuade men, by "the meekness and gentleness of Christ." His preaching was "as the dew that descended upon the mountains of Zion," rather than "as showers that water the earth."

If the favourable representation of Mr. Armstrong's character, which we have presented, is substantially just or correct, and those who knew him the best will, we believe, be the most ready to endorse it—it is scarcely necessary to add that his conduct in the conjugal and parental relations was most affectionate, and that his home was a happy one. It was not that he thought any place like home, that he so often left it for hours or all the day: it was to seek the good, the happiness of others, returning, like the royal Psalmist, "to bless his household." Family religion was regularly attended to, not as a duty merely, but as a privilege—as a daily preparative for, and earnest of, heaven. "The voice of salvation and rejoicing" was in his tabernacle.

Suddenly, however, his tongue was silenced, and it will never again be heard, either in his house (which is, indeed, no longer his house, the grave is his house now), in the social circle, the Sunday-school, or the pulpit. The last time we saw his face alive was at Tynemouth, along with his fellow teachers and the children of Arthur's Hill and Derby Street Sabbath-schools, a few days only before his departure. During the conversation that passed at tea, in a wooden tent on the sand, he remarked, in reference to the inconveniences of the table accommodation, "This will make us more thankful for the comforts of home;" little thinking that he should so soon be called to leave his home on earth, not to return. Ah! dear reader, ought we not daily to regard all our earthly surroundings but as temporary tent accommodations, which should only make us more thankful for a better, an enduring home, prepared for us in heaven? After tea, a meeting was held in the open-air, and several addresses delivered, in connection with singing and prayer. Brother Armstrong, in his brief, appropriate speech, referred to the demise of some who were with them there last year, and the improbability of our being permitted to meet again on another similar occasion, quoting that beautifully solemn passage in 1 Peter i. 24, 25—"All flesh is as grass, and all the glory of man as the flower of grass: the grass withereth, and the flower thereof falleth away; but the word of the Lord endureth for ever. It was impressive; but it would have been much more so—it would have drawn tears from all our eyes, if he could have foreseen what was so soon to happen to himself—if he could have said in the farewell language of the apostle, "And now, behold, I know that all ye among whom I have gone preaching the kingdom of God shall" (six days hence) "see my face no more."

His funeral was very numerously attended, and every one seemed to say of him, "Gone, and will be greatly missed!" On Sunday, July the 27th, an appropriate and impressive sermon was preached in Nelson Street Chapel, by the Rev. Thomas Greenfield.

May the writer and the reader have grace to follow him as he followed Christ, so that if our exit out of the world be as sudden as his, it may be "as safe"—as happy!

W. DENT.

---

MEMOIR OF MR. R. WILLIAMS.

RICHARD WILLIAMS, late of Douglas, Isle of Man, was well-known to many who read the Magazines. He was not a fixed star always shining in one place; nor a planet ever revolving in a given orbit; but rather a comet, a wandering star, erratic in his movements, now visiting this place, now that, now found moving in one sphere of life, then suddenly abandoning it for another. But while somewhat given to change in secular things, he was firm and fixed in things spiritual and sacred; maintaining, during the many years that intervened between his conversion and his death, a consistent Christian deportment, and a firm adherence to the Primitive Methodist Connexion.

Respecting his early life, our information is limited and meagre. He was born at Lapington, Shropshire, August 13th, 1807, and was the youngest of four children. When but a year old, his father died; and when only five years old, the insatiate archer, death, aimed a deadly dart at Richard's mother; and when she sank beneath the cruel blow, the subject of our sketch was left an orphan to the care of Providence. The father was a worldly man; but the mother was a true Christian. She prayed earnestly for her children, commending them to God; and when dying testified that she was going to be with Jesus. Richard was brought up to attend the parish church, and while quite a youth he became a church singer. He knew nothing, however, of inward religion; he was not even moral in his conduct, but plunged deeply into folly and sin. "The sins to which I was most addicted," he remarks, "were swearing, song-singing, and all kinds of drollery and foolery." These things would give him bad popularity, making him the lion of his party, and one of the heroes of his native village. How well it was that a Divine hand arrested him early in his career of ruin!

He was converted to God when probably about twenty years of age. There were several things which contributed their share of influence in effecting Richard's conversion; amongst which a dying mother's prayers must hold a prominent place. Hear how he speaks concerning her: "I have been informed that my mother prayed earnestly for all her children, and though I was only five years old when she died, the good seed she sowed took root in my heart. I can remember that at a very early age I felt longings after God and heaven, and dreadful fears of going to hell and being tormented by the devil. Many times I was terrified by dramas. But alas! after this I got into company, ran into sin, and continued in a careless state until I was about sixteen years of age."

But the good seed of the Divine Word, sown in his heart, was only buried, not destroyed; and the visit of a Primitive Methodist missionary to Richard's native place, operated like warm rain and sunshine to quicken it into growth. Let us hear his own account of this matter:—"The first Primitive Methodist I ever saw was William Doughty, in 1823; and the hymn he sung was—

"Stop, poor sinner, stop and think,
Before you further go," &c.

He seemed to have a voice like a lion: when he came to the lines,

"Once again I charge you stop,
For unless you warning take,
Ere you are aware you'll drop Into the burning lake:"—

He repeated it several times. The power of God attended the solemn words, and they sank like lead into my heart. I saw clearly, at that time, that the way in which I was travelling led to destruction." Shortly afterwards a band of Primitive Methodists visited the same locality, singing as they entered the place,

"Come friends and relations, let's join heart and hand," &c.

Richard's serious impressions were deepened; he felt that he was wrong, and determined to commence the important task of making himself right with God. "I felt something was wanting," he remarks, "so I commenced a kind of reformation, sewing fig-leaves together to hide my spiritual nakedness. At this time I had no knowledge of repentance towards God and faith in His Son Jesus Christ. In this way I went on for some time, laving* off first one sin, then another, trying to patch up something that would stop the mouth of conscience." Knowing, as we do, from experience and the Word of God, that by the deeds of the law we can never be saved, we wonder not that he failed in the attempt. After months, perhaps years, of fruitless labour, he gives the following as his bitter experience:—"Alas! I could as asily stop the sun with my hand, or turn the tide with my foot, as keep down my corruptions by my own power. Perhaps after hearing a good sermon I could check and bridle myself for a few days; then Satan would prevail, and lead me captive at his will as bad as ever."

At this eventful stage of his career, the "Pilgrim's Progress" was made a blessing to his soul. He read it through and through, and thereby obtained considerable light on the way of salvation. The probability is that he was at this time converted; for he says, "I now felt the sure influences of the Holy Spirit, my sins seemed to die at the root; I felt no more inclination to sin than to walk in the fire. How aisy is running, when God is drawing!"

He soon had to encounter what he calls "a strong temptation;" and simple and common as it seems, it belongs to a class of things by which Satan ruins thousands of young disciples. The young squire of the village, on coming of age, made a feast, to which the whole parish appears to have been invited. Richard observes, "The devil tempted me to go; many religious people said there was no harm in going; but the Spirit said, 'If you go you will repent to-morrow.' I thought I shall be silly to do to-day what I shall wish undone to-morrow, and make work for repentance. So I would not go." Dear, youthful Christian, when thou encounterest similar temptations, go and do likewise.

He had not yet made an open profession of religion, but continued connected with the Church as a singer, attending the preaching of the Primitive Methodists as frequently as he could. But the character of his singing was changed; he sang in the Spirit, sang with grace in his heart to the Lord; he lifted up his voice like a trumpet when making melody in his heart to God. This startled the clergyman, who sent him a peremptory dismissal. Let Richard describe the matter himself:—"I still went to Church every Sunday; but not in the same spirit as formerly. No; I bowed my knees and prayed with fervour, for I was convinced that our singing had been complete mockery. I now put my heart and soul into both hymn and tune. This raised the devil, and grieved the hunting parson, and he sent me word to come and sing no more, for he could hear nothing for me, I was like the big drum on the field of battle. This suddenly cut my connection with the Church; I never went again, except to a funeral. I now joined the people of God, and cared not what any one said about my leaving the Church." We give his own words without intending disrespect to the Established Church. Had he fallen into the hands of a godly clergyman, his opinion would probably have been more favourable than that indicated above.

---

* The biographer thinks the retention of some of Mr. W.'s provincialisms will enable the reader the better to appreciate him.—Ed.

A gracious revival of religion, which occurred at his native place about this time, was made the means of building him up in the holy faith of the Gospel. He saw first one and then another obtain pardon or holiness, and "set to with all his might" to obtain a greater blessing himself. Seeking a retired place by the side of a brook, he knelt reverently before the Most High, and prayed fervently for a fuller manifestation of Christ to his heart. "I had not prayed long," he observes, "when something strange came over me. I got up, but could scarce see. The sky and everything else had something of rainbow appearance for a short time. I was so happy, and I shouted and praised God, and made such a noise, that one of the men in the other end of the field went home and told that I was gone mad."

His joy was now great in the Lord. But another trial was before him. Let him relate it himself.

"On Sunday morning I went to tell my brother Edward (now an esteemed superannuated minister of the Primitive Methodist Connexion) what had taken place, and how happy I felt. He told me he was afraid I was desaving myself, and building a wall with untempered mortar. He once, he said, felt the same himself; but it was nothing more than flashes of love. He feared that I was not converted, as I had not sorrowed for sin long enough. My brother knows more about present salvation now."

Surprised, but nothing daunted, and like Luther of old, whom in several features he resembled, determined to be right, he says, "I now went home to lay the foundation of repentance afresh; and my cry was, Lord, if I am desaving myself, undesave me; if the wound is not deep enough, make it deeper; Lord, if I am not right, make me right. I prayed for sorrow; but while I did so I was many times so happy that I scarce knew what to do with myself." Prayer made the darkened clouds withdraw from his soul; took away all doubt respecting the reality of his conversion ; and filled him with joy unspeakable. Respecting the blessed seasons then enjoyed, he exclaims, "O these were angels' visits ; I cannot describe them. I have since had two or three visits something like them, but very few."

. We must now briefly glance at his official life. To the spiritually-minded observer it soon became evident that Richard with all his rusticity and lack of education, possessed talents for usefulness. His soul glowed with intense desire for the salvation of men ; he prayed with great power, and warned and wooed his unsaved neighbours with marked effect. His religion was felt at the house where he lived ; but he soon had to suffer for his devotion to his Master's cause. Richard observes, "In the family I lived with, five daughters got converted ; and we determined to get the mother converted, too. The unsaved part of the family could stand it no longer. They thought if they could get shut of me and Joseph Doves, they would have it all their own way. So we were both paid off without any fault save praying to God, like Daniel." He obtained a situation, shortly afterwards, at Shrewsbury, in which circuit he made his first attempt at preaching. He felt the task to be heavy. "I went," he remarks, "praying all the way for help. I sang, prayed, and said a few words to the people, when something indescribable came over me ; I felt twice as big as myself ; speech and ideas fled, and I felt as if I should fall on the floor. J. Williams, the coach painter, was with me, and finished for me. This was my first sermon, if we may call it one ; and but for the encouraging words of the people, it might have been my last ; for I was strongly tempted to give it up."

Preaching was heavy work to him for some time. When put on Birmingham plan, upon removing thither, the greatness of the work and his own unfitness for it, oppressed his mind. "The first time I had to preach at Birmingham," he remarks, "it was a dreadful cross ; I quaked and shook, and my feet rattled on the boards, but God was with us, and we had a good time." After remaining here nearly two years, he removed to Mickleover, near Derby, and took appointments in Derby, Burton, and Belper Circuits. While here, he formed an enduring friendship with the late Mr. John Hall, and family, of Sutton-on-the-Hill, a man of considerable local celebrity in Burton Circuit ; but who, many years before death, sank into a state of monomania, from which he never recovered. "The first time I heard him pray," says Mr. Williams, "he seemed to shake heaven and earth. He was no surface man ; he dug deep into the things of God. He was like a father to me, and gave me an insight into many things I knew but little about ; and he had the Word of God at his finger-ends." He is now where the inhabitants never say, I am sick, whither his admiring friend has followed him ; but the widow and family of Mr. Hall still live to bless the locality where they reside, and the interests of Primitive Methodism in particular.

We have now reached the time, probably the year 1835, when he became a travelling preacher. Becoming acquainted with the late Rev. J. Brownson, "he got me," says Mr. W., "to go out to travel in Loughborough Circuit, and I was sent for a short time to Melton Mowbray to open fresh places. Here I worked hard and fared hard; but empty bellies were more in fashion among us then than they are now. I was frequently glad of a raw turnip for dinner; have had to drink my tea out of the brook, preach on an empty stomach, and then, hungry and faint, walk nine or ten miles to Melton to sleep. But this was for a short time only. Mr. Brownson came to Melton, and I went back to Loughborough. I had two comfortable years, and I believe a dale of good was done. Mr. Brownson was very kind to me: he would lend or give me anything that I required, and when by poor living and severe labour I was so reduced in strength as to be scarcely able to walk to my appointments, and strongly tempted to give up, he comforted me, and encouraged me to persevere in my great work."

We next find him in Leicester Circuit, under the able superintendency of the late Rev. Thomas Morgan. This was in 1837. The circuit then enjoyed a high degree of prosperity, to which the labours of Mr. W. contributed no small share. It is pleasant to hear him speak thus of his superintendent: "Mr. Morgan gave me some of the best advice I ever had concerning present salvation, the short and direct way of going to God by faith, the way of bringing sinners to Christ, and above all, family visiting. I never met with one to equal him in these respects."

While in Leicester Circuit he narrowly escaped perishing in the snow. Rising at three o'clock on a Monday morning, he started to Leicester, a distance of about thirteen miles, to be in time for the Quarterly Meeting. Before he had gone far, the snow which had fallen in the night became dangerously deep. The hedges were covered, and he soon lost his way. Slow and painful was his progress. At one moment he would be on the top of a snow-mountain, the next moment buried beneath. Thus he went on till day dawned, when, coming to a guide post, he found that he was nearly as far from home as when he started, having wandered far out of his way. He reached home about mid-day, saved, doubtless, by a special Providence. I saw him two days afterwards, with joints so stiffened, that his only way of getting down the steps of my father's house was by jumping.

Mr. Morgan used to relate with glee an amusing conversation which he overheard, and which took place in the bed-room occupied by Mr. Williams and one of his colleagues. Perhaps two young men could not have been found more unlike each other than were these two young preachers. The one was quiet, precise, studious, grave, reserved; the other, lively, ready, rattling, full of rough, homely wit, with no sympathy at all with literary habits. On the morning in question, the studious young divine rose early to his books, but while he stored the other snored. The heavy eyelids were at length drawn up, when a voice, solemn as the grave, said, "Mr. Williams, I am surprised at you; you ought to have been up a long time ago studying grammar and arithmetic." But the ungrateful recipient of this severe lecture gruffly replied, "What's in yo' never comes out; away with your grammar and rathmattick, I want to get souls converted." In his simplicity he mistook a friend for an enemy, not being aware that learning is not a hindrance but a help in promoting religion among men.

It might be three or four years later that Mr. W. attended a missionary meeting in Sheffield Circuit. The late Dr. Stowell presided. Among the persons appointed as speakers was one noted for wit and drollery, and who was fond of having a little innocent amusement at another's expense. Some time before the meeting commenced, he designedly spoke against "college parsons," wishful to enjoy a platform encounter between the chairman and Dickie, as he was familiarly called. As the witty brother described the literary habits of collegians, as he spoke against their laziness and want of care for souls, and as he pointed out how much more Christ-like it would be to close their Latin and Greek folios, leave their cloisters, and go from house to house getting souls converted, the bait took as desired, and Dickie resolved to have a fly at the crying evil in his speech that night. The speaker rose. Out flew his flaming thoughts, expressed in flaming words. The audience were taken by surprise. Sly glances were directed to the doctor, the tutor of a college, who occupied the chair. How would he bear all this? The doctor quietly rose when the speaker had sat down, and pleasantly congratulated himself on his good fortune in getting into the ministry before his good friend, who had just sat down, came into power. Though it was his misfortune to have some learning, he was not sorry. Learning was very serviceable sometimes. What would his friend have done had there been no learned men to translate the Scriptures into English? Could he read the Hebrew and Greek originals? Thus quietly, playfully, he continued for sometime, removing the skin from the flesh with a very delicate hand. There was quite a scene. The people clapped and cheered, the designing and delighted colleague who set the trap in which an unsuspecting bird was caught, heartily applauded; while one, who sat behind blushing, stammered out, "I did na mean yo'! I did na mean yo'!" It is right to add that his views of the utility of learning were considerably changed with advancing years, and that though he never was fond of study himself, he learned to respect and honour such as were.

From Leicester he removed to Welton, Northamptonshire, in 1838. Here he spent a laborious year, but according to his own opinion, one of the most useful years of his life. Sheffield was his next station, where he remained two years, and then removed to Boston. His two years' labour at Sheffield shook his constitution considerably. The cause was low, the chapel in the town large, and burdened with a ponderous debt. These things taxed the united energies of mind, heart, and body to the utmost. But in addition to his ordinary labour he was sent out into neighbouring circuits, preaching, begging, and selling Sheffield goods for the reduction of the chapel debt. By these extraordinary toils his heart and flesh began to give way, so that when he arrived at Boston he was only a shadow of his former self.

"I liked Boston Circuit," he remarks, "and the people were very kind. My strength might have returned; but when in a neighbouring circuit holding missionary meetings, I was put into two damp beds in one week. This finished me off. I was afterwards stationed to Burton-on-Trent in 1842, but was unable to enter on my work, and compelled to resign." How sad that a useful minister of Christ should be thus prematurely laid aside, and rendered weak and sickly for life, through the thoughtlessness of Christian friends!

After retiring from the ministry, his life was unsettled and seemingly uncomfortable for some years. He entered into business, in which, more through generosity than incapacity, he became somewhat involved. He trusted persons who proved unworthy of his confidence. This circumstance embittered several years of his life. About fourteen years ago he married an estimable wife, who rendered most important aid in extricating him from financial difficulty. From Sileby, where they lived a few months, and where the writer lodged with them, they removed to the Isle of Man, where he spent the last eleven years of his life. He continued to preach as long as he was able, and took a lively interest in the work of God to the last.

His final affliction was protracted, but he endured it as a Christian. He was ready for death; he longed for the time of his departure; but while crying to God to hasten his chariot wheels, he yet said, "Thy will be done." To a friend from Sheffield who was visiting at his house a little while before his decease, he remarked, "If my old friends in England ask after me, tell them that I am in full sail for heaven." In this happy state of mind he continued until September 24th, 1861, when he closed his weary eyes to earth, but opened them to behold the fadeless glories of heaven. He was a kind husband, a warm-hearted friend, a true Christian, hot in temper, careless with respect to dress, unpolished in speech, very animated in the pulpit, and fervent in prayer. Let us forget his failings, imitate his excellencies, and follow him to heaven.

JOHN BARFOOT.

[We regret that this memoir is so much behind time, but the fault does not belong to the biographer or ourselves. We should have regretted still more if it had not been prepared at all.—Ed.]

MEMOIR OF MR. G. CARNLEY.

GEORGE CARNLEY, the subject of the following sketch, was born December 11th, 1824, and died June 15th, 1862, at Buringham, in the Scotter Circuit. In early life he was sent to the Primitive Methodist Sabbath-school, which he continued to attend till his death, latterly discharging the duties of teacher and superintendent. Notwithstanding the instruction he received in the school, and the good example of his parents, who were members with us, George grew up a godless youth.

In the year 1847 a great revival commenced in his native village; many of his companions obtained mercy, and he went to the meetings to hear the new converts make blunders while engaged in prayer. But the Spirit smote him, and he saw that he was making the greatest blunder in putting off the great work of salvation. After a mighty struggle he came to the Saviour, who is ready to pardon, and obtained the forgiveness of sins, and was made very happy in the Lord. The day following his conversion he thought that it was a great and important change, and therefore all the inhabitants of the village ought to know of it. He told them all (calling at the houses one by one) that he was happy in the Lord, and that what the Lord had done for him, He could and would do for them, if they, like him, would come to Jesus. He then went into the street and shouted "Glory! God has converted my soul." He continued thus to burn with holy zeal for God and the salvation of souls; and in 1849 his name appeared on the circuit's plan, and he became an acceptable local preacher. Many have to bless the day they heard him preach.

He was mighty in prayer. One evening at a prayer-meeting while engaged with his wonted fervour, his head went too near the candle that was lighted, and the flame caught his hair. One said to him, "Carnley, your hair is on fire." He replied, "It is like my heart, which is all on fire with warm desire to be dissolved in love." He also discharged the duties of a class-leader, and was successful in visiting the sick, thereby gathering many into the fold of the Great Shepherd.

In 1861 he took a severe cold, and then was much afflicted with nervous debility, which was followed with pulmonary consumption, that terminated in death. Though he had to contend with the above diseases he was happy in God. That religion which guided him in health, supported him in sickness and death. Many visited him, but to all he bore testimony to the power of the truth that had made him free.

The greatest cause of sorrow to his mind was his wife and children that he was about to leave; but he gave them up to that God who had said, "Leave thy fatherless children, I will preserve them alive; and let thy widows trust in me."—Jeremiah xlix. 11. Brother Cranidge, who is a local preacher in the village, went to see him a little before he died, and said to him, "Is all right?" he replied, "All is right. Praise God! He will not leave me now; He is present to help and cheer in death."

the last words he was heard to say were, "I am going home. Glory to God!" Thus died George Carnley, in the thirty-eighth year of his age, and the fifteenth year of his membership in the Primitive Methodist Connexion.

SMITH BIRCH.

---

MEMOIR OF MR. EUSEBIUS BASSINGDALE.

EUSEBIUS BASSINGDALE was born at Hollym, in Yorkshire, in 1797, and departed this life at Haven Bank Mill, in the Coningsby Branch, Lincolnshire, on the 22nd day of June, 1862, aged sixty-four years.

It was well for Eusebius that he had a pious mother, for she took her son to the house of God when very young, and through her prayers and religious conversation, he was much alarmed at the thought of sin; and one day, when about eight years of age, he was very unhappy, and went into an out-building, and prayed long and loudly for the Lord to save his soul. His prayers were not in vain; the Lord heard his supplication, and made him happy. He rose from his knees, ran into the house, and told his mother that he was not afraid to die now, for the Lord Jesus had pardoned all his sins. How long he remained in this happy state of mind we know not, but we have often heard him speak of it as the beginning of his religious experience; but we are sorry to say that as he grew up to manhood he lost religion and became very wicked, and would at times make use of profane and disgusting language. But when he was twenty-nine years of age, it pleased God by His providence to bring him to see himself a sinner under the preaching of a Wesleyan minister. He received the forgiveness of all his sins, and united with the Wesleyans, but did not long remain with them. The lively singing and the fervent manner of praying of the Primitive Methodists just met his views of religious worship, and he united with us in the year 1826, and until death took him from us, he was a good and faithful servant of Christ and of the community of his choice.

He was married in 1822, and left Yorkshire and came into Lincolnshire in 1835. He found a small society worshipping in a cottage at Haven Bank. He at once set himself to work, and in a short time the society was more than doubled. A chapel was built at a place called Old Fen Lane, in 1838, and rebuilt in 1857. He assisted to raise a Sabbath-school, which has prospered. He was the only superintendent of the school for many years. He loved the children, and was by them much beloved. Brother John Pickwell, now a travelling preacher, was brought to God in the school through the labours of our departed friend.

Brother Bassingdale was a local preacher of about thirty-four years' standing, and was at the time of his death the oldest local preacher on the plan. His preaching was clear, lively, and powerful. He was well received, and many souls will have to bless God that ever he was raised up. He helped to mission and re-mission several places in his neighbourhood, became a trustee for several chapels, and was a liberal supporter of the cause of God in general. He was one of the best class-leaders that we ever became acquainted with. We have known him to speak personally to fifteen or twenty members in half an hour, get several of them to pray, call over his class-book, receive their contributions, and be out of the chapel within the hour. In family prayer he was often very mighty. It was seldom that business prevented him from reading the Scriptures to his family and his servants.

The loss of his first wife, nearly twenty years ago, was a sad stroke to him, but by the grace of God he was sustained. He remained a widower for several years, and was then married to her who now laments her loss. As a husband he was remarkably kind, as a parent indulgent, and as a Christian honest, and much respected by his neighbours, who called him the "honest miller."

For some time before his death it was evident to his friends that the Lord was taking down the earthly house of his tabernacle, but he was daily making preparation for "a house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens." On the day above-named he died in the full assurance of a glorious immortality. His last words were, "Glory be to God ! glory be to God !"

R. DUCKER.

---

---

D I V I N I T Y .

---

JESUS, THE RESURRECTION AND THE LIFE.

A SERMON BY THE REV. THOMAS SOUTHRON.

"Martha saith unto him, I know that he shall rise again in the resurrection at the last day. Jesus said unto her, I am the resurrection and the life: he that believeth in me, though he were dead, yet shall he live: And whosoever liveth and believeth in me shall never die. Believest thou this?"—John xi. 24-26.

THE text is suggestive of many topics. A dead brother, bereaved sisters, a disconsolate household, and all the mournful events associated with the ascendancy of the king of terrors. The solemnities of the funeral ; the grave lately closed on the mortal remains of the much loved one ; the numerous strange domestic arrangements which such events not unfrequently necessitate ; the dreary and bewildering reflections which such conditions will generate. Often the survivors will surmise that if other courses had been pursued, the dead would still have lived ; that the carelessness of one, or the inability of another, or the absence of some friend, one or all helped the swift and certain approaches of death ; that blame is assignable somewhere, when in reality fault is attributable nowhere, but he who has our times in his hand, has in the most benevolent manner controlled all things.

Lazarus is sick ; his sisters dread the issue. Jesus loves Lazarus : in very touching and pathetic style the sisters inform the Lord of the illness of their brother. "Lord, behold he whom thou lovest is sick." The Lord hastes not to the couch of his much-loved friend. Death strikes his last stroke—Lazarus departs this life. His remains are consigned to the grave, the house appointed for all living. The Prince of Life proceeds to the house of mourning ; Martha, aware of his approach, meets him. There is a strange conflict in her believing but bereaved heart : she says, "Lord, if thou hadst been here, my brother had not died. But I know that even now, whatsoever thou wilt ask of God, God will give it thee. Jesus saith unto her, Thy brother shall rise again. Martha saith unto him, I know that he shall rise again in the resurrection at the last day," &c.

I. THERE WILL BE A RESURRECTION. If men die, they shall live again : there shall be a resurrection both of the just and of the unjust. Death is the wages of sin : sin hath reigned unto death. Had there been no sin, for man there had been no death ; he dies because of transgression : his preparatory life terminates in deepest gloom. Man is accountable ; at death he meets God. Death is not the cessation of existence ; man outlives it. Death demolishes the now existing union between soul and body. Man is not all flesh, he is a spirit. The soul never expires ; time does not wither it ; mortality cannot crush it ; majestically it outbraves and defies the pressure of dissolution. Not one of its strong instinctive anticipations of perpetuated existence is falsified. Every human soul will exist for ever. The bygone generations still survive, in some other and distant department of being ; spirits of the just made perfect are present with the Lord. The souls of the wicked perish in the pit of perdition. Bodies return to the dust, but they shall rise again. All that are in the graves shall come forth. Death shall be swallowed up in victory. The Bible proclaims that the resurrection shall be universal ; it dwells largely on the resurrection condition of the redeemed, teaching, that although after death in spirit they are perfectly at rest, in the high enjoyment of Paradise, their constitution and condition are incomplete without the body. It favours not the mystic dream that a human soul is most free and honourable disembodied. It shows that full redemption consists in a renovated soul re-united to a raised and glorified body, revealing the resurrection as our hope. It tells not that the glory of man consists in the demolition of his material organization, but in the perpetual emancipation of his entire constitution from the domination and in-being of sin.

The resurrection is to assimilate the follower of the Son of God into the glorious likeness of his exalted Lord. He who, amid the struggles of this life, was the great pattern for universal man, is now the great representative Man in heaven, from whence also we look for him, and when he shall appear in glory, then shall we also appear in glory with him. We look for the Saviour, the Lord Jesus Christ, who shall change our vile body, that it may be fashioned like unto his glorious body. Shall the body of the resurrection be as was that of the Saviour on the Mount of Transfiguration? Was that a manifestation of a glorious appearance, somewhat analogous to that which now he presents in the midst of the throne in heaven? Did not the glorified Man of Nazareth unveil his splendour to the persecuting Saul of Tarsus, and was not the mid-day oriental sun eclipsed? Did not John see the glory of the transformed humanity of his exalted Master, when he received the revelations in Patmos? He saw the Lamb in the midst of the throne, the same Lamb, the man Christ Jesus, who on earth endured the cross. At the resurrection we shall be like him.

Shall not the glorified children of God, at the resurrection, be so essentially the same as to be recognizable in their distinct and perfect individuality? Did not the disciples on the mount know the transfigured Redeemer? They knew Elijah, also Moses: the former was there in the entirety of his constitution; the latter might be there in soul only (this we know not), but the disciples knew them. St. Paul dwells on the resurrection condition of the redeemed. "It is sown in corruption; it is raised in incorruption: it is sown in dishonour; it is raised in glory: it is sown in weakness; it is raised in power: it is sown a natural body; it is raised a spiritual body. For the trumpet shall sound, and the dead shall be raised incorruptible. For this corruptible must put on incorruption, and this mortal must put on immortality. So when this corruptible shall have put on incorruption, and this mortal shall have put on immortality, then shall be brought to pass the saying that is written, Death is swallowed up in victory."

Universal man shall live again; the wicked and the just. "All that are in the graves shall come forth:" the living shall be changed; quick as in the twinkling of an eye. the pulsations of immortality shall beat in their once death-doomed frame. All shall appear.

II. THERE WILL BE A LAST DAY. There was the first day, the beginning of the creation of God; the first day measured off the limitless scroll of eternity, by the natal diurnal revolution of our planet. Its last datal revolution will transpire. All had a beginning but God. It is said that scientific men, in their adventurous researches, soon reach that part of the earth's crust which tells that when it first was, man was not born and dying on it; for it embodies not aught to tell, that during the period of its formation it was, or could be, the home of man; in it human remains are not. They say that science preaches, that at a comparatively recent period, man began to be: revelation tells that God made man; he had a beginning. The manifest manufacture of the crust of the globe, it is said, is sufficient evidence that it has not eternally existed, it had a birth period ; God reveals that he created it.

Those men who have best understood the mechanism and movements of the heavens, have averred that that mechanism and those movements, all declare that they were originated during limited, yet unascertainable periods of duration. They did begin to be ; they have not rolled on afar, amid the wide expanse, from everlasting days. The Bible says, God made them ; they are the work of his fingers. "In the beginning he laid the foundations of the earth, and the heavens are the work of his hands."

God alone is from everlasting. He reigns in uncreated and infinite majesty : "Who may declare his generation ?" In thought the creation day of the first seraph may be reached ; but God was the Eternal One, ere that. On the strong, broad wings of intellect, the backward flight to the origination of the first atom may soon be swept ; God eternally existed then. There was that dateless, measureless, undefinable, sublime duration when God alone existed. He inhabiteth eternity : it is his home. He manifested himself ; there was the beginning. God created the heavens and the earth, some say the substance of the heavens and the earth. The darkness and solitude fled at his word. Light poured its now created effulgence over the wide-spreading realms of being. Suns assumed their central thrones ; planets danced in their resplendent spheres ; now seraphs worship, and strong pinioned angels fly ; oceans of life roll forth ; earth becomes a proper residence for probationary and immortal man. God creates man in his own image ; man sins ; he propagates his race ; the earth dances its diurnal and annual revolutions on ; millions of men are born, they sin, they die ; the grave with yawning jaws engulfs them all. This globe is hastening to its final hour ; its doom is coming, revealed, proclaimed, fixed, immutably sure ; the shadows flee away. The last day is coming. The last day. What scenes will it witness ; what emotions will then be experienced ; and what destinies will then be chronicled ! Here some of the bygone might be reviewed to lead to reflection respecting the coming. The past is admonitory, the future we must witness. Think, how strangely must our high father Adam have felt the last day, the last hour of his dwelling in Eden, just as God drove out the man !

Then think of the last day before the flood ; would not Noah be well nigh overwhelmed with thought ? The speedily approaching overwhelming waters, and the probabilities of the future ! Then the last day of his dwelling in the ark. Certainly it had not been strange, if as the waters left the earth, the fountains of the man's heart had been broken up. Then think of the last day that the Israelitish people were held in bondage in the land of Ham. The keeping of the Passover, the destruction of the first-born in every Egyptian family ; the speedy and miraculous departure, on an unknown journey, to another country, and a diverse condition.

The last day. What profound emotions were in the universe when the last hour of the Jewish economy struck, and the shadows of that Divinely drawn picture dispensation passed away amid the agonies and humiliation of the Prince of Life. But such reflections must end. The earth's last day is hastening. Will it come gradually, amid evident tokens of decay? Will one joint of its marvellous mechanism break, and then another and another of its distinctive attributes become extinct, and its last struggle and final throes take place amid imbecility and decrepitude? No! As it goes careering on, its doom will suddenly occur. This is no misguided conjecture, no random conclusion. You see the future! A lamp from the eternal throne comes down to earth. Light, issuing from the strong utterances of Him who liveth for ever, illumines the earth, penetrates the coming generations, irradiates the tomb, reveals the future, shows the destiny of our earth. The steadfast utterances of an infallible testimony fall on our ears. Man, prepare to meet thy God. "The day of the Lord will come as a thief in the night, in which the heavens shall pass away with a great noise, and the elements shall melt with fervent heat, the earth also and the works that are therein shall be burned up." He who will then be the supreme and adored Master of the position says, "Behold I come quickly." Behold I "come as a thief in the night."

The last day. It will be the resurrection and the judgment day. John saw it in vision; you must see it in reality. "And I saw a great white throne, and Him that sat on it, from whose face the earth and the heaven fled away; and there was found no place for them. And I saw the dead, small and great, stand before God; and the books were opened, and another book was opened, which is the Book of Life; and the dead were judged out of those things which were written in the books, according to their works. And the sea gave up the dead which were in it; and death and hell delivered up the dead which were in them; and they were judged every man according to his works."

The last day. Then shall be realized the final scenes, which long ago, He who spake as never man spake, revealed, and the inspired apostle chronicled. Matthew xxv.

III. THE AUTHOR OF THE TEXT IS THE AUTHOR OF THE RESURRECTION AND THE LIFE. Jesus saith, "I am the resurrection and the life." In all things he hath the pre-eminence. He is the first, and he is the last; he is, and was, and is to come. He is the light of the world, he is the light of heaven. He is the truth; the true God and eternal life; he is the mighty God; he and the Father are one; he is that Prophet; he is the Word of God; he is the servant of all; he is King of kings, and Lord of lords. He is the Brother of man; he is Jehovah's fellow; he is the Great High Priest of our profession. He was dead, and is alive, and liveth for evermore. He is now in the presence of God. We have an advocate with the Father. He is head over all things for his church. He has the keys of death and hell, the unseen state. All power is given to him in heaven and in earth.

He is the Life. It is in himself, not derived; in all its supreme and measureless plenitude it is in him. It is in him, not originated in and dependent on some other source bestowing it on him. It is in himself, the centre and fountain of life. It is in him, not mutable, but the same yesterday, to-day, and for ever. He is the life of heaven, of all things. Every living thing derived its life from him. He came to earth in human form that we might have life, and have it more abundantly. The life was manifested in this the dread domain of death. He gave his life for the life of the world. He that hath the Son hath life. Although sin hath reigned unto death, even so doth grace reign through righteousness unto eternal life, by Jesus Christ our Lord. He is the resurrection and the life. Jesus saith, "I am the resurrection."

First. He reveals the resurrection; he makes it known. It is his doctrine, taught only in the Bible, which is the word of Christ. He is the grand medium of Divine revelation. His Spirit was in the ancient prophets. The revelation and hope of the resurrection are of Divine origination. The dead shall live. God teaches this. The knowledge of this is not the product of man's unaided capacity. The thought was too bold for his soaring intellect. Imagination's broadest wing and strongest pinion never wafted over it. Heathen, philosophic, and poetic men at Corinth, Athens, and Rome were equally ignorant of it. No marvel that the men of Athens mocked when they first heard of it. Was not their reception of the apostolic utterances respecting it, just such as we might bestow on it, were it now first sounding in our ears? There were distinct intimations of it, in patriarchal and prophetic times. There is that remarkable passage in the 19th chapter of Job. "For I know that my Redeemer liveth; and that he shall stand at the latter day on the earth; and though after my skin, worms destroy this body, yet in my flesh I shall see God: whom I shall see for myself, and mine eyes shall behold and not another; though my reins be consumed within me."

Various renderings of this famous passage may be found in the seventh volume of the Congregational Lectures: Appendix K. It is very obvious, from those various renderings, that the English translation contains the import of the original, and that the doctrine of the resurrection, by the Living One, is not very obscurely taught in it.

Does it not show that the patriarch believed in and proclaimed the resurrection? Did he not expect the living and then existing vindicator or Redeemer! Does he not declare that although corruption might master him, that his material nature must rise again ; that in his flesh he should see God ?

By many good interpreters the Psalmist is understood to speak of the resurrection and its joys, when he says, "I shall be satisfied when I awake up in thy likeness." Most assuredly he was acquainted with it when he said, Neither wilt thou "suffer thine Holy One to see corruption."

Solomon, in not equivocal, but distinct style, tells of the future judgment, and very probably assumes the reality of the resurrection.

Isaiah lucidly states it : "he will swallow up death in victory."

Ezekiel seems to take it for granted as well understood by the Israelitish people in his time, and makes it a figure of their restoration from captivity.

Daniel avers it. "And many of them that sleep in the dust of the earth shall awake, some to everlasting life, and some to shame and everlasting contempt."

Through Hosea, the Redeemer explicitly states it : "I will ransom them from the power of the grave ; I will redeem them from death : O death ! I will be thy plagues ; O grave ! I will be thy destruction."

When Jesus lived on earth, in many ways he revealed the resurrection. "I will," says he, "raise him up at the last day. All that are in the graves shall hear the voice of the Son of Man and come forth."

The apostles made it one grand and principal part of their preaching. They preached Jesus and the resurrection. They made it their hope. They rejoiced in prospect of it. They laboured to attain to it. They pressed on to it. They looked for it. And Jesus Christ hath abolished, or counterworked death, and brought life and immortality to light. He is the resurrection.

Second. He is the first-fruits of the resurrection. "Now is Christ risen from the dead and become the first-fruits of them that slept." "Because he lives we shall live also." "As in Adam all die, even so in Christ shall all be made alive." He had power to lay down his life, and power to take it up again. The grave has been conquered, death has been mastered.

During the prophetic and antediluvian periods death was defeated, his territories were invaded, men escaped his power, or were delivered from his grasp ; the Lord of the prophets did the work. There was the woman's son, whom Elisha restored. At least two persons went from earth to heaven in the undissolved and perfected entirety of humanity. Enoch was translated that he should not see death ; Elijah in a chariot of fire, drawn by horses of fire, went up as by a whirlwind into heaven. Were these not intimations and foreshadowings of the resurrection ? Did these not point to another state of human existence ? Did not these events proclaim the existence of a realm of life, beyond the domains of corruption, in which human bodies, as well as souls, may live ? that probably the dead might yet again live ?

The miracles of Jesus Christ illustrate and prove it. Once he entered the abode of a weeping family where death dominated. A young damsel was dead ; they all wept and bewailed her. Him they laughed to scorn when he said, she did but sleep. "He took her by the hand and said, Damsel, I say unto thee, arise ! And she that was dead sat up." He is the resurrection. He restored the young man of Nain to his weeping, widowed mother.

Of Lazarus, his sister said to Jesus, "Lord, by this time he stinketh;" but Jesus commanded, and Lazarus was restored to life.

He is the resurrection. He himself rose from the dead. "It is Christ that died, yea rather, that is risen again." He gave his life for the life of the world ; by the grace of God he tasted death for every man. "He paid the rigid satisfaction, death for death." He had power to lay down his life, and power to take it again : he laid it down voluntarily, he took it again triumphantly. God raised him from the dead. He dieth no more ; death hath no more dominion over him. He ever liveth ; through him we shall live also. He lives in heaven ; through him the living and Divine Spirit comes down to earth. It is the Spirit that quickeneth. By his agency myriads of now existing men know Jesus and the power of his resurrection. Now they are quickened together with Christ ; they are exalted together with him ; they live in him. Each can say, "I live, yet not I, but Christ which liveth in me." They are risen and living witnesses of the resurrection ; they are blessed and holy now. To such death hath lost its sting. Now they rejoice in hope of the universal resurrection. He in whom they now live is the beginning of it, the earnest of it ; the first-fruits of the last glorious harvest. As such he now appears in heaven.

Thirdly. He will accomplish the resurrection. "Thy brother shall rise again. I am the resurrection. I will raise him up at the last day." According to the working, whereby he is able to subdue all things to himself. He has declared it, and he will complete it. He has the right to do it ; he is Lord of all. He has the might to do it ; all power is given to him ; he is the Almighty. Let it not be thought a thing incredible that he shall raise the dead ; let him speak, and it shall be done ; as he commands, it will stand fast. The dark reign of worms and corruption will become as a tale of yesterday. Every vestige of the ascendancy of death over humanity shall be swept away ; the resurrection shall be completed.

Fourthly. He who shall complete the resurrection will give his own people eternal life. They shall live together with him. He that liveth and believeth in him never dies eternally ; to die is gain. They who keep his sayings never see death. "Mark the perfect man and behold the upright, for the end of that man is peace." The righteous hath hope in his death ; he is more than conqueror through him that loved him. He leaves the earth, but lives in heaven ; he puts off this tabernacle, but enters the building of God, the house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens. Absent from the body he is present with the Lord. The Lord receives him. Where the Lord is, his servant is also. At the resurrection the spirits of the just made perfect appear with their triumphant Lord. Then he will give them life. He will bestow on them crowns of life; his own hand will perfect the work: he will nerve them with life, and clothe them with immortality. In the presence of a congregated universe, he will bid them welcome to indestructible thrones: theirs will be an abundant entrance administered into an everlasting kingdom; he will administer it. Life in all its perpetuity and perfection he will bestow. They shall eat of the fruit of the tree of life; and Christ will lead them to fountains of living water. Jesus will introduce them to the fellowship of the loftiest of created living beings; he will present them before the presence of his Father's glory, with exceeding joy. In the presence of God there is fulness of joy; at his right hand there are pleasures for evermore; there is no death. Life is the portion of all—life perfect and perpetual.

Lastly. Only the believer in the Son of God hath everlasting life. The resurrection is universal; but only the redeemed are triumphant over death. Jesus saith, "Believest thou this?" He that believeth on him is not condemned, but he that believeth not is condemned already; he that hath the Son hath life—he is the Fountain of life; to live men must come to him. He is the Light of life; to live men must look to him. He came that we might have life; but to obtain it we must trust in him. He loved us, and came that we might have life, and have it more abundantly; but to share in its plenitude we must love him. He is the resurrection; but to attain to it we must be quickened together with him now. If any man has not the Spirit of Christ, he is none of his. Believest thou this? Man is dead till he believeth this; dead till he comes to Jesus. Dead, he knows not God; dead, he has not the favour of God; dead, he loves not, neither can he enjoy God. If never quickened, he must endure the bitter pains of death eternal. "The wages of sin is death, but the gift of God is eternal life through Jesus Christ our Lord." Believe this, and life is yours. "With the heart man believeth unto righteousness." Believe this, and you shall live; live, triumphant on earth amid its weakness and its conflicts; live, more than conqueror over death, amid its agonies; live, exultant at the resurrection day, amid its high solemnities; live, in futurity, amid its undefinable and unending joys, in the perfect and indestructible dwelling-place of God.

---

WORKS OF CREATION.

THE SEA AND ITS PERILS.

With Brief Sketches of some of our Filey Fishermen who have perished therein.—By the REV. C. KENDALL.

"How humbling to one with a heart and a soul,
To look on thy greatness and list to its roll;
To think how that heart in cold ashes shall be,
While the voice of eternity rises from thee!
But when thy deep surges no longer shall roll,
And the firmament's length is drawn back like a scroll
Then—then shall the spirit that sighs by thee now
Be more mighty, more lasting, more chainless than thou."

J. A. SHEA.

THE sea has been an object of great interest to reflective persons in every age. The Bible plainly shows that God's inspired servants did not overlook its excellences and peculiarities. When a thoughtful and pious person stands on the ocean's shore for the first time, what strong and varied emotions are awakened in his breast, emotions which he can scarcely define or control. The sea contrasts in a striking manner with the earth and its products. As we travel on land there is generally produced on our minds an impression of waste and decay. The golden grain and odorous meadows are soon cut down and gathered. The oak in its great strength, and the elm and the ash in their green and abundant dress, soon become naked, and present a dead unattractive appearance. The smiling and lovely flowers share the same lot. Even the strong building of brick or stone is worn by the action of rain, wind, or frost, and grows old with years and hastens to decay. Wear and waste are everywhere apparent; "passing away" is plainly written on the objects which are earthly. It is different with "the many sounding" sea: it affords a faint picture of immortality. Many ages her voice has been heard and it is still as loud and as distinct as ever; her action has been continued for thousands of years, and it is still as vigorous as ever; her productions have been numerous for a very lengthened period, and they are obtained more numerous than ever. And what hand has been put forth to repair the waste of the sea, or prevent its barrenness? In this we think we see some intimation of that indestructibleness which will mark man's future existence. The ocean, as the scene of contemplation, is fitted to remind us of eternity with all its solemn interests. How much she swallows up, and refuses to resign it again, and will not do so till the judgment day. The sea is interesting from being the home of many thousands who do business on its waters, who see it in the loveliness of a calm, and in all the sublimity of a storm, where many suffer much hardship, and others sink into its deep caverns, unvisited in death by any friendly voice. As the domicile of multitudes of loved ones, the sea cannot fail to awaken thrilling interest in the hearts of many.

"The 'whelming wave has stopped their breath,
And quenched the flame which life had fed,
They struggled with the arm of death,
Then, wearied, sought their coral bed!"

"Ocean! when I thy rushing flood survey,
 I'm lost in wild amaze, and then I view,
 One of the greatest master-works of nature.
 A liquid world thou art, august and deep,
 In whose conflicting billows oft is seen,
 Thy Author's wondrous powers, when the surge
 Boiling with rage, makes sport with lives of men,
 Tossing their frail ships upon watery mountains,
 Or else depressing them into the abyss
 Of horror and of night!"

The sea has many properties which deserve attention. Some of the most remarkable we will briefly point out. Among these we cannot well overlook its expansiveness. David called it the great and wide sea, and some suppose that he was only acquainted with the Mediterranean. The sea is much larger than the dry land, indeed nearly three-fourths of the globe are covered with water. The sea is said to comprehend an extent of one hundred and forty-eight millions of square miles. As to its depth, little is known positively; the deepest sounding that has been taken is said to be less than two miles. As we leave the shore the waters gradually increase in depth, and the bottom thereof, probably, resembles the surface of the land, consisting of hills, and valleys, and caverns. How remarkable to us would be a view of the ocean's bed with all its variety of appearance, and all its busy and varied occupants. In some places the sea is probably four or five miles deep, but in attempting an estimate of its waters a medium depth must be supposed: if we suppose it to average one mile in depth—and this is a low estimate—this would give us an extraordinary quantity of water, a quantity which if estimated by tons (and a ton, or 160 stones weight, is about a load for one horse) it is said would give about six hundred thousand billions of tons. This would cover the whole globe, if the sea be of the same form as the earth's surface, to the depth of seven-tenths of a mile, or 3,700 feet. This is fitted to teach us that the Almighty could soon drown the world by breaking up the fountains of the deep, and opening the windows of heaven. Were he to remove the barrier which now confines these mighty waters within their prescribed limits, waste and destruction would overflow the world.

The saline properties of the sea are an interesting fact. Indeed, this has engaged the attention, and exercised the skill of the learned in almost every age, nor are they yet fully decided as to its cause. It completely baffles scientific investigation, for if we suppose the salt to be derived from immense beds of fossil or rock-salt at the bottom of the ocean, or to be carried down by springs or rivers from the land, the water ought to be continually becoming saltier, which is contrary to observation. It is, however, universally admitted to be an evidence of the wisdom and goodness of God, as it is one cause of the sea retaining its purity and health-creating properties. It is said that between two and three per cent. of sea water consists of salt. If this could be extracted from the sea it would be found to be an enormous quantity—a quantity which would be sufficient to cover the whole of Europe to a height equal to Mont Blanc. The saltiness of sea water serves several useful purposes; persons who are immersed in it do not take cold so readily as from fresh water; besides having from this cause, what is called a greater gravity, it is capable of carrying much heavier burdens than it otherwise could, and it can better bear up the poor sailor and fisherman when thrown on its liquid surface. Could we fully understand the usefulness of this property of the sea we should admire the wisdom of Him who created it.

The motions of the sea claim a passing remark.—It is said to have three motions. The first is that undulation which is produced by the wind and is confined to the surface. Oil poured on the water will destroy this motion as far as the oil extends. The second motion is the tendency which the waters have toward the West, which is greater at the equator than at the poles; but the most wonderful motion of the sea is the flowing of the tide every twelve and a-half hours; this is truly a wonder of the deep, and it is said the flow occurs on the opposite side of the globe at the same time that it does with us. How strange to see the sea rise upon the land and run up the rivers many miles. Its flowing is said to be owing to the attractive influence of the moon, and to a small extent, of the sun. See how the sea is governed by heaven. And no human power can forbid or prevent the flowing of the water. Our young readers will have heard of the ancient monarch Canute, who being flattered by his subjects, by way of reproof ordered them to place him in a chair on the sea-shore as the tide was advancing, and then desired them to ask him to command the advancing waters to stop. This was done, and they quickly saw that the word of a king could not interfere with the will of God.* The motion of the sea plainly shows God's goodness. The waters by this are kept from stagnation, and commerce is also promoted. Let the floods clap their hands and shout, they are governed by a Divine hand.

The inhabitants of the sea.—The earth is vocal with the voices and the echoes of the voices of its endlessly varied and manifold population, including living creatures of every size, form, and colour, from the tiniest insect to the hugest elephant. "The earth is full of thy riches." Nor is the sea less so; it teems with life and activity. Could we look upon the inhabitants of the deep with the unassisted eye, from the animalcule to the huge leviathan that God has made to play therein, a feeling of astonishment would doubtless seize our minds. What extraordinary variety—their structure and appearance are wonderful. Some are designed for food, some for ornament, and others for the various purposes of civilized life. They are furnished with an apparatus whereby they can sink to the bottom or rise to the top, or poise themselves in mid-water. They breathe and feed, and multiply in a very different manner from the living creatures on land. But their number is probably the most interesting fact connected with them. The produce of one codfish in a single year is said to be nearer four millions than three; and the common herring abounds by hundreds of millions. In some seasons of the year a pin's point can hardly be put down on the rocks favourable to production without touching some shell, or other living creature in a rudimental state; every bit of sea-weed has its numerous colonies all in progress towards maturity, and even when the water is empty to the naked eye, it presents a very different appearance to the microscope. These are the creatures of God's power. Let the heavens and the earth praise him, and every thing that moveth therein. "Speak unto the earth and it shall teach thee, the fishes of the sea" (mute as they are) "shall declare unto thee. Who knoweth not that the hand of the Lord hath wrought this?"—Job. xii. 8, 9.

* This anecdote is suggestive of wholesome instruction.

“As the earth,
So teem'st thou, too, with life ; thou hast thy inmates,
That air, heat, light, and various blessings know,
By the same power dispens'd,—some so minute,
The microscope will scarce their form describe,
And some unwieldier than the elephant ;
Oh ! wondrous cause, and wonderful effect !”

The uses of the sea.—These are many ; to a few we will briefly refer. The sea supplies the land with water through rain and vapour. As the land is only equal to a little more than one-fourth of the surface of the water, the former is cooled and watered by the latter. The water leaves the sea by evaporation caused by wind and the sun, especially the latter. And what is remarkable, though the sea is so salt, the salt is left in the sea, and the water descends sweet and wholesome. Fish taken from the sea are fresh. A pedant at a dinner party said to the guests, “Ask me a question and I will engage to answer it.” One who was eating fish remarked, “This fish is from salt water, and yet it is fresh, explain this.” The man was confounded.

What an amount of employment is found on the sea ! Some millions of sailors and fishermen are employed on the ocean, and these find sustenance for millions more. And who can tell the use of the sea in the rich and abundant supply it yields to meet the wants of men ! Besides the sea is useful as a medium of intercourse with other lands. Indeed the ocean is the highway of the world. Man has but to build his vessel of the proper size and strength, and water and wind will bear him to any part of the navigable globe. Through this medium we know more of distant nations than we should have done if we had been separated the same distance from them by land. The sea is not only useful as a medium of intercourse and civilization, but also of evangelization. Many a ship has been freighted with the Christian missionary, and has borne him away to the land of heathen darkness and cruelty ; those distant people who have been brought up in the darkness and wickedness of idol worship, have to some extent already heard of Jesus as the world's Redeemer ; some who were once vile and degraded, are now enlightened and converted through faith in Him who came to seek and save the lost. But the uses of the sea cannot be told. We gaze on the waters and adore the wisdom and power of Him who holds them in his hand, and has said to the mountain billows, “Hitherto shalt thou come and no further, and here shall thy proud waves be stayed.”

“Thou hast ever been the sure conductor
Of commerce ; the vast boundary, true definer
Of kingdoms and of empire, the enricher
Of every soil : conveyer for the whole ;
And kind dispenser of their differing products.
Thy province 'tis t' associate in one,
The manifold nations of the peopled world,
Their interests uniting.”

(To be continued.)

FOR PREACHERS AND CLASS-LEADERS.

A MODEL MINISTER OF CHRIST.

At the dinner-table of the celebrated Dr. Hamilton, of London, a few weeks since, we were shown a dozen autograph letters of Robert Murray McCheyne.

The chirography was beautiful ; and the spirit was heavenly. No autographs that we saw in the British Museum—no relics from the hand of Luther, Cromwell, and Milton—possessed such moral fragrance to us as those neat, round, fair, spiritual love-notes.

For, to our mind, this young apostle of Dundee was the model minister of our generation. Since the hour when the beloved disciple went up to lay his head on the bosom of his Lord, the church has beheld no lovelier spirit. We know not where such another living epistle can be found, as the record of this young saint's pilgrimage. Were we rich enough to do so, we would order it to be placed on the study-table of every candidate for the ministry in the land. Next to John Bunyan's immortal allegory, it is the best-thumbed volume in our library.

McCheyne's life is a perpetual inspiration. Brainerd's biography saddens us by its pervading tone of melancholy. Henry Martyn's and Summerfield's are all too brief—glorious sun-bursts over the eastern hills, to be snatched beneath the death-cloud for ever. To spend an hour with Payson is almost like sitting with Paul in the hired house at Rome ; but his seraphic piety was mournfully tinged by his morbid temperament. To McCheyne was vouchsafed their heavenly spirit, without their trial to shade its lightsome lustre. McCheyne's piety was eminently healthy and cheerful. He dwelt, during the nine years of his earthly ministry, far away from the damps that arise about Doubting Castle, and hard by Beulah, were the sunlight ever falls. His biography has a rare power to sober us when tempted to levity, and to cheer us when tempted to despondency.

Robert Murray McCheyne—as many of my readers already know—was a young preacher of the Scottish National Church, who was called away to his crown just before the memorable disruption in 1843. He entered the vineyard at twenty-one. After nine years of unceasing, earnest, happy labour, he was laid, amid weeping thousands, in a new tomb, opened for him under the shadow of his own church—venerable St. Peter's, of Dundee. In that church he had watched and prayed over three thousand souls. Among them he had sown the precious seed, and every returning communion season witnessed some sheaves brought in with the joys of harvest. To pray and to search the Word of God—to carry the hidden fire from house to house—to prepare the beaten oil for the sanctuary—to plead with dying men, and to allure to brighter worlds by the joyous up-tread of his own heavenward march—these formed the varied, but yet unchanged employment of his fervid spirit.

Love of Jesus was his master-passion. His Saviour's work was his work ; he was continually about it. "This one thing," he did. He never wearied and never rested. Every day he gave to Christ. Dr. Hamilton told us that he used to seal his letters with a sun going down behind the mountains, and the motto over it, "The night cometh." For souls, he watched as the fisherman's wife trims her lamp in the window, and watches for the storm-tossed and belated ones in the offing. He hoisted the light of Calvary ; and like our Harlem Page, it was his life's joy to welcome the returning wanderers into the covert from the tempest.

In prayer he must have been a mighty and prevailing wrestler. Instead of a penance it was a delight. He gave himself to prayer ; and the secret of that blooming, vigorous piety, whose leaf never withered, is to be found in the perpetual baptisms which his soul received at the mercy-seat. He prayed before he sat down to his studies—before he went out to visit the sick—before he entered his pulpit. He rose from his bed to plead for his people. He had a scheme of prayer, and marked the names of missionaries on the map that he might pray for them in course and by name ! His Bible he read with the eager avidity of one who is delving in a gold mine, with the shining ore laid bare at every stroke of the mattock. When you write, said he to a friend, tell me the meaning of Scripture. One gem from that ocean is worth all the pebbles of earthly streams. Would that his life might go into every young preacher's study and heart ; for the lack of more than one popular pulpit is the lamentable lack of the Bible.

When talking with some of his parishioners, we were not surprised to learn that the striking peculiarity of his preaching was persuasive tenderness. His sermons were artless spillings of the heart. He overflowed into his discourses. Once, when a brother minister told him that he had been preaching from that fearful passage, "the wicked shall be turned into hell," he inquired with some emotion, "Were you able to preach it with tenderness?" His few printed sermons are models of affectionate entreaty. To those young students who fry the unction out of first sermons by long labour over the lamp, we can recommend no happier specimens of simple, winning, earnest preaching.

It is now nineteen years since McCheyne fell asleep in Jesus. His fatal sickness was brought on by visiting the victims of a prevailing epidemic. He lingered for many days, and the closing hours of his life were overshadowed by the delirium of the fever. In his rational moments he listened to the reading of the word; and even the wanderings of his mind were broken by occasional ejaculations of prayer for his flock. "O God! my people! my people! this whole place!" On the morning of the 25th of March, 1843, he sank gently into a sleep, which deepened and deepened, until his spirit passed without a groan to the presence of his Saviour.

The tidings of his death fell cold on many a heart, and nearly every eye in his parish was red with weeping. The road was thronged by the thousands who gathered to his burial. They laid him in his narrow bed amid sobs and gushing tears, and even to this day his smitten flock often speak his name with moistened eye, and lips trembling with emotion. Although he died a few weeks before her exodus from the old Establishment, the Free Church of Scotland numbers him among her dearest sons, and writes his name on the same lofty scroll of her founders with the names of Chalmers, Cunningham, and Hugh Miller.

"O star, untimely set!

Why should we weep for thee?

Thy bright and dewy coronet

Is rising o'er the sea."

From the Christian Journal.

FOR THE FAMILY.

AN IMPRESSIVE QUESTION.

"MOTHER, do you love the good Lord?" said little Mary, as she rose from her knees, after repeating her evening prayer, with her head resting on her mother's lap.

Mrs. Green gave no reply to the question, but made a sign to her daughter to get into her bed. The little girl looked astonished, and said, in a timid voice, "Have I asked an improper question?"

"No," whispered the mother. She kissed her child, and left the chamber.

"Why did she not answer me, if the question was not an improper one?" thought little Mary. She continued to think on the subject till she fell asleep.

It was Mrs. Green's habit to encourage her child to ask questions—that is, questions relating to proper subjects. She was patient in hearing and in answering her questions, and by that means greatly strengthened the bonds of affection between them. No woman was more esteemed by her acquaintances than was Mrs. Green. She was a most obliging neighbour, an affectionate friend, a model housekeeper, and a most careful mother. No child in the village school was so habitually neat and well-beloved as her Mary. She carefully instructed her in the elements of religious truth, and caused her, morning and evening, to bend the knee in prayer. But she was not a Christian. With all her excellences, she had not "the pearl of great price." With a full knowledge of her duty, with a tender heart, and an active conscience, she had refused to come to Christ. In the performance of all the duties of morality, she was exact and conscientious; but the duties of repentance and faith she had neglected. She had an unwavering belief in the truth of religion, and a most profound conviction of its importance. From her earliest years, it was her purpose to become a Christian. When a child, she was sure she would become a Christian before she became a woman; when a maiden, before she married; when she was married, before her children should become old enough to distinguish between right and wrong. Now her child was eleven years old, and she was still a stranger to religion.

"Are you not well?" said his husband, as she seated herself by his side, and preserved an unwonted silence.

"I do not feel very well; I believe I will go to bed," said she, rising and going to her room to conceal her tears. The anxious husband followed her, and found her weeping bitterly.

"My dear wife, what is the matter?"

"Nothing that you can help," striving to dry her tears.

"Something distresses you greatly," said he, with much concern.

"You cannot help me. Leave me alone. I shall be better soon. I am only nervous."

Mr. Green was accustomed to pay the strictest attention to his wife's requests. His disposition was affectionate and indulgent, and he had the utmost confidence in her discretion. He left her alone, and passed a very uncomfortable evening over his newspaper, which he, for the first time, discovered was falling off in interest.

When he retired for the night, his wife appeared to be in a profound sleep. Taking great care to avoid disturbing her, he composed himself to slumber, and soon forgot his cares in the sweet sleep which God so generally bestows as the reward of honest industry.

"How are you this morning, my dear?" said he, as they rose with the dawn, to engage in the labours of the day.

"I am very well," said she, with her usual smile. All traces of sadness had disappeared, and she went through the duties of the day with her usual alacrity and cheerfulness. When night came, she felt a little uncomfortable as she went to put Mary to bed. "Come, my dear, undress yourself quickly, and say your prayers, and get into bed. Mother has a great deal of mending to do this evening."

Her heart smote her as she bade her daughter good night. She felt that she had departed from her usual mode of dealing with her child. She had deceived her. It was true that she intended employing the evening in mending, and that she had a great deal to do; but it was also true that she spoke as she did to her daughter, in order to prevent her from repeating the question which had given her so much disturbance the night before. She spent some little time in her own room, that she might regain her composure before she appeared in the presence of her husband. When she seated herself by her work-table, she dreaded his inquiring eye, and to divert it, requested him to read aloud, because she wished to divert his attention from herself.

It happened that the paper contained a very humorous article. Its effect was to banish all sadness from her mind. When the paper had been read, she engaged in conversation with her usual sprightly and animated manner. Her husband was pleased to observe that no marks of the nervousness of the preceding evening were apparent.

From that time, Mrs. Green pursued the even tenor of her way without nervousness. Little Mary was shrewd enough to know that the question she had asked was unpleasant to her mother. She did not repeat it, nor did she ask similar ones. She became reserved in her remarks connected with the subject of religion. Her mother observed it, and in her heart rejoiced at it, though she probably would have been shocked to confess that fact, even to herself. But though Mary was more silent, she was not less thoughtful. She observed her mother's habits, and concluded she did not practise the devotions she enjoined on her child. She saw that her mother did not remain at the communion service; she came to the conclusion that she did not love the good Lord. The conclusion made her young heart sad; still it was one which she could not avoid.

Two years passed away, and little Mary lay on a sick bed. From her first attack, Mrs. Green, though not easily alarmed, felt a presentiment of an impending calamity. Contrary to her usual custom, she had the physician called, and pressed him to repeat his call at an early hour, with an earnestness that brought a smile to his lips—a smile at the unnecessary anxiety of the fond mother.

"How is Mary?" said Mr. Green, as he came from his day's labour.

"The physician says she has nothing but a bad cold, which she will get over in a day or two; but I am afraid he judges too favourably in her case."

"Does she appear to be worse?"

"No, I don't know that she does. She has had her playthings out this afternoon. She is lying down now. Will you go and see her?"

They went to Mary's room. The father smiled as he saw the play-house arranged in the corner of the room. "How do you feel, daughter?" said he.

"Pretty well, thank you, sir."

"What a pretty play-house you have," said he, taking up a sofa, and examining it.

"Won't you please to put it where you took it from, when you have done with it?" said Mary. "I want my things to be left just as they are till I get well, if they are not in mother's way."

"They are not in my way at all. They shall not be disturbed," said her mother.

"Please to give me some water, mother."

The water was furnished, and it was received with an eagerness indicating fever. "My throat is sore," said she, as she laid her head on the pillow, after having taken the water.

"Come to supper, father," said Mrs. Green, in a tone that startled Mr. Green. "I will come and sit with you, my dear, as soon as I have given father his supper."

"Husband," said she, as soon as they were out of the child's hearing, "that child has got the scarlet fever. Go as quick as you can for Dr. M——."

"When did he say he would call again?"

"He said he might look in this evening, but probably not till morning. Go, I entreat you, and ask him to come immediately, and if he is not at home, ask Dr. H—— to come."

Mr. Green saw no cause for alarm, yet he sympathized with his wife's excitement, knowing her to be by no means given to unreasonable fears.

The physician came, and confessed that the child had symptoms of the scarlet fever. Still he assured the parents there was no danger. He had had several cases which had readily yielded to his treatment. He gave her medicines, and bade her parents go to bed, assuring them that Mary would undoubtedly sleep through the night as usual.

Mrs. Green did not follow the advice of the physician. She did not leave the bedside of her child for a moment during the whole night. It is true that Mary slept, but it was a restless, fevered sleep. Her pulse became more rapid, and her cheek grew red, the difficulty in swallowing much greater. The fever was evidently making rapid progress. At the earliest dawn, Mrs. G. awoke her husband, and despatched him to the doctor, with an account of the manner in which his patient had passed the night. The kind-hearted man returned with the father, and could not refrain from manifesting some uneasiness at the condition in which he found his little charge.

"She is worse," said he, "than I expected to find her; but still I have seen many recover who had the disease much more severely than I think she will have it."

When he left the sick chamber, Mrs. Green followed him. "Doctor," said she, while the tear stood in her eye, and her voice quivered with emotion, "if anything can be done to save my child, do it, but I felt from the time she was first taken that she would never —."

"My dear madam, do not give way to unreasonable fears; it is natural that you should feel anxious, but you must not entertain fears without reason."

"I have never felt so before. Come in again in a few hours, and call often during the day. If my fears are unreasonable, they are still real, and cannot be driven away."

Sympathizing with the devoted mother, Dr. M—— called again, and brought another practitioner with him. In the opinion of both the disease had now assumed a serious type. From that hour, Dr. M—— spent as large a portion of his time by the child's bedside, as his duties to his other patients would allow. Despite of all his skill she grew worse, and at the end of three days the mother's worst fears were realized—her only child was no more.

During Mary's illness no word was spoken to her respecting that world which she was so soon to enter. The physician was not a religious man, and the pastor was absent on a visit to his dying mother. He returned just in time to perform the funeral solemnities.

The mother bore her loss in silence, but her silence resembled that of despair. No tear was on her cheek as she stood by her husband's side, and saw the grave filled up. It was in vain that he attempted to console her, and to engage her in conversation. It was not till the third day after the funeral that her tongue was loosed. Then she confessed to her pastor her unfaithfulness to the soul of her child, and her solemn conviction that her own day of grace was passed. She detailed the history given above—Mary's question, and its impression upon her heart and conscience. "Then was the time," said she, "when I might have been saved. I felt then that I might have mercy if I asked for it. But I was ashamed to have my child and my husband know that I was anxious about my soul; I deceived them both, and my convictions left me."

Under the judicious guidance of the faithful pastor, the mourner was at length led to Christ. Though converted at last by his unbounding grace, she always believed that she was near the kingdom of God when her feelings were so deeply affected by the question, "Do you love the good Lord?" She always believed that if she had confessed to her husband the cause of her distress at that time, grace would have been given to seek and find the Saviour. And in that conviction, she never failed to ask, with bitter feelings of regret, "If I had confessed my sins and sought the Saviour then, what might have been the influence of my course on my child and my husband?"

Mary's playthings remained for years undisturbed. Her room was reserved as her mother's place of prayer. Daily, and many times in the day, she used to kneel down and pray by the affecting mementoes of her departed daughter.

Z. Z.

POETRY.

THE FLIGHT OF YEARS.

THE flight of years, how soft, how fleet—
How like a winged angel's feet
Departing from the starry throne,
On messages of love unknown.

A setting sun, a gleaming sail,
Driving before the western gale;
Then last where ocean's venge appears,
Are shadows of the flight of years.

The flight of years—ah! who can tell
Where the departed moments dwell?
Lost in what deep and boundless sea?
Sunk in what wide eternity?
For ever past—for ever gone—
No trace to fix a thought upon,
But mirth and grief, and hopes, and fears
Are swallow'd in the flight of years.

The flight of years—how many an eye
Weeps at the thought of years gone by,
Looks back upon the sad array,
The restless night—the anxious day;
Sees the lov'd form so pale, so chill,
And mourns its broken idol still;
While all below that soothes or cheers,
Seems buried in the flight of years.

The flight of years it bears along.
The mighty purpose of the strong,
Youth's thousand fond imaginings,
And manhood's ardent spiritings.
The sigh of love, the sigh of care,
The sad forebodings of despair—
And pride's approach, and slander's sneers
Sink in the rapid flight of years.

The flight of years 'twill soon be o'er,
When the last pilgrim treads the shore;
When darkness hoods across the sun,
And mercy's gracious work is done;
When heaven renewed and earth restored,
Shout at the presence of their Lord;
Disease, and death, and sin, and tears,
Shall perish with the "Flight of Years."
Thirsk. E. H.

THE SABBATH SCHOOL.

THE HISTORY AND INFLUENCE OF SUNDAY SCHOOLS IN ENGLAND.

A Paper read by Mr. Watson, at the General Sunday School Convention, September 1st, 1862.

(Concluded from Page 42.)

THE preceding illustrations of life and manners in the age immediately preceding the introduction of the Sabbath school system, are chiefly gathered from the concluding chapter of Lord Mahon's "History of England, from 1713 to 1783." His lordship had, in a previous chapter, given a narrative of those fearful events which may not unfairly be attributed to the debased intellectual, moral, and religious condition of the nation, when, in June, 1780, under the pretence of a regard to the Protestant religion, numerous Roman Catholic chapels, the residence of Sir George Savile, in Leicester Square, and of Lord Mansfield, in Bloomsbury Square, and the goal of Newgate, which had cost £140,000, were gutted and destroyed. For two whole days London was in the possession of the mob, and thirty-six fires could be seen blazing in various parts of it. Lord Mahon states that "throughout England the education of the labouring classes was most grievously neglected, the supineness of the clergy of that age being manifest on this point as on every other." He also quotes the testimony of Hannah More, who declares that "on first going to the village of Cheddar, near the cathedral city of Wells, we found more than 200 people in the parish, almost all very poor, no gentry, a dozen wealthy farmers, hard, brutal, and ignorant. . . . We saw but one Bible in all the parish, and that was used to prop a flower pot!"

The preceding review will excite thankfulness that the nation now presents so different a prospect to the observant eye, whether regarded intellectually, morally, or religiously. The question is, whether the change can be traced to those institutions, the extension and improvement of which it is the object of this Convention to promote. On this subject the testimony of Lord Mahon is very distinct, and we believe we cannot do better than fully quote him as an enlightened and impartial witness.

"Among the principal means which, under Providence, tended to a better spirit in the coming age, may be ranked the system of Sunday schools; and of these, the main praise belongs to Robert Raikes. There are, indeed, some previous claims alleged on behalf of other persons, especially Miss Hannah Ball, of High Wycombe, in 1769. But certainly, at least, the example did not spread at that time. The elder Mr. Raikes, being printer and proprietor of the Gloucester ter Journal, had been brought before the House of Commons, in 1729, for the offence, as it was then considered, of reporting their debates. His son, born in 1735, became in due time the successor to his business. Struck at the noise and riot of the poor boys in his native streets, Raikes, the younger, established the first of his Sunday schools in 1781. Thus, in one of his early letters, does he explain his views—further carried out in our own day by Lord Ashley's (now the Earl of Shaftesbury's) care :—"I argue, therefore, if you can loiter about without shoes and a ragged coat, you may as well come to school and learn what may tend to your good in that footing. All that I require are clean hands, clean face, and the hair combed. . . . I cannot express to you the pleasure I often receive in discovering genius and innate good dispositions among this little multitude. It is botanizing in human nature.' The benevolent exertions of Mr. Raikes were well seconded, and widely diffused. His schools received the early patronage and aid of several eminent prelates, especially Dr. Porteus, at that time Bishop of Chester. Adam Smith bore his testimony to them in these remarkable words :—"No plan has promised to effect a change of manners with equal ease and simplicity since the days of the apostles.' Thus it happened that schools on Mr. Raikes' plan soon started up in almost every county. In London, they owed their first secure establishment to the zeal of Mr. William Fox, a wholesale draper, assisted by Mr. Jonas Hanway, a gentleman who had first risen into notice by the publication, on a most ample scale, of his Journey to Persia in 1753—who since that time had been forward in all works of benevolence, as in the foundation of the Magdalen Charity in 1758, and who will be remembered as a philanthropist long after he is forgotten as a traveller."

It is unnecessary, and would therefore be a waste of time, to pursue further the history of Sabbath schools, which is so familiar to the members of the Convention. We cannot, however, refrain from quoting the words of the Rev. Dr. Kennedy, of New York, when addressing the State Convention of Sabbath school teachers at Newhaven, Connecticut. "Many years ago, in one of the older cities of England, two men might have been seen walking together, the one older than the other, and leaning on the arm of his younger friend. When they reached a certain place, the elder of the two said, 'Pause here,' and so saying, he uncovered his brow, closed his eyes, and stood for a moment in silent prayer. That place was the site of the first Sabbath school, and that elder man was Robert Raikes, its founder. He paused on the spot, and that silent prayer ascended to the ear of the crucified Christ, and the tears rolled down his cheeks as he said to his friend, 'This is the spot on which I stood when I saw the destitution of the children and the desecration of the Sabbath by the inhabitants of the town; and I asked, Can nothing be done? And a voice answered, Try: and I did try; and see what God hath wrought.'"

In order to do anything like justice to the inquiry, "What influence have Sabbath schools exerted upon England?" much more time would be required than the arrangements of this meeting leave at disposal. A contrast of England as she is, with what she was prior to the introduction of Sabbath schools, will show the vast improvement in her intellectual, moral, and religious condition; and the only question that can arise will be, to what extent that improvement is attributable to the introduction of Sabbath schools. Our universities are increased in number—their advantages are, to a considerable extent, thrown open to all classes of the community—their discipline is improved, and their honours can only be obtained as the result of examinations, which bring out evidence of careful study; while our nobility and legislators exhibit the influence which their superior education has had upon their minds by their readiness to assist the intellectual pursuits of those who are less favourably situated. We have passed through scenes of intense political excitement and of severe distress, but they have disturbed the public peace in the smallest possible degree, while the manner in which the present suffering among the manufacturers of cotton goods in Lancashire is borne, daily excites the astonishment and thankfulness of all. And what connexion have Sabbath schools with this! We answer, that to Sabbath schools is owing that increased attention to the general education of the people, which has ended in raising England from almost the lowest in the scale to but one step below the highest, there being now one in seven of her population in attendance at daily schools. The increase in the number of those able to read, "through the medium of Sabbath schools," as stated in one of the early addresses of the Religious Tract Society, led to the establishment of that great and remarkably useful institution, which has issued 950 millions of publications; while the want of Bibles for the Sabbath scholars of Wales, induced the formation of the British and Foreign Bible Society, which has circulated 70 millions of copies of the sacred volume in whole or in part. At the present time there are also published, mostly in London, 801 periodical publications, many of which have an enormous circulation throughout the country. We are now looking merely at the intellectual influence of this extension of knowledge, and in connection with it there has to be borne in mind the fact, that every Lord's day, and on many other occasions, there are nearly 300,000 teachers, of various grades of intellectual acquirements, in close intercourse with above 3,000,000 of the young people of our land. It is not surprising, under these circumstances, to find a great improvement in the intellectual character of our people, and that it has been found safe to extend largely political privileges.

Nor is the change less strikingly marked in the moral character of the nation. Look at the manners of our court, study the habits of our nobility and aristocracy, and what a striking contrast do they present to those of former days! And if we descend to the lower classes, where are the bull-baitings, the cock-fightings, and coarse and brutal practices of bygone years! If they occur, they are heard of with general surprise and disgust. A few years since, in a provincial town, some public event led to the appointment of a general holiday. Many entertainments were provided, and amongst others some of the old-fashioned vulgar sports were intended for the working classes. They, however, met, and passed resolutions, denouncing in strong terms the mistaken kindness of those who thus, under the idea of promoting the comfort of their fellow-countrymen, were offering an insult to their understandings by a supposition that such coarse amusements could be acceptable to them. There is, doubtless, much evil in this respect yet to be removed, but there is always a tendency to magnify present evils, and think lightly of present mercies. Each advocate for reformatory measures naturally draws a dark picture of the evil against which he is striving, and thus unintentionally produces an incorrect impression. We were struck some years since by the remark of an American friend who had been some time in London, that he had that day seen for the first time a drunken man, and it is certain that there is in this respect a great and increasing improvement in the habits of the nation; and we fear not to attribute the improvement of the morals of the people to those influences which have been directly and indirectly brought to bear upon them through the Sabbath schools of our land.

If there should be any disposed to think that we have attributed too much influence to Sabbath schools in connection with the intellectual and moral condition of England, we believe that even they will be ready to admit this influence to its full extent in relation to its religious condition. And what a delightful contrast do the present times present in this respect to those of former days! We see the clergy of the Church of England labouring diligently to provide for the religious instruction of the people, while the various bodies of Nonconformists are running a not unequal race. Some collisions are inevitable in such a race; but, on the whole, the result is good, for the religious instruction of the people is cared for to an extent which neither of these parties could alone have accomplished. It is well to remember the statement of Dr. Paley, an eminent dignitary of the English Church, on the subject of differences of religious opinion. He says, — "They promote discussion and knowledge. They help to keep up an attention to religious subjects, and a concern about them, which might be apt to die away in the calm and silence of universal agreement. I do not know that it is in any degree true that the influence of religion is the greatest where there are the fewest Dissenters." When we look at the number of buildings erected for public worship during the present century, the yearly increasing list of godly and studious ministers, the congregations of faithful men by whom those buildings are occupied, and where those ministers preach the Gospel, and in connection with which such a variety of Christian influences is being continually sent forth, our hearts cannot but be filled with gratitude and joy. Lord Mahon records that the Lord Lieutenant, and for very many former years the representative in Parliament of one of the midland shires, had told him that when he came of age there were only two landed gentlemen of his county who had family prayers; whilst, then, as he believed, there were scarcely two that had not. Nor can we forget that it was the Sabbath school which stirred up this concern for the religious condition of the people—that many of those congregations and places of religious worship have originated with the Sabbath school—that vast numbers of the ministers who there labour, as well as of the most successful missionaries who have gone forth amongst the heathen, have received their religious impressions, and acquired their aptitude for public instruction in these institutions—and finally, that an increasing conviction rests in the minds of thoughtful Christian men, that whatsoever influence the instruction of the day school may have on the intellectual and moral condition of the people, it is to our Sabbath schools we must look for that sound, enlarged, scriptural instruction which, while it strengthens the mind, enlarges the intellectual, and purifies the moral faculties and will, at the same time, renew and sanctify the soul, and prepare it for a land of purity and of never-ending happiness, where the great work of redemption by Jesus Christ, is completed, and God is all in all.

---

MISCELLANIES.

---

THE LIFE-BOAT.

THE "Robert and Margaret," commanded by Captain D—, had returned from St. Petersburg, and was freighted for Memel in Prussia. The crew who navigated the ship from Russia fully expected to sail with her, but the captain, a steady and God-fearing man, was dissatisfied with their conduct. He therefore drew up certain regulations, which he laid before the sailors, and informed them it was his wish that every man who sailed with him should abide by these rules, as a means for the promotion of piety and the glory of God. The crew, being ungodly men, thought otherwise, and resolved not to sail with him. An opening was thus made for some of the pious seamen who had lent a hand in the prayer-meetings which are held on board different ships in the Thames; some of them were soon shipped, and they rejoiced most sincerely that they had to sail with a master who feared God and wrought righteousness. The vessel had now a complement of master, mate, eight seamen, and three boys. Previous to the ship leaving the Surrey Canal, the usual signal for prayer amongst sailors was hoisted; the meeting was held between the decks, which were crowded.

She sailed from London in the month of September, 1817: the crew held divine worship every evening as the duty of the ship permitted, when they read a chapter in the Bible, and then returned thanks to God for the mercies they had received, and supplicated, through Christ, such blessings as they needed. In this way was the sacred name of the Lord revered in this bark. Nothing remarkable occurred during her voyage. On the day she arrived at Memel the wind blew a strong gale from the west, and produced a heavy sea over the bar of sand at the entrance of the port, but they crossed it in safety, and ran up to the ballast quay, where they moored ship, furled sails, and from the top-sail yard, beheld a ship struck on the bar, which, being deeply laden, was stuck fast. She was a Prussian, belonging to the port of Memel. The relatives and countrymen of the crew beheld their sufferings, and, anxious for their preservation, launched the life-boat and rowed off to their assistance. After much exertion they failed in the attempt. Soon afterwards another effort was made to reach the vessel, which was equally fruitless, and they were again driven back. Night was now approaching, and the horror of the people on shore may easily be imagined.

The Prussian boatmen were prevailed on to launch the life-boat a third time. Alas! their exertions were in vain; they were compelled to regain the shore, and leave their unhappy countrymen to perish.

What pen can describe the terror that seized on the stranded crew as the life-boat made for shore, and the darkness of a tempestuous northern night came on! They fled to the rigging, and clinging to the ropes expected death, while the agonizing thought of perishing close to their own families made them feel the horrors of their situation most severely.

At midnight the gale increased to a tremendous hurricane; the whole of the ship's masts were carried over the side. Happily the crew grasped the bowsprit and the windlass, and clung till morning.

At daylight the crew of the "Robert and Margaret" directed their attention to the stranded vessel, hoping that the life-boat had succeeded last evening in bringing the sailors on shore, but they soon learned that the people were still on board, and that two more vessels had struck during the night, namely, the ship "Cato," and another Prussian ship.

Alarmed at this intelligence, and full of compassion to the stranded mariners, these pious seamen resolved to venture their lives to deliver them, and communicated their intentions to the captain, who instantly cried out, "I will go also." Thus resolved, they knelt down, earnestly imploring the protection of God, and solemnly commending their families, their bodies, and their souls to the kind and gracious care of God their Saviour. Thus fitted for life or death, they waited on the commodore of the port, and tendered their services, which were readily accepted.

Too long has a general but mistaken notion prevailed that the most reckless sailors are the fittest for any dangerous enterprise. Many facts have occurred which prove the falsity of the idea; and the simple story now presented to the reader effectually shows that the influence of Divine grace does not weaken the natural courage of a British sailor. No, his courage is increased thereby, for he feels that, come what may, he is all right, for life or death, for time or eternity. He depends entirely on an almighty Saviour, having received peace through the blood of Jesus, who died on the cross a sacrifice for sins. The sailor who experiences this becomes a truly devoted follower of Christ; he is brave and fearless, and will not, cannot hang back when duty or the feelings of humanity call upon him to go forward. Never yet did truly religious seamen prove skulkers in the hour of difficulty and danger.

To return to our narrative. They immediately launched the life-boat and pulled out. After incurring considerable danger, with extraordinary exertions and great patience they reached the stranded ship, which grounded about one o'clock in the afternoon, and had lain in this dreadful situation until ten the next morning. The Prussians were quite exhausted, and each one anxious for his own preservation hastened to reach the boat regardless of his neighbour.

A little cabin boy lay stretched on the deck, incapable of helping himself, and fast approaching an eternal world. The crew in their eagerness to get down the side of the vessel deserted the poor boy, and full of the idea of self-preservation seemed disposed to leave him to perish; but the English captain, who had ventured his life to rescue the people, determined to save the exhausted child, and cried aloud, "Hand me the little boy! oh, save the poor little boy! I cannot leave the lad to perish! Bear a hand; hand me the boy down before you come into the boat." Struck with this humane cry, one man less exhausted than the rest, took the little boy and handed him over the side to the worthy captain. Thus loaded they returned back to the shore, and landed all their charge safely, amidst the joyful shoutings and applause of an immense multitude, who had crowded the beach on learning the news of the English sailors' generous conduct in going off to save the stranded crew.

As God had thus prospered them, they determined to launch out again for the crew of another vessel which had stranded much farther out than the first. To reach her with the least possible danger, it was necessary to drag the life-boat a considerable way along a deep, sandy beach. As there was no carriage to take the boat, the English seamen dragged her along by main strength. They had toiled in this way, with some little help, for about an hour, when some wagons from the country stopped on the high road, and the wagoners stood gazing at the exertions of the sailors. One of the sailors, thinking this was not right, called out to another, "John, let us unship those horses and hook them on to the boat."

About twenty horses were accordingly fixed on to the life-boat, and thus they reached the shore abreast of the stranded vessel. She was a Prussian, her crew belonged to this place; they had run up the rigging, and were now distinctly seen waving their hats. The relatives of the crew were on the beach beholding with horror, which may be better imagined than described, the situation of their dearest connections.

We may guess the scene which took place when the British sailors arrived with the life-boat, and the heart-rending appeals made to them; a momentary pause ensued, when, animated with fresh vigour, looking to God for protection, they grasped the oars, and after excessive exertions reached the ship. But who can describe the mutual anxiety of the crew on the rigging and their relatives on the beach during the progress of the life-boat? When she touched the side of the ship the crew fell one over another from the rigging, risking their limbs to save their lives. They were, however, heartily received, and on being stowed away so as to trim the boat, the sailors pulled towards the shore and arrived in safety. Thus these pious, brave Englishmen were instrumental in saving the entire crews of two vessels.

Some are perhaps ready to say, "Any English sailors would have done as much, for British seamen are generous and ever ready to succour the distressed, whether they fear God or not." This observation was made to a seamen while this narrative was related. It was replied, "British seamen, with all that generosity and courage for which they are famed, could never have performed what these men accomplished unless impelled by motives more than common; their bodily strength must have sunk beneath the exertion had not their minds been actuated by more than human feelings; yes, they not only felt for their brethren in distress as men, but considered that they possessed immortal souls; the desire to rescue them as such gave strength to their arms which they never could have possessed had they not known and felt the value of an immortal soul."

They would gladly now have rested from their great fatigue, but another vessel was on shore, and she was an English ship. Determined to attempt the rescue of their suffering countrymen, they cheered each other, and, intreating the Divine protection, launched forth with the life-boat, a third time contending with the storm. This last effort almost overcame them, and nature was exhausted with the fatigues of the day, and they had nearly perished; but an Almighty arm supported them, and at length they reached the "Cato." Some of the crew in this ship had been standing so long in one position that they could not get into the boat without the assistance of the intrepid but fatigued seamen. In such an emergency another extraordinary effort was made, and they took all the crew off the rigging. Here alone was one cause of regret, the poor cabin boy had been washed off the deck and lost. With some difficulty they now, for the last time, reached the shore, and the captain offered his ship to his countrymen, but the commodore of the port considered the pilot house more suitable, and he immediately lodged them there.

Shortly after the crew of the "Robert and Margaret" had reached their own ship, the commodore of the port came on board, acknowledging the general admiration at their conduct, and testifying the gratitude universally felt by the people on the shore for their generous and noble conduct to the stranded Prussians. The pious captain instantly replied, "Thank the Lord, sir, for our lives were in as much danger as theirs, but He preserved us all; we are just going to offer up our solemn and grateful praises to the God of winds and sea, and if you please you can stay on board and join with us."

By this time the sailors had changed their wet clothes and jumped upon deck. Some of the seamen who had been saved joined them, and as the ship was lying along side the ballast quay several people from the shore came on board. Short hymns were sung, as is usual with the crews of praying ships, and falling on their knees on the deck the captain began with prayer to God, others followed him, to the great astonishment of the Prussians, who with deep emotion beheld the tears of joy and gratitude rolling down the cheeks of these pious sailors.

What a scene was this! British seamen had often been a disgrace, but these were an honour to their country. Instead of making foreigners tremble with their drunkenness and blasphemy, they were viewed not only with admiration for their intrepidity but also with veneration for their devotion.

The crew, as might be expected, were very earnest in prayer, very humble, and very thankful. The sailors who had been rescued appeared deeply affected with the mercies they had received. The Prussian commodore sincerely thanked the captain for the religious instruction he had received, and retired evidently astonished at this proof of British piety.

During the time the "Robert and Margaret" lay in this port, family worship was carried on as usual on board, and many people attended. The ship's company were treated on shore with the highest respect, and the name of this vessel will long be remembered to the credit and honour of Great Britain and the glory of Christianity.

Few seamen will read this narrative without calling to mind scenes of danger in which they have experienced the gracious providence of God interfering in their behalf. The truth of the following lines has been felt by many that "go down to the sea in ships, that do business in the great waters;" truly is it said, "These see the works of the Lord, and his wonders in the deep."

"God of my life, whose gracious power
Thro' varied deaths my soul hath led;
Or turned aside the fatal hour,
Or lifted up my sinking head;
"Oft hath the sea confess'd Thy power,
And given me back at Thy command;
It could not, Lord, my life devour,
Safe in the hollow of Thy hand."

Reader! are you affected by this simple narrative? Does your heart feel a fellowship with these pious sailors while you hear of their thankfulness to God for this remarkable instance of His providential aid? Perhaps you are ready to smile at this relation; perhaps you never thought of religion except to despise it. If this is the case, you are in greater danger than these poor sailors, of whom you have just read. You are in danger of perishing for evermore. Oh! may you consider these things while yet there is time; life is uncertain, you may be called away in a moment; "to-morrow" may be too late; the Word of God assures us that all who do not flee to Christ for pardon and salvation must perish everlastingly. Nothing we have done or can do can recommend us to God. All have sinned and come short of the glory of God; our entire and only dependence must be upon Christ for pardon and salvation. Reader, think upon this; in Him is plenteous redemption; and may the Holy Spirit direct your prayers and supplications for pardon and mercy, and influence you to walk in the paths of holiness and the practice of his will, wherein alone real peace and happiness can be found!

CONNEXIONAL INTELLIGENCE.

HOME DEPARTMENT.

LEINTWARDINE.—On the 6th of July, 1862, we held our school anniversary when two sermons were preached by the Rev. T. Meredith, of Manchester, and various interesting dialogues and pieces were recited by the children to crowded audiences. A collection was made after each service, and £2 10s. were realized. On the Monday we held the children's festival. We are happy to report our school is prosperous. C. RUSSELL.

BRIERLEY-HILL.—July 20th, 1862, being the anniversary of our sabbath-school, excellent and impressive sermons were delivered by the Rev. James Arnold, and the Rev. H. Higginson. The children recited their pieces to the satisfaction of the congregation and with credit to the school. £23 1s. 4d. were realised, being £5 better than last year. D. BUCKLEY.

MEXBOROUGH, DONCASTER CIRCUIT.—On Sunday, July 20th, 1862, two sermons were preached in behalf of the Sabbath school at Mexborough, by the Rev. F. Rudd. After each sermon the children recited several interesting pieces and dialogues in a satisfactory manner. On Monday, July 21st, about 150 persons sat down to tea, after which a public meeting was held. Mr. T. Shaw occupied the chair, and addresses were delivered by Messrs. F. Rudd and R. Wadsworth. The children again recited some pieces and the singing was excellent, the chapel crowded with people, and much good was expected to be the result. The school contains about 200 scholars eighteen of them meet in a select class, and a good work of grace appears to be going on amongst them. The collections and tea raised £10 11s. 9d., which sum is in advance of last year. It is gratifying to state that the school is in a healthy and prosperous condition.

T. KENDALL.

BENTLEY, DONCASTER CIRCUIT.—Three sermons were preached in behalf of our Sabbath school at Bentley, July 27th: morning and evening by the Rev. F. Budd, and in the afternoon by Mr. T. Jackson. After each sermon the children recited several pieces in a creditable manner, and considering it was the first anniversary of the above institution, much praise is due to all who took an active part in the arrangement. The congregations were large and the collections satisfactory. An interesting meeting was held on Monday night, Mr. Hall occupied the chair, and addresses on the utility of Sabbath schools were delivered by Messrs. J. G. Smith, W. Rowe, W. Wright, and J. Hewson. The total proceeds, including a donation of £1 from W. Chadwick, Esq., were £8 7s. 9d. The school is in a thriving state and will, with diligence and perseverance by the teachers, and the blessing of God, do much good to our rising youth.

T. KENDALL.

ASTON ABBOTS, AYLESBURY CIRCUIT.—The ceremony connected with laying the foundation-stone of a new Primitive Methodist Chapel took place on Tuesday, July 29th, 1862. The whole village seemed alive to the event, and mustered numerous to witness the proceedings of the day. The glorious weather also tended to increase the numbers, and many from adjacent villages were to be seen wending their way to the rural spot, to participate in the transaction. At 2 o'clock the Rev. T. Penrose, of London, preached an appropriate and suggestive sermon in the Independent Chapel. At the close of the service the friends proceeded to the site of the proposed building, and after a suitable hymn had been sung, and the Rev. T. Penrose had engaged in prayer, Mr. Wilson, of Leighton, proceeded to lay the stone, accompanying the act by a few pertinent observations. The spectators were then invited to lay bricks, which request many appeared pleased in acceding to. A tea was provided in a tent, and the building used as a chapel. It might be considered worthy of remark that this tent was erected for dancing at the village feast, held the day previous, but the inhabitants manifested their disapprobation by keeping aloof, and so unsuccessful did these speculators find it, that they were glad to let it on this afternoon for the purpose named. About 250 persons united to partake of this social repast. In the evening a public meeting was held in the Independent Chapel, when stirring addresses on well-chosen topics were given by Mr. Wilson (chairman), Mr. Bradley, Revs. T. Penrose, of London, S. Turner, and J. Nevill, of Aylesbury. Votes of thanks were unanimously given for the loan of the chapel for the services of that day and the previous Sabbath, and to others who had contributed to or manifested their interest in what had been done. The meeting terminated shortly before nine in the usual manner. The proceeds, including the collections of the previous Sabbath, amounted to above £15. £5 was sent by J. Palmer, Esq., of London, and was laid on the stone by Mr. Wilson.

BARDFIELD, MALDON MISSION.—We deem it right to give publicity to all new efforts to extend the beneficial influence of our beloved Connexion. The county of Essex has but recently had the labours of our missionaries on any extended scale. Five years ago there was but one missionary on Chelmsford mission; one preacher could not mission nine-tenths of the county; and yet it greatly needed to be missioned. The General Missionary Committee considered the case, and sent a second labourer into the harvest. We then extended the mission far and wide with good success. And now we have full labour for seven missionaries, who are stationed on Chelmsford and Maldon missions; and still the labourers are few for this large county adjoining the great metropolis. But I write to tell you we have just laid the foundation-stone of our new chapel at Bardfield under favourable circumstances. On Tuesday, July 29th, Mr. Dinnick preached the foundation sermon at 3 o'clock. A great number assembled who contributed freely. After the stone was laid we had a public tea in the Boys' British School, kindly lent by H. Smith, Esq., for the occasion. After tea we held a good public meeting, and we were cheered on the occasion, and since by additional donations. Our receipts are nearly £25, which we consider to be encouraging, in a part of the county where Methodism, till lately, was not known. We shall turn up every stone in our power to look for money to aid us in our undertaking. We thank God and take courage, and when we have raised the topstone you shall hear from us again.

JOHN GUY.

COLCHESTER.—On the 3rd of August, the Rev. R. Church preached three impressive sermons in connection with the opening of our school. The following day we held a tea-meeting which was gratuitously provided for by the teachers and friends, when 140 persons sat down. After tea the Rev. R. Church again preached. August 10th, the Rev. W. Yeadon preached in the morning, and in the afternoon and evening appropriate and interesting pieces and dialogues were recited by the children. The entire cost of enlargement is £105, towards which we have raised by collections, donations, tea-meetings, cards, &c., £80, and we hope to pay off the whole debt in twelve months. We are thankful to say that the greatest unity and peace prevail in the school.

W. S. YEADON.

WILTON PARK, WOLSEINGHAM CIRCUIT.—I am happy to inform you that the work of God is progressing in this locality, so much so that when our anniversary was held last year the trustees resolved to get a few collecting cards printed and distributed in order that something might be done to reduce the then existing debt of £100, which remained on the chapel. Happily this plan proved successful, for with a little money we had at the time and the liberality of a few of the brethren, within the twelve months £50 were raised. At this time our chapel was twelve yards square with 140 sittings to let, beside as many free seats, and as all were filled, and souls were being converted, the cry went up for more room; accordingly application was immediately made to the Quarter-day Board and to the District Building Committee, for permission to enlarge our place of worship. This request being granted, to work we went, and contracted with Mason and Joiner to do the requisites for the sum of £130, which work we must say has been done in a masterly and workmanlike manner, the front having a most majestic appearance and the inside every convenience. A short while ago we held a tea party which was gratuitously supplied by our worthy female members and friends, and nobly supported by the public. By this we realized upwards of £20, so that with our re-opening collections and private subscriptions, we now stand with the chapel enlarged and beautified and all complete, and able to accommodate 400 listeners, with a debt of £80 only on the building. Our prosperity we attribute to the increased holiness, earnestness, and labour of the whole church as a body, with the blessing of God. The reopening sermons were preached on August 3rd, by the Rev. Wm. Dent, of Newcastle on Tyne, and our respected superintendent the Rev. W. Clemitson, and truly it was a gracious day.

JOHN DENT.

BAWTRY, RETFORD CIRCUIT.—After repeated attempts to procure land in this place, R. M. Milnes, Esq., M.P., consented to sell. The purchase being effected, on Friday, August 8th, 1862, by request the members and friends met from several parts of the station, at the preaching room in Bawtry, at two o'clock in the afternoon, formed a procession, and sang through the principal streets to the site of the contemplated building; and although the weather was unfavourable the company was large, and attracted the attention of the inhabitants, many of whom attended to witness the ceremony. The Rev. H. Knowles gave out the hymn beginning with "Except the Lord conduct the plan," &c.; the Rev. W. Harland engaged in prayer, during which a gracious influence prevailed; another hymn having been sung George Naylor Esq. (a Wesleyan local preacher) proceeded to lay the stone; and then remarked that he felt himself honoured by having the privilege of laying the first stone of a building in which he did not for one moment doubt but that the truth, as it is in Jesus, would be plainly and faithfully preached, and he hoped that it would become the birthplace of many precious souls; for he had long thought that his Primitive friends had been very much inconvenienced, for want of a better place in which to conduct their religious worship; and though he did belong to another denomination of Christians he should have a pleasure in tendering assistance towards so desirable an object. The weather still being unpropitious, the company repaired to the Independent chapel which was kindly placed at our service for the occasion, when an interesting sermon was delivered by the Rev. W. Harland, and was listened to with profit; after which a tea being gratuitously provided in a marquee, about two hundred and forty persons, besides the waiters and tray holders, partook of the bountiful repast. In the evening a public meeting was convened in the above chapel, the chair was ably occupied by G. Naylor, Esq., and addresses were delivered by the Revs. T. Campey, W. Harland, W. Wesson, (Independent,) H. Knowles, J. G. Smith and Mr. G. Rex. The pecuniary proceeds for the day, including the chairman's gift of £10, and a promise of £2 by Mr. G. Rex, of Retford, amounted to the handsome sum of £28 16s., and who ever lives to witness the opening services, and the winding up of the accounts, will find that there has been on the part of the friends and the public in general, a disposition to place the chapel in an easy position. May the blessing of Him who dwelt in the bush, specially rest on all who favour Zion; and may peace dwell within her borders, and prosperity within her palaces. Amen.

HENRY KNOWLES.

BALDWIN'S GATE.—We held our fourth anniversary at Baldwin's Gate Sunday school on August 10th, 1862, when two sermons were preached by the Rev. J. Timmins, of Leominster. The children sang suitable hymns and recited pieces and a dialogue on heaven with very great credit. The collections amounted to the sum of £8 1s. 6d. To God be all the praise.

JOHN BENNETT.

CHESTER.—The ancient city of Chester was first visited by our missionaries in the year 1820; and although persecution was their lot for some time, they pursued their course with undaunted courage, and were successful in the conversion of souls: and in 1824 Chester became the head of a circuit, which is now one of the largest in the Manchester district, having three travelling preachers, eighty local preachers, fifteen connexional chapels, twenty-seven other preaching places, twelve Sabbath schools, and 750 members of society. But for want of better accommodation in the city our efforts to promote the interests of the cause have been greatly hindered, the chapel we occupy being a rented one, and the situation very disagreeable. We therefore resolved about two years ago to raise a fund, and look out for a suitable site of land on which to erect a chapel and school-room; and, fortunately, a site was offered for sale on the south side of George-street, which seems to meet with the approbation of the public in general; and the deeds having been made, also plans and specifications of the intended structure, the foundation stone was formally laid on Tuesday, August 12th, 1862, by T. F. Maddock Esq., to whom the trustees presented a beautiful silver trowel, and a neat wooden mallet, as a token of gratitude for the assistance he has rendered in enabling us to raise funds for the chapel. A sermon was preached on the occasion by the Rev. J. W. Howell, of Ashby-de-la-Zouch to about 2000 people. At the close of the foundation service a tea meeting was held in the Independent lecture room, Queen-street, (kindly lent for the occasion.) Upwards of 800 took tea, and when the tables were cleared a public meeting was held in the Independent chapel, at which the Rev. J. W. Howell delivered an excellent lecture on the following subject.—“Young men, what society demands of them.” The mayor of the city occupied the chair, and several ministers connected with other denominations kindly assisted us, amongst whom was the Rev. C. Chapman, M.A., minister of the above chapel, who has shown us much kindness. The proceeds of the day towards the new chapel fund (including the collection and profits from the tea meeting) are about £50, as the trays were furnished gratuitously by our own people. The trustees tender their sincere thanks to all who have thus far assisted in the undertaking, and pray that the intended edifice, when reared, may be a great blessing in the city.

JOHN EASTWOOD.

COCKWELLS, PENRANCE CIRCUIT. Sunday-school anniversary.—The sermons were preached by the Rev. R. Killingrey, of St. Ives, and the Rev. J. Hawkins, to large congregations. And on Saturday, August 16th, 1862, the children were regaled with tea and cake, in a field close to the chapel; after which the little ones were dismissed. There was tea provided for the public in the chapel, when a large company sat down to an excellent repast. The religious service was presided over by Mr. H. Thomas, and after a short address from the chair, he called on Mr. C. Kessell, Mr. T. Pascoe, and the writer to address the assembly. The speakers dwelt on the duties, the discouragements, the encouragements, and the crowning glories of all rightly-conducted Sunday-schools. This meeting was a success, and the large congregation separated with joy, and thanking God for the moral change in the lives of young and old.

The amount collected was £7 8s. 3d., being £2 1s. 3d. above last year.

C. T. HARRIS.

BLAENAFON, PONTYPOOL CIRCUIT.—The anniversary of this very commodious chapel was celebrated on Sunday, August 17th, 1862, when three sermons were preached, that in the morning by the superintendent of the circuit, and those in the afternoon and evening by the Rev. R. Key, of Norwich. A very gracious influence from heaven pervaded the assemblies, and in the evening's prayer-meeting two persons professed to obtain pardon. In connection with this anniversary two lectures were delivered in the above chapel, by Mr. Key, one on Monday evening, on "Infidelity tried at the bar of reason, and found wa ting;" John Harris, Esq. presiding. The other, on Tuesday evening, on "The immortality of the soul, established by reason and confirmed by Revelation." The entire proceeds amounted to the noble sum of £35.

On the following evening (Wednesday) Mr. Key delivered his lecture on the "Immortality of the Soul," in the Town Hall, Pontypool. The Rev. T. Thomas, D.D., president of Pontypool College presided. And on Thursday evening Mr. Key delivered a lecture on "Christianity and Infidelity contrasted," in the British School-room, Risca. The proceeds at each place were devoted to the respective chapel funds.

We are happy to add that within the last few months about one hundred persons have been converted and added to the societies in this circuit. To God be all the praise. THOMAS HOBSON.

RANSOR CIRCUIT.—Roccester was one of the first places visited by the founders of our Connexion, and the fruit of their labour remains to this day. Many precious souls have been gathered into the fold of Christ in this place who are gone to enjoy the bliss of a holier and happier clime. And many are now walking in the fear of the Lord and the comforts of true religion. One of the first chapels built in the Primitive Methodist Connexion was built at Roccester, in the year 1812; and our people worshipped in it for many years; and much good was done.

But unfortunately the chapel was not properly conveyed, and hence it was lost to the Connexion; and for several years we have been necessitated to hold our services in a private house. But about six months ago land was purchased. Plans and specifications were prepared, and sanction was obtained for building; and a beautiful little chapel has been erected at the west end of this rising village. The chapel is 27 feet by 21 feet, and 13 feet from the level of the floor to the wallplate. It has four substantial windows, with circular tops, a boarded floor, and elevated pews, and a singers' pew. The chapel is built of brick and covered with tiles. We have laid in gas, and palisaded the front. The whole cost will be about £260, including £38 10s. the price of the land. The chapel was opened for Divine worship August 17th, by Bro. G. Stansfield of Manchester, and on September 7th, 1862, by Bro. J. Moss, of West Bromwich. The collections at the opening amounted to £141 2s. 2½d. We are grateful to be able to say we have raised by private donations and public collections the noble sum of £31 1s. 7d., and we hope to continue our efforts till we have raised one-half of the whole cost. We hereby acknowledge our gratitude to all who have supported us; and we anticipate that this chapel will become the birthplace of numbers of precious souls.

W. ROOKE.

MARKET DRAYTON.—Believing that intelligence relative to Sabbath schools will be interesting, the following account of our school anniversary at Market Drayton is placed at your disposal. At 9 o'clock in the morning of Sunday, August 17th, the day appointed for celebrating the above anniversary, the teachers, scholars, and friends met in the chapel. We then formed ourselves into a procession, and walked through the principal streets of the town, singing at intervals with very good effect. In the afternoon of the day the Rev. W. E. Saunders, of Newcastle-under-Lyme, preached two very telling and suitable sermons in the chapel. Several of the children recited pieces, which were of an interesting and entertaining character. The congregations on the occasion were very large, the chapel was crowded to excess both afternoon and night, and there were many who could not get in. The collections for the day amounted to £6 8s, which is more than has been realized on any former occasion. We had a good share of Divine influence. On Monday, the 18th, the children were treated with their tea in the chapel. We have in connection with our Sabbath-school a Band of Hope, of which many of our scholars are members, and those who are members are in the habit of paying into the hands of the treasurer their farthings, halfpence, and pennies; and these have, during the past year, amounted in all to £13 15s. 6½d. A proper account of what each child pays is kept by the secretary, and then at the year's end, and just before the anniversary of the school, they have their money returned to them, so that it proves useful to them in providing them with a few articles of wearing apparel against their anniversary. The 18th inst. being the day appointed for holding the annual meeting of this Band of Hope, the teachers, scholars, and friends met in the chapel at 2 o'clock, P.M. We then proceeded to the National School, where we were joined by the Rev. G. Chutt, vicar of the parish, and the children belonging to the National School Band of Hope. We afterward processioned the principal streets, returning to the National School. The children belonging to our school then proceeded in order to the chapel, where they partook of an excellent tea and cake provided for the occasion. At seven o'clock we commenced a Temperance Meeting in the National school-room, the Rev. G. Chutt took the chair, when two Lectures were delivered, the first by the writer, to show that Intemperance is a great social evil, and how to avoid it. The second, by the Rev. W. E. Saunders, who very efficiently showed that Intoxicating drinks are not nutritious, and that teetotalism is a natural and a moral duty. The attendance at the meeting was large beyond all expectation, and at the conclusion thirty persons signed the temperance pledge. On Monday night last we held our annual committee meeting of the school, and by the reports which were presented to that meeting it was shown that the school and the Band of Hope are in a very prosperous state. To our God be all the praise.

THOMAS BRAMALL.

PRIOR'S MARSTON, LACKINGTON CIRCUIT.—We have lately purchased a chapel of Mr. Gilbert, which has been occupied, by our society on rent for the last four years. It is a good substantial chapel built of brick and stone, covered with blue slates, properly pewed, with a small gallery. Altogether it will accommodate with seats 180 persons. The cost, including deeds, enrolment, &c., is a little over one hundred pounds. The re-opening services took place on Sunday, August 17th, 1862, when two sermons were preached by an old friend, the Rev. J. Mules, of Brigg. The weather was very unpropitious, as the rain descended copiously, but still the congregations were as good as could be expected. On Monday, the 18th, 130 persons sat down to a well arranged tea, after which a public meeting was addressed by Messrs. E. Young, J. Bull, G. Roberson (Independent), T. Assup, and J. Mules; Mr. G. Russell was in the chair. AM the services were of an interesting character, and the collections good. Mrs. Spencer and other female friends brought the handsome sum of £3 4s. 7½d. received for needlework. Mr. Spencer, and other friends, with cards, collected £4 2s. 2d. About three years ago Mr. Cook, of this place, a member of society, died and left £50 towards a chapel. That sum, and what has been collected will place the society in easy circumstances, leaving only £40 debt upon the place. Mr. Spencer has introduced a harmonium, which we find to be a great addition. We beg to tender our thanks to all our kind friends.

G. WALLIS.

LACKINGTON, DRIFFIELD CIRCUIT.—Lackington is a pleasant village, situated about midway between Beverley and Driffeld. Primitive Methodist was introduced into it many years ago, and with God's blessing upon the labours of his servants many of the inhabitants were awakened and saved; a society was raised, but for want of a suitable place of worship the cause was materially retarded; and numerous unsuccessful efforts were made to obtain a suitable plot of ground on which to erect a chapel. The recently improved state of the society, congregation, and Sabbath school, demanding a larger and more commodious place of worship, we determined to make another effort, and application was made to the proprietor of the property in which we worshipped, who agreed to sell us a piece of land, 40 feet long by 18 wide, for the sum of £60. We considered the price very high, especially as the society and congregation belonged to the working classes. But we adopted Nehemiah's resolution, "The God of heaven, he will prosper us, therefore we his servants will arise and build." Having obtained the sanction of the quarterly meeting, &c., the land was purchased, and on Wednesday, August 20th, 1862, the foundation-stone was laid by our venerable and long-tried friend, Mr. P. Knaggs, of Wetwang; after which a very appropriate and telling address was delivered by the Rev. W. Mitchell, Independent minister. At 4 o'clock a tea meeting was held, and a public meeting followed. Brother Stather was called to the chair, and the meeting was addressed by Brothers W. Stabler, E. Tyos, T. Giles, W. Coulson, and W. Mitchell. The services were well attended, and told well on the public.

The proceeds amounted to £17 or £18. This is the fifth new chapel that has been erected in this station within the last few years, besides a new school room; other chapels have been considerably improved, and the debts lowered, &c. Preparations are now being made to erect a new chapel in another place, and establish a day school; and as our camp meetings for this season have been attended with unusual unction and power, and many precious souls have been brought to God, we are hoping the revival influence will descend upon every part of the circuit.

THOMAS GILES.

MOTCOMBE.—The services in connection with the opening of a new organ in the Primitive Methodist chapel, Motcombe, were held August 24th, 1862, when two powerful sermons were preached by the Rev. J. Mules, of Brigg, Lincolnshire. The chapel was crowded at these services, and many persons could not obtain even standing room. On the following day about 400 persons partook of an excellent tea, provided in a booth erected in front of Mr. W. Bartley's residence. After the tables were removed, a public religious service was held, the writer presiding. The Revs. J. Mules, J. Hill, and G. Cripps, addressed the meeting, much to the delight and profit of the hearers. Upwards of £32 were realized at the services.

T. POWELL.

MORECAMBE BAY.—Services in connection with the laying of the foundation stone of a Primitive Methodist chapel, Morecambe Bay, in the Lancaster Mission, were held on Monday, August 25th, 1862. At half-past three, p.m., the services began by the singing of a hymn, which was given out by the Rev. T. Bennett; after which the Rev. J. Graham, of Preston, engaged in prayer; another verse having been sung, the stone was laid by E. Dawson, Esq., of Aldcliffe Hall, who then delivered a most appropriate and impressive address, in which he referred to the usefulness of our body. After a few remarks by the writer a collection was made, and then Mr. Graham delivered a very appropriate speech. Prayer was then offered by the Rev. T. Lord, (Independent) which brought the services to a close. We then adjourned to the Independent wooden chapel, (kindly lent) where tea was provided; and while the tables were being removed, we went to the front of the beach, sung several hymns, delivered several addresses, and processioned back to the chapel, where a public meeting was held. The chair was occupied by Mr. Gaukrodger, of Burnley, and addresses were delivered by the Revs. J. Graham, T. Bennett, T. Lord, and Messrs. W. Dodd and W. Jackson. The collections amounted to £8 1s. 9d. The proceeds of the tea are not yet ascertained. In conclusion we beg to state that this is the third connexional chapel erected on this station since the beginning of 1861. The cost of the present one will be about £500, which we feel to be a great undertaking, considering the times, our slender means, &c. It will nevertheless be a great boon to our numerous friends, who during the summer months, visit this rapidly improving sea-bathing place, and we sincerely trust they will assist in the undertaking.

T. BENNETT.

STOKENCHURCH, CHINXOR CIRCUIT.—The friends in connection with our society at this place, have long felt the need of a more suitable and commodious place in which to worship the Divine Being. But for want of an eligible site on which to build they have been prevented from erecting a house to the honour of our glorious Redeemer's name. This difficulty has, we are happy to say, in the order of Divine Providence, been recently removed. Mrs. Mary Burgess, an aged widow of the neighbourhood, has kindly granted a site to the trustees and Connexion, [and on this plot we have now begun to build a chapel.

The ceremony of laying the foundation stone was performed on Tuesday, September 2nd, 1862. The day was fine, and a deeply-interested audience assembled on the spot. The service was commenced about three o'clock p.m., by singing an appropriate hymn, after which prayer was offered by Mr. J. Darvell (Baptist) of Wycombe, T. Wheeler, Esq., of the Established Church, then read a Psalm of devotion. After this he proceeded to lay the stone in the name of the adorable Trinity. In the back part of the stone a bottle was deposited by the Rev. E. Hancock, containing a record of the ceremony, the names of the trustees and others, a circuit plan, part of a local paper, called the "Free Press," and one piece of coin bearing the superscription of our beloved Queen. T. Wheeler, Esq. laid one sovereign on the stone, and Mrs. King another. Suitable addresses followed, by T. Wheeler, Mr. J. Darvell, and the Rev. J. Toulson. A collection was made. An interesting public tea meeting was held in the old rented chapel at half-past four o'clock. A good sermon was preached at six o'clock, by the Rev. J. Toulson, in the Independent chapel, kindly granted for the occasion. The total sum raised at the services was £8 2s.

E. HANCOCK.

BROTHERTON, PONTEFRACCT CIRCUIT.—On the 7th and 14th of September, 1862, we opened our new chapel at this place. W. Briggs, Esq., of Leeds, and H. J. McCulloch, Esq., of York, preached on the former date, and the Rev. H. Simon (Independent), J. Tate, Esq., and the Rev. E. Jones, Wesleyan, on the latter. On the fifteenth about two hundred and fifty persons partook of an excellent tea in the chapel, and in the evening we held a public meeting at which Capt. Arnold presided, and addresses were delivered by Messrs. J. Mosby, T. Atha, T. Thornton, and the circuit ministers.

The plans and specifications of the chapel were presented to the trustees, by Mr. J. Night, architect, of London, and competent judges regard the chapel as a neat, convenient, and substantial building. It is well lighted and ventilated, is calculated to seat one hundred and sixty, and will cost (including a cottage which we were obliged to take in the purchase) £250. From all sources we have realized £90; and as the cottage is let at £3 per annum, and every seat in the pews is taken, the premises are placed in easy circumstances.

W. BENNETT.

BILSTON.—Bilston Sabbath school annual sermons were preached on Lord's day, September 7th, 1862, by Mr. T. Bate-man, of Chorley, and the Rev. R. Jukes, of West Bromwich. The congregations were good, especially in the evening, and the collections amounted to £21, being considerably more than those of last year.

S. MORRIS.

SANDWICH, RAMSGATE STATION.—The town of Sandwich contains a population of nearly 3,000 inhabitants. In the summer of 1860 the Primitive Methodist missionaries visited this place, and proclaimed the Gospel of salvation in the open air; subsequently they succeeded in obtaining a room; and a society was formed which has gradually increased up to the present time. In November last we secured a piece of freehold land in an eligible situation, on which to erect a chapel. The ceremony of laying the corner-stone of the building took place on Tuesday, September 9th; the Rev. W. E. Nobbs commenced the services at 3 o'clock, by singing and prayer, after which a sermon was delivered by the Rev. D. Kendall, of Canterbury. Mr. G. Peat then proceeded to lay the stone, giving a short address expressive of his sympathy with the infant cause of Primitive Methodism in this town, and his willingness to render all the assistance in his power; and as a token of his sympathy and regard, he generously placed five sovereigns upon the stone. When the services accompanying the laying of the stone had been completed, a number of friends assembled in a large room, kindly lent by Mr. Baker for the occasion, where tea was provided, to which about 100 sat down; after which a public meeting was held, presided over by Mr. W. R. Harris, and addressed by Revs. R. Ayers, D. Day, D. Kendall, and J. H. Dash. Nearly £20 were realized.

J. DASH.

LEIGHTON BUZZARD.—On Sabbath September 14th, 1862, sermons on behalf of our chapel at this place were preached by the Rev. G. Warner, of Oxford. The weather was very unfavourable during the day, which we think made very much against our congregations and collections, but the services were attended with power. On the day following we held a tea meeting in our school rooms. After tea a public meeting was held in the chapel, presided over by our worthy brother, Mr. John Wilson. The Rev. G. Warner gave us a lengthy and warm-hearted address, which we trust will be followed with lasting good. By this anniversary we have realized about £18, including profits of tea, public collections, and the amounts raised on the golden system: amongst those who have collected and given various sums on that system may be mentioned:—J. Wilson, £2; W. Watkins, £1 5s.; J. Biggs, £1 12s. 6d.; Mrs. Birks and Miss Clegg, £3 1s. 5d. We purpose soon to make another effort to reduce our chapel debt at this place.

W. BIRKS.

OUTWOODS, BURTON-ON-TRENT CIRCUIT.—Our friends at this place had for upwards of twenty-four years worshipped in a small house, but many persons objecting to going there it was decided to build a chapel. About the month of August, 1861, plans and specifications were prepared by Messrs. T. Lowe and Son, of Burton-on-Trent, and the foundation stone was laid by Mr. F. Dalton. On Sundays, September 15th and 22nd, the same year, the opening services were held, and sermons preached by the Rev. R. Kenney, Rev. — Massey, (Baptists,) and the Rev. J. Wilkinson. Since the chapel was opened, the services have been well attended, and the cause has prospered. On Sunday, August 31st, 1862, the first anniversary services were held, when Mr. James Sherlock, of Derby, preached in the afternoon and evening to large and attentive congregations. The sum of £2 12s. was collected in aid of the Trust Fund.

F. RICHARDSON.

NEW BASFORD, NOTTINGHAM SECOND CIRCUIT.—The anniversary of our chapel in this village was celebrated on Lord's day, Sep. 21st., 1862, when two instructive and impressive sermons were preached by our esteemed minister, the Rev. J. Woodcock. The congregations were tolerably good and a gracious influence pervaded each service. The collections amounted to nearly £3, which is a large sum for so small a place. We have paid £25 off the chapel debt during the year. We tender our thanks to all the kind friends who have in any way assisted us. It affords me pleasure to state that God is pouring out His Spirit amongst our people. Our society is in a united, working, prosperous condition. The Lord of Hosts is with us, our way is opening before us and our congregations are gradually increasing.

W. BACON.

ST. GEORGE'S, WRECKWARDINE WOOD CIRCUIT.—We celebrated our second anniversary at St. George's, on Sunday, Sept. 28th, 1862. J. Wood, Esq., of Nantwich, preached two able discourses on the occasion. Mr. S. Cadman preached well in the afternoon. The collections for the day, with the donations that have been raised during the year, amount to the sum of £11 17s. 7d., for which we feel very grateful.

J. BOOTH.

RYNOPS COLLIERY.—SUNDERLAND CIRCUIT.—On Saturday last the friends of Primitive Methodism met on a spot adjoining the new schools, for the purpose of laying the foundation stone of a new Primitive Methodist chapel, the site of which has been liberally given by the owners of the colliery. After devotional exercises, conducted by the Rev. R. Fenwick and W. Alderson, Mr. Gibson, the colliery engineer, presented Wm. Hopper, Esq., of Sunderland, with the silver trowel, purchased for him by the society, with which he proceeded to lay the stone. Suitable addresses were given by Messrs. Fenwick, Hopper, and T. Gibson, of Sunderland, all bearing testimony to the liberality and kindness of the colliery owners in this undertaking, who had not only given the site, but had promised the stone, lime, water, &c., and also led them to the ground. They had often been helped with equal liberality by the same company at other collieries, and they hoped the workmen would ever feel deeply grateful. A collection was taken on the ground, which, with ten pounds given by W. Hopper, Esq., amounted to about £11. The company adjourned to the boys' school and partook of tea. In the evening a public meeting was held, presided over by Mr. Hopper, when addresses were given by the ministers of the circuit, and other friends. The chapel is to be large and commodious, with a vestry, and will cost upwards of £300. Towards this sum several handsome donations have come in, and the committee are determined to make every effort to have the chapel free from debt as soon as possible. —Sunderland Times.—[We are sorry the date of the above service is not given, but we suppose it was sometime in the month of September last. Ed.]

COLONIAL DEPARTMENT.

LAUNCESTON, TASMANIA.—Primitive Methodism was introduced into this town and colony by immigrants from the old country. For a considerable time those persons worshipped with other congregations, but having been brought to a knowledge of salvation through the instrumentality of this Connexion, they could not endure the thought of being finally separated from it. The result was the formation of a class, in September, 1859, of which Mr. T. Woolnough became the leader. The society from its commencement rented from the Rev. C. Price the building, known as "the Wyeklife Chapel," for which they had to pay for a considerable time twenty-five shillings per week. The wretched situation of this building, its want of ventilation, and its inconvenience, were long felt, and had an unfavourable influence on the infant cause. After the arrival of Mr. J. Langham as the minister of the station, the society resolved to build a place of its own, which could be regarded as its future home. A bazaar and tea meeting were held in December, 1860, and subscriptions received and promised toward the object. A plot of ground, in Frederick Street was purchased in June, 1861, but nothing further was done, until after the writer arrived in the station. In March, 1862, public services were held, and sufficient money was soon obtained for paying the remaining debt on the ground. Plans were prepared and adopted. A tender for the erection was accepted, May 1st, and the foundation-stone laid by Alderman Nerwood, on the 13th of the same month. On Lord's day, August 16th, the chapel was opened for Divine worship, when the Revs. J. Foggon, R. K. Ewing, and the writer preached the Word of Life to overflowing congregations. On the following day we had a public tea, after which addresses were delivered by the Revs. H. B. Giles, J. Lindsay, W. Law, C. Price, J. Foggon, and J. Sharpe. The services were continued on Sabbath, August 17th, when the Revs. B. Drake, W. Lane, and J. Lindsay preached interesting and appropriate sermons. The income from the various amusements connected with the opening is £26 10s.; this we consider good under the circumstances, for only the week before the opening, we held a bazaar, which produced clear of all expenses the sum of £131 9s. 10<sup>1</sup>/<sub>2</sub>d. In the estimation of many persons the society has achieved a great success. To Him from whom all blessings flow be all the glory.

The style of the building is Italian. Its dimensions are 40 feet by 32, and 26 to the collar beams. The appearance and fittings are excellent, and the place is generally admired.

The following is a brief summary of the financial position of the trust estate. Paid for ground, including two Old Weather Board cottages, making road by the side of the same, together with interest on bill, £369 18s. 6d. Contract for building, plastering, gas fittings, extra seats, filling up yard, &c., &c., £714 10s. 9<sup>1</sup>/<sub>4</sub>d. Total outlay £1084 19s. 3d. Towards this there was raised previous to the removal of Mr. J. Langham, by bazaar, tea meeting, &c., £240 12s. 10d. Since March last £324 11s. 6<sup>1</sup>/<sub>2</sub>d. for rent of cottages, £17 12s. Total income £582 16s. 4<sup>1</sup>/<sub>2</sub>d.

We have not included the expense of the bazaar, as some few goods were sold on commission; we have given only the clear profits. There is still some work to be done, and the architect's fee to be paid, but towards these we have several amounts still to come in. It is the intention of the trustees to leave £500 on the premises for the present, the interest of which will not exceed the rent of the former place. We may also mention, that the money is borrowed from several of our own members on notes of hand, so that the expense and inconvenience of a mortgage have been avoided. This is a very pleasing feature in the case, and we think it worthy of imitation.

For a people so few and feeble as we are, we regard what has been accomplished as a great work. In fact many are taken by surprise, and ask, "How has this been done?" Diligent, earnest, united effort has done it, and by the Divine blessing we hope we shall yet do greater things than these. Where all have done so much, and so well, it is unnecessary to particularize; we will only say that to the Christian public we are much indebted for sympathy and assistance, to our own members and congregation we are more deeply indebted for their great liberality and untiring zeal; but to God we are most of all indebted for opening our way, and giving the people a mind to work. We pray that within the walls of this building a numerous and powerful church, composed of living souls, may be raised up, and that it may become "The House of God and the gate of heaven" to many a weary wanderer.

JOHN SHARPE.

ADELAIDE SOUTH AUSTRALIA.—Extracts from the Journal of J. Read.

Dec. 31st, 1861. Attended a watch-night service at Brompton with the Wesleyans. It was a solemn and profitable time. 1861, farewell! Burdens, troubles, cares, hopes, griefs, and yearnings, farewell! Farewell to my Christian brethren who have heard the trumpet, and obeyed the summons before me and have gone forward!—Welcome! Welcome! 1862.

Who can tell what materials for future history 1862 may furnish? Who can point out the heart destined to ache with disappointment or to be elevated by hope? What writer's pen will drop, what warrior's sword be sheathed, what monarch's crown fall during 1862? Ah, these things float in darkness, or are like some hieroglyphic of which we have not the key. If I be spared, may 1862 be a year of greater usefulness and devotedness than 1861. Amen.

Jan. 5th. Preached special sermons for our chapel at North Adelaide; subjects—morning "The conqueror conquered," afternoon "Echoes of the departed year," evening "The crystal river." The evening service was one of great power. May my heart be cheered by my soon seeing souls brought to God.

6th. Tea meeting at North Adelaide. There was a good attendance. A heavenly influence pervaded the public meeting. We raised by these services about £23. Praise the Lord!

19th. Preached at Norwood School Anniversary, South Adelaide Circuit. May heaven's blessing rest upon the children.

26th. I felt the presence of my Master while administering the Sacrament at Pine Forest this evening. At this place our first connexional chapel in the colony was erected.

29th. Gave a lecture at North Adelaide on the "Utility of preaching the gospel in the open air."

31st. Preached in the open air at North Adelaide. The people, to whom it seemed a new thing to see a preacher with open book preaching beneath heaven's wide canopy—listened attentively while we spoke of the saying that smiled in the Star of Bethlehem and was proved by the sweet drops of Gethsemane and the blood of Calvary—"Christ Jesus came into the world to save sinners."

Feb. 2nd. Preached three times at Queenstown, Beverley and North Adelaide: I felt the blood of sprinkling in the evening while speaking upon the three crosses and the three dying ones of Calvary.

3rd. Attended South Adelaide school tea meeting. It was interesting and profitable.

5th. Preached in the open air at North Adelaide on the cry from the cross, "Is it nothing to you all ye that pass by?" and afterwards in the chapel on "Jesus in the midst." Lord, bless thy word!

10th. Preached in the open air at Walkerville to a good congregation. This place was missioned by our people about ten years ago, but no society was formed. There has been no preaching there for several years except by the Wesleyans and the Church people. O that our way may be opened!

11th. Preached in the open air at Alberton at 7, and in the chapel at Queenstown at 8 o'clock. May the seed soon be blessed. Amen.

16th. Preached the anniversary sermon of Burton Chapel, Salisbury Circuit. There being only £8 debt on the chapel it was swept off and the Treasurer found himself with money in hand.

23rd. Preached school sermons at N. Adelaide to good congregations who manifested their sympathy for this blessed institution by contributing liberally to the school funds.

March 2nd. Preached school sermons at Payneham, South Adelaide circuit, to overflowing congregations. Had a blessed time in the evening, speaking on "They that sow in tears shall reap in joy."

10th. Attended the opening of a New Lutheran Evangelical Church. Several German ministers spoke in German, a Congregational minister and myself addressed the people in English. It was a good meeting. Their lively singing and warm hearted prayers made me think of "home," and the solitary monk who by Divine help shook the moral world.

16th. Preached chapel sermons at Salisbury. The prayer meeting in the evening was a good one in heavenly influence, but I want to see souls—precious, blood-bought souls converted to God. The Salisbury friends have done well in chapel matters; during the past year by special efforts they have raised above £200.

24th. Gave a lecture at Pine Forest on "Bunyan, the immortal dreamer." Profits nearly £8. This was more than we expected from so small a place.

30th. This evening at North Adelaide, while preaching from the solemn words "Woe be unto him that striveth with his Maker!" I felt an unction from the Holy One resting upon me. I have been at meetings in the colony where more have been converted, but none have surpassed this in influence and mighty power. Believers were quickened, backsliders wept, and sinners cried for mercy. It was a melting, moving, reviving time. O for more such showers of grace!

April 3rd. There were more at the week night service this evening at North Adelaide than I have seen before since I have been on the circuit. I had a good time in preaching from "Hinder me not!" I believe the Lord is at work upon the hearts of the people. Ride on, Jesus, still ride on!

6th. Preached the opening sermon of a new Baptist chapel at North Adelaide this morning; and afternoon and evening the school sermons at Queenstown. Many were unable to obtain standing room. Tears were shed while we spoke of "the Great Shepherd gathering the lambs," and "sorrowing sowers but successful reapers." May some of the little ones soon be brought to Jesus. Amen.

13th. Preached morning and evening at North Adelaide and an anniversary sermon at Norwood, South Adelaide, in the afternoon.

20th. This evening preached a school sermon in the Bible Christian Chapel, South Adelaide. Union! blessed union! with it the church could convert the world.

23rd. Buried a man to-day, who two days ago seemed to be in the enjoyment of good health. May I hear the echo of the warning, "Be ye also ready!" Met with some natives on my return home. Self-gratification is their chief characteristic—eating and sleeping. They talked about "white money" and "tuck out" meaning they wanted some money to buy food. On spiritual things, O how dark! What can raise them? The gospel! Yes! thank God, it can. O brethren, if you have the means, send us praying, faithful men—and send them speedily,—for sinners are dying every day,—that the thousands here in darkness may be pointed to the "Lamb of God that taketh away the sin of the world."* J. READ.

THE fourth anniversary of the Primitive Methodist Chapel, Queenstown, North Adelaide Circuit, was celebrated on Sunday and Monday, the 15th and 16th, June 1862. On the Sunday three sermons were preached, those in the morning and evening by the Rev. J. Read, and that in the afternoon by the Rev. T. Smillie, of the Free Scotch Church. The congregations were numerous. On Monday a public tea meeting was held, when a goodly number sat down to enjoy a social meal together. The meeting commenced by singing and prayer, after which Mr. G. Hills was voted to the chair. In a few appropriate remarks he introduced the Rev. J. Read, who, according to announcement, delivered a lecture on "John Bunyan, the immortal dreamer." The rev. gentleman treated the subject in a masterly manner. Mr. R. Keal was called upon to read the report, showing the financial position of the chapel up to the present date. According to the report the debt remaining on the chapel is £120 2s. 6d. £100 of the first amount are owing to the Hon. G. F. Angus, that gentleman having lent the trustees £200 for four years without interest, to be repaid in eight instalments of £25 each half year—for which kindness the trustees desire to return the hon. gentleman their warmest thanks, as it has placed them in a position to get the chapel out of debt in a short time. Total amount realized by collections, seat rents, &c, £21 12s., leaving a deficiency of £3 8s. of the £25 due in a few days. Votes of thanks to the Chairman, and to the ladies for providing the tea having been carried, the Doxology was sung, and prayer being offered by the Rev. J. Read, brought to a close these interesting services.

* [We hope to bring our Intelligence in this department up to more reasonable dates in another month or two. Editor.]

CASTLEMAINE, VICTORIA.—In celebration of our chapel anniversary, at Green-Gully, on Lord's-day, July 13th, 1862, sermons were preached by the writer and Samuel Kelsall, Esq. The congregations were good, and we hope good was done. On the following Tuesday the annual tea meeting took place. The tables were richly and gratuitously laden by the members of the church, and, considering the unfavourable state of the weather—and that the inhabitants are thinly and widely scattered, some of them having to come three or four miles, the number who attended was very respectable. The public meeting was presided over by Mr. J. Williamson, and addressed by Messrs. Fbbetson, House, the writer, and Rev. G. T. Hall. The proceeds of the anniversary were a little over £7. There is no debt on the chapel, and it was thought by several of the friends that the time had come to make an effort towards erecting a more substantial and commodious one. Others were afraid, and pleaded that the old chapel might still do. But a gentleman in the meeting made a proposition which decided the matter, viz., that if nine persons would get or engage to give five pounds each, he would give five pounds. The proposition was warmly responded to, and the result is that, about £80 are guaranteed. You may, therefore, (D.V.) ere long expect to hear something more about the matter. May the Lord establish and bless the work of our hands.

GEORGE GREY.

P.S. Several souls have of late been converted in this circuit. Glory be to God!

G. G.

CASTLEMAINE, VICTORIA.—On Lord's day, July 13th, 1862, we opened for Divine worship a very neat and substantial church at Daylesford. Useful and impressive sermons were preached to attentive congregations, by the Rev. G. T. Hall, of Bendigo, and the Rev. S. Knight, (Wesleyan) Daylesford.

On the following day the ladies of the church gratuitously provided a first-class tea, to which, notwithstanding that the rain was fast descending, and the streets were about twelve inches deep in mud, a goodly number sat down. After the tables had been cleared, the public meeting commenced. Devotional exercises over, Captain Trewarther was called to the chair, and made a very appropriate speech, and then called upon the writer, the Rev. G. T. Hall, and the Rev. S. Knight, to successively address the meeting. The presence of our God was graciously manifested: we really felt it good to be there.

The church has a very chaste appearance. The cost, including fencing, &c., is about £155. The following sums have been realized: subscriptions, £43, opening services £37, total, £80. We have borrowed £70, at 8 per cent. per annum.

May God glorify this house of his glory. Amen.

GEORGE GREY.

WOLLONGONG AND FOX GROUND MISSION, NEW SOUTH WALES.—The Primitive Methodists at Mount Keira opened their new chapel for Divine worship on the 7th of August, 1862, when three sermons were preached: in the morning by the Rev. G. Charter, Congregational minister, Wollongong; and in the afternoon and evening, by the Rev. J. Langford, of Newtown. The congregations were large, and a gracious influence pervaded the meetings. On Monday a soiree was held to assist in paying for the building: a large, concourse of people was present on the occasion. After the tables were removed a public meeting was convened, the Mayor of Wollongong presided, and appropriate addresses were delivered by the Revs. J. Somerville (Wesleyan), G. Charter, and J. Langford. Including subscriptions, Sunday collections, and proceeds of the soiree, about £105 were raised in favour of the chapel fund, and it is expected that in about three months the building will be all but, if not completely, out of debt. The progress of the cause on this mission is exceedingly retarded for want of a resident minister, but the officials and members cling together and struggle for the advancement of the cause in a most praiseworthy manner. If ever any people merited the attention and assistance of the General Missionary Committee so do the members and friends on the Wollongong and Fox

Ground mission; and it is sincerely hoped that the General Missionary Committee will soon be able to send a married missionary to this place.

J. LANGFORD.

MARRICKVILLE, NEW SOUTH WALES.—The second anniversary of the Primitive Methodist Chapel, Marrickville, was celebrated on the 7th and 8th of September, 1862. On the Sabbath three sermons were preached, in the morning and evening by the Rev. N. Pidgeon, and in the afternoon by Mr. Gibson. On Monday evening a public tea meeting was held in the chapel, when a large number of people assembled to enjoy the rich repast gratuitously provided by the members of the church. After tea the public meeting was presided over by the Rev. J. Langford, and addressed by the Revs. T. C. Mell and N. Pidgeon. The whole of the services were of a very interesting kind, and there is not any room to doubt but that good and lasting impressions were made by the sermons and speeches. The collections on Sunday and Monday, including the proceeds of the tea, amounted to £15, which sum will enable the trustees to reduce the debt to about £33. During the past year they have expended a considerable amount in improvements. Our congregations are generally good, occasionally the chapel is made the birthplace of deathless spirits. O for an outpouring of the Holy Spirit, that speedily all may enjoy the love of God shed abroad in their hearts by the Holy Ghost given unto them!

JAMES LANGFORD.

LITERARY NOTICES.

The Duty: an argument on the Existence, Attributes, and Personal Distinctions of the Godhead. By WILLIAM COOKE, D.D. Second edition of "Theiotes," revised and enlarged. London: Hamilton, Adams, and Co., Paternoster row, and H. Webber, 21, Warwick lane. 1862.

WHEN "Theiotes" first appeared, its perusal afforded us no ordinary interest and pleasure: and now that it has exchanged its Greek for an English name, and has come forth in a second and revised edition, we are happy to offer its esteemed author our congratulations on its success. Few works in our tongue are so worthy of a thoughtful and repeated reading and study as this admirable volume. In these days of superficial scepticism, when secularism and its affiliated associations of nondescript misbelievers, are "playing such pranks before high heaven as might make the angels weep," and when even dignitaries of the State Church of this so-called Christian country are exhausting their mispent energies to overthrow the citadel of Christian truth, and leave us helpless orphans in a fatherless world, it is truly encouraging to find that works of the class to which this volume belongs are after all in good request; and that neither the fermenting trash with which the press of the nation is teeming, the drain upon the finances of the people at large, nor the ribald infidelity that is employing its sappers and miners incessantly at the base of Biblical and Theological truth, has been allowed to produce a stagnation in the demand for such works as this. The cloud has still its silver lining, and the desert its oases. We will, therefore, "be of good courage, and hope to the end."

If the present work had not been more than once noticed in this Magazine before, and if valuable extracts from it had not been given in our pages, we should have felt ourselves, in duty bound, to give a more lengthy notice of it than at present comports with our limits. Under existing circumstances, all we can do is to repeat the favourable testimony to the ability, candour, piety, learning, and usefulness of the volume, which our predecessors have given (which we most cordially do), and to urge all our readers who have not yet secured a copy of it to lose no time in procuring one.

A Prince in Israel; or, Sketches of the Life of John Ridgway, Esq. By the Rev. J. STACHT, author of "The Christian Sacraments," "The Church and the Age," &c. London: Hamilton, Adams, and Co., Paternoster Row. 1862.

MR. RIDGWAY was for many years well known and generally revered in the Staffordshire potteries, and among men of business and all classes of philanthropists he won golden opinions. But unless we mistake, he most excelled as a member and office-bearer in the Christian Church. He may have been a master in trade, and a leader in the walks of philanthropy, but he was a "PRINCE IN ISRAEL." Let none of our contemporaries stumble at this title. Surely the Methodist New Connexion is one of the tribes of Israel, and as assuredly John Ridgway was one of its princes. Every section of the church has its leading spirits and perhaps, all things considered, there are few such spirits more worthy of their position than was the honoured subject of this memoir. He possessed great native capacity, was early brought to the Saviour, consecrated to His service a long life, and no wonder if he lived to wield an extensive influence. There is no question that some men are born to rule, and when they have wisdom enough to rule wisely, let none envy their position. Mr. Ridgway was by no means a strait-laced sectarian; his heart was too warm, and his judgment too enlightened for that. Many of the churches of Staffordshire, in particular, can bear testimony to the orthodoxy of his spirit, and the liberality of his contributions. We once met him at a Primitive Methodist public meeting, over which he presided with his wonted urbanity and heartiness. It really does as good to feel that members of different portions of Christ's militant church are now on terms of amity and brotherhood, such as will hereafter develop into the oneness and harmony of the triumphant church before the throne. If we had more of the genial spirit of John Ridgway, earth would still more resemble heaven.

Notwithstanding the many "Lives" with which this writing and reading age abounds, there are few deserving of higher rank than this. Besides the claims of the subject of it, the superior talents of the author render it worthy of "double honour." Few men are fitter for the somewhat difficult and delicate task of a biographer, than the able author of this excellent book. Keen discernment, philosophical accuracy, elegant diction, lofty aims, and pervading piety distinguish the work. Many collateral subjects and contemporaneous men and events obtain a share of the writer's attention; but nothing really irrelevant, nothing requiring to be dragooned into position, just to show the writer's capability, or to fill up his volume,—nothing that we wish had been omitted, have we met with here. If, then, our readers will listen to us, we counsel them to take the first opportunity of obtaining, and of reading, marking, learning, and inwardly digesting the valuable work which is now before us.

An Exposition of the Prophecy of Hosea.

By the Rev. JEREMIAH BURROUGHS, rector of Tivetshall, Norfolk, 1643. Completed by the Rev. Thomas Hall, B.D., rector of King's Norton, and the Right Rev. Edward Reynolds, D.D., Bishop of Norwich. Revised and corrected by the late Rev. James Sherman, minister of Surrey Chapel. Edinburgh: James Nichol. London: J. Nisbet and Co. 1863.

Now we have another volume of the Nichol series of commentaries to which we called attention last month. This is a composite, being the production of three several authors. The greater portion of the work, however, is by Burroughs, and only five verses were expounded by Mr. Hall, and one chapter by Bishop Reynolds. The late James Sherman revised the whole work, and he very generously handed the stereotype plates of the work to Mr. Nichol for its re-publication. Excepting a few Calvinistic crotchets, and some antiquated and rather verbose passages, the work is well worthy of extensive patronage. Rich and beautiful thoughts often are to be found here, like the diamond in the midst of somewhat repulsive encrustations. In one of the prefaces we are told that the work had, like its devoted author (Burroughs), many narrow escapes!—

"Now among other arguments (good reader) to commend this excellent piece, this is one, That it has been brought to thy hand through several elements, having been in danger, part of it to be rotted in the earth where it was buried; part of it to be consumed in the fire wherewith much of the town where it was, flamed; part of it to be lost in by-holes where it was hidden in the midst of enemies." The reference to fire respects the town of Colchester, which was besieged and much of it burnt, while the original of a portion of the work was in the care of a friend residing there. We have great pleasure in recommending this valuable work to preachers and other students of prophetic scripture.

The Works of Thomas Goodwin, D.D., some time president of Magdalen College, Oxford. With General Preface by John C. Miller, D.D., Lincoln College; honorary canon of Worcester; rector of St. Martin's, Birmingham. And Memoir by Robert Halley, D.D., principal of the Independent New College, London. Vol. IV. containing: Christ Set Forth—The Heart of Christ in Heaven Towards Sinners on Earth—Aggravation of Sin—Encouragements to Faith—The Glory of the Gospel—A Discourse of the Glory of the Gospel—The Knowledge of God the Father and His Son Jesus Christ. Edinburgh: J. Nichol. London: J. Nisbet and Co.; Dublin: Robertson. 1862.

This volume of Mr. Nichol's series of the Puritan Divines well sustains the character won for the series by the foregoing ones. It contains some of the best pieces of the celebrated Goodwin; "Christ set forth," and "the Heart of Christ in Heaven Towards Sinners on Earth," being peculiarly valuable. The defects of Goodwin, in the estimation of Methodists, especially those of this generation, are his prolixity and his Calvinism. But allowing for these things, his works may be read to advantage by most persons. They are a treasury of puritan divinity. We trust the sale of the series will justify the experiment of the generous-spirited publisher.

Second Edition. An Old Methodist; or, Memoirs of Mrs. Jane Swallow, with Extracts from her Diary and Correspondence. By her Son, THOMAS SWALLOW, Primitive Methodist Minister. "She was a mother in Israel." The entire profits to be given to the Benevolent Fund. London: Richard Davies, Sutton Street, Commercial Road, E. Liverpool: G. Michelson, 42, Berry Street; and all Booksellers. 1862.

MRS. SWALLOW deserves to take rank with such devoted women as Mrs. Fletcher, Mrs. Rogers, Mrs. Judson, and others, as a woman of unwonted piety and unquestioned superiority of character. Her life, by her attached son, is alike creditable to subject and biographer. None can rise from a candid perusal of this book without being the better for the exercise. How desirable that mothers generally should imbibe the spirit of this excellent mother in Israel. She was a genuine old Methodist, and what is better, a very eminent Christian. Her son has becomingly enshrined the virtues of his sainted mother in this pithy volume, and while we thank him for his production, and for his generous offer of the profits of its sale to our Benevolent Fund, we commend his labour of love to all our female friends, and to all others who are willing to help our widows, orphans, and worn-out preachers, at the same time that they are promoting their own spiritual instruction and edification. We are glad to see the work has so soon reached a second edition, and hope shortly to find it has reached a third and a fourth. We should not omit to mention that the present edition is embellished with a beautiful portrait of the sainted woman.

Salem's Harp; being Hymns and Poems on miscellaneous subjects. By PARKINSON MILSON, minister of the Gospel. London: R. Davies; Leeds: J. Parrott, Briggate. May be had of Primitive Methodist Ministers. 1863.

HERE is a new volume of poetry by a Primitive Methodist minister. A devoted and successful Itinerant preacher, who has courted the muses in occasional moments of leisure and relaxation, but has also been honoured by them at times when most men are too much absorbed in the prosaic nature of their work (as in travelling home from a country appointment in a winter's night), to hold converse with such fickle and fanciful visitors. We are happy to say we find the ring of the genuine coin in these pieces. Mr. Milson is more than a mere poetaster; he is a true poet. We have always thought that true piety is favourable to true poetry, and unless we much misjudge, our author supports our theory.

In this little book, the best edition of which sells at a shilling, there is considerable compass of theme; we meet now with a piece on the moon, and anon with a piece on the sea; now with lines on the New Jerusalem, and anon with lines on hell. A poetical memorial of the venerable W. Clowes, and verses on the Rev. J. Wesley's preaching on the tomb of his father, lines on the fires of Smithfield, and others on the ruins of Louth Park Abbey, some verses on the Christian warrior, and others addressed to our widowed Queen, are also contained in the volume. Prose, likewise, of no slight interest, accompanies the poetry. An able article on Smithfield, and another on Epworth and Wesley, for example.

On the whole, we deem this a very respectable little work, and shall rejoice in its rapid and extensive circulation.

The Temperance Congress of 1862. London: Published for the National Temperance League, by W. Tweedie, 337, Strand. Half-a-crown.

AMONG the interesting and important events of the by-gone year, there will hold high rank in the estimation and memory of many an Englishman, for many long years to come, besides the great International Exhibition, several other great gatherings, to which the Exhibition lent attraction and stimulus. And among such gatherings, the Sunday School Convention and the two Temperance Congresses may claim a leading position. Here we have a report of one of those Congresses, and a very respectable report it is. It extends to upwards of 200 pages, octavo, chiefly in bourgeois and breviter type, and therefore it contains no very limited amount of matter. It embodies the ripe thought of many of the leading temperance philanthropists—ministers, medical men, men of science, and others; and presents the temperance question as in a kaleidoscope, affording a lucid view of the multifarious aspects of this great physiological, medical, economical, social, moral, political, and patriotic movement. Papers were read at the Congress by a number of gentlemen and ladies whose names are a tower of strength, and whose views on the subjects discussed most candid persons will treat with respect; and those papers are given in extenso in these pages.

The report, therefore, is no commonplace affair; and to all who wish to see the noble temperance enterprise fairly represented, and thoroughly expounded, it will be a valuable boon. Both friends and enemies would do well to examine it; and we advise all who wish to refresh their memory, or to read up, on the subject, to give this work a place in their libraries. It will be found, of course, that the merits of the different papers are unequal; but while all are good, it would be invidious to particularize. We have no hesitation in giving the report our hearty commendation.

Lectures to the People, delivered in Sheffield during the winter of 1857-58, by the Rev. HENRY BATCHELOR, now of Elgin-place, Glasgow. Second edition. London: Ward and Co., Paternoster Row.

THESE lectures were delivered by an able Congregational minister, on Sabbath afternoons, in the important town of Sheffield, after much the same fashion, and, of course, with much the same objects, as the lectures to working men which, within the last few years, have attained considerable notoriety in many towns in the kingdom. Many of the subjects are peculiarly interesting, and the style is generally very appropriate and telling. While some of the lectures have a local, and others a temporary interest, mainly, the majority of them may be read to good purpose at any place, and at all times. Some very eloquent passages occur in them, and many important lessons are supplied by them. We should be glad if all the working men who have leisure, could and would, in this season of comparative scarcity of employment, give these lectures a careful and prayerful perusal.

The True and Beautiful in Man's Spiritual Experience. By the Rev. HENRY GILL, author of "Early at the Temple." London: Ward and Co.

BEAUTIFUL without and TRUE within. So at least the work appears to us, with very slight exceptions in the latter particular. It is much like H. Ward Beecher's "Life Thoughts," which have gained great popularity on this side the Atlantic, as well as the other. Pithy paragraphs, all like the members of the body, distinct and yet connected. A leading principle permeates all—love to God and love to man. Bright touches of thought ever and anon turn up on the subject of that experience which is distinctively Christian. It is a suitable book for snatches of time, such as busy people sometimes like to fill up with a paragraph from a good author. If a celebrated Frenchman could write a voluminous work while waiting from day to day for his meals, how many a work might be read in similar circumstances! If our readers have a mind to try the experiment, suppose they start with "The True and Beautiful" as No. 1.

"To Be, or Not to Be?" or, Man's Present and Future Condition Considered. By the author of "The Triple Judgment," &c., &c. London: W. Freeman, 102, Fleet Street. 1862.

A PLAIN, unpretentious, but sensible book, on the destiny of mankind. The author lays no claim to originality of thought or argument, but he brings the doctrine of Divine revelation as to man's future existence into decisive prominence, and clearly enough shows that nature and science, if they do not dogmatically teach, at least strikingly illustrate the doctrine of man's immortality, and especially the resurrection of his body. We have no doubt but the perusal of the arguments and illustrations with which this chaste and tasty volume abounds, will render very valuable succour to many minds, and we wish for the work an extensive circulation.

Jesus our Ark. By J. CHRISTIAN, Monghier. London: W. Freeman, 162, Fleet-street. 1862.

AMID much that is unexceptionable in this volume, we regret that there are some things of a contrary character. The author's views do not appear to be very exalted or enlightened either as to science or revealed truth. We believe he means well, but he had better have reconsidered his subject before committing his thoughts to the press. Methodist readers will do well to recollect the old motto—"Cum grano salis" going through this production.

Pastor Gossner—his life, labours, and persecutions. By the Rev. Dr. PROCHNOW, Berlin. With preface and introductory chapter, by Mrs. WITBRECHT. With engraved frontispiece. London: Morgan and Chase, 3, Amen-corner, Paternoster-row, E.C.

AN interesting life of an extraordinary man; a Roman Catholic Priest for many years in Russia, he was, nevertheless, a very earnest and eminently successful preacher of the gospel. He was the George Whitfield of the Russian metropolis, in so far as zeal and success were concerned.

It will do a Primitive Methodist good to ponder the history of this remarkable man. We have great satisfaction in recommending the work to all our readers.

The Homilist. A Monthly Pulpit Review. January, 1883. No. I. Third Series, price ninepence. London: W. Kent & Co., Paternoster Row.

We have good reason for saying the "Homilist" is a favourite with many of our readers, especially many of our preachers—itinerant and local—chiefly, perhaps, the junior portion of them. And if rightly read and used, it is well they should continue their patronage to it. For we deem it one of the most thoughtful, fresh, and suggestive, of all the periodicals issuing from the religious press of this country. We have occasionally met with sentiments no genuine Methodist could endorse, and expressions that savoured very much of Anglo-Germanism; but we believe the able editor has improved in his style of thought and utterance as he has advanced with his work; and of the present number we have nothing to say but good. If our brethren will be content to use the work as its editor designs, there will be no harm in the supercession of "The Pulpit Assistant," "Continental Sketches," "The Pulpit," "The Pulpit Cyclopaedia," "Simmons's Outlines," "Barrett's Sketches," or any similar work, by the successive numbers of the "Homilist." Dr. Thomas is a man of considerable originality and force of mind, and if his readers will seek a development of their own powers, instead of a slavish use of the products of his, we believe it will be quite agreeable to his purpose, and certainly much better for them. Primitive Methodist preachers, at all events, should not be mere memoriter, and more especially, not mere plagiaristic speakers; but while culling other men's thoughts, and appropriating what is good, in a proper way, they should also think for themselves, and preach their own thoughts, and their own words—above all using freely those "which the Holy Ghost teacheth." There are more important things in these days than fine, flashy sermons—namely those sermons that come from the heart of a preacher, who is "full of the Holy Ghost and of faith," and reach the hearts of his hearers, exciting the cry, "What shall we do to be saved?" giving occasion for the angels of heaven to rejoice because sinners are brought to penitence and salvation. Let us all seek a renewed baptism of Pentecostal fire, and then shall we be likely to witness Pentecostal success. To our junior preachers we would say in all kindness and affection, study the sermons of Wesley, the lives of Fletcher, Bramwell, Oxtohy, Beurne, and Clowes; and above all the Sermon on the Mount, and the Epistles of Paul, and pray and labour to understand "the travail in birth for souls," till Christ anoint you with power from on high, and you become emphatically "able ministers of the New Testament." The Church expects this at your hands; the perishing souls around you demand it; the present and future prosperity of our beloved Zion depend much upon it. Thousands of prayers are ascending to heaven in your behalf. O may they be answered!

---

OBITUARY.

---

Died, at Castleisle, in the County of Durham, in the Shotley Bridge circuit, March 26th, 1862, ROBERT COULTER, aged fifty-eight years. He was born April 4th, 1804, at Whitehaven, in the county of Cumberland.

His parents walked in the midst of spiritual darkness, and lived without God, and without hope in the world; consequently no pious influences were brought to bear upon the minds of their children, and no Christian example was placed before them; so that in early life, Robert became addicted to hard drinking and other sinful habits, and lived in all respects after the course of this world, till he was thirty-seven years of age; during which time he changed his residence from one place to another till he finally settled down at Castleisle.

At this place about twenty-one years ago, under the ministry of the Wesleys, he became convinced of his lost state as a sinner, and was enabled to embrace gospel salvation through faith in Jesus Christ. Having given his heart to God, he at once gave his hand to his people, and united in church membership with the Wesleyan Society at Castleisle, of which he remained a steady member till about three years ago, when circumstances occurred which led him to believe it would be to his own spiritual advantage to leave the Wesleys and unite with the Primitive Methodist Society; and in this belief he did so, and never afterwards had to regret it.

From the day on which he joined our Society till he was called to be numbered amongst the happy spirits above, he walked worthy of his holy vocation, and placed a consistent example before the church and the world.

He was strongly attached to the house of God, and regular in his attendance at all the means of grace, except when prevented by affliction. He was a plain, humble, praying, earnest, and consistent Christian, and as far as his ability would allow, he laboured hard to glorify God and benefit his fellow men; so that his simple, earnest piety had gained the respect of all who knew him.

For some time before his decease, it was clear that his general health was failing, and that his once strong constitution was giving way to the power of disease, brought on by working many years in a lead mine. But as the outward man decayed his inward man was renewed day by day. It was evident to his friends that he was ripening for glory; frequently, whilst speaking his experience in the class, he has been heard to say, "I am going home to glory, and I shall soon be there."

His last affliction was short and severe, viz., inflammation of the lungs, which in the course of a fortnight terminated his mortal life, and placed him in the grave. His sufferings were great, but his patience was exemplary; not a single murmur escaped his lips, but he was in all things perfectly resigned to the will of God, and when not delirious, his mouth was filled with prayer and praise.

A few days before he died, he took an affectionate farewell of most of his children, to whom he spoke in tones of love and solemn tenderness, charging them to meet him in heaven.

One of his class-mates visited him, to whom he said, "Live to God, strive to be useful. I am dying, you are young and strong to labour; try to do all the good you can while you live."

His leader, brother Matcalf, sat up with him the last night he lived, and when he asked him how he felt in the near prospect of death, he broke out into earnest prayer and rapturous praise, expressive of his strong confidence and holy joy in the Saviour, and thus triumphantly he passed away from earth to join the redeemed "beyond the glittering starry skies."

He has left a widow and nine fatherless children to mourn their sad bereavement. But they do not "sorrow as those without hope," as "their loss is his infinite gain." May they and the writer meet him in heaven, where "The Lamb which is in the midst of the throne shall feed them, and shall lead them unto living fountains of waters, and God shall wipe away all tears from their eyes."

W. NATION.

On Monday, April 7th, 1862, WILLIAM CLARKE died happy in the Lord at Dauntsey, near Brinkworth, Wilts, aged twenty-two years. Born in very humble circumstances, he was necessitated to go to work in very early life. Consequently his education was sadly neglected. But very providentially his situations were most favourable for moral and religious training. He was impressed with strong convictions that he was a sinner, while attending the established church. But there he could find no peace. At length he happened to attend a prayer meeting held at Tockenham, Brinkworth Circuit, and feeling surprised at seeing the whole congregation on their knees earnestly praying, he believed they were seeking for God's blessing, and that was just what he wanted; immediately he followed the example, and went as a penitent to the throne of grace. God's praying host were instantly engaged in his behalf. William cried with all his might, and believed with all his heart. The Lord heard his cries, and brought him out of all his troubles by making him happy in the blood of Jesus. That was about five years and six months ago. He was admitted into society, and became a warm, useful, and exemplary member. His conduct both private and public was highly commended by all who knew him. He maintained a most consistent walk as a professor of religion. His services will be greatly missed, as he made himself so generally useful, especially on public occasions. He was quite an example to young men for his activity in doing good and liberality to the cause of God. In the early part of January last he was taken ill with a severe cold. Medical advice was sought, but little or no relief was obtained. His affliction rapidly increased, and brought on a consumption which soon terminated his useful career. In health he had a ruddy countenance, and generally looked happy. He was greatly loved by all his class, and had the unbounded confidence of his employer. In affliction he was patient and resigned. I visited him several times and always found him happy in Jesus, ready to depart whenever the Lord should see fit to take him. At one time there was room for cherishing a fond hope that he would again recover. But, oh, how deceptive is disease! It came back with redoubled force, and almost suddenly took our young brother into the eternal world; but not without his leaving a testimony that he was going to be with Christ which is far better. His end was peace.

J. HILL.

ELEANOR CREECH of Castletown, Isle of Man, was born in the year 1794. During the early part of her life she lived according to the course of this world ; but about the year 1842, through a sermon preached by Brother T. Jobling, on "The Prodigal Son," it pleased the Lord to awaken her to a sense of her condition, when she conferred not with flesh and blood, but with deep contrition mourned over her sins, ventured her all on the atoning blood of Christ, and obtained peace through faith in Christ. She at once united in church fellowship with us, and up to the time of her death was a steady and consistent member. She was constant in her attendance at the means of grace; if any one was to be found there, it was sister Creech. If any of the members absented themselves from the class, she on the first opportunity failed not to ask the reason of their absence, and she would often faithfully reprove them. Her illness was short and severe; she suffered about five weeks, during which time she frequently spoke of her hope in Christ, and her assurance of salvation. On being visited by her leader and the writer, she gave the greatest satisfaction as to her acceptance, and her willingness to depart and be with Christ. On Sunday, March 16th, she died in peace, aged sixty-eight years. S. S.

Died recently at Sheffield, SUSANNAH REANEY. She was a very worthy member of our Society at Bethel, Sheffield, and made it a rule never to engage in service, unless she could have the positive promise that she should meet in class with, and attend at stated times the religious services of, our people.

At the class, in the band-meeting, and at the prayer-meeting, she gave convincing proof that she was growing in grace, and living prepared to die. I saw her at her grandfather's funeral, (the late Mr. Bingham). She came to me and spoke of her aged relative's glorious finish, and while tears flowed down her cheeks, she said, with almost choking feeling, "It's all for the best." A week after she was at the class, and referring to her grandfather's death, she said, "I think sometimes I shall not be long after him." So it was. That was the last time she was at class, the last time she was at the means of grace. The following Saturday, with difficulty she was conveyed home, and the next Tuesday she went to join her grandfather in a happier clime. How mysterious! With greater appropriateness, and with as true submission to God's will, we say concerning her, cut off in the bloom of womanhood, what she said of her grandfather just before following him to his grave, "It's all for the best." It may not appear to some to be so; but it is so. If 'tis ours to go as suddenly, may we go quite as safely. J. G. SMITH.

Died at Aldwark Grange, in the Winster Circuit, March 13th, 1862, WILLIAM, the son of William and Lydia BARNESLEY, aged twenty-seven years. In early life he was the subject of deep and serious impressions; in the year 1848, he attended a Revival service at Ible, conducted by Mr. Joseph Harrison, and obtained the blessing of forgiveness of sins. His conduct for fourteen years was consistent with his profession. A day or two before death he quoted those beautiful lines:—

"O, love, thou bottomless abyss!
My sins are swallow'd up in Thee;
Cover'd is my unrighteousness,
Nor spot of guilt remains on me;
While Jesus' blood through earth and skies,
Mercy, free, boundless mercy, cries."

W. PRICE.

Died at Hedon, in the Hull Second Circuit, March 8th, 1862, LOUISA ANDERSON, aged twenty-four years. She was converted to God about eleven years ago, and from that time to the day of her death, her conduct at home and abroad, was such as became a Christian. She possessed an intelligent mind, and a mild and amiable disposition, which, under the ennobling and sanctifying influences of grace made her an obedient child, an affectionate sister, a cheerful companion, and a highly esteemed member of our Society. She was most regular in her attendance at the means of grace; and when untoward circumstances compelled our people to discontinue for a while their services at Hedon, Louisa would plod her way two, and often three times on the Sabbath day, to Preston, an adjoining village. The bitter blast and piercing cold of winter did not prevent her from taking her accustomed seat in the sanctuary. About four years ago that fatal disease consumption first made its appearance in her system. During her long affliction she was never once known to murmur, but she bore all with the most Christian patience and resignation. As death approached she endured great spiritual conflict, and was tempted to think Christianity was a fable; but on the night of her death, while a few friends prayed around her couch, she obtained a complete victory, and repeatedly burst forth in prayer and praise. "The valley," she said, "is lighted up all the way through." "Thou wilt not leave me, Lord. I feel leaving my parents, but the will of the Lord be done." Such a glory filled the room as will not soon be forgotten. H. WOODCOCK.

Died at Ripley, Derbyshire, March 23rd, 1862, MARY BAMPFORD, in the sixty-sixth year of her age. From early life she was strictly moral, and attended the house of God. She was converted to God about nineteen years since, and united with the church, and lived a consistent life until death terminated her earthly sojourn. Soon after her conversion she removed into Yorkshire, and while there she "witnessed a good confession before many witnesses." She travelled many miles to the means of grace; dark nights, and cold weather did not prevent her being there; she loved God's house, and not only went herself, but oft invited her neighbours to go with her. She had a large family, and her husband was unconverted; she had therefore much to contend with; but she was "more than conqueror through Him that loved her." When she returned to Ripley, she joined the church again, and for some time met in Brother Meakin's class. He says that her experience was clear, sound, and Scriptural. She was zealous in the cause she had espoused, and felt concerned for the welfare of her family. She prayed much for their conversion to God. Her last affliction was severe and protracted, but patience had its perfect work; she never murmured, nor wished her sufferings less. Her anchor was cast within the veil. As she drew near the grave she became more matured in grace. A few days before she died I called (in company with the Rev. J. Barfoot, of Belper,) to see her; we talked to her and prayed with her, and found her ready to go. Her language was:—

"Wisdom to aliver we prefer,
And gold is dross compared to her."

She talked sweetly about Jesus Christ, and when her voice failed, she raised her hand as the expression of her conquest in Him.

J. STEPHENSON.

"A time to die."

The truthfulness of these words has been realised at Canning Town, London Third Circuit, by the death of Mrs. E. PALMER, seven years a Christian and consistent member of the church. She was converted on 21st February, 1855, and died on 21st February, 1862, aged twenty-seven years.

During her last illness she maintained Christian patience and fortitude. She was unspeakably happy, and was often heard to say, "Come, Lord Jesus, come quickly, and take my happy spirit home." She is now at home. J. B. HORBERRY.

Died at St. Ives, Hunts, March 12th, 1862, HENRY TWEET, aged fifty-one. About seventeen years ago under the ministry of the Primitive Methodists, he was led to see his state as a sinner, and was enabled to believe to the saving of his soul. He soon gave his hand to God's people, and said, "This people shall be my people, and their God my God." His path was as the shining light that shineth more and more unto the perfect day. He was anxious that his neighbours should be brought to a saving knowledge of the truth, and laboured to bring them to God; and his efforts were not in vain. He was an assistant class-leader, and a member of the Branch Committee. A short time before his sickness, which was unto death, he was unusually happy in the prayer meeting, and exclaimed, "If I were now to die, I should go to heaven!" A short time after he was attacked with fever and inflammation, and although his sufferings appeared to be very great, his mind was stayed upon God and he was kept in perfect peace. He said to a friend who visited him, "Bless God, I shall soon be in heaven!" His end was peace.

E. WAITS.

Died at Patricroft, in the Manchester Third Circuit, March 1st, 1862, JOHN STONE, in the sixty-seventh year of his age. Of his early history I know but little, but his own statement is that he lived without the comforts of religion until the year 1835, when Brother G. Betts missioned the neighbourhood of Bury St. Edmunds, and the word preached came with power to his heart: he then sought and found pardon and peace through believing in Jesus.

Soon after his conversion, he removed with his family to Patricroft. During his pilgrimage he was the subject of many trials and much affliction, but out of all the Lord delivered him. His experience was simple and Scriptural. He had humble views of himself, but exalted views of the Saviour. His love for the cause of God was exhibited by his liberal contributions for its support, and his constant attention to duty. He loved the house of God. During his last affliction, which was somewhat protracted, I visited him, and found him happy in God. That religion which was his stay in health, was his solace in affliction; that Saviour whom he served in life was his support in death. When approaching his end, I asked him if there was light in the valley, and he lifted up his hand in triumph. One of his daughters asked him if he was happy. "O yes," was his reply, "and there is the same happiness for you all."

W. JONES.

MONTHLY SUMMARY.

A MEMORIAL has recently been addressed to the Directors of those Railway Companies that run excursion trains on the Sabbath-day, urging them to discontinue the desecration of the Lord's-day by such a practice. The memorial was signed by all the Bishops of the Establishment, with the exception of the Bishop of Hereford, who, though he did not sign, expressed his approval of the object of the memorialists. And though the secular press has taken their lordships to task for this (so-called) attempted encroachment on the liberty of the people, and undue interference the enjoyments of the working classes, this is only what might be expected from those who know not God, nor regard the sanctities of the holy day. The reasons adduced in support of the prayer of the memorial are:—

"1. That we are of opinion that it is in accordance with the will of God, and essential to the well-being of man, that the Lord's-day be kept holy for the worship of God, and the performance of religious duties.

"2. Because excursion trains become a temptation to many to make Sunday a day of dissipation, and thereby tend to demoralize them (and those with whom they come in contact).

"3. Because while we are anxious to secure the working classes the relaxation which they need, we believe that the object can be obtained without encouraging the practice of travelling on the Lord's-day; as, for example, by affording them an opportunity of travelling at a cheap rate on a week-day.

"4th. Because excursion trains deprive both the company's servants, and many persons in the places to which they run, of the weekly day of rest, which they all require, as accountable beings, with a view to preparation for eternity.

"5th. Because we are persuaded that the more rest you allow your servants on the Lord's-day the more efficient they will be, both morally and physically, for your service.

"Believing therefore that Sunday excursion trains are wrong in themselves, and injurious both to the public and to the Railway Companies, we earnestly hope you will add the weight of your example to that of several of the other leading Railway Companies and refrain from running them."

Similar memorials have been sent to the same parties by the Congregationalists, the Wesleyans, the Methodist New Connexion, the London Presbyterians, from several parishes and congregations in London and the neighbourhood,—among which were one from 1365 inhabitants of East London, and one from 1409 working men in the same locality,—and from the society for promoting the due observance of the Lord's Day. The movement has our best wishes.

We are glad to see that in some parts of the country efforts are being put forth with the object of securing the closing of public houses on the Sabbath. Any Christian, one should think, would be heartily glad to see these efforts crowned with success.

The Sabbath services in the London theatres have been resumed, and from what we hear we presume they are well attended, and doing some good. The Sabbath evening services in St. Paul's Cathedral have also recommenced, and the first Sabbath evening in the year the Bishop of London preached to about 3,000 persons.

The Bishops of Winchester and Rochester have spoken out against the book of the Bishop of Natal, and the Bishop of Rochester has written a strong request to his brother of Natal, who is at present in this country, to refrain from taking part in any service in his diocese. Dr. Lushington has pronounced judgment in the court of Arches against Dr. Williams and Mr. Wilson, two of the writers in the "Essays and Reviews," depriving them of their livings and status for one year, and mulcting them in expenses. But they have appealed to the Judicial Committee of Privy Council, and therefore "the end is not yet."

Lord Ebury has written to the daily papers on the spiritual destitution of the Metropolis, and he very earnestly urges on the Church of England the duty of working side by side with the Nonconformists, to promote the evangelization of the masses, instead of treating their dissenting brethren as though they were Papists or Infidels.

The Nonconformist Bicentenary fund has reached £152,000. Chapel building, school extension, and kindred objects are to be promoted thereby. How is the Primitive Methodist Jubilee fund doing in comparison with this?

Something has been said lately on the desirableness of an amalgamation of the Nonconforming churches, such as the Congregationalists, the Baptists, and the Presbyterians of England. Several emi-next names, such as those of Dr. Macfarlane, Howard Hinton, and Samuel Martin are mixed up with the subject. We must wait to see if anything comes of the discussion. In the meantime it seems some dissatisfaction is being displayed with the mode in which Dissenting ministers are in some instances ordained, especially when prayers that have been previously prepared, are actually read at such services.

Most of the religious denominations are collecting and contributing large funds in aid of the Lancashire operatives, and the sum raised by the Wesleyans amounts, according to last reports, to more than £31,000. This is a much more agreeable announcement than the one which says that, between November, 1859, and October, 1862, there was subscribed in this and other lands, in aid of the falling fortunes of the Pope, the sum of 5,150,000 crowns, under the name of Peter's peace.

Several of the services for special prayer, held during the week, January 4th—11th, seem to have been well sustained, and were doubtless productive of good.

A novel kind of revival meeting has recently been held in Ireland. It seems that for a series of years, a savage system of faction fights has been carried on in a district of Tipperary, between different portions of the papal church. The origin of the dispute was a difference of opinion on the age of a bull; from which the opposite parties took the names of the "Three year olds," and the "Four year olds." Lately an archbishop made an endeavour to put an end to the quarrel which had been attended from time to time with rancour, bloodshed, and murder. Besides addressing a pastoral letter to these members of his flock, he sent some missionaries, under the title of "Redemptionist Fathers," to hold a sort of "revival meetings," among the people. The missionaries, or revivalists, held a series of services night and day, apparently with considerable effect; and at last the archbishop himself appeared on the scene. And when relics had been duly exhibited, saints and angels invoked, masses said, eloquent discourses delivered, and supposed miracles abundantly performed, his grace took his seat by the altar, and summoned the members of the factions to appear before him. They came, they clasped each other's hands in impassioned conciliation, and vowed with fervent enthusiasm that they would never, no, never, quarrel anymore, nor even mention the obnoxious words that had hitherto been the rival battle cries. The archbishop might surely take up the language of Cæsar, and exultingly exclaim, "veni, vidi, vici!" "I came, I saw, I conquered!" We wish the reconciliation may be permanent.

But while we are glad to see a Romish Priest using his influence to effect a consummation so devoutly to be wished, we cannot rejoice over the doings of his brethren in other places. A terrible example of the persecuting spirit of the papacy is now exhibited in Spain, where a number of Protestants are imprisoned, and even sentenced to the galleys, for "the Word of God and the testimony of Jesus Christ." We hope next month to supply some remarkable information on this subject. Well may the French Emperor urge the pope to institute reforms in his administration in Rome, for both in the far-famed city and everywhere else, where his ebon sceptre prevails, deeds of darkness are the order of the day.

Right glad are we that, all the influence of the priests to the contrary notwithstanding, a Protestant church is now in course of erection at Naples. The land was generously granted by the illustrious Garibaldi, during his brief tenure of power there, and after many delays the foundation stone has been laid, and the first Protestant place of worship in Southern Italy is in a fair way for being completed.

The "Matilda Wattenbach," and the "Hanover," have safely arrived at Auckland, New Zealand, with the first cargo of Nonconformist settlers, for the colony of Albertland. The former vessel arrived on 8th, and the latter on the 18th of September last.

A powerful appeal on the subject of the American war and slavery, has recently been issued by a committee of correspondence in London, and signed by a large number of influential London and country ministers and laymen; and perhaps, a still more powerful document has been published by Mrs. Beecher Stowe, as a reply to an address sent to America, some years ago, by the ladies of England, calling on the ladies of America to use their influence for the overthrow of slavery. Mrs. Stowe writes in behalf of multitudes of women in America, who now call for the sympathy of their English sisters to sustain them, and their fathers, husbands, brothers, and sons, in their present endeavour to effect the liberation of the down-trodden sons of Ham. Would that this eloquent address could be read by every woman in the land. It is published as a small book, by Low, Ludgate-hill, London, price one shilling.

The terrible American war still continues, with small prospect of abatement. Let all British Christians pray that it be soon brought to a righteous termination, and that liberty to the slave may result from it. Primitive Methodism in Canada, we are happy to learn, still progresses, and so it does in the Australasian Colonies.

May the Connexion this year enjoy universal prosperity, and all the sections of the Redeemer's universal church be covered with the divine glory.

POETRY.

THE INNER CALM.

Calm me, my God, and keep me calm
While these hot breezes blow;
Be like the night-dew's cooling balm,
Upon earth's fever'd brow.

Calm me, my God, and keep me calm,
Soft resting on thy breast;
Soothe me with holy hymn and psalm,
And bid my spirit rest.

Calm me, my God, and keep me calm;
Let thine outstretched wing
Be like the shade of Elim's palm,
Beside her desert-spring.

Yes, keep me calm, tho' loud and rude
The sounds my ear that greet,— Calm in the closet's solitude,
Calm in the bustling street.

Calm in the hour of buoyant health,
Calm in my hour of pain,
Calm in my poverty or wealth,
Calm in my loss or gain.

Calm in the sufferance of wrong,—
Like Him who bore my shame;
Calm 'mid the threatening taunting throng,
Who hate thy holy name.

Calm when the great world's news with power
My listening spirit stir;
Let not the tidings of the hour
E'er find too fond an ear.

Calm as the ray of sun or star,
Which storms assail in vain;
Moving unruffled thro' earth's war;
The eternal calm to gain.

DR. BONAR.

THE DYING CHRISTIAN TO HIS FRIENDS.

For me "to die is gain."—Philippians i. 21.

O DRY those tears which flow so fast,
From all your grief refrain,—
Soon will my sufferings all be past,—
For me "To die is gain."

Ah, why should fears your bosom swell,
Or parting cause you pain?
"My Jesus has done all things well,"—
For me "to die is gain."

While thousands only long for life,
And toil for earthly fame,
Through years of tumult, noise, and strife,—
For me "to die is gain."

The joys of earth which charm the gay,
Are only joys in name;
As shadows they shall pass away,—
For me "to die is gain."

I fled in life's sweet morn to Him
Who was for sinners slain;
His blood still cleanses me from sin,—
For me "to die is gain."

'Tis life indeed, to live to Christ,
While here I still remain;
And life in death, to feel I'm His,—
For me "to die is gain."

My soul has oft desired to reach,—
While on life's stormy main,—
This holy calm, this heavenly beach,—
For me "to die is gain."

Delightful thought! I soon shall rest
From sorrow, sin, and shame;
And feel with millions of the blest,—
For me "to die is gain."

Newark.

P. DAYKIN.

Yours Truly
Edward Rust

Born Nov<sup>r</sup> 26 1813

Engraved by T. W. Hunt.

THE Primitive Methodist Magazine.

---

MARCH, 1863.

---

B I O G R A P H Y .

MEMOIR OF THE REV. M. TINSLEY.

MARSHALL TINSLEY, late of North Walsham, in the county of Norfolk, was an itinerant minister in our Connexion. He was born at Balderton, in Nottinghamshire, in 1818. He was the son of Marshall and Bridget Tinsley, who lived in the fear of the Lord, and took great pains to train up their children in the way they should go, combining with their instruction, fervent prayer and supplication on their behalf at the throne of grace. As they belonged to the poor, they were unable to bestow upon their children a liberal education.

The subject of this memoir was brought to God when about sixteen years of age; he then became a member of our society, and continued a zealous, consistent Christian to the end of his life. Shortly after his conversion, his name appeared on the circuit's plan, and he laboured in the capacity of a local preacher about four years, and had success in warning sinners to flee from the wrath to come. In 1838, he was called to the work of the ministry by the Fulbeck Circuit, and from that time until 1843 he laboured on the following stations—Fulbeck, Bury, Isle of Man, Preston Brook, and Chester,—with some tokens of Divine approval. By the Conference of 1843 he was re-stationed at Chester, but North Walsham being in need of a preacher, he was given up to that station. Here he enjoyed the sympathy of the people, and by the blessing of God witnessed an increase of members. His next station was Wangford, where he saw the salvation of God in the conversion of sinners,—about one hundred being added to society. He thence removed to Stowmarket, in Suffolk, and in this station I understand he was the means of doing good to some whom he found in the way to ruin.

From 1846 to 1848 he laboured on the Hadleigh Circuit, where I believe he had to endure some severe trials; but he prayed, "Save me, O God, for the waters are come in unto my soul ;" and many deliverances he realized. By the Conference of 1848 he was appointed to Brandon, where he laboured two years, and left an increase of members. He next removed to Rockland, where after labouring earnestly and suffering patiently until 1852, it was his painful lot to have to report a small decrease.

Swaffham, Aylsham, Wangford, Wisbeach, and Briston next in succession shared his labours, until 1861. He was then stationed the second time to North Walsham ; and on his entering his station he appeared in a low, nervous state, having recently interred a beloved wife and an interesting daughter in the cemetery of this town. After some time, however, he became more cheerful, and the friends remarked they never saw him look so well. Appearances are proverbially deceptive : and so it was here. For our friend soon sickened and died. The cause of his death was gastric fever, from which he suffered extremely during the fourteen days of his affliction ; but in the midst of all he enjoyed a calm and tranquil state of mind : having laid the foundation of his hope on the Rock, it was unshaken "Amidst the jar of cleaving pain."

He departed this life June 27th, 1862, aged forty-four years, with a firm assurance that the blood of Christ cleanseth from all sin. May all who read these lines realize its cleansing virtue.

Those who knew Mr. Tinsley say he was a good man, and possessed a benevolent disposition. He was an affectionate husband and father, and a kind friend to the poor. But his work is done, and he now enjoys his reward. May the reader and the writer meet him in heaven.

W. DOLMAN.

MEMOIR OF THE REV. R. FENWICK.

ROBERT FENWICK was born at Haslingden in 1837. During his boyhood he manifested a very spirited disposition of mind, and was at times very bad to manage ; but being blessed with pious parents, both of whom were members of our society, they endeavoured to train up their children in the fear of the Lord. His mother frequently spoke to him of good things, and used to exhort him to be a good boy ; and he would very seriously say, that he would some time become a good boy, and that he would also be a preacher. He was sent to our Sabbath-school, and it is said by his teachers that he was difficult to control for a time, but he had not been a scholar long before he began to manifest a serious concern for his soul's salvation. He sought the Lord by earnest prayer and deep penitence of heart, and wept bitterly on account of his sins ; but ultimately he was brought to see clearly the plan of salvation. He ventured his soul on the atonement of Christ, and obtained redemption through his blood, even the forgiveness of sins. He forthwith joined our society at his native place, and from this time he became a devoted follower of Christ. He was often found in private, wrestling with God in prayer. His class-meeting was a real delight to him. He was punctual in his attendance at the means of grace, and signs of adaptation for usefulness soon manifested themselves. Hence in 1854 his name was placed on the preachers' plan among those of exhorters, and in 1855 he was advanced to an approved preacher. He was attentive to his appointments, and was acceptable and useful in his public ministrations.

In April, 1859, he was called into the regular ministry by the Oldham Circuit, and laboured with great acceptance till July, 1860, when he was removed to Rochdale, where he was well received and very useful. He returned home in December of that year, evidently far gone in a consumption. His affliction was protracted and severe, and he often expressed a desire to recover that he might resume his labours. But when he was informed that there was no hope of his recovery, he cheerfully acquiesced, saying, "It is all right;" adding, "I am the Lord's, and he is mine."

He enjoyed perfect peace in prospect of his departure, which event occurred on the morning of Friday, April 5th, 1861, in the twenty-fourth year of his age and the second of his itinerancy. At his funeral a large number of friends from Oldham, Rochdale, and Haslingden were present. The Rev. R. Hill, his superintendent, delivered a short address, and the scene was very affecting. Many felt the force of that saying in the book of Ecclesiastes, "It is better to go to the house of mourning than to go to the house of feasting." May those that were present, and all that read this short sketch meet him in the better land. Amen.

T. HINDLEY.

[As I was in the Haslingden Circuit when Brother Fenwick was put on the plan, and was in the Oldham Circuit, as superintendent, when he was taken into the regular ministry, and repeatedly visited him after he became unable to labour, I may state that I have good reason to believe that he was a devoted young man, and was very much respected. He would have been useful to many, I doubt not, had his life been spared. But our loss is his infinite gain. By some oversight, no memoir of him has been prepared for the Magazine until now; but I give insertion to this short account as soon as it has come to hand.—Ed.]

MEMOIR OF THE REV. J. WALKER.

JAMES WALKER, son of the late Rev. J. Walker, Primitive Methodist minister, was taken out to travel by the Boston Circuit, January 18th, 1862, and died at Yarmouth, August 11th, 1862, aged twenty-one years. The following particulars have been received from Brother C. Gardiner:—I first became acquainted with Mr. W. when I was stationed at Yarmouth in 1858, my home being at his mother's. I had a good opportunity to ascertain his character and disposition. James lost his father when only six years of age. He was the eldest of four left to the care of his widowed mother. A sympathising friend at Manchester, Mr. Willett, adopted James as his son, gave him a liberal education, and would have placed him in a position to do well in life. But he became refractory and was sent home. He was then put apprentice to a slater in Yarmouth. About a year afterwards he formed an acquaintance with some young men who led him further into sin and folly. Unsteadiness, late hours, intemperance and corrupt language now were his traits. He became worse and worse, frequenting public houses, dancing, and ball rooms, &c., breaking through all restraint and casting aside religious impressions, the instruction and counsel of his pious mother, and of the ministers who took an interest in his welfare. These things greatly pained the mind of his kind and devoted mother, and drew forth many ejaculations that God would turn the bias of his mind; and we constantly remembered him at the throne of grace. But still he appeared to harden himself in sin, and to give place to sceptical principles.

For four months before his conversion he refused to kneel at the family altar, and annoyed us as much as possible when engaged there. This was very distressing to his family and myself. But bless God, at length a change took place! And what a glorious change! The lion was turned into a lamb. This occurred January 2nd, 1859, at twelve o'clock at night, in our bedroom. When I was talking to him on the importance of attending to the salvation of his soul, he fell suddenly on his knees, and cried for mercy; he prayed mightily, and in about twenty minutes obtained pardon. A more blessed season, I never experienced. We were singing and praying all night, and the next morning he took out of his pocket some cards and put them into the fire, saying, "There is an end of them; they had nearly been my ruin." The same week he joined Mrs. Smith's class, and signed the temperance pledge.

In June his name appeared on the Yarmouth plan among the exhorters; he was very earnest, and promised to be extensively useful. Favorable testimonials having been received from the Yarmouth officials, he was pledged by the Boston Circuit in March 1862. He attended the District Meeting at Melton Mowbray, and during his examination he was suddenly taken ill of gastric fever. Ten weeks elapsed before he could be removed home. The friends at Melton were exceedingly kind to him (although he was an entire stranger) and bore a large share of the heavy expenses incurred by his affliction. Boston and the other stations in the district have subscribed the rest. His family informs me that after his removal home his sufferings were of the severest nature, yet scarcely a murmur escaped his lips. Often when his physical strength was exhausted, he would say, "Now I am happy, those hours you think my worst, are my best: my soul is then in close communion with the Lord."

Often bathed in tears he complained of his own unworthiness, and in his letters to me he expressed his implicit confidence in the atonement.

On the morning of his death he took breakfast as usual. He was seized in half an hour after with a violent fit of coughing and vomiting blood, which continued thirty minutes. His mother perceiving he was near death said, "James, is all right between you and God? give me some token." As he could not speak he immediately lifted up his arm to indicate all was well. The arm dropped. The mortal affliction was past.

J. T. NEAL.

MEMOIR OF MR. ABRAHAM SYKES.

ABRAHAM SYKES, a class-leader in Dewsbury Circuit, was born at Dewsbury Moor, in the year 1786, and died at Gomersal, June 12th, 1862. His parents were of the humbler class of society, but decidedly pious being members of the Wesleyan Community. He followed the course of this world in his youthful days, and at an early period enlisted into the British army. It would appear his conduct as a soldier was good, hence he was sent out on a recruiting mission, and whilst thus engaged at Manchester he met with and married her who now mourns his loss. According to the terms of his enlistment he had now only three months to serve, but the French war breaking out, he was sent to encounter his country's foe, and was engaged in the desperate and memorable battles of Salamanca, and Badajoz, in which he beheld his comrades fall on either hand, whilst, doubtless in answer to a father's prayers, and a mother's entreaties, a kind Providence watched over and preserved him. At the termination of the war he was discharged, and joined his wife, who had begun to meet in Mr. Waller's class in Manchester; but on account of the nature of his employment—he being a miner,—he located at Marsden, near Burnley. About this time he surrendered his rebellious will, and by faith in a crucified Redeemer, embraced the free, sovereign, forgiving mercy of God, joyfully experiencing

"Jesus and all in him are mine."

This happy change was wrought in the year 1821, his first ticket bearing date October. Not by any particular human agency was he converted, but as he always acknowledged, he was gently drawn by the Spirit of God, in answer to the prayers offered by his parents on his behalf. There being no Primitive Methodists in Marsden, in order to meet in class, and sit under the preaching of God's Word, he and his wife had to walk to Burnley, taking with them what family they had. But an ardent thirst for the conversion of his fellow men, a travelling in birth for souls—which always characterized him—induced him to open his house at Marsden for preaching, and for the meeting of a class. Although on this account, contumely and persecution were heaped upon him, yet he trusted in God—the work prospered, and some eight or ten joined the class. But a strike taking place amongst the miners, all left except himself and his wife. This to our departed brother was a very trying time, the enemies of the cross exulted, and the cry was raised that there were only a “Ranter and a half,” left in Marsden. But though tried, he was not cast down nor forsaken; he believed Marsden was destined to become a fruitful field. For this end he made it his constant study how to win souls to Christ, and when engaged at his daily toil in the bowels of the earth, he would frequently cry mightily to God for a revival of his work—no matter who pointed the finger of scorn,—his motto being—

“Wicked men I’m not to fear.”

Sometimes he would go into the “hole” where some of his fellow-miners were at work, and pour out his soul to God in earnest, believing prayer for their conversion, though frequently threatened with bodily harm if he did not desist. My informant was one by whom he was thus treated. But God often works by very humble means, our friend saw conviction was produced—for a mightier power than human was at work. God triumphed, and my informant was the second person to come forward to help to form another class, and he is still a member with us at Marsden. When those forming the first class had to leave the neighbourhood, an attempt was made to take Marsden off the plan, but on our brother’s asking the question, “Will you keep it on if I will pay for twelve members?” the matter dropped. One Sabbath, being without a preacher, they applied to the Rev. M. Lee, then travelling in the circuit, for a supply; but he could not meet the case unless they could prevail upon his wife to go;—she went, God blessed the Word, several souls were converted, one backslider was reclaimed, and the struggling cause received an impetus which it never afterwards lost.

It was the custom of our friend to call his class together on Saturday evenings for singing, prayer, and Scripture reading. On one of these occasions he told them that it had been revealed to him, while at prayer, that they were to have a chapel, and where it was to stand;—he saw the chapel built, and an excellent choir of converted persons connected therewith; and it now stands on the very spot indicated, having about ninety members in church fellowship, and about three hundred Sabbath scholars. He is regarded to this day as being the highly honoured agent in God’s hand of introducing, and to his utmost ability of supporting, Primitive Methodism in Marsden.

In the year 1835 he removed into Yorkshire, his native county, and into the same house from which he has been interred. Finding no Primitive Methodist interest here, he succeeded in getting Gomersal put on the Huddersfield Circuit’s plan, where through his endeavours a class was soon formed, of which he was appointed leader. Shortly afterwards he, with the preachers planned for Gomersal, missioned the adjacent and populous village of Littletown. A society was raised, principally of young people, some of whom remain, whilst others have preceded him to heaven. One of that number, R. Brook, is now in the itinerancy, and stationed at Huddersfield.

About the year 1840 the writer became acquainted with Brother Sykes, and he always found him truly devoted to God. His religion was a deep settled love to God, which he evinced in his every day life by a circumspect walk and conversation, by closet devotion, by family worship, by his punctuality at the means of grace, and by the support he afforded to the cause of Christ. His house was ever open to receive the ministers of the Gospel, and even when his children one after another got married and left the parental roof, and he by reason of old age, was too feeble to follow his usual employment, he would still offer of his substance to God's servants, and his house was still the pilgrim's inn.

For a few of the latter years of his life he suffered, sometimes very acutely, from affliction, which incapacitated him for any labour, and reduced him to great straits, even so far as to have to be praying for deliverance at the very time his deliverer knocked at the door. God did not forsake his righteous servant nor suffer his seed to beg bread. His feet seemed to be several times dipt in Jordan's streams, and to human appearance he was about to quit this terrestrial scene, but he rallied again and again. However the last conflict came, and he was fully equipped for the battle. He gave to all who visited him the fullest assurance of his acceptance with God, and when nearing the portals of eternal blessedness, he testified that he was going to heaven: and on the morning of the above named date, he triumphantly departed to glory.

By his removal the Church militant has lost a consistent member, his class a faithful leader, and his family an affectionate husband and father; but the Church triumphant, has received another trophy of redemption.

" His memory long will live alone,
In all our hearts as mournful light,
That broods above the fallen sun,
And dwells in heaven half the night."

May reader and writer meet him in heaven, is the prayer of

J. BATTYE.

[We can endorse what is said by Mr. Battye of the sincere and earnest piety of our departed brother Sykes. For three years we regularly visited his hospitable dwelling, and always found him what his biographer has so aptly said. He was an "Israelite indeed, in whom was no guile." He was very "zealous for the Lord of hosts." We doubt not he is now enjoying the blissful vision of God. May we meet him again when our warfare is past. Amen.—ED.]

MEMOIR OF MRS. CATHERINE LEAK.

CATHERINE LEAK, of Hull Second Circuit, the daughter of George and Mary Bell, and wife of William Leak, was born March 21st, 1817, at Hexham, Northumberland. Being blessed with a praying father, she was from her childhood led to the means of grace, and taught to fear the Lord; hence from an early period she was the subject of religious impressions. When about fifteen years of age she gave her heart to God, and united with the Primitive Methodist Society in Hull. However, after being a consistent member for some time, through changing her situation, and the force of temptation, she lost her confidence in the Saviour.

Of late years, when deeply sympathizing with backsliders, she has often been heard to refer to this part of her experience, saying, "I have known what it is to be a miserable backslider; but the Lord has had mercy upon me, and saved my soul." About three years after marriage, her husband became the subject of saving grace, through the preaching of the Rev. W. Sanderson. He at once did what the heads of all families ought to do—he reared a family altar. One time whilst kneeling at that altar, she engaged in earnest prayer for pardon, and through faith in Jesus she was enabled to rejoice aloud in God her Saviour.

In November, 1848, under the preaching of the Rev. P. Milson, our sister obtained light on the great doctrine of a full salvation; and in the prayer-meeting which followed, she, by faith, realized the blessing. After that time her whole life was one powerful argument in support of the above doctrine. Although she had many temptations from the devil—temptations of a most powerful and harassing character—and persecution from the world and lukewarm professors, yet by the grace of God she lived, professed, and preached entire sanctification; yes, and gloried in it too, up to the day of her death.

Mrs. Leak did not reach angelic perfection; she was human, and consequently had her infirmities. She was capable of committing mistakes, of arriving at wrong conclusions, of erring in conversation and conduct; and the more so because her education was very limited, and she was gifted with no extraordinary powers of mind. But she knew more of the deep things of the spiritual life, and had clearer views of the highway of holiness than many Christians who are endowed with superior mental ability.

As a wife she was about all a reasonable husband could wish. She often cheered her husband on in the way to heaven, directed his attention upwards for help in his troubles, commonly saying, "The Lord will bring you through." Both by her conversation and example she shed religious light upon her children, and prayed down awakening influence upon them. She strove to "bring them up in the nurture and admonition of the Lord." She was highly esteemed by her neighbours; even those who can scarcely spare a favourable word for Christians or Christianity admitted her to be one of the excellent of the earth ; they had confidence in her prayers, and she was the first they were anxious to see when they supposed death was knocking at their door. Her zeal for the Lord of hosts won the admiration of all. Many members of our own society and congregation, together with hundreds of her neighbours, forsook their dwellings and thronged the highway to see her borne to her final earthly resting-place, and thus told that they, with ourselves, believed that a mighty woman had fallen in Israel.

Mrs. Leak burned for the honour of God her Saviour. The love of Christ constrained her. She endeavoured to tread in the steps of her Divine Master by going about doing good. Many interesting facts might be given, would space permit, showing how the careless have been awakened, professors quickened and sanctified, and the afflicted and dying saved through her efforts and in answer to her prayers. She was naturally diffident, not courageous ; but being filled with God, she broke through all, and when opportunity allowed would dare to speak to almost any one on eternity and the blood of the Lamb.

About nine months before her death, Mrs. Leak was appointed a class-leader in connection with the Church Street Society. She felt the work to be great, and the cross heavy ; but she took the appointment, and persevered, and the class greatly prospered. It was visited by many beside the members of it, who bear witness that God there wonderfully revealed himself. Many whilst worshipping in that class received unusually rich baptisms of the Holy Ghost. She strongly urged her members to seek the fulness of the Spirit ; some realized it, and retain it to this day.

Mrs. Leak was often an afflicted woman. Consumption commenced its fatal ravages upon her weakly system. She was ill the last time about twenty-four weeks, during which she had many visitors, to whom she preached Christ and holiness. For some weeks a cloud hung over her soul ; Satan with his temptations assailed her mightily. But yet her confidence in her Saviour she maintained unshaken, and at intervals the light of heaven broke in upon her soul, and she rejoiced exceedingly. In the morning of the day on which she died, whilst her brother was talking to her about Christ, she had a severe struggle, and whilst praying, " the heavens opened," the cloud dispersed, Satan fled, and her soul was filled with rapturous joy. From this moment she was most triumphant. She appeared to be no longer treading the cold regions of death, but to be on the very borders of paradise, and to be bathing in the light of heaven. To those present it was like dwelling on Mount Tabor, or near to the celestial gates. Her expressions were grand, such as, " I am on the Rock ;" " I shall weather the storm ;" " The blood of Christ cleanses me ;" " Glory ! hallelujah !" She many times with inexpressible joy clapped her hands, and said, "Glory be to God!" Death was now advancing upon her in every part. She shook hands with her husband and children just before dying, gave them her last advice, and offered for each her last prayer. She thus did to all present, and then said, "My work is done. Father, I have finished the work thou hast given me to do. I only want now to be loosened; Father, loose me and let me go." After this, as if heaven was open to her view and she was drinking of its bliss, she said, "Is this glory? Home at last! home at last!" When she could talk no longer to her family and friends, she appeared to converse with heaven's bright intelligences, for some of the last words she articulated were, "Angels are . . . I am coming, Jesus . . . heaven. . ." and then she sweetly "languished into life," on the 11th July, 1862, leaving a husband and four children to mourn their loss, but not to sorrow as those without hope. J. TONGUE.

MEMOIR OF MR. SAMUEL PINNELL.

SAMUEL PINNELL was born at Brinkworth, in the county of Wilts, in the year 1802, and died at Grittenham, June 23rd, 1862. At a very early age he was sent to school, and his progress in learning far exceeded that of many of his school-fellows; but he never had the advantage of receiving either instructions or corrections from his father; and his mother being poor, he was soon obliged to go to work to help to provide for his maintenance, and then he followed "a multitude to do evil." At times he has been led to praise God with all his heart that ever the Primitive Methodist missionaries visited this country when he was on the brink of ruin, for while listening to the word of life from their lips, conviction seized his guilty soul, and he trembled beneath the word; but through not giving his heart to God there and then, and casting his soul fully on Christ for salvation, he went home from the means of grace with a burdened, guilty conscience, and through the insinuations of Satan, and the follies of youth, his convictions soon wore away. For some time he neglected going to hear the word, but at length a young man that had been his companion in sin, and who had found salvation through the blood of the Lamb, prevailed on him to go with him to the means of grace. At that time the Lord wonderfully poured out His Spirit on the inhabitants of this country, and hundreds were converted to God, and our departed friend was amongst the number. He then could sing with all his heart and voice—

"My God is reconciled,
His pard'ning voice I hear;
He owns me for His child,
I can no longer fear."

The change wrought in him by the Spirit of God was visible to all who knew him, and his cry to his neighbours, acquaintances, and poor sinners generally was, "Come thou with us, and we will do thee good." The love of Christ constrained him to speak to his fellow-men in the name of the Lord, and he was soon put on the plan as an exhorter, and anon as a local preacher. His powerful voice will long be remembered by those who heard him in the open-air, as well as by those who heard him in the sanctuary. His views on the doctrines of salvation were clear and scriptural; and he was a good public speaker. The writer, and many others, no doubt, can well remember, when with trembling steps he got up into a wagon to preach at a camp-meeting at Clack, more than thirty years ago; his text was "O Israel, thou hast destroyed thyself, but in Me is thy help." He delighted to tell what he knew and felt of Christ, and while with streaming eyes and a feeling heart he has been speaking, the influences of the Holy Spirit have flowed through the congregations, and the stout-hearted have been constrained to cry for mercy; and, doubtless, many will be the crown of his rejoicing in the day of the Lord Jesus. For thirty-five years he was a member in our Connexion; but for many years he has been the subject of severe affliction. He suffered from asthma, which he bore patiently. His end was peace. He rested on the great atonement. Many years a class met in his house on Sabbath mornings, and a prayer-meeting was held there in the week; he had there refreshing seasons to his soul, and would sing, when his breath was sufficient,—

"Though poverty's my lot,
And the fig tree blossom not,
I can sing the song of hope,
Heaven's my home!"

It was his wish that his remains should be deposited in our chapel yard at Brinkworth, with those of some of his early fellow-labourers and sufferers in the cause of the Lord Jesus Christ. Some of the rich as well as the poor paid a last tribute of respect to him, by following his mortal remains to their resting place. The funeral service was performed by our respected friend Mr. J. Hill, who on the following Sabbath evening preached his funeral sermon in the open-air at Grittenham, to a large and attentive congregation.

J. MATTHEWS.

MEMOIR OF MR. JAMES THOMAS.

JAMES THOMAS was born at Ridge hill, in the parish of Bullingham, in the county of Hereford, 1814. From his childhood he was of a mild and peaceable disposition; he nevertheless remained a stranger to God till, in his seventeenth year, he was persuaded to attend the preaching of our people, when conviction darted into his mind, and he saw the need of a Saviour; after a short struggle he was converted to God. As the authorities of the circuit perceived that he had the promise of usefulness about him, his name appeared on the plan, in March, 1834.

He laboured hard in the Pillawell and Hereford Circuit, with a good share of success, and many are the souls who ascribe their conversion to his labours. He was punctual in his attention to his appointments, nor did he pause for dread of long journeys, rainy days, or dark nights. His Christian career was bright, and his character without a stain ; by his honest and upright demeanour he gained the respect of all with whom he came incontact.

In the year 1856, he was employed in raising gravel, and while doing so the earth gave way, and a large quantity fell on him, dislocating one hand, and his legs were sorely mangled. This laid him on a bed of affliction for some considerable time ; indeed, he never fully recovered from the shock, but he bore the sad stroke with lamb-like patience ; nor did one murmur escape from his lips ; and as soon as he had to some extent recovered, he resumed the work of the ministry, as far as strength and circumstances would allow. But during the latter part of his life he had an aged mother at home to take care of ; this detained him much of his time, and often prevented him from attending to that work in which he so much delighted.

His last illness was diarrhœa, which, after a few weeks of painful affliction, put an end to his earthly career. During his illness he was never heard to express one doubt as to his soul's safety ; he was fully resigned to the will of the Lord, and died triumphant in the faith, July 7th, 1862, aged forty-eight years.

" The Church has lost a man of faith and prayer,
Who peacefully trod the even tenor of his way ;
He's gone the nameless bliss of heaven to share,
And bask in regions of a cloudless day ;
His battle's fought, the fight is o'er,
The goal is gained, the race is run,
The staff's laid by, the pilgrim toils no more,
The welcome's given, ' Come in, well done, well done ! ' "

R. LANGFORD.

---

MEMOIR OF MR. M. GIBSON.

ONE after another we are summoned hence. Death is perpetually making inroads upon our families, friends and churches. Another of our office-bearers has been called to his reward. Michael Gibson is no longer among us. He was a tenant of earth about seventy-four years. He was born and he died at Kilham. With his character previous to his regeneration we have no acquaintance. He was a son of fallen Adam, and partook of the degeneracy of his posterity. We do not know that there was anything unusually immoral in him, but the saying of the Saviour was applicable to him, " Ye must be born again." He lived in his carnal state until he was thirty-five years of age. He was awakened in a prayer-meeting ; it was about the time when the late Rev. John Coulson first visited this neighbourhood. Whether Mr. C. was specially used as the agent in the conversion of Michael we do not know, but it is known that others claim Mr. C. as their spiritual father, who were converted about the time of Michael's conversion. When convinced of sin, as being guilty of it and polluted by it; of righteousness, as needing one that was not his own, and needing to be purified by the washing of regeneration; and of a judgment to come, when all secrets will be disclosed and every man will be rewarded according to his doings, Michael earnestly sought and soon found him of whom Moses and the prophets wrote: "The Lord our righteousness." From the time of his conversion to the day of his death he maintained with integrity the character of a Christian.

For thirty-six years he sustained the office of a local preacher. As to pulpit ability he might perhaps be ranked with the third class; but as to attendance on his appointments, he would be about number one in class the first. When health permitted, nothing prevented him attending to his appointments. When others would have shrunk on account of the smallness of the congregation, the distance of the place, the badness of the roads, or the roughness of the weather, Michael was still at his post. His motive was a sense of duty. He said, "If I do my duty I shall be right." He did not labour in vain nor spend his strength for nought. Many will be the crown of his rejoicing in the day of the Lord. He was a class-leader thirty years, and was faithful in the discharge of the duties of this important office. In it he has left an example worthy of imitation. He always endeavoured to see his members once a week. When they were absent from class, he visited them at their own home. If any of them were lost they were not lost through his neglect. From Kilham to Thwing, a distance of four miles, he went for years to lead a class. Thwing was his spiritual birth-place. Here he lived and laboured for many years, and when he had removed to Kilham, he still visited Thwing, and watched over the interest of the society there as leader and steward. At this place he took an active part in getting up a chapel; and before he was married, when a farmer's servant, not having convenience of his own to accommodate the ministers of Christ, he paid for board and lodgings for them; and this he continued to do until they could be otherwise accommodated. And for the last twenty years his house has been the home of one or more of our preachers when they have visited Kilham, and from him they have always met with a hearty welcome.

During the last few months his health visibly declined. A severe attack of jaundice indicated his approaching end. Death came, but not unlooked for. During his affliction he was disturbed by no dark forebodings. He said to some who visited him, "All is right," and to others, "I'm packed up," and to others, "I am a great sinner, but I have found a great Saviour." He breathed his last, July 9th, 1862. His end was peace. Many have made a greater display in the world than Michael, but few have acted with more consistency. His earnestness kept him steadily to his purpose, and punctual in the discharge of his duties. We knew him many years, but we cannot call to mind a single instance in which his morals were impeached. To the wavering class he did not belong. Having taken hold of the plough, he held to his hold until his Master called him to his reward. Let such as are ever declaiming against the inconsistencies of religious professors find one belonging to their own class equal in worth to Michael Gibson. That his widow may be comforted while she remains on earth and then crowned with him in heaven, is the prayer of

E. TYAS.

MEMOIR OF MR. R. CAMMACK.

RICHARD CAMMACK, the subject of this brief sketch, was born at Heapham, in the county of Lincoln, in the summer of 1836, of poor but honest and industrious parents. He lived after the course of this world, a stranger to true religion, but not indulging in those excesses of immorality and wickedness which many do. Sustaining an injury in one of his ankles, which disqualified him for farm service, he was apprenticed to the shoemaking business at Hemswell, in Lincoln Circuit, where he attended the means of grace amongst the Primitive Methodists, and was awakened to a sense of his danger and brought to a knowledge of the truth as it is in Jesus. This was about the nineteenth year of his age. Having obtained the pearl of great price, he became very zealous in the cause of truth. The circuit authorities seeing he was likely to be useful put him on the plan as an exhorter, which office he filled with acceptability and faithfulness. His earnest appeals to the hearts of his hearers have caused the tear to start, and the sinner to tremble and cry for mercy, and his name to some is now as ointment poured forth.

At the close of the year 1860 he came to reside at his native place, and joined our society at Springthorpe, Gainsborough Branch, and laboured amongst us about twelve months. It then began to be evident that consumption had laid siege to his weak frame. He continued to attend the means of grace as long as his strength would permit; he loved the house of prayer. The last time he spoke at Springthorpe, the Divine influence was wonderfully felt: he had power with God, and prevailed. Being his leader, I generally found him clear in his experience, with his prospects bright for glory. I visited him several times during his affliction, and always found him on the Rock. He suffered much from internal pain, which he bore with patience, exclaiming,—

“ I suffer my allotted years,
Till my Deliverer come;
And wipe away his servant's tears,
And take his exile home.”

The day before he died, he said, “ Mother, I shall die to-morrow.” Seeing his friends weep he said, “ What do you cry for? all is right.

Jesus is mine, and I am his. Bless the Lord! he is precious." The next day he suffered much, and often said, "Lord, help me! come, Jesus, and fetch me. Glory! glory! bless him." And waving his hands in token of victory, he then sweetly fell asleep in Jesus, July 14th, 1862, nearly twenty-six years of age.

S. HILL.

MEMOIR OF MR. S. WOODWARD.

"THE memory of the just is blessed," and "the righteous shall be had in everlasting remembrance." Such is the memory of Samuel Woodward, who departed this life at Kensington, July 21st, 1862, aged twenty-six. The history of his early days appears to have been marked by all the frivolities and sins which generally characterize youth. Not having been blest with pious parents, it is not to be wondered at if he experienced but few pious restraints.

At the age of twenty, he was providentially led to our preaching-room at Kensington. His attention being arrested by the lively singing, he was induced to enter, and to his great astonishment all seemed happy in their employment. He resolved forthwith to attend the means of grace, which course soon resulted in his salvation. Then it was that he resolved, "this people shall be my people, and their God my God." His union with God's people was to him a source of joy, he loved the communion of saints. His religious experience was clear and scriptural, and the grace of God abounded in him as a well-spring of life. Cheerfulness invariably characterized his deportment; religion to him had its charms.

Having zealously co-operated for some time with the Kensington society, circumstances arose which led him to unite with the society at Hammersmith, a union which proved to be valuable. Naturally being of a warm and an enthusiastic temperament, all he did was characterized by a fervency and a zeal bordering on excess; his words and acts said, "Work while it is called to day, for the night cometh when no man can work."

In 1859 he entered the marriage state; the union was short but felicitous. It is just to remark, that he was the means in the hands of God of leading his partner to a saving knowledge of the truth. May she meet him in glory.

The Sabbath school at Hammersmith being in want of a superintendent our brother was appointed to that office, which he nobly sustained to the last. He was kind and persevering, and in punctuality he greatly excelled. His attachment to the children was strong, and not a few of them reciprocated the same feeling. He was ever at his post; "first in the morning, and last at night," was not only a maxim, but a practice. To live, spend, and be spent in the cause of God was what he really coveted. His removal is a breach and loss not easily to be repaired. But the school did not enjoy all his labours; on the plan his name appeared as an exhorter. In this capacity his labours were abundant. We have frequently known him on a Sabbath day go out into the streets and preach three or four times, accompanied by the children of the school ; and this in addition to attending all the regular services.

The last Sabbath but one he spent upon earth he spoke three or four times in the open air, besides attending the regular services in the chapel, school, class, and prayer-meetings. In short, we can say that some weeks before his death, scarcely a moment was spent on the Sabbath, but was put to good account. His fervent prayers and burning addresses in the open air, were not all in vain ; but eternity alone will unfold the full amount of his success.

His departure is a loss to the temperance cause, for he was a leading spirit in that moral movement. Many of the children of the Sabbath school he had formed into a band of hope, and not a few poor inebriates had renounced the accursed thing through his influence. In his secular calling he was highly respected, and by different tradesmen his loss is much lamented.

The affliction which proved fatal to him, was abscess on the brain, accelerated by falls from his cart. For some years he suffered more or less from an affection in the ear, but alarming symptoms did not appear until a short time before his death. The few days he was confined to his room he suffered much, and although at times reason was gone, yet there were lucid moments in which he gave undeniable proofs of his fitness for heaven. His desire was " to depart and be with Christ, which is far better." The day before he died, which was the Sabbath, he awoke early in the morning, and wished to go to the prayer-meeting ; and throughout the former part of the day his constant cry was " Let me go to the chapel !" But being informed that he was not fit to go, he would reply, " When I get there and pray, I shall be all right." Finding that he would not be permitted to go, he exclaimed, " I have never been accustomed to spend my Sabbaths in bed, let me go." His constant attendance at the means of grace, and his secret devotion at home evinced his spiritual progression. Truly his path was that of the just which is as the shining light, shining more and more even to the perfect day. Death to him had no sting ; he spoke of it only as a departure. His faith realized the fact that " absent from the body, present with the Lord." To get to glory was what he most anxiously desired and sought after ; this was the ruling principle of his being.

A few hours before he departed he seemed to suffer much, but being perfectly resigned to the will of God, he exclaimed, " Father, if it be thy will, let it be short ;" after which he calmly and sweetly sank to rest. He has left behind him a widow and one child. May they both meet him in heaven, is the prayer of

J. HEALEY.

D I V I N I T Y .

---

AN ESSAY ON THE PENAL CONSEQUENCES OF SIN.

Read before the Association of Ministers of the Nottingham District, and sent to the Magazine at their request.

BY REV. JOHN WENN.

The subject of the present paper is of vast and solemn interest. For the penal consequences of sin are felt in every zone of the earth's surface, have been felt through all past ages, and by all ascending generations up to our first parents, and will be felt by most through all time, and by many to the dim, the distant, the interminable ages of eternity.

Its solemnity arises from the view of creature-suffering which it presents. If we read the history of the past, survey the present, and attentively note the testimony of universal experience, we shall the more admire that striking passage of St. Paul's in the epistle to the Romans, "For we know that the whole creation groaneth and travaileth in pain together until now : and not only they, but ourselves also, which have the first fruits of the Spirit, even we ourselves groan within ourselves, waiting for the adoption, to wit, the redemption of our body."

Indeed, the greatness and importance of this subject are such, that any one however gifted might well despair of doing justice to it. Surely, then, we can hardly be acquitted of presumption in attempting to deal with it. Yet there are one or two considerations that may serve not only to remove all suspicion of undue boldness, but also to animate us in the "work that has been given us to do."

And first, we shall not meddle with things too high for us. We shall enter no abysmal depth, climb no giddy height of daring speculation. We shall endeavour to keep the plain beaten path of hard fact and revealed doctrine. Or if we deviate at all therefrom, it will only be to meet conjecture with conjecture, and to confront probability with a counter-probability. And second, we are assured that we shall obtain the sympathy and forbearance of our brethren.

The penal consequences of sin are present and future, or temporal and eternal. We shall take them up in order. But before we proceed to illustrate the connection between sin and suffering here, permit us to observe, that in our judgment, it is not a useless task. For unless we have much mistaken the character of the Church's teaching, this subject has rarely received from that quarter the attention it deserves. The subject is, indeed, commanding the attention of the higher class of novel writers, and they are dealing with it forcibly and well, so far as they go ; but they lack sufficient motive. The motives which they present are chiefly drawn from the wreck and ruin that sin works upon people's reputations, fortunes, families, and so on. Now beside these the Christian teacher has other motives to present. He points to the disorder that sin has created in the heart, and the misery that it has occasioned in the soul of man; he describes the beauty and the joys of holiness; he tells of the love of a crucified Redeemer; he proclaims the approach of death and of the day of judgment. These motives are amongst the most powerful inducements to moral action. So that, cæteris paribus, Christian teachers should be able to effect more in this direction than any other class of men whatever. But we think that as a class, with their advantages, they have not achieved so much in this line as might reasonably have been expected from them.

Our observation needs not to be very extended in order to find out that two evils exist in this world,—the evil of pain, and the evil of sin. We feel these are evils because the mind shrinks from the one, and condemns the other. Nevertheless, the tendency of pain may be to improve and "perfect" the moral nature of the sufferer; while the tendency of sin on the other hand is to deprave that nature, and its result is punishment.

But before we lay claim to any consolation to be derived from the beneficial tendency of pain and sorrow, we must be satisfied of two things concerning them. First, that they derive all their efficacy in this respect from their previous and present connection with Divine grace. "For whom the Lord loveth he chasteneth." And second, that their origin lies beyond ourselves. For who can doubt that a great deal of pain and sorrow, and of circumstantial depression, is to be laid to the account of imprudence, wastefulness, and idleness? Now it often happens that persons who suffer much in these respects, and perhaps to a large extent from these causes, are wont to quote, (in sincerity, no doubt, though mistaken sincerity) that line of Cowper's—"God moves in a mysterious way," when, as Joseph Parker says, they ought rather to say, "Man moves in a mysterious way," because it is certain that law, whether physical, social, or moral, cannot be broken with impunity, and such persons seem to speak and act as if it could. Such individuals seem to forget that the pot-house will bring a family to want and disgrace, and that "drowsiness will clothe a man with rags." The Apostle James tells us "to count it all joy when we fall into divers temptations." But then we must "fall," not float or run into them. And then, when in the exercise of prudence and diligence faithfully discharging our duty, "we fall" into temptations, these are not intended as punishments, but as aids to our faith and patience.

We have thought it right thus far to distinguish between those effects of sin which are not attributable to any specific violation of law, and those which are: because it is to the latter only that we apply the epithet penal. Now it is with the penal consequences of sin that we have to do. Not with those general consequences of sin which fasten themselves upon man as man, whether Christian or infidel, but with those that overtake him as, in some specific sense, a transgressor and a rebel.

And that dire consequences will follow the commission of crime there can be no reasonable doubt. It is not always, however, that the sinner feels the effect of his sin the moment after it is committed, any more than a man must feel severe pain the next moment after an accident. The Bible may not in all cases, nor in many, specify the exact point in the path of being at which the culprit shall be overtaken. This, in most cases, is more or less uncertain. The avenger oftentimes limps after his prey as if he would never come up with it : but at other times he leaps upon it with the ferocity and agility of a tiger. There are more men threatened than stricken, says George Herbert. The day of iniquity may also be the day of visitation, or there may be an indefinite distance between them. "Their foot shall slide in due time." But however punishment may be suspended to a future stage in the history of an individual or a people, it is usually only suspended, not averted. This remark is illustrated in the history of the Israelites. In using the history of that people for our purpose, we lay ourselves open indeed to the cavil of Strauss, who affirms in his "Leben Jesu," that "the connection between sin and suffering is a vulgar Hebrew notion." He goes on to say that Christ himself "repudiated it." But Strauss has fallen into hands abler than his own. One of these, Dean Trench, in his book on the parables, says, "All Scripture affirms that the sum total of the calamity that oppresses the human race is the consequence of the sum total of its sin : nor does he (Christ) deny the relation in which a man's actual sins may stand to his sufferings. What he does deny is, man's power to trace the connection, and therefore his right in any particular case to assert it." But when the connection is traced by the finger, and asserted by the word of God, surely we cannot err. Such we believe to be the case in the history of the Israelites. When, yielding to the foolish clamours of the people, Aaron made the golden calf, God was angry and threatened to consume them. Moses interceded, and God said, "Go, lead the people into the place of which I have spoken unto thee : Behold, mine angel shall go before thee, nevertheless, in the day when I visit, I will visit their sin upon them."

No doubt the connection between sin and suffering is as real as the connection between any other cause and its effect. Only punishment is not so easily traceable to its own proper cause, as some other effects are to theirs. The reason may be found, perhaps, in the nature of the moral government of God. The reality of the connection just mentioned, and the difficulty of tracing it apart from some Divine intimation, are both well illustrated by another Biblical narrative. Joshua and the elders of Israel had sworn to respect the persons of the Gibeonites, who had craftily secured their lives by pawning their liberties. Almost five hundred years after, Saul, in zeal for the men of Israel and Judah, slew many of the Gibeonites. After this, Saul dies, and no question is made of that slaughter. But in the days of David there was a famine in the land for three years successively, and God being inquired of, said, "it was for Saul's killing the Gibeonites." Now the connection between the crime and the punishment was here real, but who could have traced it, except the finger of God had done so? How forcibly the narrative just given illustrates St. Paul's charge to the Thessalonians—"That no man go beyond or defraud his brother in any matter, because that the Lord is the avenger of all such, as we also have forewarned you and testified."

While, however, it is always difficult, if not impossible, to say precisely to what crime any particular penalty should be assigned in the case of another, it is not so difficult in one's own case. For frequently there is so close and evident a connection between sin and suffering, as to oblige a man's own conscience to a confession of its reality. When the sons of Jacob had come into their brother Joseph's presence in Egypt, and he had spoken roughly to them, had treated them as spies, had imprisoned them, had imposed upon them the condition of leaving one of their elder brothers with him while they went to fetch the youngest, they said one to another, "We are verily guilty concerning our brother, in that we saw the anguish of his soul when he besought us, and we would not hear: therefore is this distress come upon us." Again, when Pilate objected to shed the innocent blood of Jesus, the Jews readily exclaimed, "His blood be upon us and on our children!" Jesus died, and was buried. But there was a resurrection, not only of his person, but of his doctrines. The apostles preached them boldly. They were cast into prison: an angel let them out. And they were found standing in the temple, and teaching the people. The officers brought them before the high priest and the council, who said, "Did not we straitly charge you that ye should teach no more in that name? And behold ye have filled Jerusalem with your doctrine, and intend to bring this man's blood upon us." And who can doubt that in hundreds and thousands of minds there is the sad but irresistible conviction that, "this shattered body, this imbecile intellect, these wasted energies, this injured reputation, this polluted, crime-haunted imagination is the result and punishment of my sin?" The Earl of Rochester, who fell a melancholy moral and physical ruin in the thirty-third year of his age, said on his death-bed, "The language of a friend which was so familiar to me, hangs yet about me!" But whether the connection between sin and its penalty be traceable or not traceable, evident or inevident, of its reality and certainty there is, there can be, no reasonable doubt. "Be ye sure your sin will find you out."

And now we pass on to a remark of more extended and solemn significance—that the consequences of sin do not at all times, if at any, exhaust themselves upon the original offender. Others may suffer for our sins. One man's crime may involve in disgrace and sorrow not only himself, but his family, three or four generations of his descendants, or a nation. This remark is also susceptible of Biblical illustration. Let us revert to the narrative given above—that concerning the famine in the days of David—and in that narrative behold the way in which the crime was expiated, and the calamity stayed. "David took seven of Saul's sons, and hung them up against the sun, and after that the Lord was entreated for the land." "Now this story does not instance in families only, but in kingdoms also. The father's fault is punished on the sons of the family, the king's on the people of his land. And this after the death of the king, after the death of the father." And there are many facts of a kindred character occurring throughout the Scripture. We can only barely mention a few of them. The sins of Ahab were visited upon his family. God said, "I will not bring the evil in his days, but in his son's days I will bring the evil upon his house." The child of Bathsheba was slain for the sin of its father David; and moreover, he who had stained himself with the crimes of adultery and murder, was doomed to behold, in agony and shame, the ravages of lust and the sword in the bosom of his own family. "The whole family of Eli—all the kindred of the nearer lines male," died in the flower of their age, on account of the criminal weakness and indulgence of the head of the house and of the priesthood. Neither can we say that such facts are peculiar to the Bible. For it will be in the recollection of most how the children of Rush, the murderer, fled to hide their shame and sorrow in the Australian bush. In a sermon entitled, "The descending and entailed curse cut off," which has for its motto or text, Exodus xx. 5, 6, Jeremy Taylor says, "This one thing I desire to be strictly observed, that it is with much error and great indiligence usually taught in this question, that the wrath of God descends from fathers to children, only in case the children imitate and write after their father's copy. Supposing these words, 'of them that hate me,' to relate to the children; but this is expressly against the words of the text, and the examples of the thing. God afflicts good children of evil parents for their fathers' sins, and the words are plain and determinate. God visits the sins of the fathers—in tertiam et quartam generationem eorum qui oderunt me—to the third and fourth generation of them—of those fathers—that hate me,—that is upon the great grandchildren of such parents." A little farther on he says:—"And that virtue and innocence which shall by God be accepted as sufficient through the Divine mercy to bring the son to heaven, yet, it may be, shall not be accepted to quit him from a load of temporal infelicities, the reward and curse of his father's crime." "Verily," as Job says, "God layeth up his," the wicked man's, "iniquity for his children."

Once more we remark that the consequences of sin may follow the offender even after he is forgiven. Of the truth of this statement we have a plain proof, we think, in the case of David. Was David forgiven or was he not, when his heart was torn by the dissensions, and the lustre of his crown dimmed by the crimes, of his children? Forgiven, say we. And yet, contemporaneously with the announcement of forgiveness, it was foretold that lust should invade, and that the sword should not depart from his house.

Some persons have manifested astonishment at the irregularities and crimes of good men's children. How comes it, say they, that such pious parents have such irreligious children—that such steady parents should be afflicted with such unruly and disorderly offspring? The cause of the children's badness, especially if they evince a proclivity towards some specific vice, may, as we have seen, lie in their parents, grand or great grandparents leaning to that same vice. And thus by a reproduction and a reaction, the children are punished on account of their parents and the parents on account of their children's sins, even after the guilt of the offenders has been all forgiven.

"For just is retributive ubiquity; Samson did sin with Delilah,
And his eyes and captive strength were forfeit to the Philistine.
Jacob robbed his brother, and sorrow was his portion to the grave.
David must fly before his foes, yea, though his guilt is covered,
And he who, seeming old in youth, was marred for others' sin.
For every special crime must bear its special penalty :
By luxury, or rashness, or vice, the member that hath erred suffereth—
And, therefore, the sacrifice for all was pains at every pore."

"Thou wast," exclaims the Psalmist, in reference to ancient Israel, "a God that forgavest them, though thou takest vengeance upon their inventions !"

With one extract from a celebrated living author, we close this part of our subject. Miss Muleck says, "What's bred in the bone will come out in the flesh ! Like father like son ! The sins of the parents shall be visited upon the children ! So runs many a proverb, so confirms the unerring decree of a just God, who would not be a just God, did he allow himself to break his own righteous laws for the government of the universe ; did he falsify the requisitions of his own holy and pure being, by permitting any other wages for sin, but death. And though through his mercy, sin forsaken, escapes sin's penalty, and every human being has it in his power to modify if not to conquer any hereditary moral as well as physical disease, thereby avoiding the doom and alleviating the curse,—still the original law remains in force, and ought to remain an example and a warning. As true as that every individual sin that a man commits breeds multitudes more, is it that every individual sinner may transmit his own peculiar type of weakness or wickedness to a whole race, disappearing in one generation, reappearing in another, exactly the same as physical peculiarities do, requiring the utmost caution and education to counteract the terrible tendencies of nature,—‘the something in the blood’—which is so difficult to eradicate; which may even make the third and fourth generation execrate the memory of him or her who was its origin.”

(To be continued.)

WORKS OF CREATION.

THE SEA AND ITS PERILS.

With Brief Sketches of some of our Filey Fishermen who have perished therein.—By the REV. C. KENDALL.

(Continued from page 94.)

“They roam where danger dwells,
Where blasts impetuous sweep,
Where sleep the dead in watery cells,
Beneath the faithless deep;
Where tempests threaten loud
To 'whelm the shipwrecked form :—
Show them a sky that hath no cloud,
A port above the storm.”

THIS division of our theme will possess a melancholy interest to many of our readers. The perils of the sea! How significant this phrase! What a thrill is it calculated to send through many hearts! How many loving families have dear ones sleeping in the deep—sleeping till the judgment's trumpet shall awake them. Some persons question the existence of any danger in a seafaring life above what is common to any of the ordinary callings pursued on land, but we consider such danger exists. Take one thousand seamen eighteen years of age, and a thousand landsmen engaged in any kind of labour, and we presume more of the former will die by accident than of the latter. So painfully common is it to be drowned, that many have called such a death for a sailor a natural one. The perils of the sea are innumerable; we shall only attempt to point out a few of these.

There is danger—

1. From hidden rocks and sands. These abound in various parts of the ocean. Some of these are well known, and are pointed out on charts, or by other marks; but others are not known familiarly, and in the darkness of night, or through the force of contrary winds, there is great danger of being brought into collision with one of these enemies of seamen. And new dangers from the above causes are continually occurring. What are called coral reefs are constantly being formed in a remarkable manner, through the labours of millions of little insects. Some of these stand out of the water, and others do not, and then the danger is much greater. If we could have a correct history of the ships which have been brought into collision with this danger, and been destroyed; could we conceive aright the amount of property which has been destroyed, and the thousands of seamen and passengers who have struggled with danger and sunk in death from this cause, we should be appalled. Nor are these alone dangerous, for sandbanks are eminently so, arising partially from changing their locality. There were two notorious ones in ancient times on the African shore, one called the Major, lying near the coast of Cyrene, and the other not far from Tripoli. Both these were much dreaded by the mariner of yore. And who has not heard of our Goodwin sands off the coast of Kent? Many a noble crew whose hearts beat high with hope of reaching port in safety, have been brought into collision with this treacherous part of the ocean; in many instances ship and men have been buried in these sands, and few, if any, vestiges left to tell the tale of their sad destiny. Rocks and sands evidently constitute two of the perils of the deep; through these many bright hopes have been dashed down, and many visions which enchanted from their distance have been clouded over.

2. There is peril from being lurching or knocked into the water. On land a man may fall from his horse, or out of a vehicle, and escaping the crush of the wheel, be but little injured, and if injured, probably soon be restored through proper treatment. But when out on the deep waters, and precipitated from his vessel, he comes into contact with the watery element, he finds it a deadly antagonist to his health and life; and has to commence a struggle for his existence. Perhaps the noble ship is sailing majestically along before a fresh breeze; the sailor youth is aloft with agile feet and fingers plying his dangerous avocation, when a sudden gust of wind or roll of the ship pitches him from his elevation on to the ship's deck, and he is destroyed—or not improbably he is precipitated into the surging billows. He may be seen and heard, for he cries for help; and every eye is turned towards him as he floats on the breast of the waves. There is bustle and excitement on board; probably an effort is made to lower a boat and attempt his rescue, but the sails being set, and the wind strong, the ship bounds away at great speed; the struggling seaman is lost sight of, and left to utter his cry for assistance to the murmuring waves and howling winds, and after a fruitless attempt to preserve his life, he descends, exhausted and perhaps unconscious to his liquid bed to sleep till the judgment's trumpet shall call him up. Truly this is a source of danger. How many have we known or heard of who in this way lost their valuable lives. They encountered this peril, and died.

“Then think of the mariner tossed on the billow,
 Afar from the scenes of childhood and youth;
 No mother to weep o'er his sleep-broken pillow,
 No father to counsel, no sister to soothe.”

There is peril—

3. From fire. Some readers might suppose at the first moment that a fire in a ship at sea would soon be extinguished; but nothing is much more difficult. From the nature of the wood, the strength of the wind, and probably the combustible character of the cargo, the devouring element often rages with uncontrollable fury. It is lamentable how many ships have been destroyed at sea by fire. We could give the names of some which have been destroyed in this manner, involving terrible loss of life and property. The Government registers would tell a tale on this subject painful in the extreme. The causes of fire while at sea have been many and various. The voluntary ignition of some of the merchandise occasioned by friction or some other cause, the lightning's flash, the blundering of some of the crew caused probably through strong drink, the lights or fires used in the vessel—one or other of these things has often been the cause of a ship's taking fire. Fire is kind as a servant, but cruel as a master. Let us try and show our readers a picture of a ship on fire. It will be found imperfect, but drawn from what is often found to be a reality. You see that noble vessel riding on the "watery crest;" danger appears very distant. There is no leakage, there are no mountain billows nor boisterous winds; no displaced sails nor injured tackling; she looks lovely in her strength and completeness. There is smoke issuing from the hold; every eye is attracted thereto. It is examined, and the officer declares the ship is on fire. Excitement and apprehension spread among all on board as with the quickness of electricity. What is to be done? They try to extinguish the fire. Probably the hatchways are covered in to try and smother it, or the lower decks are scuttled, and the hatchways are opened to let in the waves, and in this way to extinguish it. Vain hope! ill requited toil! The destructive fire rapidly spreads. Danger appears imminent. The boats on board may be few, and incapable of holding half of those on board; perhaps the spreading and intense fire prevents their being lowered. The flames progress, and begin to scorch the unhappy sufferers. Death is near in his most terrible aspect. Terror or despair seizes every mind. There is no prospect before them but death, and the dreadful alternative of dying either by fire or water—and the majority prefer the latter. Plunge! plunge! go these unhappy ones, raising their voices to God the universal Father for that mercy which is denied them by the death-dealing elements.

What peril has been encountered from fire! What a picture could be drawn by some persons who have been involved in this danger! To what a number of ships the poet's lines will apply by merely altering the name of the ship:—

"The Amazon is missing! her mariners sleep,
As we fear, in the depths of the fathomless deep;
And no tidings shall tell if their death grapple came
By disease or by famine, by flood or by flame.
The storm-beaten billows that ceaselessly roll
Shall hide them for ever from mortal control;
And their tale be untold, and their history unread,
Till the dark caves of ocean shall give up their dead."

4. Sudden and strong winds are perilous.

Moderate breezes are favourable to commerce, and are ranked amongst the seamen's best friends; but boisterous winds and gales are his determined enemies. In every gale which disturbs the mother on shore, especially the sailor's mother, she hears, or fancies she hears the death-knell of some loved youth. It was an opinion held by the ancients that Satan had power to raise the wind, and in a storm they were accustomed to sacrifice a black sheep to drive the angry demon away. This usage illustrates the sailors' treatment of the prophet Jonah. But we are not disposed to yield so much power to Satan, for we think if he possessed it, more persons would be drowned than are; however, if Satan has power to raise the wind, and he is called "the Prince of the power of the air;" we know whose prerogative it is to say to the troubled waters, "Peace be still."

Strong winds weave the death-shroud of many sailors and fishermen, and of great numbers who are voyagers in search of a home in a distant Colony or Continent. Through their fierceness, perhaps the vessel founders in mid ocean, leaving no memento behind to tell loved ones on shore the mode of their death. Within the last few days, three fishing smacks from this port (Great Grimsby) have disappeared, involving an aggregate loss of life of twenty-four persons; no one has seen the vessels since the commencement of the late gales, and it is more than probable that smacks and men now rest in the ocean's deep. Many distracted minds are found in this town as the consequence of this disaster. It loudly preaches to living seamen from that solemn text, "Prepare to meet thy God." But what more often happens is, the vessel is driven by furious winds on some rock or sand bed, and is destroyed, perhaps in sight of anxious friends or numerous spectators. What heart-rending calamities rush into the mind as we discourse of dangers from winds. Who has not suffered loss from this cause? Reference to a case in point, memorable from its character and the number who perished, will be acceptable to most of our readers. On the 26th of August, 1859, the Royal Charter left Melbourne for England; she made a rapid and prosperous voyage till she arrived off the Irish Coast; arriving off point Lynas, on the Welsh Coast, the wind blew a perfect hurricane. A pilot was signalled, but none appeared; the ship gradually drifted towards the shore, both the anchors were let go, but the chains parted. The engines were worked at their full power, but the vessel would not move windward, and soon struck the rocks in four fathoms of water. The cry arose, "We are lost, we are lost!" The captain tried to console the passengers by an assurance that they were on a sand bed and would be able to walk on shore. Fallacious hope! It was then night and dark; the ship however soon thumped so heavily on the rocks, that danger was evident to all. She was then only twenty yards from a projecting rock, and at half-past three o'clock, a man named Rogers, engaged to carry a rope on shore. With true heroism he plunged into the raging surge, and after being beaten back once or twice, succeeded. The people in the ship crowded together as well as they could, and the Rev. Mr. Hodge, a clergyman from New Zealand, prayed and exhorted, but was interrupted by the thumping of the ship, and the sea washing over her. The scene in the saloon was of the most heart-rending character; husbands and wives, parents and children, clinging to one another in the most affectionate embrace. Thirty-nine by the rope were carried on shore, and then the ship divided, plunging all into the sea, and killing numbers. What thrilling incidents occurred in connection with this wreck! A son of a Mr. Lewis who lived near the scene of the wreck went to Australia eight years before, and was returning home with the fruits of his toil. Mr. Lewis was aware of his son's being on board this ship, and when news of her being a wreck reached him, he hurried to the rocks overlooking the appalling scene. He spied his returning son, and the son his anxious father; regardless of his wealth, he cast himself into the sea, and swam to his father who stretched out his hands to draw him to shore; but at the moment when about to embrace each other, a terrific sea swept over the young man, and carried him into a watery grave. In connection with this wreck four hundred and sixty persons in a few hours were launched into eternity. What hopes and anticipations then perished—perished near port. In twenty-four hours, the captain had said, we shall be in Liverpool, and the company were so elated and grateful that they presented a purse of gold to the captain, and another to the minister. All was hilarity as they neared the shores of England, and many of them were engaged in music and dancing, who in a few brief hours entered the eternal world. Ah! what multitudes are trifling, sportive, and immoral on the verge of perdition, and still expecting a home in heaven! May the Holy Spirit awaken them! To perish in the neighbourhood of the port, after traversing the dangerous sea many thousand miles; to perish with all the feelings of home warm in the heart, and all the anticipations of domestic felicity vivid in the imagination, adds considerably to the severity of the calamity! How many thus sink! How many thus struggle with death on the margin of dry land! It is said that eleven out of every sixteen seamen die by accident. There are lost every year on the English coast, eight hundred lives, and one fourth of these are lost between the Humber and the Firth. Nor does the mariner only suffer from strong winds. The hardy fisherman as he plies his avocation in pursuit of honest bread, often falls a victim to their power. Through accidents inseparable from his calling, his vigorous and valuable life is often sacrificed.

Religion is essential to safety, for eternity, in every avocation of life. The seaman finds it an invaluable treasure in the day of trial, and many of this bold, useful class of men are sailing over the ocean, month after month, with a consciousness that spiritually they are voyaging to the port of endless felicity. This statement will be confirmed by a touching incident that has recently occurred in a sailor's career. A letter, of which the following is a copy, was a short time ago picked up in a bottle upon the coast of Jutland; the writer, Captain Loynes, of Hartlepool, was a devoted Christian; he had been at sea twenty-two years, and about the same length of time had been united with the Church of Christ. He left Hartlepool on the 16th of October, 1862, with a crew of four hands in the "Glory" of that port, bound to Hamburg, with a cargo of coals; the vessel has not since been heard of, except through the annexed letter, leaving no doubt that she foundered at sea, with all hands, in the fearful storm of the 19th of October, the date of the letter. Here is a man standing face to face with death, calm, self-possessed, with presence of mind to sit down and pen this letter when all hope as regards this life is gone, but with a hope blooming with immortality; his ship the sport of the billows, but heaven open to his view, and his deepest sympathies called out towards his wife, so soon to be a widow, and his six children, so soon to be orphans.

At Sea, October 19th, 1862.

"My dear wife,—Before you get this I shall be in heaven; our ship, the "Glory," of West Hartlepool, is just about foundering; the pumps both choked; and John Hunter has had his leg fractured with a sea breaking, and we are almost a wreck; but thank God we are resigned to our heavenly Father's will. My men are all happy in the Saviour's love. They were all crying for mercy, and they found peace. The lad, John Hunter, was one of the brightest conversions I ever saw. My dear wife, I have left you in the hands of the Lord, and I know he will provide for you and the dear children, and I hope you will meet me in heaven. May this be granted for Christ's sake—in heaven.

I remain your loving husband, JOHN LOYNES."

What but true religion can produce heroic fortitude like this? What a blessed possession is religion. Who on reading this deeply affecting letter does not say,—“Let me die the death of the righteous, and let my last end be like his.”

(To be continued in our next.)

FOR PREACHERS AND CLASS-LEADERS.

EXTRACTS.

GLORY OF REDEMPTION.—There is more of God, more of his essential glory displayed in bringing one sinner to repentance, and forgiving his sins, than in all the wonders of creation. From this work angels themselves have probably learned more of God's moral character than they had ever been able to learn before. They knew before that God was wise and powerful; for they had seen him create a world. They knew before that he was good; for he had made them perfectly holy and happy. They knew that he was just; for they had seen him cast down their own rebellious brethren from heaven to hell for their sins. But until they saw him give repentance and the remission of sins through Christ, they did not know that he was merciful—they did not know that he could pardon a sinner. And oh! what an hour was that in heaven when this great truth was first made known—when the first penitent was pardoned! Then a “new song” was put into the mouths of angels; and while with unutterable emotions of wonder, love, and praise, they began to sing it, their voices swelled to a higher pitch, and they experienced joys unfelt before. Oh, how did the joyful sounds, “His mercy endureth for ever” spread from choir to choir, echo through the high arches of heaven, and thrill through every enraptured angelic breast! and how did they cry with one voice, “Glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace, good will toward men.”—Payson.

OMNIPRESENCE OF GOD.—God is everywhere present by his power. He rolls the orbs of heaven with his hands; he fixes the earth with his foot; he guides all the creatures with his eye, and refreshes them with his influence; he makes the powers of hell to shake with his terrors, and throws them out with his command, and sends the angels on embassies with his decrees; he hardens the joints of infants, and confirms the bones, when they are fashioned beneath secretly in the earth. There is not a fish in the sea, but he shows himself to be the Lord of it, by sustaining it; and in the wilderness the bittern and the stork, the dragon and the satyr, the unicorn and the elk, live upon his provisions, and revere his power, and feel the force of his Almightiness.”—Jeremy Taylor.

NIGHT.—“The day is thine; the night also is thine.” The night indeed casts a veil upon the beauty of the earth, but it draws the curtain from that of heaven; though it darkens below, it makes us see the beauty of the world above, and discovers to us a glorious part of the creation of God, the tapestry of heaven, and the motions of the stars, hid from us by the eminent light of the day. It procures a truce from labour, and refreshes the bodies of creatures, by recruiting the spirits which are scattered by watching. It prevents the ruin of life by the reparation of what was wasted in the day. It takes from us the sight of flowers and plants, but washeth them with dew for a new appearance in the morning. The perpetual succession of night and day is an evidence of Divine wisdom in tempering the travel and rest of creatures.”—Charnock.

ATHEISM.—The heroism of the atheist is heroism no longer if he knows that there is no God, the wonder then turns on the great process by which a man could grow to the immense intelligence that can know there is no God.

What ages, and what lights are requisite for this attainment! This intelligence involves the very attributes of Divinity, while a God is denied. For unless this man is omnipresent, unless he is at this moment in every place in the universe, he cannot know but there may be in some place manifestations of a Deity, by which even he would be overpowered. If he does not know absolutely every agent in the universe, the one he does not know may be God. If he is not himself the chief agent in the universe, and does not know what is so, that which is may be God. If he is not in absolute possession of all the propositions that constitute universal truth, the one which he wants may be, that there is a God. If he does not know everything that has been done in the immeasurable ages that are past, some things may have been done by a God. Thus unless he knows all things, that is, precludes another Deity by being one himself, he cannot know that the Being whose existence he rejects does not exist. But he must know that he does not exist, else he deserves equal contempt and compassion for the temerity with which he firmly avows his rejection, and acts accordingly.—Foster.

CROSSING THE JORDAN.—When the children of Israel entered Canaan, so great were the mustering numbers, that while column after column covered the shore of the Promised Land, thousands filled the channel of Jordan, and thousands more had not reached its brink. There were those who had attained their highest hope, those who trembled in the passage between the arrested billows of that river, and those who toiled still amidst the desert thorns and sands, not catching a view of that deliverance which was now begun. Yet was all assured. The most distant step was marching towards victory and rest. Each tribe was in its place. The whole people was in movement. It was an unbroken train. First and last, only sooner or later, were speeding to their country of inheritance. Shout was prolonged by shout from those who were foremost and from those who were behind. It was one great armament impelled by a common spirit throbbing with a common life. The triumph of every one momentarily advanced—"All passed clean over." So, dear Christians, onward hasten the pilgrim saints of the Most High. Innumerable are the throngs which have found their way to heaven. An entrance has been ministered unto them. At this hour many feel the pains of death. Jordan is driven back. What companies crowd the desert world, and shall increasingly crowd it, but all journeying to the same goodly place. "Now is their salvation nearer than when they believed." The glorified, the dying, the living, they are marshalled into one procession, and constitute but one host. There is no interval nor interruption in their array. In mighty series they urge their course or find their rest. The gate of heaven is never shut. They who enter in encourage those who follow them. The succession never fails. They come! they come! from the four corners of earth, from the four winds of heaven! The celestial conquerors bend from their thrones to meet them! And they who are still in this wilderness, with death between them and heaven, are not cut off from that congregated infinite—"Ye are come to the spirits of just men made perfect."—R. W. Hamilton.

THOUGHTS ON OUR QUARTERLY TICKET FOR DECEMBER, 1862.

"Let your conversation be without covetousness," &c.—Heb. xiii. 5.

ALTHOUGH I am not going to write a sermon on these words, the thoughts therein contained may serve me as the basis of a few remarks. The first thing that claims our attention is the term "covetousness," which in its ordinary acceptation means an eager, insatiable desire for gain; in itself it is a great, growing, and in some respects a universal evil. All persons, perhaps, are at one time of life or other more or less liable to its influence. God, in his word, expressly forbids it, and declares he holds it in abhorrence: it has its seat in the heart, which is under the influence of an insatiable desire for that which belongs to others. St. Paul says, "The love of money is the root of all evil"—it tends to produce unbelief and all those lustful feelings which are so injurious in their results. It has frequently caused its subject to swerve from the truth, practise deceit, fraudulently lay hands on the property of others, and imbrue his hands in the blood of his fellow. The man who is thoroughly under the influence of this sin is the subject of the worst feelings a man can endure on this side hell, and if he do not get saved from it he will have to endure the torments of the burning lake. As I belong to the laity, I may be permitted to ask, why do many of our people attach so little value to the Quarterly ticket? Too many of them never think of paying anything for it; they seem to view it more in the light of a ministerial perquisite than as a pledge of their membership with God's militant host. And with whom does the blame rest? Not with our people as members: I am convinced they are not so under the influence of the demon covetousness—no, the blame rests mainly with the ministers and leaders. The Lord convince us one and all of our duty, that we may be enabled affectionately to teach our people theirs; then I am sure none will more cheerfully perform that duty than the members of the Primitive Methodist Society. Suppose a circuit has 500 members, it is not too much to expect 400 of them will pay their weekly penny, and sixpence or one shilling for their Quarterly ticket. Were this done, the finances of our circuits would soon be greatly improved, the labours of our Connexion be greatly extended, new ground be broken up, that now occupied be better worked, and the Church and the world proportionately blessed. The Lord hasten the time, and save us fully from the sin of covetousness. Amen.

We now notice the important duty of Christian contentment. I shall not linger here; suffice it to say that the basis of true Christian contentment is reconciliation with God by Jesus Christ; hence its possessor lives in the enjoyment of true heaven-born peace, and has the testimony of a good conscience before God and men. St. Paul says, "Godliness with contentment is great gain." It is the duty of the Christian to be satisfied with that sphere of life in which God in his Providence has placed him, to be contented with what God has given him to possess: "Better is a little with righteousness than great revenues without right." But though the Christian is to be contented with what he possesses, it does not imply that he is not to try to improve the position of himself and those dependent upon him; no, the direct tendency of religion is to raise a man, and if the energies of his renewed nature have fair play he will be intellectually elevated, will perform every duty, and prosecute every effort to advance his social position; and as the door of Providence opens he will enter in, and by prayer for God's blessing to rest on his honest industry, he will do all he can that his children may occupy at least as good a position as himself, if not a better and more influential one. This is not antagonistic to, but in perfect accordance with, the spirit of the Gospel.

I direct attention lastly to God's glorious promise, "I will never leave thee nor forsake thee." In whatever state the Christian may be found, in whatever circumstances he may be placed, the promise holds good; for the mouth of the Lord hath spoken it—the lip of eternal Truth hath declared it, and this is enough for the believer. Is he the subject of affliction, poverty, or bereavement? He is not alone; for Christ is with him, giving him consolation and inspiring him with hope. Is he the subject of temptation? He is not alone; for Christ is by his side, "He knows what sore temptations mean." Let the Christian in the time of temptation place his hope where his help is laid; let him do as the disciples did when John was beheaded: "They went and told Jesus." If he do so, he shall realize the blessedness of the man that endureth temptation. Is he on the battle-field, engaged in severe conflict with the enemy? Let him use the sword of the Spirit; it is made of the best material, and will cut both back and edge; let his arm be nerved by prayer, that he may skillfully use the shield of faith, and however thick and fast the fiery darts of Satan may fly, they shall fall pointless at his feet. Is he grasped by the icy hand of death? Still he is not alone; for Christ is with him, and he has said, "I will never leave thee." Is he entering the valley? He may find it dark at the entrance, he may have a dreadful struggle with the powerful but conquered foe; still he is not alone, for Christ is with him ; and as he grasps this promise, and leans upon the arm of Omnipotence, light springs up in the midst of the darkness, for the valley is lighted up by the Light of life, and he passes onward through the valley, and if not triumphantly, yet he peacefully enters the haven of eternal repose. It must be so, for "cherubic legions guard him home, and shout him welcome to the skies."

"There all the ship's company meet,
Who sailed with the Saviour beneath ;
With shouting each other they greet,
And triumph o'er sorrow and death."

May we all be among them.

S. B.

FOR THE FAMILY.

SOCIAL LIFE OF THE PURITANS.*

It is now time to turn from the churches, that we may direct our thoughts to the social life of the first Nonconformists. You will there find that, of many grotesque things imputed to them, some were the pure inventions of festive malice, and that others lose their look of absurdity when truly understood. You expect to see the immortal oddities of Hudibras start up before you ; you expect to meet half-gloomy, half-comic wonders, at every step of your inquiry ; at the very beginning you expect, at least, to find that George Newton's people have outlandish names, such as Kill-sin Pimple, or Weep-not Billings, for all the historians from Hume to Macaulay have told you that this was the fashion. They all appear to have been mistaken. It may be allowed that names remotely like these, because formed out of a religious dialect, were occasionally given by the settlers in Massachusetts to their children and that a very few might also have been given to children in England ; it must be asserted, however, that where they were in use, they were always imposed in infancy, and never selected by the parties themselves. Please to remember, that if such names were worn by the men and women of the Protectorate, they had been conferred upon them at the font in the reign of the British Solomon. We have ample evidence that the habit was occasional then, but it really seems to have declined by the time of which we are writing. If existent anywhere, it surely might have been expected in the place where those charged with adopting it had their stronghold ; but not one such name is to be found in the copious Taunton register of that date, and not one in all the numerous parochial registers of the same era, which the present writer has examined.†

Imagine yourself leaving Taunton Church on some thanksgiving day, and walking with a grave barger to his home. Take notes of what you see. His life there, just as much as in public worship, is ruled by Scripture texts. Texts are woven into all his conversation, for the language of the Bible is with him the language of common life ; he applies it to everything, and uses it most, not as you might suppose, when most artificial, but when most in earnest. Looking round, you see texts painted on the doors and over the fireplaces, stamped on kettles and skillets, wrought in garments, and even carved on the wooden cradle in the corner where the child lies asleep. A Nonconformist, who was young in Oliver's time, after praising his father for great care in the religious instruction of his children, adds, "Let those Scriptures upon the chimney-stone in the parlour be witness."‡ There were

* From "JOSEPH ALKENE." By the Rev. Charles Stanford. London: Jackson and Walford.

† Confirmation of these statements will be found in "Camden's Remains," p. 42, 1629; "Harris's Cromwell," p. 342; and Lower on "English Surnames." This writer gives instances of such names from a Sussex jury list, which he assigns to about the year 1610, and from the parochial register of Warbleton, 1617.

‡ "Life of John Machin," p. 19.

thirteen texts there. In a few cases, as might have been expected, satirists wrote merrily about this Puritan use of texts, especially on their appearance in ladies' embroideries. A personage in one of the comedies is represented as saying—

“Nay, sir, she is a Puritan at her needle too
She works religious petticoats; for flowers,
She'll make church-histories; besides,
My sleeves have such holy embroideries,
And are so learned, that I fear in time
All my apparel will be quoted by some pure instructor.”*

In one of Beaumont and Fletcher's plays we read of “a neat historical shirt.”† From such passages it appears that the custom was of earlier origin than the period of the Commonwealth, although it was then in the height of its observance.

You are not to infer from all this, that your burgher friend leads a life of holy dulness or illiteracy on account of his biblical notions. Why should he? He enjoys a recreative hour as freely as any other man, thinking it lawful, however, not so much because it is natural, as because he can show you chapter and verse for it. “Recreation,” he will say, “is an exercise joined with the fear of God, conversant with things indifferent, for the preservation of bodily strength, and the confirmation of the mind in holiness. To this end hath the word of God permitted shooting (2 Sam. i. 18); musical concert (Neh. vii. 67); putting forth riddles (Judges xiv. 12); hunting of wild beasts (Can. ii. 15); searching out, or the contemplation of the works of God (1 Kings iv. 33).”‡

You find him almost insensible to the beautiful or awful in art; but not so much from religious scruples, as from strong religious excitement, and the effect of distracting war. In time of war the best man thinks more of the forces that insure protection than of the graces that decorate repose. He is more likely to be occupied in barring his gate, than in training the rose that clusters over it.§

On the same account you will find him indifferent to written poetry. You are not likely to see a new poem in his house. We are told, it is true, that in the houses of a certain western town—

“Poems were pasted up on every hall
As thick and thin as cobwebs on the wall:—

Here you might view Haman in all his pride,
And, like a rogue, hanged and then dittified.
Each kitchen, parlour, chamber, were all drest here
With Samson, Joseph, Daniel, or Queen Hester.”||

But this was a local accident,—these were the effusions of an inspired parish clerk; and Nathaniel Miers, “the clarke that did the christenings”¶ in Mr. Newton's absence, was not inspired. If, in any of the houses at Taunton in the time of the Commonwealth, you saw amongst the broad

* Jasper Mayne's “City Match.”

† Beaumont and Fletcher's “Custom of the Court.” The statements given above are supported by the traditions and relics of three or four Nonconformist families known to the author, in the west of England. One venerable member of his former congregation, a gentleman who lived to the age of ninety-four, used to tell of a ramble he had when a boy over the old house of a Nonconformist baronet, which was printed over in this way: and he remembered how his youthful mind was impressed by an inscription in the dormitory anciently used by the handmaidens of the family, and which was intended to strike the eye the first thing in the morning,—“Arise, ye women that are at ease.” It is a wonder that the witty enemies of the Nonconformists have not made more of these things.

‡ Master Perkins.

§ Wilmot.

|| “Batt upon Batt,” a poem, 1680.

¶ Register of Mary Magdalen.

sheets on the wall, one that was covered over with what at the distance of a few yards looked like poetry, a nearer approach would shew you that it certainly had not been selected for its poetical merit. We owe most of our written poetry to the remembrance in peace of past excitement; but the crisis of excitement is not itself the season when poetry is most likely to be written or read. The lives of the Puritans were often instinct with the very soul of poetry; only, "instead of singing it like birds, they acted it like men."* Poetical authorship was next to impossible amidst their trials; yet, even in this respect, they were not deficient in comparison with their opponents. They had at least, George Wither, John Milton, and "the glorious dreamer," John Bunyan.

After the noon-day meal, your host confesses to you his delight in goodly music, and quotes in support of his views, the saying of one of his ministers: "Of all beastes," saith Ælian, "there is none that delighteth not in harmony, save only the asse; strange would it be for men to love it not." Singing begins, and perhaps, to the accompaniment of the lute; but, although playing on the lute is mentioned by Alleine with approval, it was a question with some of his neighbours whether they ought to conform so far to the habits of the ungodly. At a meeting which the members of the Baptist Church at Taunton held with the members of sister churches at the Bridgewater Association in 1655, the question was proposed, "Whether a believing man or woman, being head of a family in this day of the Gospell, may keep in his or her house an instrument or instruments of musique, playing on them, or admitting others to play thereon?" The answer was, "It is the duty of the saints to abstain from all appearance of evil, and not to make provision for the flesh to fulfill the lusts thereof, to redeem the time, and to do all to the glory of God; and though we cannot consider the use of such instruments to be unlawful, yet we desire the saints to be very cautious lest they transgress the aforesaid rules in the use of it, and do that which may not be of good report, and so give offence to their tender brethren."† Keeping the "aforesaid rules" in mind, your friend will venture to use the lute, and invite you to join in a song, not, however, one of the songs of this world. (When you have time, if you have courage, look into one of the Roxburgh or Luttrell Collections of the songs of the Seventeenth Century, preserved in the British Museum, and you will soon see the reason.) Since all the living literature of music was too tainted for the pure to use, he gives out a canticle from a little black volume, called the "The Booke of Psalmes; close and proper to the Hebrew; smooth and pleasant for the Metre; plain and easy to the Tunes. By W. B., 1654." Out of this book Alleine and his family were accustomed to sing after dinner, though sometimes he would substitute the Te Deum, which he much rejoiced in; and it was said, when he pronounced the sentence, "The noble army of martyrs praise thee," it was always with "a certain exaltation."

You will find your companion severe in his notions as to simplicity in dress. When a Somersetshire lad came home one day, in a coat brodered with broad gold lace, his mother in great alarm cut it all away, and he himself afterwards remembered his "vain apparel" with great anguish, saying, "My buttons, gold, and the silk on my sleeves lay on my conscience, a burden weighty as a world."‡ Some of the elders of the people, while they held grave opinions about adornment in "gold, pearls, and costly array," expressed those opinions to the weaker brethren with edifying moderation, desiring that "they should be proceeded against with all sweetness and tenderness, and long-suffering, it being not so clearly and generally understood as other things that are more contrary to the light of nature."§ After all the standard of dress adopted by the Puritan would more closely approximate to modern * Kingsley on Plays and Puritans.

† "Baptist Church Book," Lyme Regis.

‡ "Life of Trosse."

§ Papers of Western Association of Baptist Churches in 1655.—Baptist College Library, Bristol.

laws of taste and propriety than would that of the Cavalier, with his silks, feathers, laces, and gaudy streamers of ribbon.

Your friend exacts from his family the most strict respect to the injunction, "be not conformed to this world."* But knowing what was meant by "the world," in the life of any one of the Stuarts, you are not surprised. If those gallants, the "bright exhalations of knighthood"—so often placed by Sir Walter Scott in enchanting contrast to the rude and gloomy Puritans—were walking the earth now, you would not call them gentlemen, nor wish to see them at your table. Of course we are speaking not of exceptions on either side, but of the average Puritan and the average Cavalier.

In the evening you leave the burgher's house to take a view of life amongst the poorer classes. You hear the music of family praise floating through many a stone shafted lattice as you pass along the streets. It used to be so even in London,† but more especially in the better instructed provincial towns.‡ At last you enter the cottage of a labourer. Pasted upon the wall are various folio sheets, with such titles as these:—"Old Mr. Dod's Sayings," "Another Posie out of Mr. Dod's Garden," "Plain Directions for the more profitable hearing of the Word," by Joseph Caryl; "Memorables concerning our life before God, by one desirous of poor folks' salvation," "Sayings, &c., which may be pasted on a man's chamber door for a memoriall." In the place meant to be most public and honourable, there is a sheet, broad as a leaf of the "Times" (you are not to forget the nineteenth century), bearing the title, "Mr. Joseph Alleine's directions for covenanting with God; also, rules for a Christian's daily self-examination."§ A few godly books lie on a shelf near the window.

If you have been much in Puritan company you must have learned that, although no large society was at that time in existence for the diffusion of religious knowledge amongst the poor, sheets and books for this purpose were often distributed privately, or by concert of two or three persons, to the extent of hundreds of thousands. When, for instance, Alleine's treatise on conversion came out, a Nonconformist minister proposed that an edition should be printed for gratuitous circulation, and immediately paid down £50 towards the cost. Others joined him, and the result was, that an impression of 20,000 was dispersed without sale, and another impression was, by the same method, sold under rate.|| In these ways, together with the system of catechizing, on which so much stress was placed in those days, the poorer people were remarkable for their religious intelligence. The poor man, into whose cottage your spirit is now glancing, is ready to open a dialogue with you like one of those reported in the "Pilgrim's Progress."

If you wish to see what Puritan life was like in "the high places," go with Mr. Alleine and his brother Norman to spend an evening with Admiral Blake at his country-house at Knowle, two miles from Bridgewater. Suppose it to be during the period of his brief visit to England in 1656. Suppose his friend, Colonel Hutchinson, to be staying there. There would be a simple meal, the Bible would be brought in, there would be prayer, there would be conversation such as Christians love, and which they can only have when in

* We must hope that extreme measures to secure family order were not often resorted to; but in one of Mr. Newton's books there is a publisher's list, which announces an interesting new work with the following title: "The Husband's Authority Unveiled; wherein is moderately discussed whether or no it be lawful for a good man to beat his bad wife."

† "Time was when one could not have come through the streets of London, even on a week-day, but we might hear the praises of God in singing of Psalms."—Mr. Case, 1663.

‡ Baxter says of Kidderminster, "You might hear a hundred families singing psalms and repeating sermons as you passed through the streets." And this, he elsewhere tells us, was not an uncommon thing in other towns.

§ British Museum. The Rev. John Wesley afterwards issued an abridged publication of these "Directions," giving them high praise.

|| Life and Funeral Sermon of the Reverend Mr. Thomas Brand, M.A., by Dr. Samuel Annerly, 1692.

"their own company ;"—there would probably be discourse in logical forms on some of the mysteries of Christian truth—of course there would be reasonings over some "case of conscience ;"—Mr. Newton would be apt to get prosy in discussing the opinions of Fragosa, Tolet Sayrus, and Roderiques—then there would be a flow of graceful and varied talk, not only on politics, but on books, pictures, gardening, or the last scientific experiments of the Oxford Society—and the great sailor who had so often made the Dutch tremble at his sublime audacity "would affect a droll concern to prove before the ministers, by the aptness and abundance of his Latin quotations, that, in becoming an admiral, he had not forfeited his claim to be considered a good classic."* You could not find better types of the winning yet stately Christian gentleman than amongst the Puritans.

They had amongst them men of narrow and negative opinions ; men of vehement, disputatious independence ; men who had no love for the lovely in the works of God or man, and who were accustomed to think that, in the exercises of religion, the eye and the ear were only in the way ; men who seldom relaxed the stern strain of the faculties which their exigencies of the day demanded, and who therefore made Christianity look forbidding. They were often joined by men who thought with, were not of them, and who only misrepresented them to the world ; who put religiosity in place of religion, and displayed a false Puritanism, "as like and as unlike the true as hemlock is to parsley ;" men to whom plain downright Lewis Stuckley said, when referring to the signs over the tradesmen's doors, "You have glorious signs, but ill customs ; an angel for a sign here, a lamb for a sign there, but within devils and cheats."† Still, the true principles of Puritanism were favourable to strength and refinement of character, to domestic purity and love, and to all kinds of commercial prosperity. While they were ascendant, "there was scarcely an instance of bankruptcy heard of in a year."‡ "Many places," remarks Baxter when writing of Alleine, "were so seasoned by the great abilities and holy lives of their pastors, the great market towns have become as religious as the selected members which some think only fit for churches." "In those years between forty and sixty," Philip Henry testifies, "though on civil accounts 'the foundations were out of course,' yet, in the matters of God's worship, things went well ; there was freedom and reformation, and a face of godliness was upon the nation, though there were some that made a mask of it. . . . This, we know very well, let men say what they will of those times."§

---

POETRY.

---

SLEEP.

"Oh, lightly, lightly tread,
A holy thing is sleep!"—MRS. HEMANS.

THE father sleeps,—hush, children! wake him not
That slumber deep is well and dearly bought.
Now the long day of heat and toil is past,
The welcome shades of evening fall at last,—
Rest, weary one! enjoy that calm repose
Which rarely on his couch a monarch knows;
Sleep undisturbed by dreams of guilt or fear,
With all thy loving and beloved ones near.
Sleep, and awake revived, refreshed, anew
The path of loving labour to pursue;

* Hepworth Dixon's Life of Blake, p. 267. † Gospel Looking Glasse.

‡ Neale's History, vol. iii. p. 46.

§ Life of Phillip Henry, by Sir J. B. Williams, p. 89.

Thus days and years of honoured life to spend,
Till the last summons meet thee at the end,
Calling to better worlds thy soul away
Softly as slumber falls at close of day!

The exile sleeps,—hush, stranger! wake him not!
Let home and friends be for a time forgot.
Ah, not forgotten! all so long in vain
Desired, remembered, is his own again!
Yon dark banana grove he sees no more,
He hears not now yon wild hyæna's roar,
Through the long vista of departed years
Far other sights he sees, and sounds he hears;—
A blue lake trembles in the evening gleam,—
Down a deep glen rushes a mountain stream—
Half hid among the birches near the hill,
On his fair home the sunset lingers still,—
And where those sands the wave and shore divide,
A gentle maiden wanders by his side;—
Gaze on, fond dreamer! all must vanish soon,
Beneath the blaze of India's sultry noon,
All, save sad memories, must ere then be gone,—
Enjoy the present bliss,—dream on, dream on!

The sufferer sleeps,—breathe softly! wake him not!
The rest has come, so long and vainly sought.
The hours of fevered restlessness are past,
The weary eyelids gently close at last,
Gone is the look of agony and care,
Almost a smile those faded features wear;—
Oh, surely God is good, and sleep's soft dew
May the worn frame and wasted strength renew,
Sleep, dearest, sleep! while Love long known and tried Watches with sleepless patience at thy side,
Watches to hail the first glad look or word
Which tells that hope has dawned, that prayer is heard,
That all those troubled days of pain and fear
Shall soon but as a midnight dream appear,
And joy, like morning sunbeams, yet shall come,
And all be bright in thy now darkened home!

The mourner sleeps,—tread lightly! wake him not!
Let sorrow's pang be for a time forgot!
In the bright spirit-land he wanders now,
With heart unburdened, and unclouded brow.
The dear departed he beholds once more,
Loving and lovely as in days of yore;
Voices long silent all his pulses thrill,—
Eyes of deep love meet his like sunshine still;—
From those fair forms all trace of slow decay,
The shadow of the grave has passed away;
Again united in communion sweet,
Spirit with spirit, heart with heart, they meet,
Oh, blissful vision! must he wake again,
To find it all illusion, false and vain!
Dream on, sad heart! but not of meetings here,
Earth's passing joys, which smile and disappear;
Dream of the brighter home, the better land,
Where soon our weary feet in peace shall stand,
Where the Forerunner is before us gone,
And all His own shall follow—thus dream on!

The Christian sleeps—in Jesus—blessed thought!
Hush, mourners! though ye could, awake him not!
Would ye recall him from the home of bliss,
The “better country,” to a land like this?

To weep as we are weeping—all our pain,
 Temptations, conflicts, to endure again?
 No, brother! slumber now, and take thy rest
 In the low sleeping place which Christ has blessed,
 Till the great Easter morning light the skies,
 And all His people like Himself shall rise,
 Bright in His radiance, with His beauty fair,
 Ever His glory and His bliss to share.
 Oh, precious hope! already from afar
 Through sorrow's night we see the Morning Star,
 And guided by its beams, we calmly lay
 Our sleeping ones to rest, to wait "that day!"

H. L. L.

---

THE SABBATH SCHOOL.

---

THE BEGINNING OF SUNDAY-SCHOOLS IN IRELAND.

THE REV. DR. URWICK, of Dublin, in the paper which he read at "the Sunday-school Convention," recently held in London, states that about the year 1770, the Rev. Dr. Kennedy, curate of Bright parish, in the county of Down, was painfully struck with the total disregard of the Lord's-day among the young people and children in some villages through which he had to pass in going to and from his duty at the church. His congregation was very small. A gentleman of the name of Henry, with his family, joined it, and with him Dr. Kennedy consulted by what means it could be improved. Having engaged a well-conducted and competent man in the capacity of parish clerk, they got boys and girls together on Sundays to practise psalmody. This made a little stir. In 1774, to singing was added exercise in reading the psalms and lessons for the day, which, being rumoured abroad, excited further attention. Ere two years more had elapsed, the numbers had considerably increased. Those who came were desired to bring what Bibles and Testaments they could, in order to their being better instructed and examined in what they read. Then the children of other denominations were invited to share the advantages of the meeting. And thus, by the year 1778, the gathering which had begun as a singing-class a few years previously, had matured into a "school" held regularly every Sunday for an hour and a half before the morning service.

The good work went on and prospered until the latter part of the year 1785, when Dr. Kennedy heard of the proceedings in England for the establishment of Sunday-schools. His own was, in reality, a Sunday-school already. But he and the gentleman he advised with, agreed that its plan should be made more comprehensive and systematic, according to the English method. During the winter they spread information on the general subject, and obtained funds among persons they interested in the project. The necessary preliminaries being arranged, the Bright Sunday-school was opened on the first Sunday in May, 1786, with Robert Henry, Esq., as its superintendent; members of his family and other respectable individuals as teachers; and honest Thomas Turr, the parish clerk, ready to help in it as he might be able, or occasion require.

This account was supplied by a man named Thomas Chambers. He entered as a scholar on the first Sunday in June, 1786, just a month only from its commencement. Being able to read well, he was placed in the head class. He represented that, though there was a good deal of opposition, the number of scholars in August afterwards amounted to 343, including Episcopalians, Presbyterians, Methodists, and Roman Catholics, collected from within a district nine miles in length, and differing in ages from four years to upwards of twenty. The senior classes, besides learning the Scriptures, committed to memory portions of Watts's hymns. A pair of shoe-buckles for boys, and pieces of ribbon for girls, were rewards for diligence. The most deserving were favoured with a tract, and had their names inscribed on a roll, and posted in the church; the first thus honoured was a Roman Catholic girl. Several years ago, our worthy informant sent up to the Sunday-school Society's Committee in Dublin a pocket Bible, which Dr. Kennedy gave him within twelve months from the opening of the school, for having sometimes acted usefully as a teacher. Not unnaturally, Chambers counted the book very precious, and the more so as he considered it to be, which probably it was, the first Bible ever given in an Irish Sunday-school. As a book, neither its paper, print, nor binding will compare with those of Bibles easily procured now; but then it would cost what to the poor was a serious sum. The hold which that copy of the Scriptures had on the good man's affections may be known by what he wrote on the paper in which he wrapped it for transmission:—"God speed thy journey, my dear Bible! Farewell.—T. C."

Chambers died a few months ago, a patriarch of more than fourscore and ten, in the possession of his faculties to the last, and trusting in the one Saviour. Though a plain man in humble life, his letters contain touches of the graphic, and even of the poetic. Dr. Kennedy's removal to another diocese, in 1791, interfered with the working of the school. Through his absence, and consequent changes in the management of parish affairs, it lingered dwindling for some time, and became almost extinct. However, it afterwards revived. The present minister of the parish writes to me, "You will, I think, be glad to hear that what he (Chambers) called the 'Bright Light' is still burning, and I hope will continue to do so till eclipsed by a brighter day."

---

MISCELLANIES.

---

THOUGHTS ON A VISIT TO THE GRAVE OF THE REV. WILLIAM CLOWES.

THERE is a solemn grandeur around the tomb which is to be felt nowhere else. When the heir apparent to the British throne stood by the grave of the great American chieftain, George Washington, he took off his hat in honour to the warrior; pensive he hung over the cold monumental marble, while a death-like stillness reigned around, unbroken, save by the sighing wind that swept around the tomb, and raised soft as the touch of an angel the locks from the brow of the noble young prince. And who does not like to hold communion with the dead, to visit the place where humanity takes its last deep slumber?

Having to pass through Hull on my way to the sea side, I took the opportunity of visiting the grave of that great and good man, the Rev. William Clowes. The afternoon was gloomy, the clouds hung like drooping banners over my head, which gave to the heavens a dismal aspect. About three o'clock I arrived at Springfield Cemetery, which possesses no small degree of artistic beauty. There stood the colossal tomb-stone, with its golden epitaph.

At my left was a humble grave, its only ornament a wreath of flowers; the living testimonies of a parent's love. I observed among the dark green foliage, a number of people walking attired in deep mourning. As they passed to and fro, I saw the tears of affection gush forth, and heard the wild wail of distress which kissed the tombs as it passed: "Lover and friend hast thou put far from me, and mine acquaintance into darkness." I was now conducted to that sacred spot, where lies locked in the arms of death, one of the mightiest warriors of his day. With becoming reverence I approached his tomb, and stood for several moments with uncovered head, reading the epitaph on the massive vault erected to perpetuate his memory. Thus reads the eulogium relative to his character:—

"HE WAS A BURNING AND A SHINING LIGHT."

How brief, yet appropriate; an archangel could not have composed a sentence more expressive. "A burning and a shining light." Not a star, but a sun arrayed in all his meridian glory.

My mind now became busy with the past. The closing scene of this great man passed in dramatic splendour before my mental vision. That hour of grand mysterious import, when he stood with one foot upon the shifting sands of time, and the other upon the grand terra firma of eternity. I saw him stretched upon the bed of death, his earthly house was being demolished, but the inner temple was being polished and fitted up to stand amongst the many mansions in his Father's house. How silent he lies! Not a syllable escapes his lips. Why does he not speak of Jesus, of whom he used to speak in such glowing strains, and bear testimony to the consoling power of religion in a dying hour? The reason is obvious; death has spoiled the power of articulation, his heavenly Father has so willed it that he shall speak no more; his shrill cry of "To Calvary," "To Calvary," which has sent thousands weeping to the cross, who by believing have liberty found through the blood of the Lamb, has been heard for the last time; those lips which once trembled with the songs of Zion, have sung their last earthly song, and are being tuned for higher raptures, and more entrancing melodies. Those eyes which were once lit up with unearthly lustre, now roll like suns eclipsed within their orbits. Those feet that once trod the dark alleys and solitary lanes in search of the wanderer, have performed their last mission. Grouped around him are his favourite marshals; they have come to see him die, to march with him to the gate of death; they have fought side by side in many a conflict, and now to inaudible shouts of triumph they watch him bear the flag of victory high above the smoke and storm of the last great battle. They cling around him, like a child around its dying parent, and are loath to let him go; but he must depart, for his Master calls; and angels with their radiant fingers are preparing the laurel for his manly brow, and the shining minstrelsy have gathered up on the jasper threshold to hail him to the courts of bliss, already soft as the dying cadence of an angel's lute the notes of welcome fall upon his ear. The flaming steeds and chariot have left the crystal portals, and are on their way to bear him home; noiseless as the golden sunbeams, they enter the chamber of death, and thread their way through that solemn assembly. Ere he departs, one of his sons in the ministry, requests him to give them a sign of his acceptance with God. Those wasted hands that have lain for hours motionless by his side, are raised in token of victory, and William Clowes exchanges time for eternity. He stepped from the bed of death into the chariot of life, and away went steed and chariot "like an ascending glory," while the face and raiment of Clowes turned golden in the flash of the fiery vehicle.

What tongue can describe the grief which this event caused? Not only a family, but a whole Connexion is thrown into mourning.

The day for his interment is published from every pulpit in Hull, and the adjacent villages. The morning dawns, and thousands come to pay their last tribute of respect to this honoured and devoted man. What a sight was that funeral train as it passed in solemn pomp through the streets of Hull; the very pavement seemed to tremble under the tramp of that mighty host! Slowly the procession moved along, the funeral dirge rolling forth in strains solemn and majestic, which told the careless spectator that no ordinary man was being carried to his resting place. They arrive at the Cemetery, and as his remains are lowered into the vault prepared for their reception, the solemn and impressive words, "Man that is born of a woman," break the silence; the burial service having been read, thousands step forward to take a last fond look of their departed leader, "Who being dead yet speaketh."

As his tomb retreats into the shade of time, the more radiant will it be with glory to the eyes of posterity.

Extraordinary men are like mountains, and their image seems to grow in proportion as they recede from our view, and stand out alone in the confines of the horizon.

HENRY HARRIS.

AN INCONSISTENT MARRIAGE.

THE relation which I am now to give of a person with whom I was intimately acquainted, may serve to awaken your fears, lest a promise being left you of entering into rest, you also should come short of it. This youth, in his unawakened state, lived in security for about twenty years. It pleased the Father of mercies to convince him then, that the course he was pursuing would lead to destruction, and that it was high time to seek the Lord while he might be found, and to call upon him while he was near. With this conviction he set about seeking the salvation of his soul. He thought it his duty to join the church of God, asking divine assistance to fulfil the duties that devolved upon him. It was not long before he thought he had found the Pearl of great price, and appeared to rejoice in a present salvation. His words were, "I know by experience that God has power on earth to forgive sins." He walked in all the means of grace for several years.

At length he was led to change his condition of life. Unhappily for him, he chose for his wife a gay handsome lady, but a stranger to serious religion; and although she was not of his way of thinking, his family and personal appearance pleased her so well, that she consented to their union, thinking that after they were married she could cure him of his religious frenzy—and too well she succeeded in the attempt. At first she began to reason with him in this way; she observed, that if they meant to be thought anything of by their friends and neighbours, they should not treat them with so much neglect, when invited by them to go to this, that, and the other place of diversion. That he knew how much very religious persons were set aside by people of respectability; that so much reading and praying went on in his house, that the neighbours laughed at it. "In fine," said she, "I married you, you know, to be happy with you, but I utterly despair of happiness, unless you become like other people." Her husband assured her that happiness was what he sought, and what he had found; but he had not found it in those things which she esteemed to be objects of happiness, but in the love of God and the services of religion; he told her, that he hoped that he should ever make it a special aim to make her happy, but that he was certain the happiness that arose from the pleasures of this world was not substantial; that although for the present it might afford imaginary sweetness, in the end it would be bitter as death.

When she found that mildness would not do, she adopted a harsher mode. She refused to conform to family devotion. He grieved, he wept, and in secret often prayed for her, but she yielded not. She used every stratagem her fruitful imagination could invent; she persisted till she finally wearied him out. His affection for his wife, worked on from day to day, induced him to comply in some measure with his partner's wishes; he thought he would attend to his private duties, and try to get to heaven alone, if she would not go with him. But she pursued him to his closet, and finally drove him from every retreat, until he seemed to forget every religious ordinance. The regulation of his life by God's law being neglected, he soon found the corruptions of his heart to stir within; they then broke out in his life, till he finally gratified her in every request she made, and even ran to greater lengths than ever he did before he made a profession of religion; he realized the truth of this proverb, "The backslider shall be filled with his own ways."

Some time after this, he was induced to go to hear a sermon preached on a particular occasion, in which the minister entered into all the feelings of his heart, and all his sins were brought to his remembrance. He then promised the Lord once more that he would again serve him, let the opposition be what it would. But his difficulties appeared now to be greater, and his strength to resist them less than before. He felt as in his enemy's hands; and, like a man who had been bound when he was asleep, he awoke with surprise. He struggled, but he could not get free; he groaned under his bondage, and wished for liberty, but in vain. His wife redoubled her efforts, and gained her point a second time. He continued in this state for some time, sinning with but little remorse of conscience. He had lost desire for the means of grace, and the company of the people of God ; he gave himself up to the customs and maxims of an ungodly world.

After this he was laid upon a bed of affliction, and his life was despaired of by himself and his friends. In this affliction his fears were roused, his sins appeared in dreadful colours before him, so aggravated did they appear to him, that he thought he dared not look up to God for mercy. "How can I," said he, "expect that God will pardon me, when I have run counter to his will, grieved his Spirit, sinned away all that peace I once enjoyed, and finally, have gone farther astray since my apostasy than I ever did before I professed to come to Jesus ? O that I had my time to live over again ; O that I had never been born !" His disorder increased, and his fears gathered into a dark cloud of terror. "If," said he, "God would only give me another trial, I would amend my ways ; if God will not hear me, perhaps he will hear the prayers of his people in my behalf. O send for them, that they may pray for me ; for how can I stand before the Avenger of sin in this lamentable condition !" His friends did visit him, and God graciously heard their prayers in his behalf, and, contrary to expectation, he recovered. But, as his strength of body increased, his convictions subsided, and by the time he was fully restored to health, he was ready for, and actually did return to, all his former vices.

Several years after this I fell in company with him, when I entered into close conversation with him about the state of his soul. I asked him what he thought would become of him if he died in his present state ? "Why," said he, "as sure as God is in heaven, I shall be damned." "Well," said I, "do you mean to die in this state ? do you never think of changing your course of life ?" "My friend," said he, "I have no desire to serve God ; I have no desire for anything that is good ; to tell you the truth, I as much believe my damnation is sealed, as I believe I am conversing with you. I know," said he, "the very time the Spirit of God took his flight, and what you may be more surprised at than all I have yet said, is, I am not troubled about it, no more than if there was no God to punish sin, or a hell to cast sinners into." I anxiously pointed out to him the fountain of Christ's blood, in which all may wash, and which washes away all stains. But he turned away. I was struck speechless. I cannot describe my feelings ; I could say no more to him ; I could only observe with what an air of indifference he spoke ; and though his words deeply affected my mind, yet his heart appeared to be as hard and unmoved as a stone.

After I parted with him, I fell into meditation on the awful subject. Lord, whom have I been conversing with ? An immortal spirit clothed with flesh and blood, that appears to be sealed over to eternal damnation ! A man that once had a day of grace, and the offer of mercy, but now appears to have cast them away ! The door of heaven seems to be shut against him, never to be opened more ! He once might have accepted of salvation, but because he did not improve his time and talent, God judiciously has given him over to hardness of heart and blindness of mind ; he is neither moved by mercy, nor terrified by judgment. What a lesson to me, thought I ; may I improve it to the glory of God and the salvation of my own soul. About two years after this he was laid upon his death-bed, and his conscience roared like thunder against him, and cast its lightning upon him to torment him. His sickness was short, and his end truly awful. Many Christian friends visited him, and sought to administer comfort : but he was comfortless. One said to him, "Perhaps you may be mistaken ; it may not be so bad with you as you imagine." "Ah," said he, "would to God I was mistaken ; happy would it be for me. But," continued he, "can I be mistaken about my affliction ? Is it imagination that confines me here ? Are my pains imaginary ? No, no, they are a reality ; and I am as certain of my damnation as I am of my affliction." Some persons offered to pray with him, but he forbade it. He charged them not to attempt it. "For," said he, "that moment you attempt to lift up your hearts to God in my behalf, I feel the flames of hell kindle in my breast. You might as well pray for the devil as for me ; you would have as much success. Do you think to force God ? Do you think to force the gates of heaven, that are barred against me by justice ? No, let your prayers return upon your own heads, I want none of them." The distress of his mind seemed to swallow up that of his body, and he continued nearly in the same situation till the day of his dissolution. All that Christians or Christian ministers could say to him made no impression on his mind. He never asked any one to pity or pray for him. Just before he departed, after he had been rolling for some time from side to side, with horror depicted in every feature of his face, he cried to his wife, "Bring me a cup of cold water, for in one hour I shall be where I shall never get another drop." She brought him the water, which he took and drank with greediness ; he then reached back the cup with his trembling hand, and staring in her face, his eyes flashing terror all around him, he exclaimed, "Becky, Becky, you are the cause of my eternal damnation." He turned over, and, with an awful groan, left the world, and launched into a boundless eternity.

Dear reader, art thou despising Christ's dying love, and his great salvation—despising the day of grace, forsaking thine own mercies, and counting thyself unworthy of eternal life ? Consider the end of thy way. "Say ye to the righteous, it shall be well with him : woe unto the wicked, it shall be ill with him, for the reward of his hands shall be given to him. (Isa. iii. 10.)

"He that walketh with wise men shall be wise, but a companion of fools shall be destroyed."—Prov. xiii. 20.

THE AGED SINNER.

ONE lovely morning in the Spring of 186—, while about our Master's business, an old man over whose head the storms of threescore years and ten had blown, called upon us requesting us to accompany him to the bedside of his aged partner who, he said, was "verra ill, and gets worse and worse, and theres neer chance for her ; Doctor's gin her up."

Feeling the request at the moment somewhat of an interruption, we nevertheless complied, remembering our business was to save souls—

"To lead them to a pardoning God,
And quench the brands in Jesus' blood."

And that like our great Exemplar we were to be always ready, instant in season and out of season, that we might by all means save some. We at once turned our steps towards the house of affliction, endeavouring as we went to elicit from our guide a few particulars respecting the previous life, and moral state of the invalid ; in order to be able to give the advice and instruction which were most suitable to her condition. In answer to our interrogations we were told that "she had been a good creature all the days of her life, and could read her Bible as weel as ivver the parson could, and was not afraid to die." On reaching her abode we found her making flesh her arm, while her heart departed from the living God. Her righteousness was of her own creation, consisting of so many duties performed with punctilious precision. The Bible had been occasionally read. "I owe nobody a farthing ; ever since we were married we've paid all our debts, and nobody can say that we've done them any harm, and I hope to go to heaven." Such was the foundation of her hope of heaven. We expressed ourselves pleased to hear that she and her husband had endeavoured to be just in all their dealings, and never to infringe upon the rights of their fellows : but we felt it no easy thing to cut away from beneath her feet the false ground without inducing despair.

As we visited her time after time, we pointed out the breadth and spirituality of the divine law, and the absolute impossibility of the sinner's being justified thereby ; showing that the law was not given for justification, but as our schoolmaster to bring us unto Christ. And as we endeavoured to lead her into the way of peace by simplifying our language as much as possible, light broke in upon her mind,—shot "athwart the gloom profound,"—and by the eye of faith she beheld the Lamb of God, and rejoiced in Christ, having no more confidence in the flesh.

A more illustrious example of saving mercy we never beheld. Her enlightenment and conversion being of God were productive of their appropriate fruits. Her progress in the divine life was strikingly manifest in her gratitude for benefits received, prayer for grace needed, penitence for faults committed, and submission to chastisements inflicted.

As she drew near the eternal city her prospects brightened. Day by day did she

"On Faith's strong eagle pinions rise,
And force her passage to the skies,
And scale the mount of God."

And ultimately she passed away like the morning star which sinks not behind the western hills, but melts away into the superior light of heaven.

"Comfort came down her departing soul to raise,
And her last faltering accents whispered praise."

Her aged partner wept, and vowed he would follow her to the skies. For a brief period he gave some indication of a fulfilment of that which he had promised. But alas! alas! he was again entangled in the meshes of the net of iniquity—a victim to the curse of intemperance, that fell destroyer of the bodies and souls of men! A few short months brought him to the house appointed for all living. He finished his course full of doubt, gloom, and uncertainty.

Our narrative is done, it teems with encouragement, it is pregnant with warning, and fraught with instruction.

To the trembling penitent, the anxious inquirer, the poor backslider, it speaks in accents of encouragement. To the profligate sinner, the impenitent man, the impenitent woman, it speaks in words of terrible import.

O heed its warning voice. Yield thyself to Christ! Take him as thy prophet, priest, and king. Take him for life and death, time and eternity; being willing to be what he would have thee be, to do what he would have thee do, and suffer what he would have thee suffer.

And may we behold his glory in heaven.

J. M.

STATISTICS.

CENSUS OF ENGLAND.—The first volume of the census for England, which has just been issued, shows the numbers and distribution of the people in the several parishes and places. An abstract of the returns was published last year; a careful revision of them shows that on the 8th of April, 1861, the population of England and Wales, with the Isle of Man and Channel Islands, including the army at home, and the navy and seamen in the ports, rivers, and creeks,—that is to say, all the persons in the kingdom—amounted in number to 20,209,671. The returns for Scotland having been also revised, the population of great Britain on that day is found to have been 23,271,965; and the returns for Ireland, when the revision of these also is completed, will bring the population of the United Kingdom to above 29,000,000. The increase in England and Wales alone, since the census of 1851, has been 2,138,615, notwithstanding that in the interval, 2,250,000 persons emigrated from the United Kingdom, of whom it is calculated that 640,316 were English. Since the census of 1851, the male population of England and Wales has increased 11·33 per cent, the female population 12·50 per cent. The excess of females over males, 365,159, in 1851, had grown to 513,706, in 1861; and these figures do not include the army, navy, and seamen out of the kingdom. In Scotland the disproportion is still greater; in Great Britain, with the islands in the British seas, the excess of females over males in 1861, was 687,471, to which the Irish returns, according to the unrevised abstract, have above 150,000 to add. On the census night 62,430 persons were on board vessels in the harbours, rivers, and creeks of England and Wales, without reckoning persons in barges on canals; in the metropolitan district 8,084 persons were on board vessels in the docks and the Thames. In England and Wales 124,962 persons were in workhouses and workhouse schools; 13,456 in hospitals; 24,207 in lunatic asylums; 26,395 in prisons and reformatories; 23,598 in orphan asylums and other principal charitable institutions, without reckoning in any instance the official staff in charge of these institutions; 80,839 persons, military and families of military, were in barracks. The population of the Isle of Man and the Channel Islands, which had previously been increasing, has, in the ten years under review, hardly maintained its number, except by an increase of the military force. In a few months the publication of the census of England will be completed by the issue of tables of the ages, occupations, birth-places, &c., of the people, with a report on the general results.

CONNEXIONAL INTELLIGENCE.

HOME DEPARTMENT.

FISHPONDS, BRISTOL STATION. — Our Society at Fishponds, previous to March last, had for some time been in a low state, but at that time several of the members were aroused to a greater earnestness in the Divine service, and commenced to converse about and pray for a revival. They obtained permission to hold prayer-meetings in houses where the inhabitants were unconverted.

While pleading with Heaven, their expectations were enlarged. Their faith became mighty, and God honoured them by manifesting his power in the conversion of sinners. The work thus commenced was not like the meteor, flashing through the sky, and then disappearing from view. It grew and spread. The fire of Divine love was kindled in the hearts of the members, and early in the morning they might be heard singing the high praises of God through the streets of the village; and the careless were aroused and soon flocked to the chapel. There, night after night, were witnessed scenes, such as cause "Joy in the presence of the angels of God." Strong, robust men, were suddenly stricken by the power of the Spirit, and constrained to cry aloud for mercy, when He who is "Mighty to save," appeared to them, as the Lamb of God, bearing away their sins. Believing in Him, they passed from "death unto life;" and were enabled to look up to God as reconciled through the blood of atonement. During this time of refreshing, upwards of a hundred professed to find pardon through faith in Christ.

"Give us room that we may dwell," now became the cry of the church. The scheme was devised of erecting a gallery in the chapel, and subsequently of painting the whole, which was duly completed, at a cost of £53 11s.

On Sunday, August 3rd, 1862, the chapel was re-opened, and a tea-meeting was held on the following day. In making up the accounts, it was found that so liberally had the people given of their substance to the cause of God, that even before the work was finished, sufficient money was in hand to pay for the whole. That this sanctuary may more than ever be filled with the power of the Highest, and be the birth-place of souls, is the prayer of J. H. J. TAYLOR.

TRAN, RAMSOR STATION.—Tea is a very respectable village, possesses a large tape factory, which employs a large number of hands, and contains a population of about 2,000 souls. A Primitive Methodist Chapel was built here in the year 1836; but, from what has happened, it appears that deception and dishonesty were practised by the builder. One morning, some months ago, the roofing gave way, and fell with so tremendous a crash that it startled the inhabitants of the place. The falling of the roof carried away part of the two gable-ends, and a side-wall down to the bottom of the window-sills, dashing the door and windows to pieces, and leaving the chapel a complete wreck. It lay for weeks in ruins. Finally it was decided at a quarter-day, to re-build it. When authority was given, Brother A. Hawley set about it with might and main, and begged through the station for funds. A builder was employed; the work set out, and the chapel has been re-built. It has four beautiful windows, with ornamented stone heads; a new door and frame; a new boarded floor, and considerable improvement in the form of the pews. The ceiling is plastered, and very tastefully corniced and bedded. The walls are built of brick, and furnished with a new inscription stone, and the front is very nicey dressed down, which makes the chapel look like a new one. It is one of the neatest chapels now in the station. The chapel was re-opened on Lord's-day, August 17th, 1862, by Brothers Tomlinson and Charlesworth; and on Sabbath, October 5th, by Miss Buck. The collections amounted to £11 11s. The total cost of the re-building is about £70 (exclusive of the painting). Towards this sum we have raised by donations, public subscriptions, &c., £63 19s.; and we intend to persevere till the whole be paid off. We hereby acknowledge our gratitude to Brother and Sister Hawley and Mrs. Nutt, for their diligence in soliciting donations, and to all who have assisted us in saving this house of God, and we trust that great grace may rest upon them all.

W. Rooke.

FROGHALL, RAMSOR STATION.—Froghall is a rising village within the precincts of Kingsley and Ipstones parishes, surrounded by romantic and varied scenery of hill and dale: and through which runs the river Churnett, which divides the two parishes. It is now a place of considerable importance, on account of the extensive iron-stone works, lime-stone works, and coal works, which are carried on in it, and in its vicinity. The name of Froghall is connected with the early history of our Connexion. But of late years it has been lying desert-like, for want of a preaching place. Within the last twelve months, it has been re-missioned by Brother W. Beech, and others; and, although we had to meet with discouragements at first, the Lord opened the way. A room was lent us gratuitously, wherein to hold our religious services; and then the Almighty poured out His Spirit, and several souls were brought in. Soon inquiries were made for land for a chapel. Mr. John Birch, of Froghall Mill, kindly gave us a very eligible site, adjoining the public road, and near the railway. Proper steps were accordingly taken preparatory to commencing building. And in June last, the foundation stone was laid by W. S. Allen, Esq., of Woodhead Hall, who gave us a donation of £5. The chapel is 30 feet by 24; and 13 feet from the level of the floor to the wallplate. It is built of brick, and covered with slate. It has a boarded-floor, with eight elevated pews; six windows, cast frames, 6 feet 6. by 2 feet 6; a first rate octagonal pulpit. A room underneath the elevated pews for a school room, capable of accommodating thirty or forty children. The chapel is ceiled and plastered to the sidepieces, and the front is nicey palisaded. It was opened for religious worship on Lord's-day, August 31st, by brother R. Jukes, of Westbromwich; and on September 21st, by Mr. W. Gilbert (Wesleyan), of Hilderstone. The collections amounted to £20 16s. 9d. The total cost of the chapel, &c., is about £160, towards which we have raised one third. The chapel is capable of accommodating 150 persons with seats, and the sittings are nearly all let. We acknowledge our gratitude to Mr. J. Birch and family for the site of land and other assistance, and to all others who have assisted us in our undertaking.

W. Rooke.

CROSTON STREET CHAPEL, LIVERPOOL CIRCUI.—A bazaar for the reduction of the debt on this chapel, was opened in the school room on Monday, September 1st, 1862, and continued on the three following days. Prior to the erection of the chapel, the society worshipped in a small room in Kirkdale, but this having become too small for the increasing congregation and neighbourhood, several friends exerted themselves to obtain a more commodious place, which resulted in the building of the present edifice. The chapel was opened for Divine worship about two years ago. After it was finished, a considerable debt remained on the premises. Owing to the difficulty of borrowing money at that time, the trustees were obliged to take £300 on a promissory note, to be repaid at £100 per annum: but having other demands to meet besides the ordinary expenses of the place, these terms could not be complied with the first year. The gentleman who had advanced the money kindly allowed the £100 due to stand over another year, intimating, however, that he must not have another disappointment. Last April, several of our lady friends resolved to do what they could to help the trustees out of their difficulties, and a bazaar was determined upon. Mrs. Cobb, the Misses Piercy, Mrs. Arnfield, Miss Jones, Mrs. Drake, Mrs. Povey, Mrs. Corfield, Mrs. Watkins, Miss Barrant, Mrs. Maddrell, Mrs. Spruce, and Mrs. Meredith, engaged to provide the needful for the stalls. Mrs. Heron and Miss Piercy undertook the management of the refreshment stalls. These ladies afterwards exerted themselves in a very praiseworthy manner, and their success exceeded our highest expectations. The stalls were crowded with useful ornamental and fancy articles. There was a good supply of needlework, also of wool and wax flowers, &c., which met with a pretty good sale. Miss S. E. Piercy presided at the piano, and enlivened the proceedings by playing occasionally a selection of sacred music and popular airs. The representatives of the press attended, and gave a very pleasing account in their respective papers. The bazaar was opened by singing a few verses of the well-known hymn,— "Praise ye the Lord, 'tis good to raise," after which, the writer engaged in prayer. The attendance on the whole was good, but many were kept away by heavy showers on the Monday afternoon, and by almost unceasing rain on the Wednesday and Thursday. The total receipts amounted to £180 Os. 5d. Since the bazaar upwards of £10 more has been received. We have still many goods on hand, by which our nett profits will easily be augmented to upwards of £200. In consequence the debt on the chapel will be considerably reduced, and the trustees placed in much easier circumstances. We have also to record our sense of the Divine goodness in the continued prosperity with which the society has been favoured. The chapel has already been the birth place of many souls. The congregation has steadily increased; the pews have let well and now yield about £46 per annum. The society has gradually increased from about thirty members to nearly one hundred; and its moneys for quarter day have increased nearly every quarter since the chapel was opened. In the beginning of 1861, a Sunday School was commenced, which has since done well. At the last March quarter day we reported to District Meeting 219 scholars, and a goodly number of teachers. At the second anniversary, held in June last, the collections amounted to nearly £20. Other efforts of a more private nature have been made on behalf of our chapel. Our esteemed friend, Mr. Piercy has presented a very handsome clock. Mrs. Cobb has kindly given a gross of cups and saucers with plates, &c. for tea meetings, and a similar number has been provided by the school. Twenty neat tea urns, and a suitable number of tables have also been provided by the congregation and school. In addition, a few of the trustees and friends of the chapel in the beginning of last year, contributed nearly £30 to the chapel fund. Truly the trustees and society have great cause for gratitude and encouragement. They have trusted in God, and worked hard, and not in vain. In conclusion, I may state that our Circuit, as a whole, is doing well. The prosperity with which it was favoured under the efficient superintendency of the Rev. J. Garner, during a period of six years, is continued. That it may abound more and more, dear Editor, is the sincere prayer of your late colleague and ever well-wisher,

R. ARNFIELD.

WHEATON ASTON, STAFFORD BRANCH.
—The second anniversary of the Sabbath School, was celebrated on Sunday, September 7th, 1862, when two powerful sermons were preached by R. Bowen, our superintendent minister. After each sermon, the children recited and sang several pieces suitable for the occasion, which gave great satisfaction to the teachers and congregations. Some pounds were collected more than at the last anniversary. Our school is in a prosperous condition.

J. CRESSWELL.

EAST RUDHAM, DOCKING STATION.—More than thirty six-years have elapsed since our people first entered this village to proclaim the "unsearchable riches of Christ." Since then many deathless souls have been turned from darkness to light, and from sin to righteousness. For years the energies of a working society had been crippled for want of a suitable place in which to conduct worship. A chapel was a desideratum, but where to obtain ground to build was the question. I am happy to inform the friends of our Zion, that God has now opened our way. A plot of freehold land has been purchased, and legally secured to the Connexion, at a cost of £20. The foundation stone was laid by the writer, on the 8th of May, 1862, and two very powerful sermons were preached by the Rev. R. Key; and the sum of £27 17s. was collected. The chapel is 38 feet by 24 outside; and 18 feet from the floor to the wallplate. It is built of good hard red and white bricks. We have a school room at the north gable 22 feet by 10, which opens into the chapel by sliding shutters. The chapel is fitted up with 26 open seats, with square framed panel backs; the rest are free seats. A rostrum, beautifully worked, serves the place of a pulpit, and will seat eight persons. At the entrance of the chapel we have a square-framed and panel-worked lobby 7 feet high, the door made to shut with a spring. The wood work is tastefully stained; the floor is boarded, the walls inside are of rough stucco, jointed. The ceiling has two handsomely formed ventilators. The chapel is lighted by eleven windows, six of which are hung with brass pulleys, patent lines, and iron weights. The centre one in front is circular, glazed with coloured glass, under which is the date stone, with the inscription, "Primitive Methodist. Ebenezer. 1862." The chapel was opened on the 7th, 14th, and 17th of September. The sermons were preached by the Revs. R. Betts, E. Blake, T. Charlton, and Mrs. Chipperfield. Much good was done, and the sum of £21 was collected. The cost of the chapel, including all expenses, is £270; towards this we have now raised £82; this sum we hope to make £110 from the forthcoming bazaar, &c. The seats are all let, and more are needed. The society and school are prospering. The building is a credit to the society, and great honour is due to the architect and builder. We tender our thanks to the many friends who have aided us, and beg for a continuance of their support. May the great God prosper the society, and fill the place with light and glory. E. BLAKE.

HOCKHAM, THETFORD STATION.—The opening services of the school-room in this village took place on Lord's-day and Monday, Sept. 14th and 15th, 1862. On the 14th three sermons were preached, by the Rev. J. Jackson, of Rockland, and Miss M. C. Buck, of Leicester. On the 15th, at three o'clock, Miss Buck preached again, after which a tea was served to 200 persons. A public meeting was held in the evening, addressed by Miss Buck, Messrs. Kemish, Frost, Nurse, sen., Nurse, jun., and the writer. The large congregations were highly delighted and blest. The cost of the building is about £62, towards which about £52 have been collected by different means, leaving a balance of £10, which is intended to be paid off in a short time. Great praise is due to Mr. Finch, who carted the materials gratis; to Miss Finch, and Brothers Adams, Ransome, Norton, and others, who assisted in bringing the object to such a happy issue. May the children of the Sabbath and day schools meet their benefactors where the Judge shall say to each, "Well done." J. ALLISON.

WORMEGAY, LYNN STATION.—Wormegay, a small village a few miles to the south of Lynn, has for many years been on the Lynn Circuit's plan as one of its regular preaching places; but the operations of the society have been greatly retarded for want of a chapel. After waiting many years, a piece of land was offered, the building was begun, and when completed was opened for Divine worship. This took place on Sept. 17th, 1862, when a sermon was preached by the writer, at three o'clock in the afternoon; afterwards about 200 persons sat down to tea. After tea there was a public meeting, presided over by Mr. W. Lift, circuit steward, and addressed by B. T. Sharpe, Esq., of Norwich; Revs. G. Dawson, and J. Scott. The last speaker presented the chairman, in the name of the trustees, with a handsome copy of the Bible and our Hymn-book, in two volumes, as a token of Christian affection for the interest he had taken in their chapel affairs. The building is 30 feet long and 21 feet wide, and is built of mixed bricks. The entire cost is about £140, towards which, by foundation services, cards, and opening collections, nearly £70 have been raised. Our thanks are due to the farmers who carted the bricks, and lent us their premises in which to hold our meetings. J. SCOTT.

PETERBOROUGH.—We believe the spirit of holy enterprise is animating our Connexion in the chapel-building department of labour. We believe the day is past when it was thought any situation would do for a Primitive Methodist chapel. We would not for a moment neglect the poor of our land; we would not for a single instant lose sight of the great work to which Divine Providence has called us; we do not wish to exonerate our preachers and members from the important duty of holding open-air services in the most neglected parts of our large towns and crowded cities; but in harmony with these sentiments, we would select the most suitable sites for our houses of prayer, and erect the most comfortable and attractive buildings thereon that our circumstances will allow. It has long appeared to us that, whoever promotes the erection of an attractive chapel in a suitable situation, is laying the foundation for the future progress of the Connexion. By special, untiring, and prayerful attention to this object, we shall succeed in raising structures where increasing congregations may be gathered, the missionary enterprise be more successfully advocated, the instruction of the young be more efficiently promoted, the relief of the poor be more promptly attended to, the funds of the denomination be more augmented, and the salvation of deathless spirits be secured on a larger scale, and in a shorter period. We rejoice that so much has been done already in this direction; but much yet remains to be done. We could even beseech with tears (were it necessary) the men of wealth and influence in our community, to turn their immediate attention to the consideration of this momentous subject. Many of them owe all the advantages of their social position, under God, to Primitive Methodism; and shall they not liberally support the institutions which have been such a blessing to them and their families? Would not these institutions prove a greater blessing to a much larger number, if more liberally supported? We can read of persons in other denominations subscribing £100, £500, £1,000, and even £5,000, to some benevolent and desirable object. When will this large-hearted sort of benevolence become more general among us as a people? Who will aspire to lead the way—be the first to subscribe to some benevolent scheme £500 or £1,000? We also earnestly hope that the poor will faithfully carry out every reasonable act of personal sacrifice and self-denial, to aid in promoting this great undertaking. We trust we do not undervalue the claims and importance of other objects, but we believe that primary attention to chapel extension is the soundest policy.

In harmony with these views, we have erected a substantial and somewhat inviting chapel, in one of the most eligible parts of the city of Peterborough, which was opened for Divine worship on Thursday, Sept. 18th, 1862. The Rev. W. Antliff, of London, preached an appropriate sermon at three o'clock. A public tea was provided at five, in the Corn Exchange, to which a goodly number sat down; after which a public meeting was held. The chair was occupied by the writer, and addresses were delivered by the Revs. W. Antliff, G. Bell, of Cambridge, R. Barron, of Ramsey, T. Barrass, A. Murray, and W. C. Tansom, of Peterborough. Sermons were preached on the three following Sabbaths by the Revs. W. Antliff, W. Sanderson, A. Murray, T. Barrass, J. Ashworth, W. C. Tansom, and Mr. W. Pentney. The congregations were good, and about £150 were realised. The chapel is 66 ft. long, 36 ft. wide, and 23 ft. from floor to ceiling. It has 32 pews in the centre, three on each side, and the remaining space is occupied by free seats; and it will accommodate about 400 persons. We have adopted a platform pulpit, and have made provision for a gallery by inserting timber in the walls. The front is built of white press bricks, with stone facings. It is approached by five steps, each 16 ft. long, leading into a neat portico. In consequence of not being able to have light from the side walls, we have adopted a dome or lantern light, which, in addition to its utility, gives a very good effect to the interior of the building. Behind the chapel there are two class-rooms, 12 ft. by 8 ft., and a school-room 37 ft. by 16 ft. The whole cost is about £1,300, towards which we have realised about £450. We tender our sincere thanks to Mr. Isaac Edis for £100, Mr. Lee for £20, Mr. Bennett for £15, T. Hankey, Esq., M.P., and G. H. Whalley, Esq., M.P., for £5 5s. each; and to all who have aided us in this important work.

J. ASHWORTH.

CROWLAND, PETERBOROUGH STATION.—The new chapel opened here is the fifth we have seen erected since our coming to this station. It was opened for Divine worship on Wednesday, September 24th, 1862, by a sermon from the Rev. W. Sanderson; after which about 400 sat down to an excellent tea, gratuitously provided by the ladies. A public meeting was held in the evening, in the Wesleyan chapel (kindly lent for the occasion); the chair was occupied by Mr. Edis, of Dogthorpe; and addresses delivered by the Revs. W. Sanderson, J. Ashworth, and Mr. Wilson, from Wisbeach. The following Sabbath sermons were preached by the Revs. W. Frear, of Maidstone;

J. Cromach, United Methodist; J. Ashworth, and W. C. Tansom. The congregations and collections were encouraging. The chapel is 54 feet long, 36 wide, and 20 from the floor to the ceiling. It has one long window on each side of the door, and two short windows over the door, which give a neat appearance to the front. There are also six long windows on each side, which will light a gallery when one shall be inserted. The chapel will accommodate 350 persons with seats; and there is a school-room behind, which is 36 feet long by 16 wide. The whole cost is about £600, towards which we have already realized, in money and promises, about £130. The first Sabbath of opening several were converted within the walls, and some have been saved almost every Sabbath since the opening. While we give God the glory for these tokens of his love, we shall not be content till the chapel is placed financially in a favourable and working condition.

J. ASHWORTH.

SNAPE, KELSEALE MISSION.—I beg to say that we have recently opened a Connexional Chapel at this place. Its size is 30 feet by 21, and 15 feet to the wall-plate. At the north end we have a school-room, which is 21 feet by 10. The entire cost is about £160. On Sabbath, August 10th, sermons were preached by Mr. Ireland, of Macclesfield, and the writer; and on the following Sabbath by Mrs. Chipperfield and W. Noy. On September 19th, a sermon was preached by Rev. — Roberts, Baptist minister, of Aldeburgh; after which a public tea was provided. In the evening a meeting was held, when addresses were delivered by the Revs. Roberts, Hadfield, and the writer. The amount raised by collections, donations, &c., is £54 11s. 0d. The seats are all let, and our prospects are cheering.

M. S. CUSHING.

BEENHAM, READING CIRCUIT.—A new chapel was opened here September 21st, 1862. The sermons, morning and evening, were preached by Mr. Thomas Church, of London, whose ministrations were appropriate, unctuous, and effective. It was the writer's privilege to preach in the afternoon. On Tuesday, September 23rd, after a short sermon by the Rev. D. Mossop, tea was provided for a large number of deeply interested friends. W. Ridley, Esq., presided at the public meeting, when several suitable addresses were delivered with good effect. The chapel, 30 feet long by 23 feet wide, built upon a most eligible site, has a neat and convenient appearance. The services were well supported by crowded congregations and liberal collections. Under the blessing of God we have done well in this place, for after paying off a long standing debt of £50 on the old chapel, we have secured more than £70 towards the cost of the new one; including a donation of £10 from Mr. C. Lewis, who laid the memorial stone. Our best thanks are hereby tendered to all who have helped us.

MURRAY WILSON.

MANGOTSFIELD, BRISTOL CIRCUIT.—The fourth anniversary of our Sabbath School was held on Sunday, September 21st, when sermons were preached in the morning and evening by the Rev. W. Watts, and in the afternoon by the Rev. J. H. J. Taylor. Our chapel was crowded in the afternoon and evening to excess. The collections during the day amounted to £2 7s. 11d., which exceeded those of last year by 12s. On Monday we treated the children with tea; after which a public tea was attended by about ninety persons. An interesting meeting was then held, and addresses were delivered by the Rev. W. Watts, the writer, and the teachers. On the whole our school is in a prosperous condition. During the year three of the scholars have been converted, and have joined the society. W. NEWMAN.

TYTHERINGTON, FROME CIRCUIT.—Tytherington is a small village in Wiltshire, about eleven miles from Frome. About thirty years ago our people visited it, to preach to the inhabitants the Word of Life. They laboured summer and winter in the open air, amidst much persecution from the farmers of the place, who did all they could to drive the preachers out of the village. Many acts of cruelty could be related by our early preachers and friends as having been committed on the humble servants of the Lord. But, notwithstanding the severe and continued opposition, the cause has lived and grown. A few years ago, after the society had been turned out of a cottage where they met to worship, and in many a dreary winter's evening had held their service under a hedge,—a small freehold cottage, with garden attached, was offered to them for sale, which they succeeded in purchasing, to the no small disappointment of their enemies. In this cottage they worshipped, though not altogether free from interruptions, until the early part of the summer of 1862, when God so abundantly poured out His Holy Spirit upon the people that the little cottage was too small to hold even those that came to join the society. The friends therefore thought it was time for them to arise and build. Several pounds had previously been subscribed and deposited in the Warminster Bank. A tea meeting was held on the 21st of May last, and promises and subscriptions were received towards a new chapel. After some preliminary arrangements, the foundation stone was laid on the 21st of June, by the Rev. E. Powell. The chapel, which is an ornament to the village, was opened for Divine service on the 28th of September. A powerful prayer meeting was conducted at eight o'clock a.m., by Mr. Powell, and at half-past ten he preached. At half-past two and at six o'clock the Rev. J. Bennetts preached. On Monday, the 29th, a public tea meeting was held, at which eighty persons sat down. After the tea a public meeting was held, presided over by W. Forward, Esq., and addressed by the Revs. E. Powell and J. Bennetts, and C. F. Lane and J. Taylor, Esqrs. On Friday, the 10th of October, the opening services were continued, when the Rev. J. Butcher, of Hereford, preached two excellent sermons to favourable congregations. Our poor friends have nobly contributed and collected towards the undertaking. The entire cost of the chapel is £111, towards which we have received £48, and we have £10 promised by the end of the year. That it may be the birth-place of many souls is our earnest prayer.

E. POWELL.

BARNINGHAM, THETFORD STATION.—The opening services of our place of worship here were commenced on Sunday, September 28th, when three sermons were preached by the Rev. W. Thoseby, of Downham. On October 5th, the writer preached afternoon and evening; and on Monday, the 6th, a tea was provided, at which 130 persons were bountifully supplied. The efforts made by the different friends who contributed their quota of help in building this sanctuary, are beyond all praise. The rearing of a chapel in this place was at first felt to be a serious undertaking, as the members of society and friends generally were of the humbler class; but, happily for us, all our doubts and fears were found to be without cause. The promises made at the beginning of the transaction were most of them well fulfilled, and many of them rendered good more than threefold. The entire cost of the chapel is about £100, towards which £80 have been raised by different means. The cost, however, must have far exceeded this amount had not the farmers and friends in the neighbourhood aided us by carting all the materials gratis. We would record our thankfulness first to the Author of all good, and then to W. G. Wigg, Esq., (who stood by us so nobly and helped us so handsomely in erecting the chapel at Market Weston,) and Messrs. Baker, Cook, and Brothers, for helping us in this matter; to Brother Alderton, who gave the greatest part of the timber for the roof; to the kind ladies who contributed the trays free of charge for the tea meeting; and to the honourable collectors (and they were not a few) whose untiring labours have helped most materially in bringing this matter to so satisfactory a conclusion. The chapel is built of the best red brick, and covered in with countess slate. It has a commodious rostrum, and is well fitted up with benches. It is secured to the Connexion by a proper deed, and with good management it may be free from debt in a short time. May many sin-enslaved spirits obtain manumission within its sacred enclosures, and hundreds of Zion's travellers from time to time "pay their constant service there," is the prayer of

J. ALLISON.

LONDON THIRD STATION.—I send you a brief notice of our last round of Missionary meetings. Preparatory sermons were preached on Lord's day, Sept. 23th, 1862, at Sutton street, by Mr. J. Bandle, of London Fourth Circuit; at Plumstead, by Mr. G. H. Fowler; at Barking, by Mr. Thompson; and at Slade, by Mrs. Pattle. On Monday, Sept. 29th, the public meeting was held at Sutton street chapel. G. Walton, Esq., our long-trying and liberal friend, took the chair; and the meeting was addressed by Messrs. J. Bandle, J. Hurd, R. Davies, T. Penrose, G. H. Fowler, C. Tapp, and G. Gowlan, Esq. The meeting was deeply interesting, and what greatly contributed to this result was the fact of the presence of our venerated mother in Israel and queen of missionary collectors, Mrs. J. Gordon, who presented the noble sum of £64, as the fruit of her hard and laborious visits to the counting houses and residences of various gentlemen. After passing through a long and severe affliction in the seventy-first year of her age, God mercifully strengthened her to resume her loved work. At the previous missionary anniversary she presented £63 to the missionary cause, and still she is found in a good old age, resolved, should God preserve her life and continue her strength, to resume and prosecute the work. We ask the prayers of the tens of thousands of our Zion, that she may be long preserved to serve God and the missionary cause, the widow, the poor, and the sabbath school, all so dear to her. The total raised at Sutton street was £74 18s. 3d.; at Plumstead £4 10s. 11d.; Barking £1 6s. 6d. That the missionary revenue and cause may abundantly prosper, is the prayer of
T. PENROSE.

MINSTERLEY CIRCUIT.—We are glad to be able to inform you that we are looking up in this station. At several places our friends are exerting themselves to promote the interests of Zion, and are encouraged in their work. We have had several sinners brought to God of late. Our missionary services were held October 5th to 8th, and were attended by the Rev. J. Heath, as deputation. They were both interesting and profitable, and notwithstanding the present depression of trade, the sum of £10 3s. 11½d. was collected, which is a little more than was obtained last year at the same places. At a trustees' meeting held at Hope's gate chapel lately we paid £22 13s. off the chapel debt, leaving only £1 7s. still owing, which will be paid in the course of a few weeks: the chapel will then be free from debt. The above money we obtained by a tea meeting, and donations from trustees and friends. That the Lord may send greater prosperity is the prayer of

J. THOMAS.

SSELBY.—By the blessing of God we have been enabled to complete the erection of a new chapel, school, vestries, and minister's house at Selby, the way having been partly prepared by the Rev. John Burroughs, who, during his three years' ministry in the Selby branch, had been enabled, with the assistance of the friends, to reduce the debt on the old chapel about £40, as also to invest £10 as the nucleus of a fund for the erection of a new one. The chapel occupies a conspicuous site, comprising 1,270 square yards of land, at the intersection of two streets; the line of frontage, measuring about 112 feet, which with the receding sides forms a triangular plot of freehold ground, which was granted to the trustees on favourable terms by the Right Hon. Lord Londesborough. The style adopted in the design embraces originality and neatness, and may be termed an adaptation of the Byzantine; the semicircular and segmental arch predominating in the various elevations, and the general arrangements have a pleasing effect. The chapel is 48 feet long by 36 feet wide, built of brick; the walls are fourteen inches thick, the front wall having a central projection, and being faced with Wallington white bricks, with Hars Hill stone dressings, copings, arches, and finials. In addition to the chapel there are class rooms at the back 18 feet by 11 each, with a school room 36 feet by 15, and a detached boiler room, and offices enclosed for the use of the school and tea meetings. The minister's house is built also of brick, and faced in the same manner with Wallington bricks, and stands about nine feet to the right of the chapel, and is a convenient and comfortable dwelling, with a frontage of thirty feet, and having four rooms on the ground floor, and four rooms on the upper floor, well lighted and lofty; and to it is attached a large garden. The entrance to the chapel consists of a double doorway divided by a cylinder with a neatly carved cap, and surmounted with fan lights under semi-circular arches. Over this again is placed the inscription on a frieze of stone, directly beneath the large central window, the head of which is filled in with open tracery of wood, and adds much to the effect of the principal or entrance front. The galleries range along the lateral walls projecting 7ft. 6in. into the chapel, as well as over the principal entrance, and are approached by staircases leading up from the front lobbies. The singers' gallery is arranged behind the pulpit, and is approached from one of the class rooms over which it is elevated about nine feet from the floor. The entire structure possesses an abundance of light, and a careful regard has also been paid to its proper ventilation. Eight windows range along each side of the chapel, which, with the three front and two circular ones (not one of which can ever be obstructed), are filled in with opaque glass, and margins of varied colours, of ruby, green, yellow, and blue. The seats are constructed of deal stained and varnished, and continue up the sides and up the centre as far as the communion, which is raised one step, and the rail supported by an iron balustrade. Over this is raised the pulpit, which stands on four pedestals, with moulded caps and vases, from which spring four semi-circular arches. Due regard has been paid to the comfort of the sitters, as the backs of the seats are made to slope. The ends are formed with elbows, and the floor is raised four inches above the flagged aisle. The height of the chapel from the floor to the ceiling is twenty-six feet. A handsome centre flower, six feet in diameter, forms the principal ornament of the ceiling, together with four neat ventilators, and a bold cornice-girth 3 feet 6 inches. The orchestral recess is lighted by a window on each side, and opens into the chapel with a bold semi-circular arch, ornamented with an architrave and trusses at the springing line. The chapel is fitted up with gas, a handsome pendant hanging from the centre flower of a geometrical pattern, with sixty jets, thus forming an important feature in the interior. The whole has been erected according to the designs and under the superintendence of Mr. H. Fippard, architect, York; to whom the trustees, seatholders, donors, and members, feel indebted for the excellent manner in which the whole has been finished; as also to the contractor, Mr. G. Bairsto, Selby, for the good materials used, and the very satisfactory manner in which he has completed his contract. The opening services of this sanctuary, (which is made available for 460 adults,) were commenced on Friday, Oct. 10th, 1862, and continued at intervals until Oct. 29th, the officiating ministers being the Rev. W. Harland, of Gainsborough; Mr. J. C. Richardson, of York; J. R. Parkinson, of Selby; J. H. McCulloch, Esq., of York; the Revs. J. Pearson, Wesleyan, of Sheffield; D. Clegg, Independent, of Selby; J. Bywater and W. Sanderson, of Kirton; and T. Greenbury, of Scarborough. On the latter date, eighteen gratuitous trays were provided for a tea meeting, the proceeds of which, with the opening collections, amounted to £78 1s. The congregations at several of these interesting services were overflowing, and some persons during their continuance sought and found salvation. The costs of the erection amount to about £1,400. We have obtained by donations, tea meetings, collections, collecting cards, and a bazaar, after expenses have been deducted, £705 8s. 1d., to which sum must be added £31 14s. 6d., being donations promised but not yet received, making a net total of £737 2s. 7d.

To the Right Hon. Lord Londesborough for granting us the site, and giving us a donation of £10, we are under especial obligation; also Mr. J. C. Richardson and Alderman Meek, of York, have rendered the undertaking essential service; to J. H. McCulloch, Esq., of York, for a donation of £45, with marble slab and font for the communion and baptism; to the ladies who have provided for the tea meetings, and prepared articles for the bazaar; and to all other benefactors, the trustees and committee tender their sincere thanks. May the Great Head of the church, to whom all praise is due, reward them in this world a hundred-fold; and in the world to come with life everlasting.

J. R. PARKINSON.

[We have given this account unusual space, because of its special interest and importance. Probably our chapel building friends may take a few hints from it. We should have been still more pleased if, instead of a pulpit, our Selby friends had erected a platform in this noble chapel. Both comfort and utility, in our opinion, are in favour of the platform versus the pulpit.—Ed.]

COLONIAL DEPARTMENT.

MORFETH, NEW SOUTH WALES.—I am glad to inform you we are still able to report progress on this station, though not to the extent that could be desired, yet sufficient to prove, "that our labours are not in vain in the Lord." We should do better if we had an additional minister. At present our places are not sufficiently supplied on Sabbath-days. We have no fault to find with our local preachers, their works commend them, and are often performed at the risk of health and at the expense of much self-denial. Yet journeys consisting of twenty miles out and twenty in, over rugged mountains, through marshy swamps, and by dangerous pitfalls, cannot well be taken in wet weather, or on dark nights. Hence disappointments are sometimes unavoidable. The people, in consequence, suffer loss; this not only militates against our congregations, but in some cases other churches have gathered the fruits of our labour. Another minister here is a great desideratum; but at present we could not support him. When we came to this station, we found the two principal chapels heavily burdened with debt. Morpeth had on it a debt of £300, and Maitland, £180. At the last-named place the society was a complete wreck. In the midst of these difficulties we commenced our labours; and now, from experience, we can say, the grace of God has been sufficient. We have, at present, a pretty good society in Maitland, consisting of twenty-five members. At our last anniversary we paid off £40 of the chapel debt, besides interest, &c. During the last six months, in addition to taking my regular work, I have been soliciting donations for Morpeth chapel, and have succeeded in obtaining promises to the amount of £200. This amount, with the anniversary collections, has enabled the trustees to pay off £180, besides the interest, which previous to this reduction was £30 per annum. There are between twenty and thirty pounds more promised, which we hope to receive shortly. The following are a few of the names of persons who have given not less than two pounds:—Mr. Tulip, local preacher, £40; Mr. Kain, local preacher, £10; Mr. Eggleston, local preacher, £10; Mr. Sim, £10; Mr. Youll, £5; Mr. G. Allen, £5; Mr. G. Hain, £5; Mr. E. Ford, £5; Mr. F. Barton, £5; Mr. G. James, £2 10s.; Mrs. James, £2 10; Mrs. Hain, £3; Mr. Eyles, £2; Mrs. Secley, £2; Mr. Thompson, £2; Mr. Bowles, £2; Mr. H. Reed, £2; Mr. Bowden, £2; Mr. G. Reed, £2; Mr. R. Selwood, £2—Total, £119.

The sums under two pounds, together with the anniversary collections, amount to about £95 more, making the grand total £214.

G. JAMES.

ADELAIDE DISTRICT MEETING.—The annual District Meeting of the Adelaide district commenced its sittings in Morpeth-street chapel on the 4th of October, and closed on the 7th. The examination of the various reports showed an increase in every department, for which all testified their thankfulness. During the year six chapels have been built, three of them being commodious buildings erected in the room of smaller ones, which were inadequate to contain the congregations. The number of chapels belonging to the denomination in the colony at present is fifty-three. These are capable of affording sitting accommodation for 6,600 persons. There are 13 ministers, being an increase of one for the year; 114 local preachers, the increase being 13; 52 Sabbath-schools, increase 5; 2,191 Sabbath scholars, increase 302; 384 teachers, increase 42; 1,083 members in the society, increase 68. The following are the stations of the ministers for 1863:—Adelaide, J. Warner; North Adelaide, J. Read; Mount Barker, J. G. Wright, S. Raymond, W. Jenkin, and E. Tear (supernumerary); Koorunga, H. Cole; Salisbury, T. Braithwaite; Saddleworth, J. Tallack; Strathalbyn, A. Pithouse; Willunga, J. H. Browne and W. Whitefield (supernumerary); Wallaroo, E. W. Stephens. The religious services in connection with the district meeting commenced on Friday evening, the 3rd. The Rev. H. Cole delivered a very appropriate discourse to a good congregation. On Saturday evening the Rev. J. G. Wright preached with much fervour to a large company, after which the sacrament of the Lord's Supper was administered to about eighty communicants. Sunday was the day fixed upon for the annual camp meeting; accordingly the friends assembled in the chapel for prayer at half-past 8, and at 9 o'clock commenced to go in procession to the camp ground. A large number attended the services, and several preachers engaged therein. During the afternoon there could not be fewer than 1,400 or 1,500 persons present at one time. A public love feast was held in the chapel in the evening. On Monday a tea meeting took place, followed by a public meeting. The chair was occupied by the minister of the Adelaide Circuit (Mr. J. Warner), and addresses were delivered by Messrs. Hamlyn, Cole, Tallack, Braithwaite, Read, Pithouse, and Wright. The choir sung several delightful pieces in excellent style. On Tuesday evening a temperance meeting was held. The attendance was not large, but the meeting was an interesting one. The services were brought to a close on Wednesday by a tea and public meeting at Payneham. The proceeds of this day, which were for the reduction of the debt on Payneham chapel, amounted to nearly £22.

LITERARY NOTICES.

Considerations on the Pentateuch. By ISAAC TAYLOR. London: Jackson, Walford, and Hodder. 1863.

DR. J. BIRD SUMNER, late Archbishop of Canterbury, is reported to have said, that the "Missionary Enterprises" of the martyr, John Williams might be fitly entitled the twenty-ninth chapter of the Acts of the Apostles. This was no unworthy testimony, by a dignitary of the Established Church, to the value of a book published by a dissenter. We have a different testimony to give respecting a book recently issued by a bishop of the Church of which Dr. Sumner was a worthy representative. The book of Dr. Colenso to which Mr. Taylor's is a reply, might very properly be styled, "A supplement to the Age of Reason, by Thomas Paine;" and it is quite fitting that the public at large should understand that the substance of Paine's chief objections to the early portions of God's book is reproduced by the modern episcopal sceptic, although he does not acknowledge his obligations to his predecessor. Perhaps no book—not even the celebrated "Essays and Reviews"—has of late years excited so much discussion and animadversion as Dr. Colenso's. We are by no means certain that this is a matter for unmingled regret. We rather lean to the opinion expressed by Mr. Taylor at the conclusion of his pamphlet—namely "In the present instance that which has so often happened heretofore will almost certainly have place again—namely, this, an onslaught upon the historical reality of the Old Testament Scriptures—an assault ill-considered, intemperate, and ill-managed, will be the occasion of renewed investigations—it will stimulate learned industry, it will make itself memorable—not in the way that had been imagined by its author, but on the contrary, by imparting to our faith in Holy Scripture more coherence and more confidence."

Many answers to Colenso's book have already appeared both in the periodical press and in other forms, and many others may be expected, but of its order Mr. Taylor's will doubtless take high rank. It is philosophical, comprehensive, clear, cogent, and convincing; but it is not so analytic, simple, and popular, as for the mass of readers may be thought desirable. Mr. Taylor, as all who are acquainted with his previous productions will suppose, is fully capable of grappling with the arithmetical quibbles and sonorous sophisms of the bishop; but into minute details it is not his forte to enter. This line of argumentation he leaves to others. The central facts or falsehoods of a subject he seizes with a bold and tenacious grasp, and having hewn away the corner-stones, he leaves to others to deal with the crumbling mass; when he has removed the key-stones he lets other demolish the remaining fragments of the arch. Every man in his own order. We accept the truism, and murmur not at its extent of application.

The pamphlet before us extends to four-score pages, and deals in a masterly manner with the principles on which Bishop Colenso has based his objections to the Mosaic history. Some very plain dealing with the cavils of this episcopal sceptic may here be met with. Speaking of the bishop's book Mr. Taylor says:—"Almost every page, certainly every chapter of it affords an instance not merely of a strange misapprehension of facts, and of much frivolous criticism, but of an intense feeling, or, as we say, animus; and this is the word we use when a speaker or a writer, who is labouring to substantiate a defamation, finds it more than he can do to repress emotions that are not of the most amiable sort, and which he does not choose to avow. There is a smothered heat in this writer's paragraphs whenever he thinks his case good against the defendant." And referring to the flippant mode in which this bishop speaks as to his views of other portions of revelation not yet, it would seem, explored by him in the light afforded by his Zulu teacher, he quotes the bishop's words—"What the end may be God only—the God of truth—can foresee."

Having dealt at some length with the flimsy arithmetical objections of the doctor which relate to the numbers of Israel when they left the land of Egypt, the difficulty of making all the people hear when Moses addressed them, the impossibility of so many standing before the door of the tabernacle as were said to be there, and similar antiquated frivolities, Mr. Taylor says, "I have come to understand that, in a hundred instances, the very thing which we might pronounce to be 'demonstrably impossible' is, nevertheless, actually done! Theory, and arithmetic, and prejudice in heaps disappear as the chaff of the threshing-floor when the morning breeze sets everything in motion." Speaking of the character of the writings of Moses, he observes:—"In the Mosaic narratives of great events, and of stated public transactions, what is given is, the upshot of the action, or of the movement or ceremonial. The things that are omitted are nothing else than those matters of course, those constant Hebrew modes of doing what was done, with which this people had been immemorably familiar, and a formal mention of which would have been quite a redundancy. Here, again, the very same instances which, in the view of Dr. Colenso, stand up as insurmountable difficulties, or as conclusive reasons for treating the narrative as a fabrication, appear to me, and so I think they will appear to every calm-minded reader, as significant evidences of its truthfulness, and especially as proofs of the contemporaneity of the document."

Mr. Taylor very ably argues that by the disintegration of the inspired volume, an inevitable blow would be struck at the Christian system which forms a main portion thereof, and that any one who goes the length to which Dr. Colenso has gone, ought to be prepared to discard the claims of Christianity entirely. And on this point he forcibly remarks, "Gibbon has immortalised his ingenuity while struggling in the fruitless endeavour to disengage Christianity from its true origin. Christianity is a vast congeries and complicity of facts; it is the casual centre of numberless radiating lines; it is the spring of thousands of streams. Remove it from its place, and the entire structure of modern history crumbles into dust—a chaos is left to us as our future inheritance on the wilds of time." On the important position held by the scenes of Sinai in the midst of God's great revelation, our author makes the following eloquent observations:

"It is a circumstance highly significant as to the feeling of the author of the book on the Pentateuch, that, although he goes round about the Sinaitic scene, speaking largely of the events preceding it, and largely, also, of the events immediately subsequent thereto, he observes silence on this principal subject. Is this ominous silence to be taken as an instance of the tender regard he has to the feeble consciousness of his religious readers? This can scarcely be allowed; for in a passage already cited, he has outraged religious feeling in a manner the most reckless; he has there uttered the puerile suggestions of an exploded rationalism in terms of his own which are little short of blasphemy. But did he not himself quail—did not his foot falter, when, in thought of this last outrage, the pen, the hand, refused to do its office?

"There needs no argument to show that, if the Promulgation of the law from the heights of Sinai took place in the manner affirmed in the Mosaic books—if, indeed, then and there God spake these words "from out of the thick darkness," and amid the blasts of the trumpet; if it be so, then this descent of the ALMIGHTY—speaking to man, carries with it, as well the immediate antecedents of the event, as its more proximate conditions, and its next following consequences. If this history be true as to its central fact, it must be true also as to its indispensable conditions. The Sinaitic narrative must be true altogether, or it must be false altogether. But I ask a moment's attention to this narrative—as to the central fact.

"The most unmarked spot on earth's alluvial levels might have been chosen as the scene of the event of which we read in the nineteenth and twentieth chapters of the Book of Exodus. But it was otherwise ordered, and a group of mountains, remarkable beyond any other elsewhere found, was singled out as the fittest for so great an occasion. Thus, therefore, it is that the enduring continuity of local traditions which gives a sort of indestructible vitality to the names of places, whether they be important or unimportant, has clustered upon this mountain mass with a peculiar strength, as if it should never come to be doubted where it was that the Eternal, the King Immortal Invisible, came down to hold converse—not as often heretofore, with favoured men apart and singly, but now with a People congregated to meet Him at His call. The stern sublimity of this group of precipices, its unchanging conditions, which neither man nor nature has affected in the lapse of ages, have preserved, in its primeval majesty, a scene which the modern traveller—devout or undevout, acknowledges as signally proper for the purpose, when a nation was summoned to appear before God. If an objector shall say—what you think of this geological vastness, this granitic sublimity, this adaptation of the scenery to the occasion, is the indication only of the smallness of your modes of estimating magnitudes; for what is Sinai in relation to the INFINITE—what is it in the estimation of the CREATOR of the universe? I may grant leave for this cavil; the reply is this—that, if liberty of traversing this universe were given us, so that we might behold the central palace of Omnipotence, and might gaze upon magnitudes that are immeasurable, and might see these heights of heaven blazing in the effulgence of a galaxy of suns, even then and there the same frigid reason would be applicable; inasmuch as things finite can bear no proportion to the attributes of the INFINITE BEING. Sinai, in its aspect as the Hebrew People saw it when it was crowned with the unquenchable fires, and such as the traveller now sees it, in its unchanging aspect of sterile majesty, is a scene proper for the purpose to which then it was made subservient.

"The Arabian spearman, as if Heaven had placed him there, has held watch around the heights of Sinai these thirty centuries and more; and this guard has been conservative of the Sinaitic tradition. Throughout the ages of the Saracenic history, this functionary—whether intended or involuntary, has held the memory of the one event, as if in the freshness of a recent recollection. Yet more has the Law, spoken from Sinai, lived in the constant heart and in the obduracy, too—in the better nature, in the noble martyr strength, and also in the senile traditions, and in the daily habits, and in the ponderous literature, and in the speech of the people, whose ancestors then filled the wide plain at the foot of Sinai. It is the same people, immovable in mind, and now, as for ages past, a witness for God in all lands. Each Jewish heart is an enduring tablet whereupon the Sinaitic words are anew and anew written—as with the finger of God.

“A fact worthy to be noted it is, but to which in this place I must advert only in a line, that, from the earliest time of the rise of the Christian ascetic and solitary life—that is to say, the meditative life in caves and sepulchres, Sinai has been its most favoured haunt; and the conventual life also has established itself upon the sides of these precipices; and within the circuit of the Sinaitic group Christian hermits and Christian societies have dared all perils, and have endured all privations so only that they might live and die—the guardians of the traditions of this hallowed region. Attach what value we please to this conservation, much or little, it has, in fact, availed to perpetuate an oral record of so great an occasion with unbroken continuity, from the very times of the Exodus, to the now passing moment.”

On what may be called the internal evidences of the inspiration of Scripture, the following apposite remarks will justify quotation:—

“The books of Holy Scripture commend themselves to our devout approval—they command our consciences, not merely, nor chiefly, on the ground of that superabundant literary and historic evidence which attests the genuineness and authenticity of each portion, and of the whole; but mainly in virtue of the irresistible force of another kind of evidence which rises into view, as if of itself; this evidence does not come to us as the fruit of critical acumen; it is no product of lexicons; nor has it any necessary dependence upon the meaning of Hebrew words, or the significance of Hebrew idioms. Holy Scripture we feel to be—ONE BIBLE; and it proves itself to be One by three distinct modes of attestation; as thus—the Bible—or let us now speak of the Hebrew Scriptures, is One Book, from its first chapter to its last, because, although it is the work of many writers, it everywhere teaches ONE THEOLOGY, and we refuse to believe that many writers, in long series, should have done this, if each followed only his own inspiration. The Bible is One Book although it is the work of many writers, because, amid all the diversities which this human instrumentality implies, there prevails throughout it what must be reverently spoken of as the indication of the historic personality of the SPEAKER; everywhere this Speaker is the same, in mood, in purpose, and in style—it is the ETERNAL God that, in these books, speaks to man.

“The Bible is One Book (and here we must speak of the New, as well as of the Old Testament) inasmuch as it brings into view, occultly, and yet undoubtedly, a one Divine scheme, or system of justice and mercy. Revelation—attested by supernatural events, is the opening out of an all-comprehensive course of procedure, as from God, toward the human family. Holy Scripture is a structure, integral and immovable as to its various constituents; and if it be disintegrated, it is destroyed.”

And again to the same effect is the following passage:—

“The brevity of the Sinaitic Law, and its comprehensiveness, and its spirituality, and its firm theistic cautions, and its ethical effectiveness—these, its qualities, these its intrinsic attestations, this, its own force in grasping and in holding the human conscience—these qualities, which are, indeed, the strength of the law, given in ten precepts, have, from that remote age to this, commanded the consciences of men, wherever the knowledge of it has come. So it has been that the most depraved of mankind have trembled in the hearing of this law of God, and each of its prohibitions has transfixed the guilt-shaken soul; and so it has been that the most blameless of mankind have shaped their confessions upon this same mould; for in listening to this law they have wept and have humbled themselves before their Judge; yet have they rejoiced and said, “The law of Thy mouth is better unto me than thousands of gold and silver.” Those Ten Words, true as to their substance in all worlds, and of perpetual force, as in heaven, so toward the human family throughout all time—this Sinaitic proclamation—who is it now that shall spend upon it his nugatory criticism? who is it that shall dare to pronounce it to be a fable?”

And after showing that Dr. Colenso is bound to reject the whole of the Mosaic teaching, if he rejects parts thereof, referring to parts of the book of Exodus, Mr Taylor says:—

“On the supposition that Dr. Colenso admits the historic truth of the narrative in the nineteenth and twentieth chapters, then, if it be so, there is an end of the exceptions which he insists upon in the eighth, ninth, tenth, eleventh, and twelfth chapters of his book. Those allegations of impossibility must, in this case, be futile; the objector substantially disposes of the whole of his own difficulties, and he answers them himself, for when he grants the principal fact, namely, the gathering of the Hebrew people at the foot of Sinai, and when he yields his assent to the reality of the Divine Presence on its summit, not mythically, but in the manner affirmed in the narrative of the event, then those other events must have had place which this event includes or supposes. If indeed it be true in this sense that the Almighty Father spoke to the thousands of Israel from out of the thick darkness, then these thousands must have made their way thither in some manner; they must have come on from the plains of Egypt—they, and their herds also, must have subsisted up to that moment—they must have had shelter, and they must have been furnished with whatever was necessary to their abode in the Desert. Every kind of incongruity is heaped up around our notions of these events, if, while we admit the leading fact, we affirm the subsidiary facts to be incredible or impossible."

In conclusion, we beg to express our high sense of the value of Mr. Taylor's production, and an earnest hope that it may obtain a wide and rapid circulation, so that the remedy it provides for the poison of Colenso's lucubrations may be co-extensive with the circulation of the poison itself.

God's Word Defended, and Infidelity Repulsed: being an answer to Bishop Colenso. By WILLIAM COOKE, D.D. London: Webber, Warwick-lane. Price twopence.

THIS is a pamphlet by Dr. Cooke on the same subject as Mr. Taylor's, above noticed; but while written with great ability, it is, of course, of a somewhat different order. Dr. Cooke treats Colenso's book in a less comprehensive, and more analytical style. He takes up the objections of Colenso seriatim, and answers them one by one. No one will be surprised that the doctor should re-burnish his weapon in this case, as he has been used to wielding a first rate blade in defence of Divine revelation against the snarling sceptics of former days. Great plainness, great candour, great ability, and great zeal for the truth distinguish this pamphlet. We wish all our Sabbath-school teachers, and all our reading people would soon secure and study this valuable and most opportune production.

Devotional Christianity, and its admirable adaptation to promote the salvation of mankind. By WILLIAM GARNER, Primitive Methodist minister. London: R. Davies.

MR. GARNER'S mind is pre-eminently distinguished by the attributes of order, penetration, prudence, and practicalness; and such are the characteristics of his published works. The present is the largest of those works, and as it was said by Cicero that the longest of the orations of Demosthenes was his best, so we may unhesitatingly affirm that the largest of Mr. Garner's works is his best. There are portions of this book which have special claims to attention just now, but the whole work has indisputable claims to our regard at all times. It is a work that cannot become obsolete; it will many years hence, we boldly predict, be found in as great request as now. The subject is always of great importance, and the ability with which it is discussed, the fulness and breadth of view in which it is presented, must command for the work a lasting renown. This is emphatically a religious and a family book. We have had it on our own parlour table from its first appearance, and recommend all our readers to give it a similar position. It is never the wrong day—Sabbath or work day; never the wrong time—morning, noon, or night, to take up and ponder this volume. We most sincerely urge all Primitive Methodists, in particular, and all others who may consult our pages, to procure and frequently peruse this valuable and beautiful production.

The Christian Ambassador. A Quarterly Review, and Journal of Theological Literature. No. 1, February, 1863. London: R. Davies. Price One Shilling.

MANY of our readers are doubtless aware that the "Christian Ambassador" was for some years issued by an association of Primitive Methodist Ministers in the Sunderland District, and consisted, for the most part, of papers contributed by themselves, and a few other sympathising brethren. The profits were generously handed over to the first Friendly Society of the Itinerant Preachers. Latterly, however, it has been thought that the work might, in the first place, assume a more elevated tone and character, and secondly, that it might profitably be placed under the management of the society by which the proceeds were enjoyed. Accordingly, at the last Conference assembly and yearly meeting of the Friendly Society, arrangements were made for carrying into effect these ideas, and the sanction of the Conference itself was kindly given for the sale of the work through the book-room as a connexional organ on favourable terms. Mr. C. C. McKechnie was appointed editor for the first year.

and we were to assist in revising proofs, while our General Book Steward, and General Committee's Secretary, were to arrange for the printing of the work. The first number is now issued; and we are happy to say a very respectable demand has been made for it. The papers contained in this number are on the following subjects:—Miracles of Faith; or, George Müller—The Pentateuch; Queries and Averments—Thoughts on the Inspiration of the Bible—John Foster—Socrates the Athenian—The Divine Treasure in Earthen Vessels—The Bible in Harmony with the Conditions of Human Thought—The Puritan Divines—Religious Knowledge and its Fruits—and Brief Notices of Books. Thus, it will be seen, a very respectable bill of fare is presented. And we have no hesitation in saying the appetites of all parties will be found abundantly provided for. We are happy to hear, from different quarters, very favourable testimonies to the acceptability and usefulness of the work. It fills an important position in our connexional literature, and something of the kind had been long felt to be a desideratum.

It will naturally be supposed that the papers are of unequal merit, and written in a variety of styles. The first article will be the most popular; the second is, perhaps, just now, the most timely; the sixth has the most freshness of thought; the seventh, the most depth and grasp; the articles on Foster and Socrates are chiefly biographical, but both well written and interesting; and the remaining papers are no discredit to a Theological Quarterly, or to any Christian denomination. We very earnestly urge on all our ministers and officials to give the work their patronage, and to use their best efforts to raise its circulation to such a point, that the worn-out preachers, and the widows and orphans of our deceased brethren, may have reason to rejoice in its existence.

"Praying Johnny;" or, the Life and Labours of John Oxbory, Primitive Methodist Minister. By HARVEY LEIGH. Fifth Edition. Eighth Thousand. London: R. Davies; Partridge and Co. Leeds: Parrott; and may be had of all Primitive Methodist Ministers.

No wonder that the present production has already had a good circulation; such a subject as "Praying Johnny" was sure to take among a plain, pious, and prayerful people. The chief ground of regret in reference to the work is, that more ample information was not available in its preparation. A sense of meagreness rests on the mind while perusing it, and one naturally feels—what a pity, while what we have is so good, that we have not more of it! However, we presume the worthy biographer used up all the material at his disposal, and therefore we must comfort ourselves with the thought—better this than nothing. We hope the book will still continue in request, and are assured that all who read it will be profited thereby.

Messiah's Many Crowns, in which may be seen an assemblage of Precious Jewels, collected from his transcendent excellencies; and in which may be found, deep set in a crimsoned wreath of piercing thorns, the Pearl of Great Price, &c. By JEREMIAH DODSWORTH, author of the "Better Land," the "Eden Family," &c. London: Jackson, Walford, and Hodder, 27, Paternoster-row; and R. Davies.

Mr. Dodsworth aims at being a writer for the million. He eschews everything like close argumentation or elaborate thought, and fixes before him the unlearned masses of society, and seeks to be their instructor and friend. "In every work regard the author's end." His readers know what to expect in the present work. If there is a little divergence from the puritanic style of the "Better Land," we confess we do not personally regret it. Tastes differ very proverbially, and some may think the "Messiah's Many Crowns" does not equal the writer's former productions. For ourselves, we must be allowed to think differently. On the whole, we regard this work as in advance of what Mr. Dodsworth has previously published. This work is not of the same class, of course, as Dr. Pye Smith's "Testimony to the Messiah;" but it is quite as full of the "Messiah," and bears quite as earnest a "Testimony" to his claims. All that can well be said to refer primarily to the Messiah, in the blessed Bible, Mr. Dodsworth has brought under tribute. A full and minute index prefaces the work, and will be of essential service to the reader. The work is neatly got up, and though of higher price than the "Better Land," &c., will, no doubt, have a good circulation. As in the case of Mrs. Beecher Stowe, and some other authors, the book that Mr. Dodsworth first published seems to have been, and to be likely to be, the most popular; nevertheless, the present is worthy of all the patronage the first obtained. To the masses of Christian readers this work will be both interesting and useful.

Religious Training for the People; or, How to be Happy in Both Worlds. By an Old Inspector of Schools. London: Wertheim, Macintosh, and Hunt, 24, Paternoster-row; J. Bentley, 13, Paternoster-row, E.C.; and all book-sellers.

We believe Mr. Bentley himself to be the author of this book, and we happen to know, that he has spent a rather lengthy life in labours for the public good. This work is evidently written with an earnest desire "to say what is worth the saying, and to do what is worth the doing." Its teachings are plain and practical, and both young and old will find their account in its attentive perusal. It is neatly got up, and sells at a shilling. We wish for it a rapid and an extensive sale.

The Marriage Gift Book and Bridal Token. By JAMES BURNS, D.D. London: Houlston and Wright. 1863.

Dr. BURNS, like Dr. Cumming, seems fully to believe and act on the proverb, "Of the making of books there is no end." Ordinary mortals wonder how these writers find time for all they undertake. It has been said of one of them that "he seems to say all he thinks, and to write all he says, and to print all he writes." Dr. Burns hardly does that, but, nevertheless, his writings now begin to look very much like a snug library. He is evidently a most industrious man; and industry combined with ability, have often wrought wonders. The idea of this work is a happy one; and the author has worked it happily out. A handsome five shilling volume on the subject of marriage, and almost all correlative topics, cannot fail to be a welcome "Marriage Gift Book and Bridal Token." Prose and poetry from ancient and modern writers the worthy doctor has gathered up with great discrimination. The flowers are sweet and he has tied them neatly together. We have great pleasure in according to the work our hearty commendation.

Watchwords for the Church Militant. By NEWMAN HALL, L.L.B. London: Nisbet and Co. 3d.

THESE "Watchwords" are an exposition and enforcement of the injunction of the Saviour, "Watch and pray." Addressed to the militant church, in Mr. Hall's sweet manner, and earnest and devout style, the little work, like all the writer's former ones, must be extensively useful. Let those who can afford, buy this work, and circulate it very freely among the churches. Great good will result.

Kester Lane: or, Glimpses of Social Life. By the Rev. J. C. STREET. London: Partridge, Paternoster Row; Caudwell, 335, Strand.

THE reverend author informs his readers that this is his first temperance story, and that it is reprinted at the request of several friends, from the "Alliance News."

It is a touching story very well told. The evils of the drinking system, and the importance of abstinence and prohibition, are eloquently put. We have no doubt the story will be a favourite among the young; and believing it to be adapted to do good, we wish it success.

The Illustrated Pocket Critical and Explanatory Commentary on the Old and New Testaments, embodying the Ripest Results of Modern Criticism, in a popular style. By the Rev. R. JAMIESON, D.D., St. Paul's, Glasgow; Rev. A. R. FAUSSIT, A.M., St. Cuthbert's, York; and the Rev. Professor DAVID BROWN, D.D., Aberdeen. London: W. Weeley, Paternoster Row; Glasgow: W. Collins. Part I. Price One Shilling.

THIS is a capital thing for Sabbath School teachers, and young persons generally. And, indeed, travelling and local preachers will find it of no trifling value. It is to be completed in twelve parts, at one shilling each. The text is on one page, and the comment on another, and the notes are compendious and comprehensive. The best writers have been placed under tribute, and the compilers of the work have shown great ability and discretion in its preparation. Parallel texts and marginal references, are liberally supplied; and, taking this part as a sample, we should say, the Commentary will prove a valuable acquisition to our literature.

Lessons for Nonconformists. By JOHN STOUGHTON, Kensington. London: Published for the Congregational Union of England and Wales, by Jackson, Walford, and Hodder. 1862. Three-pence.

"THE words of the wise are as goads," and such are the words of Mr. Stoughton. These lessons are fraught with practical sense and important suggestion; and while specially designed and adapted for the Congregationalists, they may be profitably pondered by Methodists.

"What hath God Wrought!" or, the Ameliorated Condition of the World, in answer to Three Years' Prayer. An Address delivered at an opening service in the "week of prayer," 1863. By BENJAMIN SCOTT, Esq., F.R.A.S., Chamberlain of London. London: Morgan and Chase, Amen Corner.

WITHIN the compass of a fourpenny tractate, the excellent author has thrown together as large a collection of remarkable facts as may often be found spread over a ponderous octavo. The power of believing prayer in the affairs of the Church and the world is suggestively exhibited. This little work forms a valuable chapter in the history of Christendom. It will amply repay a careful examination.

Black Bartholomew. A Lecture delivered in the Free Church, Camborne, December 26th, 1862. By SAMUEL DUKK. Among the many productions which have lately been given to the world regarding "Black Bartholomew," Mr. Dann's deserves to hold a foremost place. It is lucid, forceful, comprehensive, and practical. Being sold at one penny, we only need say to those who have an interest in the subject, make haste to procure and study it. It is worth your while.

OBITUARY.

IREBECCA, wife of Thomas BAILY, of Yarmouth, was born at Hilgay, Downham Circuit, July 18th, 1811. Her early years were spent in the pursuit of vain and worldly pleasures. One evening, when on her way to a ball-room, to spend the night in dancing, she passed a congregation of Primitive Methodists, who were worshipping in the open air; she was much attracted by the singing of those beautiful lines—

"No room for mirth or trifling here,
For worldly hope or worldly fear,
If life so soon is gone;
If now the Judge is at the door,
And all mankind must stand before
The inexorable throne."

What she heard and felt on that occasion, produced such a state of mind that she relinquished the gaieties and follies of the world, and that night angels rejoiced over her, a sinner that repented, and soon she realized salvation by faith in the Lord Jesus Christ.

She now thought it her duty to unite with our society, in her native village, and she manifested in her life and conversation that she had put on the Lord Jesus. Her pious zeal and Christian prudence in endeavouring to promote the cause of religion will long be remembered. Being appointed a class-leader, she fulfilled the office creditably to herself and very usefully to the church. She became the wife of Mr. Thomas Baily, who was at that time one of our itinerant ministers. And in this new sphere her piety shone with additional lustre; she bore its unavoidable trials with Christian resignation, and discharged its complicated duties with faithfulness.

Subsequently she removed with her husband to the city of Norwich, where he located; they have since resided at Woodton and Yarmouth. During the last few years her health greatly declined, and her vigorous appearance was greatly changed. Still she maintained decision of character, and the ministers of religion always found her cheerful, kind, and ready to aid the cause of the Redeemer.

The last sixteen weeks of her life were a period of great mental and bodily suffering, yet she maintained confidence in God, and frequently sung—

"Haste, my Lord, no more delay, Come, my Saviour, come away."

And then she would sing—

"We're bound for the land of the pure and the holy."

She found great comfort in hearing her husband read of the death of such men as Bourne, Clowes, Gilbert, and others. As she approached her end she said, "Christ has brought me into Jordan's river, the waters are cold and chilly, but he will bring me safely to the other side." The great enemy of souls strove to harass her mind, and she had two severe conflicts, but she overcame by the blood of the Lamb, and broke out singing—

"Bright angels are whispering
So sweet in my ear," &c.

She calmly fell asleep in Jesus, March 28th, 1862, aged 50 years, leaving a sorrowing husband, two sons, and three daughters to lament their loss.

W. WAINWRIGHT.

MRS. WATTS, wife of the Rev. W. Watts, was born at Salisbury, August 2nd, 1823, and died at Camborne, Cornwall, March 22nd, 1862. At the early age of five years she was sent to a Wesleyan Sabbath-school, where she continued under the tuition of pious teachers for twelve years. Frequently, during that period was she impressed by the Spirit of God; especially was this the case when questioned by her teacher, and while singing the stirring language of some of the hymns. At length, under a sermon preached from Psalm xl. 2, the fountain of her tears was broken up; she was deeply convinced of sin. In this state she joined the church. When she first went to class, the leader asked her the reason of her presence there. She told him she wanted to find her way to heaven. He directed her to the atoning work of Christ, and bid her look and believe. She did look, she did believe and was soon enabled to "rejoice with joy unspeakable and full of glory." She then gave herself fully to God, and began to seek in earnest the conversion of her relatives. Nor did she labour in vain. In answer to her persevering prayers, several of the family were brought into the way of peace, and she had the happiness to see her father and a brother die happy in the Lord.

From the time of her marriage with him who now feels his loss, she became increasingly active in the cause of Jesus, and laboured in any and every way which her time, her strength, and her capabilities would permit. She had no fear of man. She would reprove sin without respect of persons, and embrace any opportunity of doing good, whether in a railway carriage, or by her own fire-side. Several are known to have been converted through her labours. Persons whom at times she met, and to whom she spoke of Jesus, though she had never seen them before, have written to her to say that they had reason to praise God that ever she spoke to them about the salvation of their souls. She was a most cheerful Christian. For two years and a half she wasted by consumption, the latter part of which time her sufferings were frequently severe; but she bore them uncomplainingly. She would often say, "Lord, I am thine; I know I am thine." She became unusually happy as she approached the eternal world, frequently saying, "I want to be gone;" her face at the same time beaming with joy, and looking more angelic than human. The night before she died she said to her husband, "I have no strength to talk; I shall not say anything more after this time, but I am all right. I am on the Rock." She lingered till the morning, and then meekly and quietly fell asleep in Jesus. J. BEST.

SARAH WHITEHURST was born in Haslington, Cheshire, Sandbach Circuit, October 12th, 1824. From a child she was of an amiable disposition, and the subject of religious impressions. But she refused to give up the pleasures of the world for Christ and religion until about sixteen years of age. But while living in service with a pious young woman who interested herself in her spiritual welfare, she was converted to God. She had a marked attachment for the means of grace, especially prayer meetings, and she had great power in prayer; and often, when pleading for the blood of Jesus to cleanse her from all sin, and at the same time praying for the salvation of sinners, the whole meeting would be moved.

When about nineteen she was married to Thomas Whitehurst. As their family increased, and poverty pressed hard upon them, she fell from her stedfastness, and for two years remained in a backsliding state. But she felt that the way of transgressors was hard. She frequently purposed to return to the Lord, and that before affliction and death should come upon her; but day after day, and week after week, she kept putting it off. At this time it pleased God to visit her with a sore affliction, during which she again sought the Lord, and found Him to the joy of her soul. As soon as she was restored to health, she joined our people at Wintale, and she remained a steady member until death. She changed mortality for life, April 7th, 1862, aged thirty-seven years. J. EDGE.

Died, May 28th, 1862, at Sheffield, WILLIAM BURTON, in the twenty-second year of his age. He entered our Sabbath School in Stanley-street when a boy, but after some years he wandered away. However, about four years ago, in a revival of religion, he was led by his former school superintendent to the penitents' form, and obtained peace. He joined the society, and continued a member until his departure to the better land. After his conversion, he became a Sabbath School teacher, and his anxiety for the welfare of others was great; and through his efforts, under the Divine blessing, his father was brought to a knowledge of the truth, and his death has led to his mother's becoming a member of society. His experience was clear, and from the beginning of the last year he was more than ever devoted to God. The day before he died he sat up, and to his medical attendant and others appeared much better than for some weeks before. He retired to bed at night, and the next morning his wife found him dead by her side. "Be ye therefore ready also, for the Son of Man cometh at an hour when ye think not."

J. THOMASON.

Died at Seaham, New Cottages, in the Sunderland Circuit, March 18th, 1862, ANN HULL, in the eighty-first year of her age. She was born at South Shields, in the year 1781, was the daughter of Thomas and Eleanor Baynes, and was converted to God among the Wesleyans, in the year 1800. She continued with them a steady member for twenty-one years. Afterwards she removed to Boldon, in the same neighbourhood.

At that time, William Clowes, with T. and J. Nelson, missioned Boldon, and she went to hear them preach. The weather being stormy on one occasion, she invited brother T. Nelson to take a bed at her house, and this gave offence to her old friends, and led to a separation from them, (see an account of her husband's death in our magazine for August, 1853.) After this she joined our society, opened her door for all our preachers, travelling and local, and was the means of the conversion of her husband, who also joined us. Her character before her conversion was moral and affectionate, and afterwards she was a sincere and laborious Christian. For many years she made a practice of reading the Bible through annually, with praise and prayer. Respecting a visit she made about five months ago to her sister and friends, at South Shields, Mr. Pringle, of that place, thus writes: "After a short stay she was taken ill; I saw her, and in conversation I found she was happy in God, and saved from the fear of death. Among other things, she said, 'I give you my dying blessing, be faithful and we shall meet in heaven; also tell friend Bulmer to preach Christ and him crucified, and to be faithful to the end;' she then repeated that beautiful verse,—

'There are my house and portion fair,' &c.

After this I prayed with her, in which she fervently joined, and I bade her farewell."

For many years she was the subject of much suffering, but she was never heard to murmur. About three weeks before her death she began rapidly to decline, but when she perceived her end to be drawing near, she was exceedingly happy. In her greatest agony she could say, "It is the Lord, let him do what seemeth to him good."

The night before her death, when enduring extreme pain, she exclaimed, "The battle's fought, the victory's won," and then repeated the well-known hymn, which commences,—

"My soul, through my Redeemer's care," &c. On the day following, while still in this happy state, she calmly fell asleep in Jesus. W. BROOKS.

Mrs. ANN MORSE died at Viney Hill, Pillawell Circuit, on the 18th of March, 1862, aged seventy-nine. She had been a consistent member upwards of twenty years; she had a warm attachment to the cause, and was unwavering in her profession. She reared a large family, and trained them up in the fear of the Lord; and she had the happiness to see two of her sons pious local preachers on our plan, another a private member with us, and two of her daughters also on the way to heaven.

Her last affliction was the dropsy; her sufferings were great, as she was unable to lie down for some months; but the Lord sustained her. I saw her a little before her death—she said, "I am wishful for the Lord to finish His work, but I must wait; the Lord's will be done!" I said, "You can trust your all in the hands of your Redeemer," to which she replied, "He has always been my friend, and He is now precious to my soul." Her last words were, "Dear Jesus!" "Bless the Lord!" and her spirit took its flight to rest. JOSEPH HIBBS.

MARGARET PANTING died at Penalt, Pillawell Circuit, April 8th, 1862, aged seventy-three. She had been a steady and honourable member upwards of twenty years. In the former part of her Christian course her way was very rough, her husband opposed her violently; but she held fast her profession, and had the consolation of seeing several members of her family converted, some of whom are already gone to heaven. On the last night of her life she was aware that her end was near, and said, "I shall not be long here." Her daughter said, "Do you fear death?" "No," she said, "Jesus will support me in the valley." She said to her family and friends, "Try to meet me in heaven!" J. HIBBS.

MARTHA ALLEN was born at Hucknall Torkard, January 8th, 1839, of respectable and godly parents, who according to the means they had at command, trained her up in the paths of truth and righteousness. At the age of six years, she was sent to a Sabbath School, where the impressions she had received at home were greatly deepened.

These impressions manifested themselves in her anxiety to attend her school, and do whatever she could for the cause of God. Her earliest efforts of this kind appear to have been collecting for the missionary cause.

When she was thirteen years of age, her parents left Hucknall Torkard and settled at New Basford. Martha immediately entered the Primitive Methodist Sabbath School, where she continued a pupil for two years; at length, however, her regular attendance and steady conduct induced the teachers to appoint her to a class. In the September following she joined the society. Her experience was sound, and her conduct consistent.

When her race was nearly run, in taking leave of her relatives and friends, she with an earnest affection desired them to meet her in heaven. The night before she died she sung those cheering lines

"My God the spring of all my joys,
The life of my delights;
The glory of my brightest days,
And comfort of my nights."

and

"Fixed on this ground will I remain,
Though my heart fail and flesh decay;
This anchor shall my soul sustain,
When earth's foundations melt away."

Thus she departed this life March 27th, 1862. M. CHADBOURN.

Died in the Lord, Sept. 20th, 1861, in Oneida Township, Grand River Station, MARY WALTON, aged seventy-eight years.

Our departed sister was a native of Weardale, Durham, England. In early life she was the subject of religious impressions, and at the age of seventeen became a decided Christian, united with the Wesleyan Church, and commenced the long pilgrimage now so peacefully closed.

In 1842 she removed to Canada, and subsequently joined our church, of which she continued a devoted and faithful member to the day of her death.

In her affliction she was almost constantly speaking of her Saviour, her heavenly home, and those who, she believed, awaited her there. She has gone to be with them. J. GOODMAN.

MONTHLY SUMMARY.

MONTH after month the doings of death are continued. The Marquis of Landsdowne, the Viceroy of Egypt, Dr. Lyman Beecher, Mr. Alderman Meek—father of Alderman James Meek, of York—among other remarkable men—have lately passed away to their long home. Let us hear a voice from heaven, saying to us, "Be ye also ready, for in such an hour as ye think not, the Son of man cometh."

Dr. Colenso's second volume has appeared, and as might be supposed, it has been eagerly bought, to gratify a very natural curiosity. The Record says of it: "To those who ventured to hope for some modification of his views, or expected a wider grasp of the great subject affected by these unhappy volumes, and a more logical comprehension of the whole argument on its positive and negative sides alike than was exhibited in the first publication, or who expected some good result from the appeal made to the Bishop's sense of honour and the solemn vows of his consecration, or who looked to find underlying his disbelief in the historical truth of the Bible some deep mystical views of doctrinal truth, to each and all of these persons alike this volume will be an absolute disappointment. The Bishop has neither learned anything nor unlearned anything; neither retracts, nor explains, nor apologises; he re-asserts his old mistakes, repeats his old fallacies, and proclaims again his old unbelief with such additional aggravations as must go far to bring what is now the avowed conflict between the Bishop of Natal and the Church from which he derives his authority to some early and decisive issue." The Bishop states, not obscurely, his belief that He in whom dwelt all the fulness of the Godhead was ignorant of the facts, and mistook the traditions of the Jews for veritable history. And yet he professes the most orthodox (?) faith in the Divinity of Christ as the eternal Son of God. Convocation has had his first book under consideration, but it seems nothing has been decided in regard thereto, excepting that the African Metropolitan Bishop Gray, is the party by whom action should be taken in the affair, and the appointment of a Committee of Examination.

The Rev. Mr. McNaught, of Liverpool, has publicly signified his recantation of the infidelity on account of which he sometime ago seceded from the Establishment.

Mr. Spurgeon's College seems to be in a flourishing condition. Upwards of fifty students now attend its classes, besides some 150 who attend only in the evening. Very much good is said to be being done by the young men, besides what those already settled, as pastors or missionaries, have achieved. Mr. Spurgeon says his is the largest Baptist College in existence, as his Church is the largest in the world. Two years are the term at the college, and besides theology, a liberal course of general instruction is pursued.

The London Missionary Society is about to hold a large Metropolitan meeting for promoting the erection of memorial chapels in Madagascar. Doubtless it will be a success. The Prime Minister of the King of Madagascar, who was very friendly to Protestant missionaries, has passed into another world. We hope this will not interfere with the prosecution of those missions in that country.

The poor old Pope has lately found a friend in Earl Russell, who has very generously offered the old man an asylum at Malta. But we presume he will not accept it just yet. Indeed, France, Spain, and other countries would be quite scandalised if his Holiness were to become the guest of Protestant England, or to share in any way our protection.

Lord Ebury has introduced a bill into the House of Lords for repealing so much of the Act of Uniformity as requires ecclesiastical functionaries to: "declare their unfeigned assent and consent to everything contained and prescribed in and by the Book of Common Prayer." Perhaps a discussion on the subject may effect some good; but the passing of the bill into law is very problematical.

The London Review, in an article on the amount of the cost of crime in England and Wales, gives the following statistics: Known thieves and depredators, 30,000; receivers of stolen goods, 3,800; suspected persons, 34,000; vagrants and tramps, 23,000; criminals in local prisons, 15,601; in convict prisons, 7,123; in reformatories, 3,199; making a gross total of 116,723, whose business and habit it is to prey upon society in one form or another. The proportion of protectors of the peace is about one in five to that of the criminals,—the police and constabulary being 21,413; establishment in local prisons, 2,334; establishment in convict prisons, 1,182. The expense incurred by repressive and punitive establishments is as follows:—Police and constabulary, £1,579,222; outlay in local prisons, £542,306; in convict prisons, ditto, £253,731; cost of convict establishments abroad, £171,861; total, £2,547,120; to which the criminals contribute by their labour only £236,000. Taking a general view, the writer says, "We believe that very few thieves and ruffians at large spend much less than 20s. a week. But suppose they spend only 12s., or the same as those in prison, say £30 a year, then they cost the country no less than £2,724,000. Add this to the above, and one way or another, the cost of those in gaol and those out, amounts to five millions per annum." How many missionaries, schoolmasters, and Bible women would this support!

The London Auxiliary of the United Kingdom Alliance has addressed a circular to the friends of temperance expressive of sympathy with the suffering operatives in Lancashire, especially for those teetotallers who through the cotton famine are deprived of their savings and their ordinary means of subsistence, and commending the National Temperance Relief Committee to the confidence and support of temperance reformers. The distress in Lancashire may be somewhat mitigated just now, but it still continues, and to all appearance is likely to continue. Let not the friends of the destitute unwisely relax their exertions. The appeal for aid for the Primitive Methodist preachers in the embarrassed stations we hope will soon be warmly responded to.

The Anti-Slavery feeling is reviving among us in England. Huge meetings have been held both in London and the provinces, to express the sympathy of Englishmen with President Lincoln's emancipation proclamation. The war still drags its slow length across the American States. The end is not yet. Poland is in insurrection, and much blood may soon be shed to little purpose. The resistance to the Russian Conscription is the ostensible cause of the revolt.

During the present year the Moravians intend to celebrate the thousandth anniversary of the introduction of Christianity into their country. Great preparations are to be made, and visitors from Bohemia, Galicia, Croatia, Hungary, Posen, and Russian Poland are expected in large numbers. Methodism is advancing in Italy, the New Connexion is prospering in China, the Protestant prisoners still suffer in Spain, and the gospel is making progress in India. Dr. Mullens reports that there are in the four provinces of Bengal, the North West, Bombay, and Madras, 418 European missionaries, 81 native missionaries, 1,079 catechists, 899 churches, 118,893 native Christians, 21,252 communicants, 54,888 boys in school, and 14,723 girls.

Primitive Methodism is advancing in Canada West, and an interesting report of a beautiful presentation to our esteemed brother Robert Walker, is given in the Christian Journal. We have not space for particulars, but anyone who wishes may obtain the journal, which contains valuable religious intelligence weekly.

Our Metropolitan Missionary Meeting will this year be held in Mr. Spurgeon's Tabernacle, on the 12th of May. We believe the chairman is not yet absolutely fixed, but the speakers are to be: Messrs. Spurgeon, Newman Hall, W. Antliff, P. Pugh, C. C. McKechnie, and others. Full particulars will be announced shortly.

The opening of Parliament, and the attendance of the Prince of Wales as a Peer, the arrival from America of vessels laden with good things for our poor, and the approaching nuptials of the Heir to the Throne, have lately been matters of general and agreeable discussion. May our legislators be guided to wise and useful conclusions in the many matters that shall come before them, may a good understanding be promoted between us and our American cousins, may the doom of slavery soon be sealed, and may the Prince of Wales and his affianced bride enjoy a long and happy married life, and then be found ready for everlasting happiness beyond the grave! Amen.

P O E T R Y.

WHY SHOULD THE SPIRIT OF MORTAL BE PROUD?.

BY PRESIDENT ABRAHAM LINCOLN.

O, why should the spirit of mortal be proud?
 Like a swift-fleeting meteor—a fast-flying cloud—
 A flash of the lightning—a break of the wave—
 He passeth from life to his rest in the grave.

The leaves of the oak and the willow shall fade,
 Be scattered around, and together be laid:
 As the young and the old, and the low and the high,
 Shall crumble to dust, and together shall lie.

The infant, a mother attended and loved—
 The mother, that infant's affection who proved—
 The father, that mother and infant who blest,
 Each, all, are away to their dwelling of rest.

The maid on whose brow, on whose cheek, in whose eye,
 Shone beauty and pleasure—her triumphs are by:
 And alike from the minds of the living erased
 Are the mem'ries of mortals who loved her and praised.

The hand of the king, that the sceptre hath borne,
 The brow of the priest, that the mitre hath worn,
 The eye of the sage, and the heart of the brave
 Are hidden and lost in the depths of the grave.

The peasant, whose lot was to sow and to reap,
 The herdsman, who climbed with his goats up the steep,
 The beggar, who wandered in search of his bread,
 Have faded away like the grass that we tread.

So the multitude goes like the flower or weed,
 That withers away to let others succeed;
 So the multitude comes, even those we behold,
 To repeat every tale that has often been told.

For we are the same our fathers have been;
 We see the same sights our fathers have seen;
 We drink the same stream, we see the same sun,
 And run the same course our fathers have run.

The thoughts we are thinking our fathers did think;
 From the death we are shrinking our fathers did shrink;
 To the life we are clinging our fathers did cling,
 But it speeds from us all like a bird on the wing.

They loved—but the story we cannot unfold;
 They scorned—but the heart of the haughty is cold;
 They grieved—but no wail from their slumbers will come;
 They joyed—but the tongue of their gladness is dumb.

They died—ah! they died—we things that are now,
 That walk on the turf that lies over their brow,
 And make in their dwellings a transient abode,
 Meet the things that they met on their pilgrimage road.

Yea, hope and despondency, pleasure and pain,
 Are mingled together like sunshine and rain;
 And the smile, and the tear, and the song, and the dirge,
 Still follow each other, like surge upon surge.

'Tis the wink of an eye, 'tis the draught of a breath,
 From the blossom of health to the paleness of death;
 From the gilded saloon to the bier and the shroud—
 Then why should the spirit of mortal be proud?

Sent by S. E. ROGERS.

Robert Eglen

THE Primitive Methodist Magazine.

---

APRIL, 1863.

---

B I O G R A P H Y .

MEMOIR OF THE REV. GEORGE HEROD.

“ Your fathers, where are they ? and the prophets, do they live for ever ? ”

How solemn the appeal ! How affecting the response of our Connexional records ! Only two of our first ministers remain on earth, and only five of those first enrolled in the Preachers' Fund, and they are all superannuated, being past regular labour ! Truly “ all flesh is grass, and all the glory of man as the flower of the grass : the grass withereth, and the flower thereof falleth away.”

The late GEORGE HEROD was born September 13th, 1797; and departed this life August 30th, 1862. As a man his figure was graceful, about five feet nine inches high, very erect, wiry and well built. His tread was firm, yet quick and elastic ; his brow was open and unclouded, and his face ruddy ; his eye dark, keen in its glance, and lit up with intelligence ; his lip compressed and finely curved, and, as might have been anticipated, much active labour, physical endurance, firmness, and decision of character, with considerable sensitiveness and just taste, became developed in him. But he lacked all the advantages of a religious training and a proper education in youth, and grew up to manhood under the blighting influences of anti-religion and a bad example, which nourished and strengthened the propensities of his fallen nature. His father was an open sinner, a hater of religion, and a hot persecutor of God's dear children. His mother was of a milder nature and better morals, but not decidedly religious, and died while George was young. Their sons, thus left, copied too closely the example of their father, grew up in depravity, and had obtained a notoriety for godlessness when the Primitive Methodists first visited East Bridgford, Nottinghamshire, where the family then resided. George was in the very act of persecution, disturbing a prayer-meeting, when, in November, 1816, the Holy Spirit first awoke his conscience to a sense of his sinfulness under the earnest prayer of his next door neighbour, a boy not thirteen years of age, that boy being the present writer. In the following March he was brought more effectually to feel the greatness of his guilt and danger, under a sermon preached by Sarah Kirkland, the first female itinerant ever employed by the Connexion, and he ultimately obtained a very clear sense of God's pardoning mercy in a prayer-meeting after a sermon preached by that prince of missionaries, the late W. Clowes, on "September 13th or 15th (the figure is defective), 1817." We have a very clear recollection of that memorable evening, its persecutions and successes, and were praying with the penitent G. Herod, when he by faith first laid hold on Jesus, sprang into Gospel liberty, and terminated his ten months' struggle with conviction for sin, on the day that he became twenty years of age.* His previous total ignorance of the plan of salvation, his confirmed habits of sinning, the natural force of his will, and the influence of his godless associations, prevented his realizing salvation earlier. But from that hour his regeneration was made visible to all who knew him. He at once joined our young society, of which my father was the leader, and his ardent love soon broke forth into flaming zeal for God's cause and glory. Our small society then worshipped in a tenanted cottage, and suffered great persecution; but a glorious work of soul-saving was carried on there and in surrounding villages, and many efficient class-leaders, local preachers, and missionaries were raised up, and sent forth to break up new ground, or to cultivate what was newly enclosed. Among these were George Herod, James Moss; Thomas Charlton, John Parrott, &c.

Prompted by his new and heaven-born principle, and aided by natural courage, our departed brother soon made himself felt in all our means of grace. Soul-saving being pre-eminently the watchword of our early missionaries, a corresponding spirit was infused into our infant societies, and imbibed by our youths. The Connexional labourers were then few, and the openings very many; so that all kinds of pious efforts which bore the stamp of pure love for souls, were fostered by the itinerant preachers who visited our locality. The creation of churches by the conversion of sinners was the great work then unitedly sought to be accomplished. And unsolicited by man, but prompted by their inward yearning for souls, some of these youths started house-to-house visitations, read the Scriptures, and prayed with families on work-day evenings. Some received them gladly, and others drove them from their doors as presumptuous impertinents. By their own arrangements they also visited other places on Sabbath days. Several of them usually met and travelled together to some previously fixed on village, often kneeling under hedges by the wayside, praying for Divine assistance and success. On arriving at their destination, they sang along the streets to a suitable place, then proceeded with a regular service, singing, and praying, and reading a chapter or a portion of one. One would then relate his conversion and present experience, and assure the people that the same blessings were for them, quoting God's word in confirmation. Another would follow, and sometimes one would venture to expound a passage of Scripture. These juvenile missionaries, whose prayer, earnestness, and decorum were accompanied by the Spirit of God, commonly produced copious flowings of tears among their hearers, and eternity only will reveal the good thus effected. In this way many villages were first missioned which now form parts of Nottingham, Ilkeston, Mansfield, Newark, and Bottesford Circuits, together with Oxton Branch. Then and thus were these young men and boys unconsciously fitting themselves for doing and suffering what was awaiting them in the regular missionary and ministerial work of the Connexion, to which they were afterwards called.

* See Herod's "Sketches," page 320. Also Clowes' "Journal," page 89.

George Herod was the leading spirit in these youthful enterprises, for young and old thought they felt and saw in him that superiority of adaptation which rarely fails to secure its own position among those whose motives are pure, and whose only ambition is success in their undertaking. And what would be the effect now were our youths and converted people equally actuated by the same heaven-born spirit and zeal? In every city, town, and village, there is scope for their ardent love and holy action in house-to-house visitations, cottage prayer-meetings, and even open-air services. What aid would this kind of effort render our regular ministry!—what new life infuse into the older societies! And what vast facilities and encouragements are there now for it compared with the period of which we are writing! Prompted and stimulated, as we have reason to know, by kindred proceedings and successes in our Connexion,—and we do not say it in vain glory, nor without data,—city and town organisations have been by others formed to do the very same work. Surely we, as a community thus originated, cannot surrender the work to others, or leave it for agencies not better fitted for the work. And would not such voluntary efforts greatly contribute to the proper training of our future staff of regular missionaries and ministers, whose close attention to and skill in this work, were never more needed than at present?

Brother Herod was officially placed upon his Circuit's plan early in 1818, and although he knew little of systematic theology and modern sermonising, his heart was filled with love for perishing souls. Practically he understood "repentance towards God, and faith towards our Lord Jesus Christ," by which he had "obtained redemption through His blood, the forgiveness of his sins, according to the riches of His grace." With these points before his mind he, as a stripling David, with his sling and a few stones, sallied forth, "endowed with power from on high," which his prayers and addresses brought down upon God's children, and which pierced with conviction the unsaved. As truly characteristic of the young man's zeal and theological acquirements, we venture one relation.

A number of the "baser sort" of young men, who had been his companions, usually beset the cottage in which we worshipped, waylaid the congregation, &c., so that we could not conclude a religious service in peace and safety. At length it was agreed to apply to a magistrate for protection, himself a clergyman, and known to be unfriendly towards us; but all the elder members shrunk from the task. Ultimately George Herod volunteered, on condition that a senior brother would accompany him for a summons. On stating the grievance to the magistrate, the following dialogue took place:—

Magistrate.—Who are the Primitive Methodists?

Herod.—They are Christians, sir, who are trying to get to heaven, and to get as many sinners converted as possible, by preaching the Gospel and holding religious meetings in W. Millington's house, which is licensed for the purpose.

M.—Pray what do they preach?

H.—"Repentance towards God, and faith towards our Lord Jesus Christ," sir.

M.—What is "repentance towards God?"

H.—Repentance is a person's feeling deeply sorry for his sins, and determining, by God's grace, to sin no more.

M.—What is faith?

H.—Faith is faith, sir; as St. Paul saith, "Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ, and thou shalt be saved."

M.—O, faith is faith! yes, and pudding is pudding! I shall not grant you a summons, so go about your business.

Besides sharing in the persecutions then endured by our society, Brother H. was painfully persecuted by his own father, with whom he resided and worked. But he endured all as a Christian, and was by God's people considered a miracle of saving grace.

On April 21st, 1819, he was married to her from whom the Master hath called him to rest, leaving her behind in widowhood and sorrow, but with a prospect of a speedy reunion in the spirit world, where are fulness of joy, and pleasures for evermore. At the following September Quarterly Meeting, his own (Nottingham) Circuit regularly called him out, and sent him to mission in Lincolnshire, for which he cheerfully left his new home comforts, and prospects of competency, accepting the small pittance of ten shillings per week, out of which to provide for himself and wife. And full of burning zeal, he laboured and suffered indefatigably with his kind colleague, the Rev. Thomas King; and before these two "servants of the Most High God," the country-side fell, so that a wide door was effectually opened for gathering souls to the Saviour, and the establishment and increase of our Connexion there. In less than two years, upon the ground now occupied by Grimsby, Louth, Market Rasen, and Alford Circuits, fifty places were opened, and upwards of 500 souls gathered into church fellowship at them. How gratifying to those two veterans must have been the sight of their spiritual progeny, with their subsequent increases, on this first field of their missionary toils and sufferings, as presented in the reports of last Conference; viz., 2,819 members, 11 travelling preachers, 161 local preachers, 152 class-leaders, 76 chapels, &c., (50 of which are Connexional,) 19 Sabbath-schools, 1,517 scholars, and 370 teachers; and all in a comparatively rural and thinly-peopled district. Then there are the vast numbers who have removed thence elsewhere on earth, or to heaven. Oh! what must it be for Brother H. to stand up yonder, surrounded by those who went before him, and looking down here, to feel the full force of that inspired text, "Blessed are the dead which die in the Lord, from henceforth: yea, saith the Spirit, that they may rest from their labours, and their works do follow them?"

Brother Herod has left voluminous journals, of many hundred closely-written pages, dating from his first entering the ministry, and, as may be expected, there are during these forty-one years deeply interesting details of stirring enterprises, peculiar difficulties, signal deliverances, and rich successes, chapels building, improving, debts reducing, &c. And it has refreshed us no little to find on every page the clearest evidences of genuine piety, deep-felt abasement before God, because of his own felt imperfections, fasting and prayer for more holiness of heart; then exultations in deliverances, and the clearest manifestations of God to his soul, pathetic lamentations over the wide-spread evidences of human depravity, the comparatively little "pure and undefiled religion" to be found even where it was natural to expect most. But our space admits of little more than their mention, and to make the best selection among so much is difficult. However, incidents being most acceptable to the generality of memoir readers, we transcribe the following sample:—

"Grimsby Mission, Oct. 3rd.*—Went to Saltfleet, and preached in the fair to a large congregation, with great power. Before I had done, the devil raged very much. A man disturbed us by trying to drive two young horses among the people. I felt the Lord had not done with that man.

"4th.—Went and preached again at Saltfleet, and was told the man that made the disturbance yesterday got a fall last night, cut his head very bad, broke his collar-bone, and almost killed himself. I hope it will be a warning to all around.

* Either 1819 or 1820, which we cannot decipher, the paper being injured.

"15th.—Preached at Tothill; had much liberty, and a good time we had. At two o'clock preached at Withern; here the word seems to have no effect, the people being hardened in sin.* When I reached Grimsby, felt wearied with my labours,† but had a large congregation, and it was a powerful time to many souls. After preaching, I formed a society of nine persons. It has been a glorious day to my soul.

"Nov. 4th, Saturday.—While preaching at Thoresby to a large congregation the power of God came down, sinners trembled, and while I was praying the Lord broke in upon a woman, and she sang for joy.

"5th, Sunday morning.—Held a meeting at seven o'clock, and another at half-past nine. Fifteen souls were brought in, and joined society. At half-past ten I preached again to a very large congregation. The Lord made bare his arm; two more souls got liberty, and many were in distress. At two o'clock I held a lovefeast at Dulstow, and the glory of God was felt so much that I was constrained to say, 'How dreadful is this place! This is none other but the house of God, and this is the gate of heaven.' At four o'clock I left the meeting with believers to pray for those in distress, and, after taking a little tea, walked nine miles. It rained and blew in my face so that sometimes I had hard work to take my breath. I reached Grimsby a little before seven o'clock. A great congregation was waiting, so in my wet clothes I fell to work, and while pressing the people to live to God and prepare to die, the Holy Ghost fell on them. One soul got liberty, and with several more under deep conviction I laboured, while the water from my clothes, which were as if I had been in a river, drained down me, running over and out of my shoes. I was in this condition for three hours. I walked twelve miles, and held five meetings; but to my soul it was a glorious day, and I will praise God for all.

"Monday, 6th.—Preached at Struby, and had a glorious time. The seed sown begins to make its appearance. We shall have a church here. The Lord preserved me from taking cold yesterday, and gives strength according to my day.

"Nov. 16th.—Preached at Tothill. The Spirit of the Lord was

* This people, however, yielded to the power of the Gospel, for a few weeks afterwards he writes, "I preached at Withern to a house-full of people, and formed a society of nine (persons) in earnest for their souls."

† Who can wonder? He had already preached twice, and walked twenty-seven miles—twenty-three of those miles between his afternoon and evening services! Wishing to avoid an incorrect statement, we wrote to the Rev. C. Kendall, present superintendent of Grimsby Circuit, and to J. Maltby, Esq., of Louth Park, General Missionary Treasurer. Both of them kindly investigated and replied. Mr. Maltby says, "Mr. Kendall took the distance from Grimsby to Withern, twenty-three miles, Tothill is about four miles from Withern." This was both labouring and "winning souls."

poured upon the people; sinners began to cry for mercy; thirteen were brought in, and I formed them into a class.

"30th.—Preached at Saltfleet to a large congregation, with much liberty, and the word went with power to sinners' hearts. I believe souls will be brought to God in this place, the devil rages so; his agents fired guns while I was preaching, and after I had done, as I was passing by them; but I felt a calm serenity in possession of that religion that would carry me to heaven.

"Saturday, Dec. 9th.—Preached at Trusthorpe, and many were in tears.

"Sunday, 10th.—Met class at half-past nine, and had much of the presence of God. At half-past ten preached to a very large congregation, and many souls got convinced. At two o'clock the glory of God was with us; the meeting continued till six o'clock; thirteen souls got liberty, and believers were strengthened. I could hardly contain myself. At half-past six I preached again; many stood on the outside, unable to get in. I gave tickets afterwards to the members.

"Monday, 11th.—While visiting and praying with the people from house to house, I felt the power of God in my soul. At night preached at Sutton to a large congregation. The Spirit of God attended the word, and the stout-hearted trembled. Praise the Lord for what he is doing in this part. About seven months ago the people were very ignorant about the state of their souls; now half the inhabitants appear anxious for salvation.

"Bridlington Branch of Hull Circuit, May 27th, 1822.—I left Bridlington at five o'clock this morning, and walked to York, 42 miles. Spoke in York Chapel at night, and God blessed my soul.

"29th.—After our mutual conversations about becoming more united as a body, in which consultations I was glad to see such a strong desire for the work of God to prosper, we sang and prayed, and never did I feel such a heaven in my life. The glory of God came down amongst us, and our souls were filled with joy and peace. After we broke up, I left York in company with Brother Armitage, and walked to Driffield, thirty miles, and arrived about midnight, much fatigued.

"30th.—Left Driffield, walked to Bridlington Quay, and preached at night, and it was a powerful time to many souls. The word was made a blessing.

"June 1st.—We have held our Quarterly Meeting at Bridlington Quay, and settled our business in unity and peace, and have an increase of members and money. In prayer we had a powerful time; God baptised our souls with his Holy Spirit.

"Sunday, June 2nd.—At the seven o'clock prayer-meeting the Lord was amongst us, and souls were affected. Preached at half-past ten at Bridlington Quay, and the presence of God did rest upon the congregation. At two o'clock I got hold of God in prayer, and Divine power did shake the people. Souls began to cry for mercy; many were in distress, two got liberty, and nine declared they had received the blessing of a clean heart. At night preached at Bridlington; a good time. I still believe souls will be converted. Lord Jesus, ride on. This day I have been much encouraged to pray for God to revive his work."

When he arrived in the North Shields Station, in 1828, he set his heart on missioning Berwick-on-Tweed, and on having the country occupied from the river Tyne to the capital of Scotland. He sketched his plans, commenced action with his usual energy, and to a remarkable extent realised his wish. Difficult as was the enterprise in that region, so proverbially hostile to Methodism, in about three years the whole was traversed by himself and colleagues. Belford, Alnwick, Jedburgh, Kelso, Wooler, Holy Island, Berwick, Edinburgh, and other places, were occupied. During the five years he spent in this region, many were his sufferings and successes, frequently walking from twenty to thirty miles a-day, besides preaching three times, leading classes, and conducting prayer-meetings.

One morning he and the writer left Berwick after breakfast, and took tea the same evening with Mr. Lister, in Edinburgh, he being then stationed there, having walked all the way, and carried the book parcel (14 lbs. weight) a distance of more than sixty miles; and, after personally inspecting the state of that mission, we walked the whole journey back to Berwick. Our light finances forbade the payment of the heavy coach fares of that period.

"On Sept. 11, 1828," he writes, "met the Circuit Committee, which agreed to open a mission at Berwick-on-Tweed." That, however, could not be carried out before "January 2, 1829." Then Mr. W. Clough, a very successful young man under God, effectually opened that mission.* A few months afterwards we find Mr. Herod in Berwick, preparing for and superintending the building of the present excellent chapel, schoolroom, and minister's house; battling and overcoming the great difficulties which sprang up in the way.

"July 23, 1829," he writes, "Harassed much with the devil. 24th. Held a meeting, and agreed to purchase ground for a chapel. I hope it is of God. 25th. A day of trial and darkness respecting the chapel building. Preached this evening in Castle Gate. A powerful time. 26th, Sunday. Preached in the room at half-past ten; felt liberty. At one, on the Town-hall steps, to many hundreds; and again, at six o'clock, to a mass of people; and good was done. Administered the Sacrament; a solemn time. In the prayer-meeting afterwards, the power of God came down, many souls in distress, and some got liberty.

* See Petty's History of the Connexion, p. 243.

27th. The society was thrown into confusion through the work last night. The leaders said if that was religion, they could not do with it, and asked if it was in our creed for preachers to pray so loud as to make the people cry out! Obtained promise of part of the money for the chapel. 28th. This has been a day of great trouble. The people are all up in arms against us for allowing persons to cry for mercy. They consider it blasphemy! While visiting to-day, found some who testified that God had pardoned their sins on Sunday night. Had liberty in preaching this evening. Many present. After service three or four of the trustees refused to stand, and one leader gave up his class-paper, and left society, because of what he calls the disturbance in Sunday night's meeting! Our prospects are black, but I leave all with the Lord. 30th. Brother Lister again accompanied me to seek money for the chapel, and obtained promise of some. Met a class, then held a prayer-meeting."

The moneys promised as above, were refused when needed, and things became very gloomy at this critical juncture, and produced the deepest distress in the minds of Brothers Herod and Lister. Mr. Clough had been called away to the home branch. How deliverance was obtained by them, we gather from the following,—“In my distress, I fell down before God in the deepest agonies of soul, and implored His help, and in my last struggle in private, I was enabled to believe for deliverance.”

Directly afterwards, the door was rapped, and my colleague answered it, and brought in a letter containing £70 in bank notes; just the sum we wanted. Oh, what gratitude filled our hearts! The letter had no person's name signed to it, but read, “From a Friend, £15; Wellwisher, £25; Anonymous, £30;—£70.” Those buildings became an ornament to the town, an honour to the Connexion, and were left in comfortable circumstances.

The following is a brief summary, drawn up by Mr. Herod's hand, of the stations in which he laboured, and his varied success therein,— “Grimsby Mission: more than 500 souls gathered into the societies. York branch: 100 increase. Burlington Branch: 50 increase. Preston missioned. Lancaster and county: 100 increase. Blackburn Mission: found 14 members, left 175. Oldham: found a debt of £14, paid it off; 100 increase. Sunderland: many converted, but no reportable increase on the numbers given in at March prior to my entry at Midsummer. Newcastle-on-Tyne: found a debt of £28, reduced it to £14; 70 increase. North Shields: a glorious work in many places, and many converted during the three years. Missioned Alnwick, Kelso, Berwick-on-Tweed, &c.; made Berwick into a new Circuit, spent two years in the new Circuit, and took up Edinburgh as a mission from Sunderland. Leicester Circuit: found it in division and wretchedness; left 50 more than I found, and the cause has gone ahead since.” Then follow the names, of the other Circuits in which he travelled, for four of which an aggregate decrease of 174, and in the remainder an aggregate increase of 217 are given.

Having been thus employed in active service as a home missionary, and itinerant minister for about forty-one years, the Conference of 1860 awarded him superannuation. And on the kind invitation of long tried friends, he located at Helmsshore in the Haslingden Circuit, which he had missioned in 1823, and to which he was twice afterwards stationed. A neat cottage and garden were very kindly placed at his disposal, in which himself and wife lived rent free. And, being still capable of preaching on Sabbath days, in order to make his latter end more comfortable, and at the same time to benefit the cause of God by his preaching and long experience, the same kind friends, under official sanction, allowed him £5 per quarter, as long as he could preach. A truly Christian example, and worthy of record to the glory of God's grace in them.

Mr. Herod's end appears to have been accelerated by a cold taken during a journey to preach special sermons in Leicester, in the winter of 1860. This brought on inflammation of the liver, and jaundice, from which he suffered much, and never recovered, though he continued his pulpit exercises up to February 23rd, 1862. That morning's sermon was his last, and he could not go through the whole service. For about four months he tried change of air and a skilful physician. On returning home, May 14th, he became confined chiefly to his bed for about three months, during which his surviving widow says, "he experienced much peace of mind and often used the words, 'Oh, how happy I am! My soul rests in Christ the atoning Lamb,'—and similar expressions." On August 16th, by his physician's advice he was conveyed to Harrogate, to try the steel waters. But ossification of the liver had taken place, and his Harrogate doctor said to Mrs. Herod, "Your husband will die." On the 25th, while preparing for his return home, cold chills seized him: that was death, about which he spoke freely to his wife and attendant friends; and when asked if ready to die, he calmly said, "O yes." When they believed he had fully entered the bed of Jordan, they asked the state of his soul at that solemn juncture, and he replied, "I rest, I REST, I REST on His arm." These were the last words uttered on earth by this singularly active servant of God, who thus passed off to his reward within fourteen days of the completion of the 65th year of his age, in the 45th of his Primitive Methodist Christian life, and the 43rd of his public ministry.

The Rev. Thomas King writes, "The late Rev. G. Herod was appointed by the Nottingham Quarterly meeting, held September, 1819, to take part with me on that extensive and laborious mission, including Grimsby, Louth, Market Rasen, and the large tract of country around those stations. And of him it may be truly said, he was filled with zeal, and love, and truth ; and hence he was well fitted for a mission where the journeys were long, the roads bad, friends few and far between, and trials numerous and severe. No trial, however, was thought by him too great either by day or night, so that he might succeed in the important work in which he was engaged. I always found Brother Herod when stationed with me, to be a truly pious, energetic, laborious, kind, and devoted fellow-labourer in the Gospel of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ ; and he was the honoured means of bringing many souls to the Saviour. From the commencement of that mission, to the Conference of 1821, societies were raised up numbering upwards of five hundred members, so mightily grew the word of the Lord and prevailed."

"At Christmas, 1828," writes Rev. W. Lister, "I was sent to a mission (Alnwick ?) connected with North Shields Circuit, of which Mr. Herod was then superintendent. During those years, we had much intercourse, part of the time we lived in the same house. We frequently had long journeys in company—as far as thirty miles a-day, on foot. Railways we then had not, and our low funds would not permit us to pay the high coach fares of those days. But amidst many deeply trying and depressing circumstances arising out of chapels building, having few friends, many opposers, small salaries, &c., God prospered his work. There was a revival in the Circuit, which cheered us. Many who were converted then, are officers in the Connexion at this day ; a great many more have fallen asleep in Jesus, and, no doubt will be Mr. H's crown of rejoicing in the last day. In prayer, he was powerful ; his preaching abilities were acceptable ; his style was clear, impressive, varied, and practical. The matter of his sermons was always important, naturally arranged, and delivered with energy. He was remarkable for promptitude, indefatigable industry, and indomitable firmness. There was intrepidity about all his movements, and a restlessness in trying to improve some part of the machinery, in order to move more effectually the great work with which he stood identified. His understanding was more quick than profound ; his natural temper was sanguine and confident ; he possessed good moral principles, truth in the inward parts, and unbending integrity. When he lacked patience with an opponent, he sometimes got foes in business meetings. But whatever infirmity he laboured under, he was a laborious, unwearied, and successful missionary and minister."

Our general missionary treasurer, John Maltby, Esq., says,—“Respecting George Herod's usefulness in this neighbourhood, too much cannot be said. If lanes and village greens, or even willow trees could speak, they would say, ‘Send us a Herod, and others of the same stamp. Lanes, &c, I am fearful will speak out against us, if we do not visit them as the Primitive fathers did. Part of the ground they broke up is gone again to its original barrenness.’”

“When he entered the field,” says the Rev. W. Clough, “a Primitive Methodist minister was a unique man, called to a unique work, a work of magnificent proportions, and surrounded with a moral and spiritual grandeur of no mean order, a work blessed of God, and honoured by the wisest and best of men. But it required an entire negation of self, good physical powers, quenchless zeal, dauntless courage, great spirituality of mind, readiness of invention, force of character, aptness for creating occasions of usefulness, an intellect permeated with Gospel truth, and a facile method of communicating that truth to the masses from whom he was to gather, teach, and discipline a people for the service of God. To this high class of men, Mr. Herod belonged, and in just proportions he possessed these large endowments; and this judgment is given from a personal knowledge reaching over thirty-seven years, seven consecutive years of which we wrought together. In the pulpit he was grave, modest, collected, realizing the responsibility of his position. In prayer, as he neared the mercy-seat, it was as though he had only to ask and have; and this exercise, though short, was peculiar for its breadth and fulness. He quietly gave out his text, which he briefly opened: his divisions were natural, his language simple, neat, and of racy strong Saxon English. He dealt little with the ideal or imaginative, and what some term philosophical preaching, was his abhorrence, deeming it a desecration of the ministry. He preached Christ for us as our justification, and the Holy Spirit within us as our sanctification. On these great themes, with their cognates, he ever dwelt, presenting them in varied phases, which gave them a spicy freshness. When in full sail, he was eloquent, but it was the eloquence of thought and conception permeated with unction from above, and on such occasions his was truly a tongue of fire, melting and burning the sinner, and warming and igniting the affections and zeal of the devoted children of God.*

By dint of close application while discharging the arduous duties of his station, Mr. Herod acquired a knowledge of the Greek and Hebrew

* For twenty-three years, Mr. Clough has been the training superintendent of "The Country Towns' Mission," which in the Home work employs about 200 agents. And during these years, many hundreds of young men have been by him put through a course of theology, house to house visiting, journal keeping, &c., fitting them for the missionary work. Some of these have become clergymen in the Established Churches of England and Scotland; others are Dissenting ministers; others are employed as missionaries to the heathen in Asia, Africa, Polynesia, and among the Papists in Spain and France. Mr. Clough was himself trained under Mr. Herod for seven consecutive years. He has, moreover, continued to exercise his influence privately and publicly favourably to the community and its operations, in which God converted him and fitted him for the work which he has so successfully and honourably conducted up to the present. Surely eternity only can reveal the wide spread and large amount of influence for good exerted by the operations and example of the Primitive Methodist community on the kingdom of Christ in the world; and while we gratefully refer to the facts, we render all the glory to God, as is meet; for all the good done in this world He is the doer of it.

languages, so as to be able to read the Scriptures in their originals, which he found at once gratifying and profitable. "From the year 1825 to 1831," says Mr. Clough, then his colleague, "as a rule he read his Greek Testament every day, and in any vezata questio of Divine truth he consulted the original. He was not a bold speculator in theology, but with reverential obedience of faith, he sat and listened to the teachings and biddings of the Book of God." And this practice was not confined to this period of his life, but continued: his mind was also well informed by general reading, yet not profoundly so. As a consistent Methodist preacher, he closely studied the works of Wesley, Benson, Fletcher, Dr. A. Clarke, Watson, and other theologians of that school, and made himself familiar with their views of the doctrines contained in the Christian Scriptures, although he by no means confined himself to the works of Arminians. He also pressed upon his younger colleagues the propriety and necessity of their doing the same. As one of his colleagues, we well remember his lectures on the great impropriety and even danger to be apprehended from young preachers studying the theology of antagonistic divines, prior to mastering sound Methodist Arminian views of those doctrines which we were set apart and expected conscientiously to teach. We also remember that thirty years ago he strongly advocated a system of supervising and directing the studies of our probationers, similar to what the Connexion has found it needful recently to adopt. As may be supposed, in his doctrinal views, Mr. Herod was a sound Methodist, very decisive, and he made himself clearly understood in social intercourse, in the pulpit, and through the press.

He published several useful works; his first was "on the pardon of all past sins, the witness of the Spirit, and the sanctification of our nature, to be experienced and distinctly known by every believing child of God. It consisted of sixty-six pages, 12mo., with a copper-plate engraving of Berwick-on-Tweed Primitive Methodist Chapel and minister's house. It was published in Berwick in the form of a "Dialogue between John Telltruth and Henry Inquisitive." In that locality, at that period, these doctrines were almost universally disbelieved and strongly opposed, and their preachers were denounced as teachers of false doctrine, and guilty of leading the people into deadly errors, so that the minds of many became strongly prejudiced against us and our doctrines. This book was very useful, for after reading it in their houses, many of the peasants freely talked to their neighbours about the sayings of "John Telltruth," who met the common prejudices in familiar language, well sustained by direct Scriptural quotations. His second work was, "A Word to Preachers, Sunday School Teachers, and Parents," founded on "Feed my lambs;" twenty-four pages, 12mo., and good of its kind. His third was a "Catechism of the Scriptures of the Old and New Testament," very useful, and sold well. His fourth is a "Catechism forming a system of Theology for the use of Sabbath Schools, Families," &c., in three parts. Eight editions have been sold, and the ninth is now in the market, a portion of which has been bound in one volume, cloth, gilt, 6d., to suit those who wish to possess this useful compendium in a handsome and convenient form. This was the only catechism we had in our Connexion until the recent issue from the pen of Mr. Petty, which is of a different order. His last work is a volume of about 500 pages, 12mo., price 3s. 6d., termed, "Biographical Sketches of some of those Preachers whose Labours Contributed to the Origination and Early Extension of the Primitive Methodist Connexion." His object in issuing this volume was to make known important facts, casting light on the birth and early extension of the Connexion, facts which but for his indefatigable efforts, would probably have remained unknown except to a few. The second edition of the work is now in the market, and contains information other works do not give.

We have seen that Mr. Herod had not an early religious training, or a liberal education; that he entered the missionary work at great temporal sacrifice, with the simple preparation of a suitable body, a renewed heart, and a quenchless zeal for the salvation of souls. He was also early invested with the office of superintending stations, which was perhaps a calamity to him, imperfectly furnished and constituted as was his mind; as had he for a few years longer been allowed to pursue the ordinary work of an evangelist, under well informed and judicious superintendents, who would have taken the chief discipline of the stations, keeping him in the calmer region of reading, study, and prayer, we are of opinion that he would have shone more brightly in the estimation of some. But when the man, and all the circumstances of his life and labours are impartially weighed in the scales of moral equity, we are forced to the conclusion, that Mr. Herod was a genuine child of God, whose heart was fully given to the work, and that he contributed largely to the purity and best interests of the community in which he was converted to God, and in which he remained with changeless fidelity until called by the Master to his reward in heaven.

JOHN PARROTT.

[Having known Mr. Herod intimately for many years, having spent two years in the same station with him, besides having been repeatedly in neighbouring stations, having often met him at public services, and in official meetings, and having, moreover, assisted him in the preparation of several of his works for the press, we may claim to be in a position to judge of the correctness of the estimate given of his life and labours in the foregoing memoir. And it affords us a mournful pleasure to bear our testimony to the accuracy of this sketch of our old friend and fellow-labourer. Mr. H. had very marked infirmities of temper and judgment, but he meant well, and laboured hard and long in the service of the Connexion of his choice. "The best of men are but men at the best." He was greatly owned of God in his missionary labours, and many souls on earth and in heaven have cause to thank God that ever they heard him preach the Gospel. Both Mr. Parrott and other brethren have expressed the views of many persons, as well as their own, in the remarks above given. For sincere piety, for stern integrity, for indefatigable toil, and public usefulness, Mr. Herod deserves well of the church. Let us pity his failings and imitate his excellences. He is now at rest, and let all who may have seen occasion to differ from him allow their differences now to rest too; and let us rejoice in the thought that when we shall meet him again we shall one and all be free from those infirmities by which on earth our harmony may have been broken, and enjoy each other's society in the presence of that Saviour who atoned for all our sins, who was touched with the feeling of our infirmities, and knew how to sympathize with us in our trials, while he had patience with us all in our shortcomings. —ED.]

MEMOIR OF MR. JOHN GERRARD.

JOHN GERRARD was born at Ellastone, in the Ramsor Circuit, in the county of Stafford, in or about the year 1779. In his childhood he was frequently a subject of serious impressions. In the year 1810 the Primitive Methodists visited Wootton, Ramsor, and other villages in the neighbourhood where our brother lived, and he was again awakened to a sense of his sin and danger, and under the ministerial labours of James Crawfoot he was converted to God. Immediately he joined the Primitive Methodist Connexion, soon after which his name appeared on the plan, and he began to preach the Gospel; and he laboured with very considerable success. He was very punctual in attending to his appointments. Neither the distance of the places nor the inclemency of the weather prevented him. He was much respected, commanded very considerable congregations, and many souls will be the crown of his rejoicing in the day of our Lord Jesus Christ. Brother Ratcliffe, a local preacher, says of him:—"He was a son of thunder. I was one of his children. The cause of God was formerly very low at Ipstones, and Brother Gerrard was sent to preach there. He was about returning without preaching; but he retired to a garden to pray, and there the Lord heard him. The neighbourhood was alarmed, and a revival broke out. Some of the fruits of Brother Gerrard's labours were saved at a camp-meeting held by him on a common at Ipstones forty-eight years ago, in company with Brothers Hugh Bourne and Samuel Barker. Persecution raged awfully. A publican brought a quantity of ale on to the ground, and we were pelted with stones and eggs. But Gerrard shouted, 'Glory,' and said, 'It is something like the stoning of Stephen, calling on the name of the Lord.' And so greatly were we blessed under the stoning, that we felt as if every stone brought with it the glory, and Gerrard seemed clothed in God. I was with him at Leek once, at the Market Cross, when a man said, 'It rains.' 'What reigns?' said Gerrard, 'I know that God reigns, and the devil reigns in thee.' Immediately the man fell on his knees, sought the Lord, and obtained mercy."

About the year 1823 he became embarrassed in his circumstances, which brought upon him great trial of mind, and put a check upon his usefulness; but still he remained a member, and he continued to take his appointments throughout a long and protracted life, till old age and infirmity prevented him. His son Joseph has furnished the writer with the following remarks on his departed father:—"His heart and hands were ever open to cases of distress. He made many a widow's heart rejoice, and travelled many miles to assist his neighbours in times of affliction and trial. The religion which my father enjoyed for more than fifty years enabled him to look into the dark vale of death with strong confidence in Christ. A friend called to see him a few days before his death, and in conversation he mentioned his going to the Great Exhibition in London. My father told him he was going to an exhibition far more glorious than that in London, and he would not change with him for all the world. My sister said to him, just before he expired, "Are you happy?" He said, "Yes, yes;" and waved his hand, and died shouting 'Victory through the blood of the Lamb.'"

Thus died John Gerrard at Colwich, in the parish of Ellastone, August 10th, 1862, aged eighty-three years, having been a member of our society fifty-two years and a local preacher fifty-one years. "Mark the perfect man and behold the upright, for the end of that man is peace."

W. ROOKE

---

MEMOIR OF MR. WILLIAM HARDCASTLE.

"Virtue, I need not tell, wher proved and full Matured, inclines us up to God and heaven;
Virtue in me was ripe. I speak not this
In boast; for what I am to God I owe, Entirely owe, and of myself am nought."

SUCH was the experience of good WILLIAM HARDCASTLE, who was born at Pateley Bridge, in April, 1790, and who died in peace at Colne, August 21st, 1862. By God's grace he was made one of the excellent of the earth—an Israelite in whom was no guile. He was humble, simple, truthful, trustful, prayerful, and transparent in his moral character. By his death the oldest member in the Burnley Circuit has joined the holy multitude before the throne of God. He was converted to God in 1813 at a great camp-meeting held on Pateley Moor. He then lived at Trawden, two miles from Colne, and attended the Pateley Bridge market on Saturdays on business. Curiosity induced him to go to the camp-meeting. His attention was arrested with the lively singing:

"Stop, poor sinner, stop and think,"

began the services for the day. One preacher addressed the people from "Say ye to the righteous, that it shall be well with him; for they shall eat the fruit of their doings. Woe unto the wicked! it shall be ill with him; for the reward of his hands shall be given him." Under that sermon God converted him. He returned home with a joyful heart, and told his wife what great things the Lord had done for his soul. She soon after gave her heart to God.

He loved music, could play the violin, and loved to play in public-houses at merry gatherings. Lest the violin should be any temptation to him, he broke it to pieces. In good earnest he engaged in God's service. The Wesleys at Trawden invited him to join in class with them; but he declined, and determined to invite the Primitive Methodists to mission this part of Lancashire. They came, God was with them, and much good was done. His house became a home for the preachers. He received his first society ticket from Mr. Jabez Burns, who is now a doctor of divinity and a Baptist minister. Since that day what hath God wrought in this neighbourhood by the labours of the Primitive Methodists!

William's path from his conversion resembled the shining light, that shineth more and more unto the perfect day. He was a truly useful man as a trustee, a steward, a Sabbath-school teacher, a prayer-leader, a visitor of the sick and the healthy, and a liberal supporter of God's cause. The Lord prospered the work of his hands, and he gave as freely as he received. He never ascended the pulpit to preach, but his life and tongue preached to all who came near him. He was a man of clear faith and earnest prayer. While engaged in prayer on one occasion with an afflicted friend, he had such access, that when he rose from his knees he said, "You shall be better to-morrow by this time." It was according to his faith. He had a neighbour, a drunken carter, who was accustomed to let his horse stand long at public-house doors. Addressing him one morning, he said, "You must go to the foundry and order an iron horse, and tell them to polish it well, or it will rust with standing at public-house doors." The word spoken was as a nail in a sure place. The drunken man from that day became sober, got converted, and joined society. William took a deep interest in most public questions; specially war, slavery, cruelty to animals, and temperance. He was a decided teetotaler. His affliction was severe and protracted, but he bore it in the spirit of gentleness and patience. God often blessed his soul in the furnace of affliction; his mind was kept in peace; his hope was clear. At length he fell asleep in Jesus.

JOHN HOPKINSON.

of the other Circuits in which he travelled, for four of which an aggregate decrease of 174, and in the remainder an aggregate increase of 217 are given.

Having been thus employed in active service as a home missionary, and itinerant minister for about forty-one years, the Conference of 1860 awarded him superannuation. And on the kind invitation of long tried friends, he located at Helmsboro in the Haslingden Circuit, which he had missioned in 1823, and to which he was twice afterwards stationed. A neat cottage and garden were very kindly placed at his disposal, in which himself and wife lived rent free. And, being still capable of preaching on Sabbath days, in order to make his latter and more comfortable, and at the same time to benefit the cause of God by his preaching and long experience, the same kind friends, under official sanction, allowed him £5 per quarter, as long as he could preach. A truly Christian example, and worthy of record to the glory of God's grace in them.

Mr. Herod's end appears to have been accelerated by a cold taken during a journey to preach special sermons in Leicester, in the winter of 1860. This brought on inflammation of the liver, and jaundice, from which he suffered much, and never recovered, though he continued his pulpit exercises up to February 23rd, 1862. That morning's sermon was his last, and he could not go through the whole service. For about four months he tried change of air and a skilful physician. On returning home, May 14th, he became confined chiefly to his bed for about three months, during which his surviving widow says, "he experienced much peace of mind and often used the words, 'Oh, how happy I am! My soul rests in Christ the atoning Lamb,'—and similar expressions." On August 16th, by his physician's advice he was conveyed to Harrogate, to try the steel waters. But ossification of the liver had taken place, and his Harrogate doctor said to Mrs. Herod, "Your husband will die." On the 25th, while preparing for his return home, cold chills seized him: that was death, about which he spoke freely to his wife and attendant friends; and when asked if ready to die, he calmly said, "O yes." When they believed he had fully entered the bed of Jordan, they asked the state of his soul at that solemn juncture, and he replied, "I rest, I REST, I REST on His arm." These were the last words uttered on earth by this singularly active servant of God, who thus passed off to his reward within fourteen days of the completion of the 65th year of his age, in the 45th of his Primitive Methodist Christian life, and the 43rd of his public ministry.

The Rev. Thomas King writes, "The late Rev. G. Herod was appointed by the Nottingham Quarterly meeting, held September, 1819, to take part with me on that extensive and laborious mission, including Grimsby, Louth, Market Rasen, and the large tract of country around those stations. And of him it may be truly said, he was filled with zeal, and love, and truth; and hence he was well fitted for a mission where the journeys were long, the roads bad, friends few and far between, and trials numerous and severe. No trial, however, was thought by him too great either by day or night, so that he might succeed in the important work in which he was engaged. I always found Brother Herod when stationed with me, to be a truly pious, energetic, laborious, kind, and devoted fellow-labourer in the Gospel of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ; and he was the honoured means of bringing many souls to the Saviour. From the commencement of that mission, to the Conference of 1821, societies were raised up numbering upwards of five hundred members, so mightily grew the word of the Lord and prevailed."

"At Christmas, 1828," writes Rev. W. Lister, "I was sent to a mission (Alnwick ?) connected with North Shields Circuit, of which Mr. Herod was then superintendent. During those years, we had much intercourse, part of the time we lived in the same house. We frequently had long journeys in company—as far as thirty miles a-day, on foot. Railways we then had not, and our low funds would not permit us to pay the high coach fares of those days. But amidst many deeply trying and depressing circumstances arising out of chapels building, having few friends, many opposers, small salaries, &c., God prospered his work. There was a revival in the Circuit, which cheered us. Many who were converted then, are officers in the Connexion at this day; a great many more have fallen asleep in Jesus, and, no doubt will be Mr. H's crown of rejoicing in the last day. In prayer, he was powerful; his preaching abilities were acceptable; his style was clear, impressive, varied, and practical. The matter of his sermons was always important, naturally arranged, and delivered with energy. He was remarkable for promptitude, indefatigable industry, and indomitable firmness. There was intrepidity about all his movements, and a restlessness in trying to improve some part of the machinery, in order to move more effectually the great work with which he stood identified. His understanding was more quick than profound; his natural temper was sanguine and confident; he possessed good moral principles, truth in the inward parts, and unbending integrity. When he lacked patience with an opponent, he sometimes got foes in business meetings. But whatever infirmity he laboured under, he was a laborious, unwearied, and successful missionary and minister."

Our general missionary treasurer, John Maltby, Esq., says,—“Respecting George Herod's usefulness in this neighbourhood, too much cannot be said. If lanes and village greens, or even willow trees could speak, they would say, ‘Send us a Herod, and others of the same stamp. Lanes, &c., I am fearful will speak out against us, if we do not visit them as the Primitive fathers did. Part of the ground they broke up is gone again to its original barrenness.’”

“When he entered the field,” says the Rev. W. Clough, “a Prim-

MEMOIR OF MR. THOMAS RUDDERHAM.

"Smitten friends
Are sent on errands full of love;
For us they languish and for us they die:
And shall they languish, shall they die in vain?"

THOMAS RUDDERHAM, the subject of this brief sketch, was born at Saham Toney, in the Brandon Circuit, on the 27th of May, 1839. Being blessed with pious parents, he was early taught to fear God; and as he grew up to boyhood, his desires became intense for a religious life. In his fifteenth year he obtained a clear sense of God's pardoning love under the ministry of the Rev. R. Betts. His knowledge of Divine things gradually increased, and his faith gathered strength; but being naturally timid, he was often harassed in reference to the reality of the change he professed to have experienced. Yet there were true evidences of the new life in his soul: his love for prayer-meetings (the early Sabbath morning finding him generally in his place there); his love for souls, which early manifested itself as he sought opportunities to do good in distributing religious tracts and periodicals, proved he was a converted person. His example also exerted a beneficial influence upon those with whom he associated; his calm and sunny temper has hushed many a storm. His activity in the Sabbath-school is worthy of special notice. As a teacher he laboured for the salvation of the children—having as his motto, "My class for Jesus." He was a quiet worker, and no matter how much he did, he felt as though he had done comparatively nothing.

His public attempts were few indeed. The March Quarterly Meeting of 1862 placed his initials upon the circuit's plan; but only one opportunity had he of engaging in this new sphere of labour, and that was his first appointment at a neighbouring village in company with some others at a revival meeting. When called upon to address the congregation, he gathered an unusual amount of courage, and spoke with great power, and ere the service closed several souls professed to find mercy.

Very soon after this, suffering severely from an internal disorder, he was induced to seek medical aid. An eminent physician was applied to, who advised him to get a recommendation for the Norfolk and Norwich Hospital, which he obtained the following week, and was admitted an in-door patient, May 9th. Here his case was pronounced a difficult one. On June 13th he passed through a severe surgical operation, which it was feared would prove fatal; and although he felt prepared for death, yet a merciful Providence saw fit to prolong his earthly existence. Now he daily improved in health and spirits, and was discharged from the hospital July 5th, as being an extraordinary case of the success of surgical skill.

On his return home he mingled among his friends, seeming as one alive from the dead, receiving congratulations upon his apparent cure. A special thanksgiving tea-meeting was held, and many were the expressions of joy ; but, alas ! this was short-lived indeed, for only a few days had passed and a serious pain settled in his back, which daily increased upon him without any real relief, till his happy spirit was released from its clay tenement, and rose to its native heaven, which took place on Friday, August 22nd, 1862, in his twenty-fourth year.

His affliction was borne with lamb-like patience and humble resignation to the Divine will. Leaving home for the hospital was a great trial to his mind, but special prayer was made by the Church for him, and in answer to prayer he was delivered from all fear of consequences, and sought to make himself useful to his fellow sufferers by directing the sick and dying to Jesus the Friend of sinners, and not, we hope, without success.

The last fortnight of his life I was mostly with him, and though his sufferings were most exquisite, a murmur never escaped his lips, and although the enemy of souls laid hard at him, yet his confidence was strong in God his Saviour ; his fervent prayers in time of extreme pain will never be forgotten by those present. Victory was his through the blood of the Lamb. Frequently these lines were upon his lips—

“The fire may burn if Christ be mine,
He will not leave me in distress.”

His last Sabbath on earth was peaceful ; he placed a calm trust in Christ. He requested his sisters to sing those sweet words—

“No music like thy charming name, Nor half so sweet can be :—”

as a chorus to Doddridge's beautiful lines—

“I'll speak the honours of thy name,
With my expiring breath.”

He gradually grew weaker, though we were flattered by some indications of returning rest ; but no, our fondest hopes were soon blighted by approaching dissolution. The Wednesday night before he died, the dull hour of midnight was enlivened by his sweet voice bursting forth into song ; the words being—

“Just as I am without one plea,” &c.

The day of his death he was calmer than usual, and a short time before he died he wished me to read to him. I read a sermon from these words, “What are these which are arrayed in white robes ? and whence came they ?” While I was reading he fell asleep ; but he soon awoke, suddenly was taken much worse, but was still calm and collected, and not at all alarmed. Fearing his end was nigh, I grasped him in my arms, and as he was quite conscious,

I asked him several questions relative to his prospect. His answers were satisfactory, and he continued in earnest prayer some time; and then, turning to me, said, in great earnestness, "Pray, brother." I did so as well as I could. I recited those words of Pope—

"Vital spark of heavenly flame," &c.

A holy calmness fell upon us. "Jesus is here," I said; "Yes," was my dear brother's reply, and turning towards his mother, who was weeping, he said in strongest affection, "Don't cry, mother, we shall meet in heaven!" Then shutting his eyes, as if sleeping quietly, he repeated these lines—

"There I shall bathe my weary soul,
In seas of heavenly rest," &c.

And in a few moments the bitterness of death was past; pain and sorrow were exchanged for the sweet peace and rest of paradise. The name of Jesus was upon his lips as long as he could articulate. "His sun is gone down while it was yet day." Thank God we "sorrow not, even as others which have no hope," but are consoled with the cheering truth that—

"There's another gem in the Saviour's crown,
And another saint in heaven."

A sermon was preached in our chapel to improve the event, by the Rev. W. H. Meadows, and in the prayer-meeting a young person struggled into the glorious liberty of the gospel. Praise the Lamb! That my brother's death may be the life of many, and that we as a family may meet him in heaven, is the prayer of

WILLIAM RUDDERHAM.

---

D I V I N I T Y.

---

AN ESSAY ON THE PENAL CONSEQUENCES OF SIN.

Read before the Association of Ministers of the Nottingham District, and sent to the Magazine at their request.

BY REV. JOHN WENN.

(Continued from page 151.)

WE proceed now to consider in the second place the future or eternal consequences of sin. Do the penal consequences of sin pursue the sinner into another world, and if so, how far? This is a solemn question; one that should, in our judgment, never be discussed but with great seriousness. Flippancy is out of place here, and so is dogmatism. This ground should be trodden with "fear and trembling." This doctrine should be announced in tremulous, not in harsh and heartless tones. This tenet should not be too frequently discussed, lest frequency should beget familiarity, and familiarity contempt. The rod held over the child for every trifle will soon lose its efficacy in those things that are not trifles. We have indeed no sympathy with those who cannot pronounce the word hell when they meet with it, but must have recourse to some awkward circumlocution, as "A place I will not mention;" but as little have we with those who seem to feel a special delight in being the messengers of fire and brimstone, of "blue flames and clanking chains." We knew a brother—a good, sincere man, no doubt—who, whenever he had occasion (which was rather often) to quote our Lord's direction to his disciples, "Go ye into all the world," &c., used to finish by saying, "He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved, but he that believeth not shall be DAMNED!" Now, we think it would be just as rational and just as scriptural to inspire a good chest full of air in order to emphasize the word saved as the word dammèd.

But it is with the doctrine, rather than with the manner of setting it forth, that we have to do. We have already assumed that eternal punishment is a doctrine of Scripture; nevertheless, a variety of conflicting sentiments obtain and have obtained on this subject from the time of Origen downwards. We shall examine only the principal of these. The difficulty with the most respectable doubters of the doctrine outside the church lies in what they call the nature of sin or evil. We shall call in the aid of a celebrated continental divine to state the rival philosophies on this subject. Vinet, in his book entitled "Vital Christianity," says: "Some of them—philosophers—regard sin as essentially a negative thing; that is, as an absence, a want, a defect. In their belief, no element of positive evil resides in the heart of man. Others, on the contrary, believe that evil consists in a direct preference of bad to good; that vice in man is not a weakness, but a depraved force; that the will is not seduced, but corrupted. You hear some explain sin as an accident of human nature; the result of the action of external circumstances upon the soul. Evil, according to them, does not proceed from the soul, but comes to it; the soul receives it, does not produce it." We are of this same writer's opinion, "that reason sheds very little light upon these questions;" but what little it does shed seems to show that the positivists are right: for it appears to us, as it does to McCosh, (we quote his "Divine Government, Physical and Moral,") that "deceit, malignity, and adultery are as positive acts as integrity, benevolence, charity."

According to the above negative theory, all the blame of sin should be laid upon the devil, or upon those "external circumstances," whatever they may be, the action of which, according to the theory, is so debasing upon the soul of man. Now, we believe the devil is the first, but not the only offender. We believe that the "wicked one," having once sowed tares in the field of humanity, needs not to renew the act, but only to develop the crop in the successive individuals and generations of man. Evil, once admitted, works on, according to a law whose existence was foretold by God; and for the admission of that evil we hold man as much to blame as the fiend. The devil did not force the forbidden fruit upon Eve against her will, but the woman, on his persuasion, "reached forth her hand and took it." Satan did not push our Lord off the pinnacle of the temple, he sought only to persuade him to cast himself down. Satan never yet had knife, nor halter, nor any other instrument of destruction in his possession; he has always persuaded men to use their own, and madly to lay violent hands upon themselves. And if he has been all along ready to tempt, we have been only too ready to be tempted; and so, accordingly, the Bible divides the blame and the punishment of sin between the two parties who are alone responsible for it,—the devil and man. We believe with our Lord, and against the negativists, that "not what goeth in, but what cometh out of a man, defiles him;" with Paul, "that there is a spirit that now worketh in the children of disobedience;" and with James, "that every man is tempted when he is drawn away of his own lust and enticed."

Having found out that men are wilful sinners, and therefore liable to punishment, what we have now to consider is its duration.

Now theologians themselves are by no means agreed as to the duration of future punishment. The doctrine perplexes them; the perplexity is twofold. First, "when the moral difference between man and man appears to graduate from utter depravity to mature saintliness, it seems difficult to provide for all by the supposition of two opposite retributory states." Secondly, the tremendous doom of eternal punishment appears to be disproportioned to any amount of criminality. The latter of these difficulties led to the bold assumption of Origen and his followers, that all evil is temporary in duration and reformatory in action, and that consequently, in process of time, even Satan himself will be delivered from his prison-house and restored to the favour of God. It is true that Origen did not very willingly accept this latter consequence of his doctrine; but, as Neander says, it is difficult to see how he could logically reject it. The other difficulty, as is well known, led to the adoption of that convenient and lucrative fable, purgatory.

For the sake of simplicity and clearness, we remark that, in the opinion of some, eternal punishment is too much for some sinners, hence the doctrine of purgatory. And in the opinion of others, eternal punishment is too much for any sinner, hence the notion of universal restoration.

We shall consider, not whether the doctrine of a purgatory finds any real support in Scripture,—for no one thinks it does except him for whom the authority of the "Church" has more weight than the authority of the Bible,—but whether it finds any support in reason, and is adapted to remove the difficulty which it professes to remove.

The difficulty is this, "that between the lowest spirit that is saved and the best that is lost, the moral difference is immeasurably smaller than the tremendous difference of doom—an eternity of happiness and an eternity of woe." We do not deny that this is a difficulty; but we do deny that the supposition of a purgatory removes it. In so far as the state of individuals in another world is concerned, we can, perhaps, find a solution of the difficulty. We refer to the doctrine of degrees, both in reward and punishment. There are "few stripes" and "many stripes." There are rulers over "ten cities" and rulers over "five cities." There are those who will be saved "by the skin of their teeth," and those to whom an "abundant entrance shall be administered into the everlasting kingdom of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ." There are those who will be "next the throne," and those who will stand in the outer circles of the glorified. Thus, it would seem, there will be a graduated scale of rewards and punishments to harmonize with the differences of moral character; and by this means we think the difficulty, so far as individuals are concerned, is nearly, if not altogether, removed. But between the two great classes into which men are divided, and so between the individuals who occupy positions nearest the great boundary line by which these two classes are separated, the difficulty still remains. "A great gulf is fixed."

But suppose we were to admit the purgatorial scheme, should we be at all advantaged? Should we get over, or by, or through the difficulty? By no means. The difficulty would remain notwithstanding. Purgatory only "disguises and postpones it." "For the question we have seen is not as to the difficulty that shall exist between individuals of the good and evil classes respectively, but altogether turns upon that tremendous point where the utterly lost and the completely saved are for ever disjoined from each other!" Now how does, how can purgatory help us in this case? Those sufferers who are in purgatory, even the worst of them, are to come out some day; but those who suffer in hell, even the best of them, are never to come out. Now there is no comparison between the lot of him who shall at some time cease to suffer, and his who never shall! Let the one be detained in purgatory a thousand, or even a million of years, and then come out, and the other, whose crimes, it is supposed, are just sufficiently mortal to be beyond the power of purgatorial fire to expiate and purge, be kept in hell for ever; and precisely the same difficulty remains.

But what is the object of purgatory, according to this popish dogma? Its object is twofold: punitive and purificatory. With regard to the first, permit us to observe that God never inflicts punishment upon his forgiven children for the same reasons and in the same sense as he inflicts it upon the damned in hell. We have admitted, and we do not recede from the admission, that forgiven men are sometimes punished. We instanced the case of David. But then, in such punishments, there is nothing expiatory. The saints suffer on account of their sins, but not to atone for their sins. Now this is what the dogma of purgatory supposes. A soul in purgatory suffers a certain degree of pain proportioned to its crime; and then when the man has suffered the proportioned amount, and earned his deliverance, assisted, perhaps, by the prayers of the faithful, and the pence of friends, he comes out. Now, we contend, there is not in scripture the shadow of a reason for such a notion. On the contrary, we believe that He who bore, in a vicarious sense, any of the penalty of sin, bore it all. "For the blood of Jesus Christ, his Son," not the fire of purgatory, "cleanseth us from all sin."

Perhaps there is more likelihood that the other end which purgatory contemplates will be secured. Let us see. It is an indisputable fact that Romish theologians admit the possibility of souls going straight to heaven without passing through purgatory at all. Such, for instance, as martyrs and newly-baptized persons. Now, not to mention that the sanctifying element, by means of which these favoured ones ascend directly to the skies, is not the blood of the Redeemer, but either fire or water, we ask why, if some may pass to heaven without suffering in purgatory, all may not? The answer we receive is, that all are not prepared, and that purgatory prepares them. It "perfects them through suffering." Now we admit that affliction has its uses on earth; that it prevents attachment to the world, that it lowers pride, that it tries fidelity, that it refines from fleshly lusts, that it habituates to resignation. But which of these uses of adversity can apply to the supposition of intermediate purification by pain? We should remember that all who go to purgatory die in the bosom of the church, and are the sincere, though imperfect and sinful, servants of Christ. Now, to imagine that severe pain can be needful to wean the desires of one who has died from the miserable shadows he has left for ever; or, again, to impress the guilt of sin upon one who has already seen it impressed in awful characters upon the "suffering Saviour;" or, to exercise his faith who has passed beyond the sphere of faith, and stands now in the very presence of reality; or, to reduce the tyranny of the flesh in a disembodied spirit, seems little short of ridiculous! Both analogy and scripture set their faces against such irrational and unfounded suppositions. A projectile thrown into space maintains to the end of its course the direction in which it was moving at the moment when it escaped from the propelling force; so the soul, discharged from the body under the influence of sin or holiness, moves onward, as we believe, in its endless career of being, under the same influence, unless we can find something to the contrary in Holy Writ. But we cannot find anything to the contrary, while we can find much that is accordant. As a sample take the following: "Blessed are the dead," not newly-baptized persons and martyrs merely, but "the dead which die in the Lord from henceforth : yea, saith the Spirit, for they rest from their labours," not suffer in purgatory, "and their works do follow them."

"So much, then," says the late lamented W. Archer Butler, to whom we are considerably indebted for assistance in this second division of our subject, "so much, then, for the speculative and philosophical merits of the hypothesis of purgatory ; a hypothesis which, originating, no doubt, in a strong sense of real difficulty, introduces more difficulties than it solves. There is no confidence to be placed in these unsubstantial shadows which the impatient curiosity or secret terrors of man have interposed between himself and the inevitable truth. They leave us unsheltered, unreprieved, naked, and trembling before the terrible simplicity of revelation—of those unambiguous oracles in which that God, who is a consuming fire, hath represented himself in the very volume of mercy itself, as bidding the cursed 'into everlasting fire,' 'into a fire that is not quenched,' that is 'unquenchable,' 'whose smoke ascendeth up for ever,' 'whose torment is day and night for ever and ever.'"

Secondly, "Eternal punishment is too much for any sinner"—hence the notion of universal restoration. Objectors in this line, from Origen down to the present race of universalists in America and this country, are wont to affirm that those expressions in Holy Writ which seem to teach the doctrine now under consideration are so "largely metaphorical" as to be of little use for direct instruction. That the difference between a brief life of sin and an eternity of suffering is "monstrous, disproportional, impossible." "Our reason," say they, "revolts from this doctrine, and we would far rather believe that all men will be finally saved, than that any will be irrecoverably lost." But the question is not concerning what we "would rather believe," but regards what scripture and sound argument combine to prove we ought to believe.

The objection to eternal punishment turns, we see, upon the alleged disproportion between the time for sinning and the time for suffering—between the crime and the penalty.

In reply to this allegation, we might observe that the harmony of revealed truth demands that this doctrine have a place in it. We grant that the doctrine is in some respects a mystery. But there are other mysteries in the Bible as profound as this, and requiring this. There is the mystery of sin and the mystery of redemption : which of these has ever been fathomed ? But unfathomable though they be, they are, nevertheless, revealed facts ; and they are facts which are closely related to one another, and both to the one now under review. The unspeakable malignity of sin necessitated the unspeakable atonement of Jesus Christ. This neglected, will involve the unspeakable doom of eternal perdition, "when the Lord Jesus shall be revealed from heaven with his mighty angels, in flaming fire, taking vengeance on them that know not God, and that obey not the gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ ; who shall be punished with everlasting destruction from the presence of the Lord and from the glory of his power."

Given the first and second of those doctrines, the last seems to follow as a necessary consequence. If sin is not beyond all our conception malignant, where is the need of a Divine atonement? For the sin that deserved but a temporal punishment a created nature might atone ; a Divine expiation infers a boundless guilt and a boundless demerit. Now if this Divine atonement, the one only thing that can reach and remove human guilt be neglected, not to say despised, what can remain for such neglecters but a boundless, timeless punishment? It would have been a waste of means on the part of Jehovah to give his own Son, if his own Son was not to procure an eternal salvation, and save from an eternal damnation. To us, then, it appears as plain as anything can do, that if you discard the one of these doctrines, you must discard the whole ; and again, if you admit one, you must admit them all. Moreover, it may be considered as the theologian Jackson has put it, whether the punishment in this case is not in proportion to the parallel of glory offered, as well as to the sin committed. It is the punishment of beings to whom eternal life has been tendered, and by whom it has been rejected—to beings who have had an option, and have made their choice. "This is the condemnation, that light is come into the world, and men love darkness rather than light, because their deeds are evil." "These are mysteries indeed, but mysteries mutually related, and that suppose and demand one another. These are depths, no doubt, but even so ; deep calleth unto deep."

"Still," it is urged, "the more we think of the brief duration of our life here and its endless duration hereafter, the more are we surprised and shocked that all our future should be made to depend upon the very commencement of our career!" But who does not know that upon the merest trifles immense results do continually hang? Who has not observed that in nature everything tends to propagate and multiply its kind? Who has not noticed that a warp or a wound in the tender plant will be a warp or a wound in the tree? Who needs to be told of the difference, in bulk, between the seed and the harvest, the acorn and the oak? But let us adduce an illustration that will perhaps be thought more appropriate to the subject in hand. "It took," says Jacob Abbott, "Dr. Dodd fifteen seconds to write Lord Chesterfield's name. He suffered indescribable agonies for many months, and was then blotted out of existence for it." He would have lived, perhaps, about forty years. So that, for a crime, which took fifteen seconds in the enacting, justice took a forty years' penalty : mercy was never mentioned. Now if a civil crime, which took fifteen seconds to commit, was punished by human justice in the severe manner prescribed by law, what punishment shall be considered too much for a life-long violation of God's law, to which there must be added a life-long rejection of his mercy? We are quite aware that the above fact does not prove anything to our purpose; but that it very forcibly illustrates the position, that the time taken in the committal of a sin has nothing to do with the duration of its punishment, few will deny.

There is yet one point of view from which we have not looked at this subject. We have not inquired if sin may not be perpetual as well as suffering. We have every reason for believing that the moral character of many a man has remained unaltered for the better, down to the latest moment of his life here. Have we any reason, even the slightest, to think that it has been or will be altered after death? A man dies, an unbelieving, depraved, and godless wretch—evincing to the last an utter insensibility to the claims, and a hatred of the moral character of Jehovah. Will that man become humble, and penitent, and trustful, and holy, in the life to come? If he will, where is the proof? We argue from what is past and present to what is to come: we say that what a man is in this life, that it is highly probable he will be in the life to come, and to all eternity. Nay it is certain that he will; for there is not one passage of the Bible which says he shall at some time become an altered being, and be admitted to the state and rewards of the righteous; while there are many which declare that he shall be excluded therefrom. "So that, in this way of conceiving them, the punishments of hell are but the perpetual vengeance that accompanies the sins of hell. An eternity of wickedness brings with it an eternity of woe. So, then, they who start at the disproportion of an eternal punishment to a temporal sin, cannot deny the proportion when the sin and the punishment are alike eternal." The notion of the soul's annihilation we do not entertain any further than to say, that if, as the pleaders for this notion say, "the soul might be annihilated rather than suffer such endless misery," so, too, it might never have existed at all.

We have forbore to criticize those passages of Scripture which are usually adduced to prove the eternity of hell torments. We have forbore to so, because most words translated "eternal," "everlasting," "ever," &c., need not, except the connection in which they are found requires it, mean endless duration. But there is one passage so unambiguous, so unequivocal and plain to the meanest capacity, that we cannot forbear to quote it. We refer to the last verse of the twenty-fifth chapter of St. Matthew's Gospel. In the latter part of that chapter our Lord sketches the last judgment. Having gathered all men before himself as the Judge, having divided them one from another as a shepherd divideth his sheep from the goats, having addressed the two parties, dwelling upon the sins of the one and the graces of the other, he concludes, "And these—the wicked—shall go away into everlasting punishment : but the righteous into life eternal." Now the two words, "everlasting" and "eternal" are, in the original, both alike. The word in both clauses is, aionion. Now the opponents of the doctrine of eternal punishment take the word in its generally received signification when it relates to heaven, but reject this meaning when it refers to hell. But why do they act thus ? For our part, we think that if they take the word to mean endless duration in the one case, they must take it to mean endless duration in the other, unless they can divest us as completely of our common sense as they seem to have divested themselves ; for if zooen aionion means eternal life, why should not kolasin aionion mean eternal punishment ?

The sum is this, that the consequences of sin are penal and not penal ; those which are not are oftentimes of service in the moral improvement of man,—those which are, are present and future : that those which are present may be near to or remote from their causes, "according to the good pleasure of him who worketh all things after the counsel of his own will ;" that the connection between sin and suffering, if not always clear, is always sure ; that the effects of sin may extend themselves personally to body, soul, and circumstances ; relatively to families, generations, and nations ; that the penal effects of sin may still be in operation in a variety of ways after forgiveness ; that the doctrine of endless punishment should be regarded and treated seriously, because of its awfulness, and calmly, because great and good men are divided in opinion about it ; that there is a twofold perplexity in the case, arising on the one hand from the seeming differences in moral character at death, and on the other from the supposed nature and design of evil and the apparent disproportion between the time for sinning and the time for suffering ; that to solve the one difficulty, purgatory,—the other, universal restoration, has been resorted to ; that, nevertheless, purgatory does not help the matter, it only shifts the difficulty from the individual to a class, and from this life to the next ; besides which, it presumptuously pretends to do the work which the atonement cannot do ; that the notion of universal restoration must fall to the ground, because it violates the harmony of certain great and necessarily connective doctrines of revelation,—because its objections, derived from the contrast between the time for sinning and the time for suffering, are removed by an appeal to analogy and fact,—and because, for anything that can be shown to the contrary, man may be a perpetual sinner, and therefore a perpetual sufferer ; that the supposition of annihilation is neutralized by the counter supposition of a no-creation, and that if there is an eternal heaven, it is Scriptural, logical, and rational to conclude that there is also an eternal hell.

We are solemnly convinced that this conclusion is scripturally right. We see ourselves and all our fellow-creatures as sinners—wilful, deliberate sinners. We see before ourselves and them a fearful possibility of sinning and suffering for ever. We see that a soul departing under the power of unbelief and depravity is lost, beyond all recovery lost ! for ever lost ! We behold such a soul writhing beneath self-procured, but Divinely-inflicted, tortures. We descry the scorn, and pride, and remorse, the twisting and struggling of a rebel spirit in the grasp of an infinite and almighty Avenger. But all is unavailing, and that pitiable struggle goes on day and night for ever. This is a dark view of human nature confessedly ; this is an awful shade, impenetrable and cold ; and were there not some rays of light to relieve this more than Egyptian darkness, well might the world be filled with wailing, lamentation, and woe ; but there are, for the "Sun of Righteousness has arisen with healing in his wings." He has "brought life and immortality to light through the Gospel." In him sin finds a remedy, death a master, hell a conqueror, heaven an opener, and man a Saviour. From most of the present, and from all the future consequences of sin, man may be saved through him. And by the light of revelation and of faith we may behold the darkness of the pit from which we have been delivered, only to praise our Deliverer the more. If eternal death is possible, so also is eternal life, and we rest in the Divine asseveration : "As I live, saith the Lord God, I have no pleasure in the death of the wicked ; but that the wicked turn from his way and live."

---

WORKS OF CREATION.

---

THE SEA AND ITS PERILS.

With Brief Sketches of some of our Filey Fishermen who have perished therein.—By the REV. C. KENDALL.

(Concluded from page 156.)

"A perilous life, and sad as life may be,
Hath the lone fisher on the lonely sea ;
In the wild waters labouring, far from home,
For some bleak pittance e'er compelled to roam !
Few friends to cheer him through his dangerous life,
And none to aid him in the stormy strife :
Companion of the sea and silent air,
The lonely fisher thus must ever fare ;
Without the comfort, hope—with scarce a friend,
He looks through life, and only sees the end !"

BARRY CORNWALL.

FILEY is pleasantly situated on the sea coast, about eight miles east of Scarborough. Thirty years ago it was comparatively a small, monotonous village, occupied principally by fishermen and their families. At that time the inhabitants were not characterized by traits of an ennobling or commendable character. Sabbath-breaking, drunkenness, and profane swearing were painfully prevalent. They were, with some exceptions, without God and without hope.

Filey is now much increased in size, and its aspect is quite attractive. There are in it some first-class lodging houses. The names of several of the nobility have recently been found in the list of its visitors. It has been favoured with the residence of Cardinal Wiseman and Earl Russell, besides many other persons of distinction. The permanent population is a little more than two thousand. It has two churches,—one of these is temporary, being built of iron, and capable of locomotion; a Wesleyan chapel, and one of our own: both these are commodious and attractive buildings. It is now forty years since the Primitive Methodists found their way to the village, and after experiencing various vicissitudes, they obtained a footing therein, and the cause has strengthened with the flight of time.

A brief extract, bearing on the introduction of our cause into Filey, from our Connexional history, by Mr. J. Petty, will be acceptable:—“In March, 1823, a great revival took place at Filey, a fishing place of great notoriety. It had frequently been visited by our people, says Mr. Howcroft, and had as frequently been given up without hope of success. But about the beginning of 1823, one soul was awakened by Brother Peart. About a fortnight after, Brother J. Oxtoby paid the place a visit, when a great many more were awakened, and stirred up to seek the Lord. Mr. Oxtoby shortly after returned and spent a few days there, to pray with penitents and direct them to Christ. In this important work he greatly excelled, and numbers soon found peace with God. In the course of a few weeks, forty professed to find the Lord in the house of Mr. and Mrs. Gordon. The inhabitants generally were brought under the influence of Divine impressions, and the church and the Wesleyan chapel were filled with hearers, as well as a large barn occupied by our missionaries. The ale bench was deserted by numbers, who changed the drunkard's song for the song of Zion; and a striking reformation took place in the morals of the people. A good society was established by the Primitive Methodists, which has long been distinguished by the liberal support it renders to the missionary cause.”

The savour of Oxtoby's piety is still felt at Filey. Several persons retain a lively recollection of his fervent prayers, his ardent zeal, his child-like simplicity, and above all, his strong, unwavering faith in God. Some of his children in Christ still remain; these persons find much delight in detailing to the ministers who visit them the achievements Oxtoby wrought through an expert and vigorous wielding of the heavenly weapons with which he was equipped.

John and Ann Jenkinson are familiar names at Filey, and in the station. The latter of these once owned the honourable distinction of Connexional queen of missionary collectors, but another heroine, (Mrs. Gordon, of London,) more intrepid or successful, wrested from her her fading crown. We have heard the Jenkinsons narrate the following remarkable anecdote, and as we believe it is not in print, we doubt not but it will be acceptable to many of our readers. On the other side the street, opposite to Jenkinson's, lived a woman named Elizabeth Ross; she was severely and mysteriously afflicted; indeed, she was bedridden for the long period of seven years. The sinews of her knees were quite fast, and her legs stiff and hard, as though they had not had a joint in them. Oxtoby visited this woman, and prayed with her. After he had prayed with her on one occasion, he addressed her in the following homely style, which was his usual mode of address: "Thou'll get better; the Lord has told me so. Thou'll be able to walk as well as ever thou did, and if thou'll serve the Lord, thou'll never have this affliction again; but if thou don't serve him, it will come to thee again, and thou'll never get better again." It was soon spread through the village that Oxtoby had prophesied Betty Ross's recovery, but this was deemed an utter impossibility. However, from the day Oxtoby said this would be, the sinews and joints of her legs began to grow pliant, and in a short time she was out of bed, active and strong. She could run up and down the cliff with as heavy a load upon her head as any other fisherman's wife in the place. But her attachment to God and his house waning, her complaint returned; she was again confined to bed, where she remained till death released her from her sufferings.*

We know not in what category the reader will place this incident—whether it will be attributed to the power of mesmerism, to the power of imagination, or to sheer accident, or what else; we believe it was effected in answer to prayer—the prayer of faith. God, through his Spirit, intimated his will in this case as he did in many others, to this unpretentious, yet unreservedly consecrated man. To use a homely illustration, Oxtoby, through faith, lived near to heaven's door, and became acquainted with some things of which most persons remained in ignorance.

In Filey Primitive Methodism appears to have progressed gradually, and at no preceding period has it been so strong as now. In 1859 the chapel was made much larger, with a school room at one end. About £500 were expended, and last year about £80 were spent in various improvements, all of which were paid for. A short time before the enlargement, in 1859, the writer was officiating one Sabbath evening, and amongst his auditors was John Crossley, Esq., of Halifax. After the preaching service was concluded, he remained in the prayer meeting, and at its close entered into a very friendly conversation respecting our success and prospects. At this time he was not known to us or to any of our people there. Mr. Crossley expressed much delight in seeing so many seafaring men attend God's house; he had seen nothing to equal it before. At that time the Sabbath school was taught in the chapel; he kindly inquired after the school, and promised a little help, providing we could effect any improvements. When we commenced to enlarge the chapel, we wrote to Mr. C. respecting our design, and he very kindly sent us £10. May he be amply rewarded!

Since last Conference, Filey has been made into a branch of Scarborough Circuit, with two preachers. In Filey we have now about 230 members of society. The Rev. J. Wood, the superintendent, in a note received the other day, says: "We have recently added a considerable number of new members, and formed two or three new classes." Most of the members are fishermen and their families. It is truly edifying to devout minds to mingle with these unsophisticated sons of the ocean; their piety is of a thoroughly genial character; in many respects they constitute a model Primitive Methodist Church. A brief indication of some of the more prominent traits in these devoted men may be interesting.

* A case very similar to this is reported to have occurred in connection with Oxtoby's labours at Emley, in Clayton West Station.—Ed.

Their observance of the Sabbath. On this sacred day no sail is spread, no anchor weighed ; their cobbles and yauls dot the Bay, awaiting the dawn of the day for toil. We hope neither increased love of worldly gain, nor the example of other places possessed of lower moral tone than their own, nor diminished trust in Divine Providence, nor any other cause, will ever induce these men to relax in their observance of the day of the Lord. Indeed, we trust the period is not remote when not only every fisherman, but every sea captain will refuse to weigh anchor on God's day. We are aware that there is a false superstition existing among seamen, that it is lucky to sail on a Sunday. We wish increased light may soon show them that it is never lucky to do wrong. We desiderate the same touching the buying and selling of fish. Let the rich have a less furnished table, and the merchant a more scantily furnished purse, rather than violate God's command and peril immortal souls. The Sabbath was made for higher purposes than these,—to be spent in rest and devotion.

"Let us repose from our care and our sorrow ;
Let all that is anxious and sad pass away ;
The rough cares of life lay aside till to-morrow,
And let us be tranquil and happy to-day."

Their liberality. This is hinted at in the extract given from the Connexional history. This trait is exhibited not only in supporting the missionary cause, but everything associated with the advancement of religion. Their liberality is one effect of their strong confidence in God's providence. They are often wont to subscribe to needy objects in proportion to their success during a given week. Often when settling their weekly accounts is a portion consecrated to some benevolent object. For many years a missionary box, called "The Young Men's Yaul," has come to the missionary meeting well replenished. They know, from pleasing experience, that "Godliness is profitable unto all things."

Their temperance. Seamen are not proverbial for their abstinence from the cup which intoxicates. In every seaport is witnessed the painful sight of seamen, young and old, crowding to houses licensed for the sale of strong drinks ; yet among this class of men are found many noble monuments of strict sobriety. Our Filey fishermen as a whole are quite exemplary in this matter. Drunkenness is little known in the village among the active sea-going portion of the community. Several of our members are total abstainers, and are ready at fitting times, and in a plain, earnest, and prudent manner, to advocate the cause of temperance. Trouble in the Church from intemperance, happily, is a rare occurrence. Doubtless both the men and their families find their account, physically, intellectually, and morally, not to speak of temporal interests, in abstinence from what intoxicates. But space forbids our attempting a full portraiture of each of their commendable characteristics, or we might speak of their firm trust in God's providence, their fervent piety, their lively singing, and their diligent attendance on the means of grace. These things among them are all noteworthy. We hope their growth in all that is good and ennobling will be progressive. Occasionally this little community is afflicted by the accidental drowning of one or more of its number. Then there is general sorrow—a fellow feeling is awakened, and the affliction of one becomes the affliction of all. A brief account of three of our members belonging to Filey who perished a short while before I left the station will be admissible. This notice was promised the friends at the time, but through some inadvertence was not supplied.

Jenkinson Haxby, one of our leaders and local preachers, in company with five others, left Filey, March 29th, 1859, for the purpose of fishing. The same day they held a prayer-meeting on board; an excellent custom, but considering the number of pious men who go to sea, it should be more common. April 1st, when about thirty miles from land, two boats, with three men each, left their yawl about noon to gather in their lines. About four o'clock one boat returned in safety; after waiting awhile, and seeing nothing of the other, the men became alarmed, and went in search of it. They found the boat bottom upwards, and various articles belonging thereto floating near. No man was to be seen, and though reluctant to admit the worst, their judgment told them too truly the poor fellows were gone to the bottom. Solemn fact! the sea had quenched the flame of life previously so vigorous, and buried them in a liquid grave. After lingering awhile in deep distress near the melancholy spot, they tore themselves away, and hastened to carry the afflictive news to their families on shore. The names of the victims were Francis Haxby, and William and Edmond Sayers; the latter were brothers and single.

F. H. was brought to God at a prayer-meeting in the year 1852. He at once joined Brother G. Chew's class, in which he remained till his death. His conduct after he joined society was everything that could be desired. From the hour of his trusting in Christ he sang his praises, confessed his name, and sought the advancement of his cause. He delighted in the means of grace. In the open-air as well as in other circumstances he was not afraid to show to whom he had consecrated himself. He was no bigot, but was warmly attached to the cause with which he was connected, and was never happier than when he heard of its success. Another conspicuous trait in his character was his readiness to speak a word for the Saviour, and to urge those who had begun to serve God to persevere. To his brethren in Christ, in the day of trial, his counsel was "Hold fast!"

He was a man of much prayer. Much as he loved the means of grace, it was in the closet where he poured forth the full emotions of his heart. His prayers were both frequent and earnest. He was accustomed to visit his closet regularly, and would come therefrom rich with heavenly fragrance, like Moses from the mount when he had been communing with God.

The last Sunday he spent on earth he was at class, and there were striking indications that he was ripening for heaven. In narrating his Christian experience he said, "I feel very happy, and intend to land in heaven. I am trying to be holier and holier, happier and happier. I desire to be with Christ—

'I long to be there and the glory to share,' " &c.

His brother Jenkinson says:—"The night before the accident occurred he was engaged as usual in secret, and at the prayer-meeting the day before he prayed with unusual fervency." He left a wife and three children to mourn over their great loss.

Respecting the brothers Sayers, Brother Isaac Ross says, "They had been members of my class about fifteen months; their attendance was regular, and I believe they enjoyed the power of religion; no doubt our loss is their infinite gain." The religious experience of these two brethren was not so fully indicated nor so diversified as that of many Christians. The lustre of many a precious gem is obscured by outward incrustations, and the sterling qualities of many a genuine disciple of Christ are not unfrequently undervalued when seen through the medium of unprepossessing accompaniments. If we mistake not, this was the case, at least, to some extent with the brothers Sayers.

Mental temperament, native intellect, and education impress mankind, both in the world and the church, with an interesting variety of character, but we should not forget that God looks not on outward peculiarities, but on the heart.

Brother J. Haxby says:—"The night before the accident which terminated those valuable lives, Brother William Sayers prayed as I had never heard him before; and among other requests petitioned to be made fit for the heavenly granary." What a blessed exercise is prayer! We trust it will become general on sea and land. These three brethren, much loved in the circle of their families, and in their place of residence, may be said to have died prematurely, yet they neither lived nor died in vain.*

"On life's rough sea their shattered bark was driven;
It foundered in the deep, but all's insured in heaven."

Early were they called from life's struggles to perpetual rest. Though so suddenly drowned they are not lost. The sea is a vast burying-place; the ashes of myriads of our race sleep in its coral tomb, or among its shining pearls, awaiting the archangel's trump to call them up. The fate of empires, in bloody strife, has been decided on the bosom of the ocean. Here the Persian and the Greek, the Roman and the Ottoman, the Spaniard and the Gaul, and the hardy sons of the British Isles sleep their last, long sleep, and—

"The battle's thunder will not break their rest."

The thrifty fishermen, countless numbers who go down to the sea in the peaceful pursuits of commerce, or for health or pleasure, or who make it their highway to a new home, find their graves in its sunless depths. Yes, there are richer treasures there than

"Wedges of gold, great anchors, heaps of pearls, Inestimable stones, unvalued jewels,
All scattered in the bottom of the sea;"— for there repose many of our race, saints of God and heirs of immortality. The sea will not be required to give any account of the gold and jewels sealed up in its coffers, but of the relics of the dead now in its grasp a full account will have to be rendered: these will be claimed, and must be surrendered. Loved ones who go down to the sea, and return not to bless their families—whose departure through death's valley is sudden and unattended with the tears and blessings of their friends, even many of these shall be found in a condition of consummated happiness, where—

"No more to part,
Soul springs to soul, and heart unites to heart."

The imminent perils involved in a seafaring life should constrain seamen, in the absence of higher motives, to live prepared for death. While all men are obligated to be prepared for dissolution, as we know not what shall be on the morrow, yet unusual danger should sharpen our caution. "Be ye also ready, for in such an hour as ye think not the Son of Man cometh." Eleven out of every sixteen seamen, it is said, perish by accident. This statistical fact speaks loudly to the living. A little girl speaking of those men who work in powder mills, remarked that the danger is so great, such men should be converted; she next spoke of another dangerous vocation, and said the workmen should be prepared to die. She then paused, and as though suddenly struck with the uncertainty of human life, remarked, life is so frail and uncertain, all persons, whatever be their station, should be prepared to die. The sailor may see death by his side in the rising billow, and hear it in the whistling wind; and there is not, when busy plying his vocation, more than a few inches of wood between him and dissolution. Had we the eye or ear of every seafarer, we would earnestly, yet tenderly cry, "Prepare to meet your God."

* Some of these statements are taken from Rev. G. Shaw's MS. sermon, preached on occasion of the death of these brethren.—C. K.

Special efforts should be put forth to lead seamen to Christ. Their bodies are not only exposed to great danger, but their souls too. As a class of men they are healthy and generous, but their long confinement at sea and seclusion from society, produce reaction when they arrive on shore; and whatever lessons they may have learned, while on the ocean, of God's power, and of man's impotent, helpless state, are too often soon forgotten amid the excitement and diversions which they find on shore. Besides there are always crimps and sundry human vultures hovering near the resorts of seamen, seeking to make them the victims of their selfishness or lust. Should not the sailor's moral dangers prompt us to do our best to pluck his soul from the pit of woe? He has a strong claim on the sympathies of God's people. There are now many laudable and benevolent means projected to rescue him from physical death in the hour of danger—the lifeboat for instance—and let such means be increased in number and efficiency; but we must not overlook the greater danger of the soul. Much has been done latterly to meet the spiritual wants of this class of men. Witness our Bethels, Sailors' Institutes, and Missions; the religious press and the Bible Society especially are doing much for them. The temperance principle would do much for them if they would firmly embrace it. What moral dangers would this destroy! what vice would it prevent! We hope to see it more widely diffused among them. We consider the American authorities have set a good example in this respect in disallowing rations of strong drink in their naval service. Much prayer should be offered for those who go down to the sea in ships. The annals of the Church, found in the religious literature of the age, show that many a threatening calamity has been averted and many a signal deliverance experienced through Divine interposition, vouchsafed in answer to prayer. Such men as Captain Hindson, of Hull, can substantiate this statement. Those who heard him give an account of the remarkable deliverance of himself and men in the recent wreck of the "Yarborough," will not soon forget the thrilling narrative. During the last November gale, which was so violent on the north-eastern coast of our island, Filey fishermen were considered much favoured. Poor Brother Walley, a member, and friend Jenkinson, one of our missionary collectors, and husband of one of our members, perished, and perhaps one or two others; but considering the character of the storm and their frail vessels, the wonder is that the destruction was not more general. Had prayer nothing to do with this deliverance? He who holds the winds in his fist, and stills the raging of the sea, can accomplish deliverance when the seaman is at his wit's end. The sailor's wife should plead for her husband away in the scene of danger; the howling winds should summon her to her knees. The mother tossed on her sleepless pillow through anxious thought of him who is "in perils in the sea," should breathe her fervent aspirations to the mercy-seat. She gave him wholesome advice whilst with her, and the Bible at parting as a legacy; and God may give her his soul, if not his body, in answer to her pleading.

"Give them the Book Divine,
Heaven's chart so full and free,
That beacon 'mid the foaming brine,
That polestar o'er the sea!"

The many seamen that have been led to Christ should strengthen our faith, and stimulate our zeal for the future. On many a fishing smack or yawl, and merchant's vessel, the Sabbath is revered, God's praises are sung, and prayer is regularly offered. The aggregate of converted seamen is said to be about twenty thousands. These are so many missionaries of the cross; they will do something to redeem the British name from that odium which now, to some extent, in some lands attaches to it. Those thousands are at least lights of the ocean, and sail on its bosom with a conviction that should this mortal life be snatched from them, that they shall arrive in heaven. Happy conviction! glorious destiny!

Let each of our readers bear in mind that life is a voyage to all. We are sailing over a tempestuous ocean to the shore of eternity. "If Christ be our pilot, hope our anchor, humility our ballast, the Spirit's influences our gales, heavenly graces and evangelical works our cargo, we shall reach the port," where—

"I long to talk with grateful tongue of storms and perils past,
And praise the mighty Pilot that hath steered us through the rapids."—

TUPPER.

FOR PREACHERS AND CLASS-LEADERS.

DR. MASON'S RULES FOR SERMONIZING.

1. Go to the bottom of your subject, and think of everything that ought to be said upon it, and consider what points or parts of it your hearers would be glad to have cleared up, or most enlarged upon. To skim off only the surface, is to put off your audience with froth. The weightiest sentiments often lie at the bottom; be at the pains, then, of diving deeply to bring them up from thence. On the other hand,—

2. Take care you do not torture your subject by aiming to exhaust it. Don't endeavour to say everything that can be said, but everything that ought to be said upon it. A preacher's excellence is seen, not so much in saying a great deal upon a text, as saying the best things in the best manner.

3. Don't crowd your thoughts too thickly. This will but fatigue and perplex the minds of your hearers, who should always have time to follow you. If you pour water too fast into the funnel, it will run over.

4. Protract not your discourse to an undue length. The best sentiments will not be attended to, whilst your hearers are impatiently waiting and wishing for the conclusion. It were better to offend by the other extreme, provided your matter be solid, well disposed, and well digested. Better leave your audience longing than loathing. Abstinence is less hurtful than repletion. I think Luther says, in his Table Talk, that "one necessary qualification of a preacher, is to know when to leave off."

Sent by W. NORRIS.

SKILL IN SOUL-SAVING.

A PROUD, passionate sinner once moved into the neighbourhood of a devoted minister, and began a career of sin which grieved the good, and increased the boldness of the wicked. His avowed purpose to insult any clergyman who should presume to address him, kept the minister from calling upon him at once, but did not prevent him from prayerfully watching for an opportunity.

This came sooner than he expected. The blaspheming sinner was struck down by severe sickness. "I will see him," said the minister.

"If you do he will insult you," said the friend who had informed him of the man's sickness.

"I will see him, nevertheless, and look to God for guidance and blessing," replied the minister.

Accordingly he called, and was shown into a parlour, where he found the sick man lying on an old sofa. With great kindness he asked after his health, and received curt, almost uncivil replies. Then, without saying one word of his own respecting religion, he opened his Bible and said :

"If you please, I will read to you."

Without waiting for a reply, he proceeded to read the words of Jesus in the fifteenth chapter of Luke, after which he offered a short, simple prayer, bade the man farewell, and left.

The next day he called again, read the fifty-third chapter of Isaiah, prayed, and left as before. This was repeated several days. Kindness, appropriate selections from the Word of God, prayer, in which the minister carefully classed himself with the sick man as needing mercy, and secret prayer for God's blessing, were the only weapons he employed. Now mark the result !

After two weeks the sick man broke down, grasped the minister's hands, wept, confessed himself a sinner, and said he was a wonder to himself.

"It is of God," replied the minister ; "I have not spoken a word. God has spoken. He has done this."

"Yes," said the man, "I see it now. If you had spoken a single word of your own to me when first you came, or for some time after, I would not have borne it. Weak as I was, I should have tried to turn you out of my house. I was astonished at your daring to come to me. You took me by surprise. I could not be angry when you asked with such kind voice after my health. You read me those beautiful words. I knew they were not your own words, but God's own words, and I was silent. You shut the book, and I thought you would begin to reproach me and tell me what a sinful wretch I was, and then would be my time to speak ; but I looked up and saw you on your knees, and heard you praying for me, and then, without another word you were gone."

It is enough to add that this chief among sinners was soon after converted, and after a few weeks of beautiful devotedness to Jesus, passed through the gates of the grave crying victory through the blood of the Lamb.

That this sinner was pulled out of the burning by the skill, as well as the fidelity of the minister, is placed beyond all doubt by the testimony of the man himself. Faithfulness alone would not have succeeded, but faithfulness joined to skill, did the work. Let the worker for souls study this fact carefully, as illustrating the philosophy of soul-saving. Perhaps it may give him light on the cause of his own lack of success. He has, it may be, a desire to do good ; he labours with sinners patiently, he utters truth in their ears, he depends on the Spirit for success, but he has no evidences of his success. Why? He lacks skill, tact, wisdom. He is not wise to win souls. He needs to study human nature more closely. Give him skill in addition to his present qualities, and he would “slay his thousands” for the Lord.

Look well to this point, dear fellow-labourer for Christ, and may the Holy Ghost make you “wise to win souls.”—Zion's Herald.

FOR THE FAMILY.

A WORD UPON FRETTING.

To fret is to fray out. A garment ravelled at the edges is frayed, or in other words fretted. So human life may be like the apparel we put on. When you say a man looks worn you have the same idea. Day by day little events worry and wear the delicate edges of the human heart. To have a capacity of being fretted in our constitution proves that we are still men of feeling; not blunted in sensibility, but with that sensibility, perhaps, o'er sensitive.

Our Father in heaven gives us kind counsel when he says to each of us, “Fret not thyself;” and by the strength of the principle of faith he provides a means of deliverance from fretting. For the secret of this malady is in this—Want of faith in that God who is present to overrule the minute as well as the mighty matters of human life.

Do not fray yourself out then; for, to take the lowest ground, to fret is useless; fretting never repaired the broken vase, nor replaced the lost watch, nor restored the scattered fortune, nor recalled the spoken word. So far from being a useful state of mind—as repentance is—fretting positively hampers and hinders us; it weakens what little power we have left, and quenches altogether the smouldering fire of hope. It hinders our usefulness; for if we do become active in any capacity our activity has none of Hezekiah's heartiness in it, who “did it with all his heart, and prospered.”

It hinders also our happiness. Great troubles, like great storms, are severe and sharp, and over! But fretting is like the drizzling sleet which beats in upon you at all points, and lasts through the long, long hours. Nothing can be appreciated by a spirit so ill at ease. There is no peace within. And think how it hinders health. Anxiety makes appetite fail, and earnestness flag. We become at last like some drooping flower that nothing seems to restore, because there is deep down beneath the soil a small worm, eating out the very centre of our heart's core.

Neither can any excuse be pleaded for our special selves; because all might fret if they were to give in to the feeling. Each man you meet has been disappointed in many things, and had his hopes blighted in some of his dearest desires. If all indulged in the melancholy of this minor key, what a sad sound would fill the world!

And think of the ingratitude of it. Do we believe that a kind Father is working all things, not only wisely, but kindly? all for our good; and that he is expending time and thought upon the plan of our individual life? To fret is to be ingrates towards him whom we believe to be lovingly interested in all that appertains to his children. We may be sure that he who gave us his only Son, will not withhold from us any good thing.

I feel sure, too, that it is one of the most common sins. And I do not shrink from the expression sin!—common to us all. Little circumstances chafe us. And what an influence they have upon our meditations and our prayers! How disturbed is that serene atmosphere in which the soul would else rest in the Lord, and wait patiently upon him!

There are various remedies for this fretting, if we will but deign to try them. One is, looking back—simple retrospection—how the most unlikely things have worked out, even in this world, beneficent results. How we learn, even here, to say, It is well. Jacob said, “All these things are against me;" and yet in the time of famine, even in his experience it was true, All these things are for me. And if we keep the promises of the Saviour before us, especially those which teach us that through much tribulation, or many troubling things, we must enter the kingdom of heaven, we shall learn patience and resignation to the end.

Why should not our peace flow like a river? This it would do if we took the stones out of the brook—these break the waters; these fret the tranquil current of the stream of life. Fret not thyself! Perhaps there is only one mosquito. Oh, traveller, that is all enough. One little worry every day will soon wear you down. Therefore try and rid yourself of each cause for fretfulness as it tries to make itself a home in the human heart.

It is easy to see that fretting is different from legitimate Christian grief: the mind, like the body, can better bear strong agonies than slow and lingering tortures; we again regain our mental elasticity after the former, we lose it by the latter. Bend the spring double, yet it will rebound to its old place; keep it for a long time in the same depressed state, and it will not altogether regain its strength. Now, fretting is a condition of mind in which trouble unstrings us: consequently, we are the easy subjects of depression and vexation.

Above all, remember it is GOD who says, Fret not thyself. And as the mother hushes the fretful child, and wipes its tears away, till over the April countenance comes sunshine again, blending beautifully with showers, so we may rest in the Lord.

"Commit thou all thy griefs
And ways into his hands."

It is marvellous what an amount of work man and beast can do if they are not fretted. Whip, whip, whip, stoppage, stoppage, stoppage, and the poor horse is in the knacker's yard, when otherwise he had been free to work and ready for the yoke.

You will say, this is asking impossible conditions; that we are all subjected to vexatious hindrances and harassing conditions of life, specially in an age where in every grade and profession of life mind and muscle are strained to the utmost. To a great extent this is true: but it is still more true that "as our day our strength shall be," and if our day has great trials, it exceeds others in its great reliefs. Suffer me in closing this brief paper to point to the tranquil life of the Son of God. No chafing of spirit; no conflict of will was there in Him; yet who is there but must feel

"His way was much rougher and darker than mine—Did Christ my Lord suffer, and shall I repine?"

Being like him, we shall enjoy "his peace;" and our influence on others will be tranquillizing also. In all fretfulness there is much of selfishness, and salvation aims to deliver us from self. May others see in us some faint reflection of that Divine Original, of whom all human character is but the imperfect copy—that blessed Saviour who says to us all, "Be of good cheer."

Any one possessed of delicate feeling will grieve over the fact that so much of the fretful worry of life is to be seen on every hand. Perhaps more in city life than country life. I incline to the idea that fresh air, and free scope, and quiet surroundings do much to promote peacefulness of spirit, especially amongst the poor. What wonder, my friend, that the pastoral visit you paid to the poor woman in the back street, with a large family, slender means, a cooped-up dwelling, and a sottish husband,—I say, what wonder that she frets so, because she has so much of work, and worry too? Let us be very chary of reproof to her, and very anxious to bring home to her heart the words of him who said, "Let not your heart be troubled."

One cannot pass from this subject without thinking with disgust of some who can witness the worry of others—ay, and promote it, too—without a sense of regret. Doubtless, dear reader, you have known such. Men who dine and dress extravagantly, and leave others at home to the anxious arrangements and the careful meeting of the ends; the one face fair and florid, the other pinched and pale.

Whilst thus trying to teach the avoidance of fretting, let us remember nothing kills so soon. By it many a preacher has had paralysis, and many a mother shortened her day of life. Dear reader, try and smooth the wrinkles on the brow of anxiety. This is the best way to enamel the face, and it is not so costly as in a recent celebrated case. Who does not like to see men and women suddenly becoming young again? And who has not seen this when some causes of fretfulness have been removed?

I do not envy the man who is unmoved by the little worries of his friends; who thinks them foolish and feeble folk to be troubled about such small affairs. He evidently knows little of the human heart if he imagines a strong will can quench its trifling troubles. Little sparks are fire, little prickles are thorns; and when the one keeps constantly falling, and the other continually piercing, they are very trying to flesh and blood.

And after all nothing will do but the Gospel. Christianity is for common life. Christ is with us always. To convince others of his sympathy and pity, his presence and providence, will do more to quiet the feverish pulse of the worried heart than all else beside.

I intended to close this article by reminding my readers that great men have not been above the influence of petty troubles; they have been fretted by very small droppings of water. Rowland Hill, if he had uttered any statement in the pulpit which might be perverted to evil purpose, had a disturbed night; and many a man, whose outward placidity you envy is inwardly the prey to petty vexations.

I know that John leaned his head on the bosom of Jesus; I know that confidence made him restful there. I know too that this Saviour is mine as well as John's. Let us all so strive to rest in the Lord, for he understands our feeble clay—he knows, that being but dust, we are moved by a breath of trouble as well as by a storm of grief. Fret not about the dead in Christ; they are happier far than we who weep beneath the willow of their memories. Fret not about the living, be earnest in purpose, and fervent in prayer, and leave the rest to the unerring will of God.

"Fret not thyself!" It is the voice of thy Father, and thou canst not err in obeying it. If thou art needy, it were well to consider the lilies how they grow; if hungry, to consider the ravens how they are fed: if distracted by opposition in the path of duty, to "consider him who endured such contradiction of sinners against himself, lest ye be wearied, and faint in your minds;" above all, to consider the promise, "weeping may endure for a night, but joy cometh in the morning."

"Sometimes a light surprises
The Christian when he sings,
It is the Lord who rises
With healing in his wings;
When comforts are declining,
He grants the soul again
A season of clear shining,
To cheer it after rain."

W. M. STATHAM.

THE HYGIENE OF CHILDHOOD AND YOUTH.

THE diet of childhood and youth should possess a progressively increasing character of animality. This is the period of life above all others fitted for the active interference of hygiene and education, and which will afford the most abundant results. It is now that we are called on to guide the process of the development of all the powers, both physical, moral, and intellectual; to seek solidity of structure, energy of action in all organs, and consequently a vigorous and durable execution of every function. And this is a business in itself sufficiently important to engross a very great share of attention, and that demands the most active solicitude. On its faithful execution, too, much of all the future health, happiness, usefulness and even longevity of the individual hinges. Of course, the brief practical notes to which we must be confined in this paper cannot be supposed to treat the subject at all as it deserves. They are intended more as guides, to be developed by reflection and further inquiry. The fundamental law for our direction is, to seek to equalize the evolution of every organ and part of the body, and every principle of the mind, within the bounds prescribed by nature as limits to the powers of this period. Where any excess of action and development in any part prevails, be it the brain producing mental precocity, or any other organ, our object must be to divert the exuberant force towards some other system or function; and where any organ or set of organs is debarred its proper share of force or magnitude, that should be the seat towards which our corroborant exertions must be directed. This is the time of growth, which occasionally proceeds too rapidly, and induces an excitement and even fever of the system, that requires to be allayed by mild measures. When no such signs of excessive action appear, the necessities of the system require a generous diet, which, however, should be entirely free from fermented drinks. Such potations are totally unsuited to the nervous excitability and quick circulation of youth, and cannot be taken frequently or extensively without inducing irremediable disease, and an abbreviation of life.

Exercise, to which young persons are impelled by an irresistible impulse, should receive every proper encouragement, and should be so guided as to bring every limb and muscle into action. Sedentary positions should not be too long continued, and occupations and games, which call forth merely the partial action of one set of muscles, should only be indulged in to a certain extent. These, as they excite particular muscles into inordinate action and consequent tone, whilst they enfeeble their antagonists and absorb their share of nutrition, are the most fertile source of deformities during the pliancy of youth. Pursuits and pastimes should be devised to counteract the effects of such partial exercises; and, as these are intended to invigorate the body, they should not be carried too far, which would lead to fatigue or debility. The open air should, as far as possible, be the common scene of all active exercises, as this affords most abundantly one of the chief aliments of the body. And besides, it yields us the great means for that portion of physical education which relates to the fitting of the frame to bear atmospherical vicissitudes with impunity. The period of robust vigour and excitement is the only one in which this object can be attempted to be accomplished with a probability of success, or even with freedom from danger.

Perhaps there is no branch of hygiene more imperfectly understood than this hardening of the constitution, and imparting to it the power of active resistance. Rash and unwise steps taken to effect this object are the frequent sources of disease and death, especially amongst very young children. In fact, in subjects like these, where the vital energies are so feeble, nearly all our efforts must be directed towards defence against atmospherical extremes and vicissitudes. The resistance must in this case be passive, for if we seek to overcome, the result may not unreasonably be expected to be a fatal discomfiture. When, however, the youthful age shall have arrived, attended with its rapid and energetic circulation, which enlarges the body at every pulsation, instinctively forcing on us an activity that cannot be repressed, when the animal temperature is high, and attached to the body with greater tenacity, where digestion and the other functions of animal life are carried on with vigour; active exercise, in a cool and bracing atmosphere, plunging into a cold bath, cold shower-baths, and so forth, may be commenced under these two regulations:—First, that they must not be applied except when the body is in an agreeable state of energy, temperature, and activity; and, secondly, that they must be intermitted before any decided feelings of depression and fatigue are produced, or, in the case of bathing, when it fails to produce a comfortable glow after its use. By persevering in an occasional exposure to these shocks till the meridian of life, a troublesome morbid irritability of the cutaneous system may be prevented or remedied, and the best safeguard raised against the unavoidable changes and extremes of temperature to which our variable climate exposes us. To pursue the moral and intellectual education of youth is not embraced in our plan. These subjects are, we rejoice exceedingly in saying it, absorbing a larger scope of attention every day, and means are and will be devised for carrying them forward to an extent not hitherto conceived of. Amongst these means, we would especially celebrate for certain classes, mechanics' institutions, and schools of art.

J. R. DAVIS, M.D.

POETRY.

A MOTHER'S DREAM.

I HAD a dream, amid a night of weeping,
 So bright and fair!
 It seem'd as though an angel watched my sleeping,
 And soothed me there:
 Upon my fever'd cheek the tear-drop dried,
 And thoughts of joy the place of grief supplied.
 I thought my tears had swell'd into an ocean,
 Briny and deep;
 And I upon its waves, with gentle motion,
 Was rock'd to sleep;
 Then visions of such glory thrill'd my heart,
 As calm'd its throbbings, and relieved its smart.
 "Jerusalem the true," I then beheld thee,
 With mansions fair,
 And bless'd the hand in pity that unveil'd thee
 To my despair:
 I gazed on everlasting hills and plains,
 Where youth and greenness dwells, and beauty reigns.
 I heard a sound like rush of many waters,
 So loud and clear!
 The harpings of earth's ransom'd sons and daughters,
 Transported here:
 As o'er the sea of glass they mov'd along,
 I heard their notes above the angels' song.
 There was no sun within that land of brightness,
 But cloudless day,
 That seem'd too fair in its transparent whiteness,
 For mortal clay.
 But what are light, and melody, and gold,
 Compared to what the inner heavens unfold!
 I stood bewildered, dimly but discerning
 A great white throne,
 And Him that sat thereon, with radiance burning,
 The glorious One

Angels stood round Him, and before Him low'd,
 In blood-wash'd robes, a saint and martyr crowd.
 Oh! know ye not the instinct of a mother,
 It wavers not;
 Think not, though heaven's own glories shine above her,
 She has forgot.
 A band of infant harpers passing by
 In robes of snowy whiteness fix'd my eye.
 Yes, they were there—the buds of my affection,
 For whom I wept;
 Yes, they were there, for whom, in deep dejection,
 Long watch I kept.
 My beautiful! transplanted in their bloom,
 More beauteous now than in their earthly home.
 I saw them there—those eyes that ached with weeping,
 With joy ran o'er,
 To see those loved ones in their Saviour's keeping
 On that bright shore:
 Amid the fadeless flowers that strew'd their way,
 No fragrant blossom seem'd so sweet as they.
 I could not speak their language, happy spirits!
 Though felt so near:
 I could but gaze on what each now inherits,
 With holy fear.
 But by their upward eyes and raptured song,
 I knew they praised the Lamb with heart and tongue.
 How distant seem'd the time when they lay dying
 Upon my breast!
 How far, far past appear'd all pain and sighing,
 Now 'mid the blast!

How strange the mem'ry of my mourning years,
While viewing them, so bless'd, in brighter spheres!

I woke from that sweet dream; no desolation
O'erwhelmed me now.

No more uncheer'd woke Rachel's lamentation

For babes laid low.

I would not call them back, though sad and lone,

But haste to follow where my babes are gone.

ANON.

THE SABBATH SCHOOL.

ON TEACHING SCRIPTURE.

From "The Silent Temple," a New Year's Address to Sabbath School Teachers, by William H. Groser, F.G.S.

Scripture is to be TAUGHT. I have compared the Sabbath School teacher to a builder, and the comparison holds good in many particulars. Thus, the qualifications of a builder are, a knowledge of the materials to be used; a knowledge of the tools to be employed; and an acquaintance with the right method of using these tools.

Let us see to it, then, first that we understand the nature of the material upon which we are to work. In other words, we must understand the mind and heart of a child. What kind of crops would that agriculturist obtain who had never studied the composition and influence of different soils? and what kind of buildings would he raise, who knew nothing of building stones, brick, or timber? How can we expect to deal skilfully with that most wonderful of all materials—youthful mind—if we are ignorant of its nature and properties? There is nothing so exquisitely delicate, so easily injured, as the character of a child; like the sensitive plate of the photographer, it receives the impress of every line and spot of the image presented to it. The rough blasts of the world have not as yet rendered the youthful nature hard and callous, and it yields to every influence, good or bad. What a material to entrust to ignorant heads and unskilful hands!

The teacher who would understand children must be willing to become a child himself. Let him endeavour to recal his own early thoughts and feelings; let him mark the influences by which his pupils are surrounded; let him watch their tastes and pursuits, listen to their common conversation, and interest himself in their pastimes. Let the preceptor be merged in the companion and friend. Were teachers to act thus, many lamentable errors of instruction and management would be avoided.

We should ever bear in mind the educational standing of our class. Different grades require different modes of treatment. Truth must be presented to infants in a different form from that which elder scholars demand. The mental and moral powers are developed at various times, and unless our instruction be wisely adapted to this progressive development, we shall blunder sadly in our attempts to inculcate Scripture truth. There is, first, the perceptive age, when our teaching must appeal to the senses; when these truths must be presented in pictures and other visible objects. Then follows the conceptive age, when imagination and fancy begin to hold sway, and when we may teach by word-pictures and easy parables. This leads on to the reflective age, when the boy or girl is able to reflect and reason, and is therefore prepared to receive Biblical instruction of a more advanced character, and to understand the evidences of Christianity.

In like manner, the moral history of childhood may be divided into the age of sympathy, when duty must be taught through the affections; the age of approbation, when the desire to please the parent or teacher may be fitly appealed to; and the age of conscience, when duty is to be performed for duty's sake.

Of the second qualification—a knowledge of the tools to be employed—I have already spoken. The third—an acquaintance with the right method of using these tools—is one upon which our attention cannot be too frequently concentrated.

These are not days when the spiritual builder can afford to be ignorant of the rules and principles of his art. Every counteragency which our enemies can employ to draw young hearts astray is eagerly seized and vigorously worked. Fellow-teachers, look around on the theatres, casinos, dancing saloons, and music halls, of our cities and large towns, and then ask yourselves if this is a time when we can safely presume to dispense with any means by which our instructions may be rendered more attractive and influential.

Allow me to call your attention to a few principles and rules, the neglect of which, it is to be feared, often seriously impairs the effectiveness of Sabbath school teaching, and is a source of perplexity and discouragement to the young and inexperienced worker.

1. Realize the necessity of special preparation for each lesson you have to impart. Your teaching, as a whole, has one great object—to lead the scholars to the Saviour; but each lesson has its own particular work to accomplish. Before meeting your class, therefore, clearly determine what your special object on that occasion shall be. Unless the mark be distinctly seen, your aim will be confused and unsteady.

2. Let singleness of purpose characterize each lesson. Many young teachers, who realize the force of the apostolic motto, "This one thing I do," in relation to Christian life, seem to have no idea of carrying it out in the giving of Bible lessons. Yet there can be little doubt that the best plan of teaching is to select some one practical truth, suited to the age and circumstances of the learners, and make it the chief object to bring home that truth to their consciences and hearts. This will not exclude, but rather involve, the enforcement of other subordinate truths; and it will tend to impart point and power to each Sabbath's exercises. The Great Teacher seems to have taught thus, if we may judge from the parables which have been recorded for our learning. Each divine story appears to have been intended to set forth one special doctrine, around which minor lessons are clustered, like planets around their sun. What other model would a wise Christian teacher desire to follow?

3. In every lesson let adaptation be carefully sought. Scripture truth is presented for your use chiefly in the form of narrative. In this the wisdom of its Author is conspicuously displayed, for, had it been otherwise, the Bible could never have been the children's book. Yet we must never lose sight of the fact that the inspired narratives are embodiments of great moral and spiritual truths—truths which it is our office to educe and expound to the youth under our care.

But Scripture is many-sided, and each of the passages which we are called to teach is capable of being viewed under various aspects. Hence we are enabled to adapt the same Bible story to scholars of various grades; and it is most important that we should make use of our knowledge of childhood to inculcate those practical truths which each successive age may require. Thus, if the Fall of Man be the subject, the duty of resisting the beginning of temptation might be the central truth selected by a Scripture class teacher; while the Infant class might more advantageously be taught the sad consequences of disobedience. In other cases, special circumstances may dictate the choice of a leading truth. But the selection should be made as soon as the teacher has fairly grasped the leading features of the narrative appointed for the occasion.

4. Let your lesson-preparation be accurate. "Writing maketh an exact man;" and if you would enjoy the comfort of "clear-headedness" in your class work, do not grudge the trouble of making written notes of every lesson. Whether or not these are taken into the school, they will, if rightly prepared, contribute much to the effectiveness of your instructions. The teacher who goes into his class without such preparation, having only a vague idea of the course which his lesson will take, will too often find his experience resemble that of the Welsh minister, who informed his diocesan, before whom he had been preaching, that when he entered the pulpit, he often did not know what he was going to say. "I am not surprised to hear that," replied the bishop; "for the people tell me they do not know what you have said, when you have done." Let every lesson be prepared in the spirit of the celebrated Sir Joshua Reynolds, who never began a picture without a determination to make it his best. Pains-taking is far more than an equivalent for talent. Careless talent will reap only failure, while diligent mediocrity will be crowned with success. Let every offering which we presume to lay upon the Divine altar be made, so far as our humble efforts extend, "without blemish and without spot."

5. Let each lesson be methodically arranged. It is a fact in physics, that all natural agencies which act upon bodies from a distance act in straight lines. This is a property which should characterize our Bible lessons. Having selected our focus, all parts of the lesson should be made to tend as directly as possible towards that point. How may this be done?

Mr. Collins, in his "Teacher's Companion," remarks that the beginning of the lesson should arrest the attention; the middle inform the understanding; the end affect the heart. In other words, there will be an Introduction, by which interest is excited, attention gained, and the minds of the pupils brought under control. The Exposition follows, in which the facts of the appointed passage are explained and illustrated, and its leading and subordinate doctrines elicited. The exercise is closed by a practical Application, in which the conscience and heart are sought to be affected, and a cordial reception of Divine truth affectionately urged.

6. Questions and illustrations should characterize every lesson. Much will depend on the teacher's ability to question with skill, and illustrate in a forcible and appropriate manner. Questions serve to exercise the pupil's mind, without which attention will flag, and no true process of education be carried on. They also serve to test the extent of the pupil's knowledge, and to ascertain how much has been really learned. Their place is therefore chiefly in the second or middle portion of a lesson, leading the scholars to the discovery of truth, and then serving to gauge the extent of their required information. Illustrations are of value in all parts of a lesson, if not too profusely used. In the Introduction they arrest the attention; in the Exposition they will be found the illuminators of truth, rendering it clearer to the perception, and fixing it more deeply in the memory.

The Dean of Westminster has forcibly remarked, that "the aim of the teacher who would find his way to the hearts and understandings of his hearers, will never be to keep down the parabolic element in his teaching, but rather to make as much and as frequent use of it as he can." How eminently illustrative the teachings of our Lord were, no reader of these pages will need to be reminded. "He gave no doctrine in an abstract form, no skeletons of truths, but all clothed, as it were, with flesh and blood. He did as he declared his apostles must do if they would be scribes instructed unto the kingdom, and able to instruct others. He brought forth out of his treasure things new and old; by the help of the old he made intelligible the new; by the aid of the familiar he introduced that which was strange; from the known he passed more easily to the unknown. And in his own manner of teaching, and in his instructions to his apostles, he has given us the secret of all effectual teaching, of all speaking which shall leave behind it, as was said of the eloquence of Pericles, stings in the minds and memories of the hearers."

7. Let the application be prepared with especial care. No part of a religious address is so frequently marred and weakened as the application. It is the crisis of the lesson—the point upon which the whole turns, and the influence of which may last throughout eternity. The scholars themselves should be led to draw out the practical truth which it is the teacher's object to enforce—thus following the method of the Great Teacher in the parables of the Two Debtors, the Good Samaritan, &c. The teacher's words should be simple, brief, pointed, earnest, and affectionate; rich in the eloquence of heartfelt conviction. No assumed fervour will avail here; the fire must come down from the heavenly altar, not be a product of artificial excitement. Let no

Christian teacher go forth to do his Master's work, ere, like the prophet, he has stretched forth his hands in prayer, and received the promised blessing. Then, with well-stored mind and glowing heart, let him meet the young ones whose souls await the impress of his own, and "expect great things from God;" for in every act of faithful service, may we not say, with the dying Wesley, "The best of all is, God is with us!"

CONNEXIONAL INTELLIGENCE.

HOME DEPARTMENT.

EWLOE, CHESTER STATION.—On Lord's Day, October 12th, 1862, we opened a new chapel at this place, when sermons were preached by Brothers J. Eastwood, J. Postlethwaite, and E. Kershaw. One soul found salvation in the prayer meeting at the close of the evening service. The services were continued on the following Sabbath, when sermons were preached by Brothers J. Williams and R. Carter. The collections amounted to £5 15s. 9½d.; collected by cards, subscriptions, and the profits of two tea meetings, £39: total, £44 15s. 9½d. Mr. W. Hughes, of Queen's Ferry, has made a handsome pulpit, and fixed it in the chapel at his own expense, for which the trustees tender their sincere thanks. The chapel is 32 feet by 22, and 13 feet from the floor to the wall plate; is well lighted, and fitted up with ten pews on an elevated floor: and will cost (including £24 paid for land) £126 10s. 0d. The inhabitants in the neighbourhood seem highly pleased with the accommodation now afforded them for meeting to worship God, as there is no other place of worship within about a mile, and we trust that much lasting good may result from the rearing of this house of prayer, and our ardent prayer is, "Peace be within thy walls." J. EASTWOOD.

SOUTH KELSRY, BRIGG STATION.—More than forty years ago the pioneers of Primitive Methodism entered the village, and sang in the streets—

"Turn to the Lord and seek salvation," and preached "the glorious Gospel of Christ." They obtained a cottage, formed a society, held religious services, and would gladly have erected a house of prayer, but the owner of the village, at that period, was a very high Churchman, and he would not grant them a site. The "little flock" struggled with difficulties for many years. Things looked dark and portentous; but at length light gleamed in the horizon. George B. Skipworth, Esq., became the owner of the village. We visited him; he received us most cordially, and, after mature deliberation, gave us an eligible site, conveyed it to the Connexion for ninety-nine years, and laid the foundation stone June 6th, 1862. The chapel is neat and substantial, 26 feet by 20, and 14 feet to the wall plate. It is much admired and spoken of, as an ornament to the north end of the village. It was opened for Divine worship on Lord's day, October 12th, 1862. Mr. J. Hollingsworth preached two acceptable sermons. The congregations were large, and the collections good. On Monday, October 13th, a tea meeting was held in a large barn, kindly lent by G. Walker, Esq. About 300 persons seemed to enjoy themselves exceedingly. The provisions were abundant, and all given. At the public meeting in the same place, Mr. G. Tenny (a trustee) was unanimously voted to the chair. Messrs. W. Dunham; C. G. Honor, G. Rowbottom, J. Hollingsworth, H. May, J. Mules, and W. Rowe (Baptist), delivered interesting addresses. The opening services were resumed October 19th, when a sermon was preached by the Rev. C. G. Honor. The erection of the building, &c., costs about £120. We hope to raise £50 towards it. We gladly record our great obligations to the following persons:—George B. Skipworth, Esq., for the land and two donations; G. Walker, Esq.; Mr. G. Tenny; to one lady, for a Bible for the pulpit, and other beneficent deeds; and to other ladies for a splendid tea. May all who have assisted us be crowned with life everlasting! "Blessed be the Lord God, the God of Israel, who only doeth wondrous things. And blessed be His glorious name for ever: and let the whole earth be filled with His glory. Amen and Amen." J. MULES.

WOLVERHAMPTON.—We have now no fewer than ten or twelve places at which we preach the Gospel in the town and neighbourhood of Wolverhampton, several of which have been opened as places of worship very lately. We have purchased land on which to build a chapel and school in one part of the town, at a cost of about £100, and have built the school at an outlay of about £150. This serves us not only as a school room, but as a place of worship. Here many precious souls have already been brought to the knowledge of the truth as it is in Jesus. The chapel will be built in due course. We have also built a wooden chapel in another part of the town, and have fitted up a room in another. At each of these places a religious society has been formed, which I trust will do well. But my object in writing to you now is more particularly to inform you that we have taken, on a rental of £22 a year, the Athenæum, in Queen Street, where we conduct Divine service twice every Lord's-day. Here we held a tea meeting on Monday, October 13th, 1862, an account of which appeared in the Birmingham Daily Post of October 18th, which I transcribe, with a few verbal alterations, for your pages:—"A tea meeting was held in the large room of the Athenæum, on Monday, by the Primitive Methodists, who have taken it for public worship on Sundays. There was a numerous attendance, and ample justice was done to the repast, which was provided by Mr. T. Hardy. During the evening a selection of sacred music was efficiently performed by the choir, under the leadership of Mr. A. Hodgkiss. The meeting was presided over by the Mayor (G. L. Underhill, Esq.), who expressed his gratification at having the opportunity of showing his Catholicity of spirit in his official capacity. Though himself a Churchman, he regarded with satisfaction the labours of all who endeavoured to do good. The Ex-Mayor (C. Clark, Esq.), who was present, concurred in the liberal sentiments of the Mayor, and made some excellent remarks on the cultivation of charity among Christians. Mr. Isaac Jones explained that the taking of the Athenæum was preliminary to the building of a commodious central chapel in the town. There are already several chapels and preaching places connected with the Primitive Methodist body, but they are mostly situated in the outskirts of the town. Mr. S. Rogers gave some useful information respecting the rise and progress of the Denomination. In fifty years, he said, it had increased from half-a-score members to 140,000, with 6,000 chapels, 13,000 travelling and local preachers, 30,000 Sunday school teachers, and nearly 200,000 scholars, and it was still rapidly increasing. After interesting speeches by Mr. G. M. Morgan, W. Porter, and the Rev. S. Morris; the evening's proceedings were brought to a close. Donations from the Mayor and Ex-Mayor were announced."

S. MORRIS.

REDDINGS, PILLOWELL STATION.—Here the Primitive Methodists have begun the building of a neat Connexional chapel. The foundation stone was laid by the writer, October 14th, 1862. The weather was most unpropitious; but a little company of liberal hearted working people attended the service, and £2 were obtained towards the chapel. After a few observations from the writer, his colleague, the Rev. J. Broadhurst, gave a short address. Mrs. Bennett, Sen., gives £5, the consideration price of the land; her son, Mr. Bennett, and his wife, give all the stone; which, together with £7 3s. 6d., the profits of a tea meeting, and other sources of income, will place the chapel in easy circumstances.

G. DOBSON.

BUTWITH, SELBY BRANCH.—Butwith is a neat, well built, and flourishing village, fourteen miles from the city of York, and seven miles distant from Selby, containing a population of 650, while the inhabitants of the parish, including the hamlets around, amount to 1,350. Nearly forty years ago the place was missioned by some of the first Primitive Methodist preachers. A society was formed, and, through the kindness of the late Mr. G. Smith, a place of worship was fitted up; but owing to various causes, the place was left off the plan fifteen years ago. In May, 1862, Butwith was remissioned by the writer, who proclaimed in the streets of the village the Word of life. A society was formed, and by the kindness of Mr. T. Pratt, a barn was fitted up for Divine worship. Three Camp Meetings were held in the place during the summer months, and much good was done. The numbers of those desirous of worshipping with us continuing to increase, the cry of Zion was, "Give us room that we may dwell." At this period, Messrs. R. Longhorn and M. Thompson offered to mould the bricks gratuitously for the erection of a chapel, and Mr. Burt, of Gunby, having generously given us the clay required for the purpose, the foundation stone of the new chapel was laid by W. Briggs, Esq., of Leeds, on Thursday, the 16th of October, 1862, on a site of ground in a most eligible situation, which was granted to us by Mr. George Smith, the son of the late Mr. G. Smith, who for many years had entertained the ministers of our denomination, and in other ways aided the cause of God. The service was commenced by singing,—

"Except the Lord conduct the plan," &c.

Prayer was then offered by the writer, and the foundation stone containing various documents was properly laid in the name of the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost. Suitable addresses were then delivered by Messrs. W. Briggs, T. Waumsley, and others; after which, the company proceeded to a large granary, lent by Mrs.

Hepton for the occasion, where 240 persons partook of a tea gratuitously and abundantly provided by friends of the cause. A most enthusiastic and excellent public meeting was afterwards held in the Wesleyan chapel. W. Briggs, Esq., presided, with his usual ability, and addresses, which were listened to with the greatest interest by the crowded audience, were delivered by the Rev. T. Waumsley, Mr. J. Dodsworth, Jun., the writer, and others. The collections for the day, with the proceeds of the tea meeting, including a donation of £5 by Mr. Briggs, amount to £24, making a total of £70 already received or promised in aid of the building fund. The chapel is designed to seat about 180 persons, and numerous accessions by the conversion of sinners to God have recently been made to the society, for whose use it is being erected.

J. R. PARKINSON.

PICKERING STATION.—The services in connection with our missions have been celebrated in the following order,—On Sabbath, October 26th, 1862, two sermons were preached in our chapel at Pickering; in the afternoon at two o'clock, by the Rev. R. Smith, of the Leeds First Circuit, and in the evening at six o'clock by the Rev. J. Maylard, of the Burnley Circuit. On the following Tuesday, the Rev. J. Maylard preached at half-past two in the afternoon; and in the evening at half-past six, a public meeting was held,—when addresses were delivered by T. Stephenson, Esq., chairman, and the Revs. R. Smith, J. Maylard, H. Leigh, A. Worsnop, and J. Hirst. The services throughout were of a highly interesting character. The congregations were good, and the collections liberal. The sum of £21 8s. 8d., being realized.

R. T. CHARTER.

GRAVESEND.—Our annual Missionary services at Gravesend, have been held as follows:—On October 26th, three sermons were preached; in the morning and evening, by the Rev. W. Freear, of Maidstone; and in the afternoon by Mrs. Green. Several were pricked in the heart; and in the evening four precious souls professed to find pardon through faith in the great atonement. To God be all the praise. On the following day, a tea and public meeting were held. The attendance was good; and a gracious influence rested upon us; and, although we have had several extra collections during the year, and have been making efforts towards the erection of a new chapel, our missionary revenue has improved rather more than two pounds. The amount realized, including public collections, boxes, and the chairman's donation of £1, was £10 5s. 4d.

H. GREEN.

LOW MOOR, BRADFORD CIRCUIT.—We held our annual tea meeting in connection with our Sunday-school anniversary, on September 13th, 1862. The occasion was one of great interest; about 120 partook of tea, after which a public meeting was convened. The anthems and psalm tunes were most efficiently performed, pieces were recited by the children, and suitable prizes were given. The meeting was presided over by Mr. Frederick Coats, Wesleyan local preacher. Two most excellent addresses were delivered by the Revs. W. Jackson and H. Harris. We realized at our anniversary and tea the sum of £18 13s. 6½d., being upwards of £5 more than we have ever realized before. To God be all the praise.

J. HALL.

SEDFORD, DOCKING CIRCUIT.—The first anniversary of the chapel at this place was held on the 20th and 21st of September. The sermons were preached by the writer and Mrs. H. Chipperfield, of Linstead, Suffolk. A tide of holy influence pervaded the congregations at all the services, and our Bethel resounded with songs of praise to the Giver of all good. The profits of the tea meeting and collections amounted to £8 11s. 11d. The trustees hope to reduce the amount of borrowed money £10 per annum, and so clear the chapel in ten years. The congregations are good, the school is prospering, and the society is greatly improved, having witnessed times of refreshing from the presence of the Lord.

E. BLAKE.

THETFORD.—The anniversary services of the chapel at Thetford were held September 21st and 22nd, 1862. The Rev. R. Eaglen preached three sermons on the 21st, and one at three o'clock on the 22nd. This was followed by a public tea, after which a meeting was held in the evening, addressed by the Revs. Eaglen, Lloyd (Independent), Kemish, and Messrs. Nurse (chairman), Foulger, Pearce, and the writer. The chairman, in his opening speech, made mention of our progress in building chapels at other places on the circuit of late, and of the necessity of doing something more at Thetford in order that our much-inconvenienced congregations may be accommodated. The key-note having been sounded, the rest of the speakers continued the strain, until the writer (who was the last speaker), suggested a method of removing the debt from the old chapel, and erecting a new one at the same time, viz., by taking a number of "ten shilling shares," and paying them in during the coming year. Several shares were taken at once, and the erection of a new chapel in a more central part of the town, has now become an idea which we expect will soon shape itself into an accomplished fact. The receipts of the anniversary are about £10, and we hope to pay off at least £20 of the debt this year. May the hand of the Almighty One ever guide us, is the prayer of

J. ALLISON.

BURNLEY.—Notwithstanding the distress which prevails in this neighbourhood, arising from the scarcity of cotton, we had a good collection and full congregations at our school anniversary, held September 21st last. The sermons were preached by the Revs. A. McKechnie, and John Maylard, the latter of whom also delivered an address to the teachers, parents, and guardians. The choir and the children gave great satisfaction in singing. The hymn, "There is a better world they say," sung by the children, was listened to with delight, and accompanied by a gracious influence. At the close of the services, the fears of the managers of the school were exchanged for gratitude, when it was announced that the collections amounted to £50 13s. Although this sum is £30 less than last year's collections, considering the state of trade here, it far exceeds our expectations. The friends of the school wish to record their gratitude for the help afforded them, and are encouraged to persevere in their labour of love.
J. MAYLARD.

CARLISLE.—Anniversary services were held in Cecil-street Chapel on Sunday, 28th September, in behalf of the Sabbath-school. Able and appropriate sermons were delivered in the morning and evening by the Rev. J. A. Bastow, at the end of which several well-selected portions of Scripture, pieces of poetry, and dialogues were recited by the scholars. The afternoon service was conducted by Mrs. Bastow. The congregations were all (especially in the afternoon) exceedingly large, and the collections, despite the present stagnation of trade, amounted to £3 12s. 2½d., showing a decided advance on former years.
W. J. W.

PENZANCE.—Our Mount-street Chapel anniversary, Penzance, was held on Sunday, September 28th, 1862. The morning and evening sermons were preached by the Rev. R. Killingrey of St. Ives, and that in the afternoon by the Rev. J. Nance, Wesleyan minister of this town. The services were well attended, and a holy influence rested upon the word delivered. On Monday, the 29th, a very comfortable tea was provided by the ladies and teachers of the Sunday-school. The tables having been removed, a public meeting commenced, when Mr. C. Kessell was called to the chair, and, after his speech he called on the Rev. J. Hawkins, Mr. W. H. Penhaligan, Rev. R. Killingrey, Mr. W. Bosence, and the writer to address the assembly. The total income was £16 16s. 6½d., being £2 4s. 11½d. more than last year. Of late some souls have been converted to God in the circuit.

C. T. HARRIS.

ANDOVER.—We celebrated our chapel anniversary on Sunday, September 28th, 1862. Three sermons were preached by the Rev. W. Marwood, of Silchester. The attendance was good, especially in the evening; and a Divine influence attended the truths delivered. On Monday we had a tea-meeting when about ninety persons were present. After tea a public meeting was held, the chair being occupied by the Rev. G. Obern. Addresses were delivered by the Revs. W. Marwood and A. Smith; also by Messrs. Kercher, Pike, Butcher, and Blandford. The collections amounted to £4 11s. 1d. One brother offered to give a sovereign next year, provided ten others could be found to pledge themselves to give ten shillings each. The required number was speedily forthcoming, and £8 6s. were promised. An enlargement of our chapel is greatly needed, but a heavy debt stands in the way. May God bless every effort to reduce the debt, and to render the present commodious sanctuary still more so. And above all, may it become the birthplace of many precious souls. Amen.

J. S.

MILTON, WITNEY CIRCUIT.—On Sunday, October 5th, 1862, three anniversary sermons were preached here by the writer, and on the following day eighty persons sat down to a well-conducted tea. The public meeting was densely crowded. J. F. Maddox, Esq., of Shipton, was invited to the chair, and his presence gave a valuable impetus to our success. The meeting was supported by the writer, the Rev. J. H. Lambert (Baptist Minister), and Mr. Parsons, student from London. The services were powerful, and the financial proceeds satisfactory. The total income of the anniversary is £7 5s. All demands will be met, and the debt reduced £3 1s.
H. YEATES.

WITNEY.—Whitney Chapel anniversary was held October 12th, 1862. The sermons were preached by Messrs. H. Yeates, and E. Alford. On the following day 100 partook of tea. The public meeting in the evening was deeply interesting. The chapel was thronged, and Brother H. Gammage occupied the chair. Suitable addresses were delivered by the circuit ministers, E. Alford, and the Rev. T. Wallis (Independent minister.) The tea, collections, and donations amounted to £8; and when all our finances are balanced at the end of the year, our debt will be reduced at least £15. The trustees say this has been their best anniversary for interest and good attendance, and this extra success is the result of timely perseverance. Great praise is due to Sisters Gammage, Haley, and Wheeler, for securing for the pulpit a fine edition of the Bible and hymn-book. O may the droppings of those blessed books from the pulpit be sweeter than honey, or the honeycomb.

H. YEATES.

NEWLYN, PENZANCE CIRCUIT.—The anniversary services of the Sabbath school connected with the above place were held October 12th, 1862, when two sermons were preached by the writer to large and respectable congregations. The children recited pieces, dialogues, and poetry of a select character, which gave general satisfaction. The proceeds were £5 10s., being 17s. 8d. in advance of last year. To God be all the praise.

J. HAWKINS.

DONCASTER.—October 12th, 1862, sermons were preached in behalf of our chapel at Doncaster, by the Revs. W. Sanderson, J. W. Howell, and P. Milson. Also two religious services were held in the Corn-market, in the morning at a quarter past nine and the afternoon at five o'clock, after which a procession was formed, which proceeded to the chapel in Spring Gardens. The congregations, although the day was wet, were large, the collections satisfactory, and good was done. On Monday, October 13th, about 300 persons partook of an excellent tea, gratuitously provided by our kind-hearted female members. A public meeting was held in the chapel at seven o'clock in the evening, under the presidency of P. M. Middlemas, Esq.; and addresses were delivered by the Revs. F. Rudd, M. Jubb (Wesleyan), C. C. Tyte (Independent), P. Milson, W. Sanderson, and Mr. B. Wadsworth. The donations amounted to £32 10s. 1d.; collections, £15 2s. 10d.; proceeds of tea, £13 10s., which, with £5 12s. 6d. promised at Christmas, made a total of £66 15s. 5d. The trustees will be in circumstances to reduce the debt £50 this year, which is a step in the right direction.

T. KENDALL.

AYLESBURY STATION:—Reminiscences of six years' labours:—The town of Aylesbury and adjoining villages, in the county of Bucks, were missioned by Sheffield (now Newbury) Circuit in the year 1836. Although the work of conversion advanced but slowly, still the missionaries had not to contend with the same organised and brutal opposition experienced in the neighbouring counties of Berks, Hants, and Wilts. At the Conference of 1838, I was appointed to this station. On our arrival we found no preaching services conducted in Aylesbury, excepting occasionally in the open air; but a small society worshipped in a cottage at Walton an adjoining parish. After consulting with the branch authorities, plans were adopted, and means employed to secure a suitable place in the centre of the town in which to conduct Divine worship. Providence smiled upon these efforts, for speedily a large room was obtained, in which an Independent minister had formerly preached; but the obstacle that appeared almost insurmountable was the premium of £30 required for the fixtures, and to fit up the place decently for the worship of God. The society was both small and poor, and could scarcely amongst themselves raise one pound towards this object. In the midst of these dark and adverse circumstances, earnest prayer was made to God, and persevering efforts put forth to secure the amount needed; and that gracious Redeemer who openeth and no man shutteth, opened the hearts of generous friends, who contributed liberally to indemnify Mr. Tapping (who is since deceased) and myself, the guarantors for the incurred debt. The place was duly opened, soon became filled with anxious and inquiring souls, and a gracious work commenced, which spread throughout the station; and during the four following years we built six chapels, fitted up three others, took one on rent, established five Sabbath-schools, had an increase of 415 members, and the income rose from £14 16s. 2d. to £57 16s. per quarter.

The station pushed forward her missionary operations, and was signally successful in establishing societies over an extensive tract in the counties of Bucks and Beds. Since that time, and at a more recent period, Buckingham Mission has been consigned to the General Missionary Committee, with 115 members, and Leighton Buzzard (now a circuit) with 313; and together with these five Connexional chapels, and five Sabbath schools. Luton Station, missioned by this circuit, was opened under circumstances worthy of a brief record in the pages of our magazine.

Agreeably with a resolution of the Aylesbury Circuit Quarter-day Board, Brother Higginson was appointed to open a mission in Luton, Dunstable, and the neighbourhood. On Sunday, April 21st, 1839, Brother George Waite preached in the morning at Houghton Regis, Brother Higginson, in the afternoon, at Dunstable; and in the evening I preached at Luton. At the conclusion of the sermon, I gave an account of the Connexion, and informed the numerous assembly that Mr. Higginson had been appointed to open a mission in that town, Dunstable, and the villages contiguous, and as there was every reason to believe that he had come amongst them in the order of a gracious Providence, we trusted that soul-saving and God-honouring results would follow his ministry. Brother Higginson was led to devote the chief of his labours to that particular part of Luton called High Town. God honoured the Word preached by his servant; a goodly number of souls were saved, who formed the nucleus of a mighty society, and a prosperous circuit; and a chapel was built at a cost of more than £300, within nine months of the opening of the mission.

Eighteen long years, years of toil and pleasure, vicissitude and anxiety, glided away, and I was restorationed to this circuit. The cause at Aylesbury was found to be in a feeble state, owing, in a great measure, to the removal of several families from the town who had been constant friends and liberal supporters of Primitive Methodism. The burden on the chapel which had been erected during the interval of my absence, was like an incubus on the energies of the small society, palsyng the ardeney of the trustees, and crushing the vitality of the Church. How to lower the debt was a question oft propounded and moodily considered, and which human wisdom failed to answer; but God, when he has shown us our extreme helplessness without him, often extricates us from perplexing difficulties by simple means. This was the case in reference to the £100 just raised to reduce the debt on Aylesbury chapel. Mr. J. Biggs and Brother W. Leaker met at the weekly market, and entered into a conversation on the serious circumstances of the chapel. "Well, Mr. Leaker," said Mr. Biggs, at the conclusion of this gloomy colloquy, "I will give what you will." A subscription list was soon afterwards made out, headed by the names of Mr. Biggs and Mr. Leaker for £10 each; then followed Sir Anthony Rothschild, Bart., £5; a Friend, £5; Mr. T. Waite, Reading, £3, and several others gave various sums. The General Chapel Fund Committee granted £30, and by the good providence of a covenant-keeping God, we have been enabled to lessen the proportions of this ugly debt, £100. Our prayer now is, that this may be the advent of future prosperity to our society in this town; that now the drought has so long prevailed, there may be heard the "sound of abundance of rain." Celebration services to signalise this event were held on Sunday, October 19th last; Brother Murray Wilson, of Reading, with his accustomed ability, preached three admirable sermons, and on the following Monday delivered a deeply interesting and thrilling lecture on the "Flood and the Ark," to large and attentive congregations, and the sum of £6 was realised.

During the past two years, the Lord has been with us in this circuit, manifesting his power to save; one hundred and thirty members have been added to our ranks, three connexional chapels built, and three Sabbath-schools formed. To God be all the glory, now and for evermore. Amen. SAMUEL TURNER.

HAPPISBURGH, NORTH WALSHAM CIRCUIT.—Happisburgh is a village containing between six and seven hundred inhabitants, situated on the Eastern coast of Norfolk, twenty-five miles from Great Yarmouth, and fifteen from Norwich. It has acquired an unhappy notoriety on account of its dangerous sands, on which many a vessel has been wrecked, and hundreds of lives lost. It is about thirty-one years since our people succeeded in establishing an interest here. They first conducted worship in a cottage, and afterwards Mr. Story converted a cottage into a chapel; but this was a very unsuitable place, and our friends, more than a year ago, thought it was time to arise and build a sanctuary in every respect more eligible. They therefore made application for a site, and obtained twelve perches, for £5, of Mr. T. Frary, who generously returned the money. The chapel is 35 feet by 26 inside, 15 from the floor to the wall-plate, is high enough for a gallery, and will comfortably seat two hundred persons. It was opened for Divine service on October 5th and 12th. On the former day, sermons were preached by the Rev. J. Winkfield, and the Rev. C. Goffe (Independent), of North Walsham, and on the latter by the Rev. O. Jackson and the Rev. J. F. Smythe (Baptist), of Worstead. On the 13th, a sermon was preached in the afternoon by the Rev. J. Venimore (Baptist), of Ingham; after which a public tea meeting was held in the old chapel, which was numerously attended. After adjourning to the new chapel, a public meeting was held, addressed by the rev. gentlemen above named. We had a crowded audience, and the meeting was a very animated and interesting one. The total cost of land and chapel is £207, towards which we have raised £83, and there is a very good prospect of the chapel paying its way and the debt being reduced.

O. JACKSON.

BAWTRY, RETFORD CIRCUIT.—The society in this town has suffered much for more than twenty years for want of a suitable place in which to worship; land, however, has been procured of R. M. Milnes, Esq., M.P., in an eligible situation, on which a neat and comfortable edifice has now been erected, the opening services of which commenced on Friday, October 17th, 1862, with a sermon by the Rev. T. Hughes, Wesleyan minister, of Doncaster. A tea was provided in the Independent chapel, kindly lent for the occasion, after which a public meeting was convened, the chair being occupied by Mr. G. Rex, of Retford. Suitable addresses were delivered by the Revs. T. Hughes, T. Campey, W. Wesson, and H. Knowles. On Sunday, October 19th, two sermons were preached by the Rev. P. Milson, of Epworth; and on Sunday, the 26th inst., the Rev. W. Harland preached to large congregations. We have great pleasure in stating that the liberality of the friends in the town and neighbourhood has far exceeded our expectations. The building has cost from £170 to £180, towards which nearly £90 have been raised by donations, collections, &c., besides the leadings.

H. KNOWLES.

BETHEL, GRIMSBY CIRCUIT.—October 19th and 20th we held the first anniversary of the Bethel chapel. The Rev. T. Whittaker and the Rev. R. Shepherd (Independent), were the preachers. On the Monday we had a social tea of a first-class character, and a well-attended meeting followed; the tone of the meeting was high, being much adapted to give hope and encouragement to those who were present, and more than £33 were realized. As we did not send a line at the opening of the chapel, allow me to make a brief statement now. The chapel will seat about 540, and has a spacious school-room and vestries. It cost about £1,400, one-third of which we have now about obtained, and we have yet a little more to come in. Since the opening the members have been more than doubled, the school has greatly improved, and an additional number of sittings has been asked for every successive quarter. Many friends have helped us liberally. Mrs. T. Campbell gave us £10 at the foundation stone laying, and Mr. C. has since given us £5 and presented us with a valuable clock for the chapel. W. Smethurst gave us £5, J. Smith £5, T. Coates, Esq., £20, and Mr. and Mrs. G. Lingard have helped us nobly. There are many more who have done well, and whose names we wish to record, but are aware your regulations will not admit of it. We present heartfelt thanks to all who have in any degree helped us in securing this valuable erection. We are filled with encouragement, and pray that it may be made a blessing to thousands.

C. KENDALL.

BRANDESBURTON, HORNSHA CIRCUIT.—For many years our people preached in a small cottage in this village, with very limited success, until the year 1856, when the Independent chapel, which had been closed for a length of time, was purchased for £100. The original cost would scarcely be less than double this sum. Several pounds were expended in painting and other improvements, and the debt left, after the opening, was £70. In our improved circumstances the congregations increased, the good work progressed, and the society has risen from nine to sixty members. For some time we have had a considerable number of applications for seats that we could not supply, and been very much inconvenienced for want of room for prayer-meetings and our Sabbath-school. Under these circumstances we resolved to attempt an improvement. We have put in a gallery across one end and on two sides, that will accommodate ninety persons. The total cost is about £98. We have borrowed on note £50, making the total debt £120. We have yet a few pounds of the remainder to raise, but hope soon to realize it. The chapel will seat 212 persons; 146 in pews, 66 free. It was re-opened on Sabbath October 19th and 26th. Mr. J. Chambers, from Hull, preached on the former, and the writer on the latter Sabbath. The congregations were good, the word was with power. That many may be born to a new life within its walls is the prayer of

T. WHITTAKER.

LEAMINGTON.—The trustees and friends decided recently to give the chapel here a thorough renovation, which, having been accomplished, the opening services took place as follow:—On Sunday, October 26th, 1862, three sermons were preached; that in the morning, at eleven, by the Rev. C. G. Sturrock, Congregational minister of this town; and those in the afternoon and evening by the Rev. E. Alford, of Chipping-Norton. On Monday, the 27th, we held a tea meeting, when about 140 persons sat down; after which we had a public meeting. On Lord's-day, November 2nd, three sermons were preached, those in the morning and afternoon by the Rev. G. Jackson, and that in the evening by the writer. The collections were pretty good, and we are raising a bazaar to meet the deficiency of the expenditure.

G. WALLIS.

SCARBORO'.—The Sabbath School in connection with the Jubilee Chapel, Aberdeen-walk, held its first anniversary October 26th, 1862. In the morning, at half-past ten o'clock, the Rev. T. Greenbury preached a sermon to the young, which was listened to by a large and attentive audience. In the afternoon, at two o'clock, the scholars recited some well-selected pieces and dialogues, which gave great satisfaction. In the evening, long before the time for commencing service, the people flocked to the chapel, and numbers sought in vain for admittance, when the Rev. T. Greenbury preached an effective sermon on the danger of procrastination. On Monday evening, a public meeting was held, when excellent addresses were delivered by Rev. T. Greenbury, Rev. S. P. Barker, Mr. Sharrow, and other friends, showing the value of the religious influence of the Sabbath school on the family and the church, and the innumerable blessings it scatters in its train. At each of the services the scholars sang a choice selection of hymns and anthems with credit to the two superintendents, Messrs. Lancaster and Everingham, who have trained them for the occasion. The collections amounted to £12 10s. I am happy to inform you that we have 200 scholars and 30 teachers. Also a library, for the use of the school, consisting of 300 volumes—all paid for, although the school has not been established twelve months. What hath God wrought! To Him be all the glory.

J. HUTTON.

FORDWELLS, WITNEY CIRCUIT.—This is a village now in formation, and from the ever flowing fountain of water it possesses, it is likely to become a place of importance. The houses are all entirely new, and are built for the labouring class. The village is central to a number of hamlets, and having no place of worship but the chapel we have raised, the prospect of our people is promising. The building is 23 ft. by 17 ft. in the clear, and 13 ft. from the floor to the ceiling. The walls are of the best stone work, with freestone groins;

the roof and floor of the best deal: it has four good windows, and is furnished with a good platform. The total cost is £105, and the contractor has done his work to the satisfaction of the trustees, and to the credit of his Christian profession. The amount raised by all efforts is £32, and £6 are promised for the first anniversary. We tender our grateful acknowledgments to all our kind friends for their assistance. On Lord's-day and Monday, October 26th and 27th, 1862, this beautiful little place was dedicated to God, and we rejoice to say that it has become the birth-place of souls.

H. YEATES.

LOWER TRANMERE, BIRKENHEAD CIRCUIT.—The want of a chapel or room amidst the increasing population of this place has been long felt. Vigorous and persevering efforts have been made in the open air, the fruits of which may be with other churches. But a better day has come. Our Wesleyan friends having recently vacated a chapel, we took it on rent, and had encouraging opening services on November 2nd, 1862, conducted by Rev. S. H. Booth, (Baptist); George Pennell, Esq., of Liverpool; and Dr. Palmer, of America. It was a day long to be remembered. About £5 10s. were collected, and since the opening several souls have found redemption. A Sabbath and a week evening class have been formed, and a Sabbath School has been commenced under promising circumstances. We are led to hope that with the blessing of God on prudent and prayerful management, we shall soon have to send more good news from Lower Tranmere.

T. DOODY.

COLONIAL DEPARTMENT.

KINGSTON, CANADA WEST.—Kingston is the oldest city in Upper Canada, and contains upwards of fourteen thousand inhabitants. About one-third of this number are Roman Catholics, chiefly of Irish origin, exceedingly rigid in their creed; leaving about two-thirds who represent several different Protestant churches. Eleven years ago, several heads of families in Kingston applied to the Primitive Methodist Missionary Committee, in Toronto, for a minister. This application led to an investigation being made, and a society being formed by the Rev. J. Davison, and the ensuing Conference appointed the Rev. J. Edgar to take charge of Kingston as a mission station. Eventually a small chapel was purchased, and for awhile the prospects of success were very encouraging. But a reaction ensued, and for several years the society remained stationary. We must not, however, overlook the fact that during this time Kingston proved the key to several important positions in the interior of the country, which are now heads of stations, and doing well.

The Conference of 1860 appointed the writer to Kingston, as a mission separate from the country parts, and he laboured hard the first year to bring it up, but with little success. This lack of success became a matter of grave consideration; but the only plausible reasons we could assign were the paltry appearance of our chapel, and its disadvantageous situation. Hence our conclusion, either to advise the Conference to give up the station, or ask it to sanction the erection of a new chapel. We decided on the latter course. Our English readers must bear in mind that open-air services cannot be carried on so extensively in Canada as in England, Canadian winters being very long and severely cold, while the summers are short and intensely hot.

On the 6th September, 1861, under the sanction of Conference, a board of trustees was formed, who immediately proceeded to action. A subscription was set on foot, headed by most of the trustees, and responded to liberally by the public. Simultaneously a building lot was purchased, beautiful for situation, being in the most central and elevated place in the city. A first-class architect was employed to prepare plans and specifications, and in due time the building was let and pushed forward with great rapidity. It is very substantial, being built of stone, and is 64 ft. long, 43 ft. wide, and 32 ft. from the foundation to the wall-plate. Of course there is a basement story, and there are also arrangements for galleries at some future time. On each side are four long windows, with one on each side of the door in the front, and there is a beautiful triplet window over the door. The front is further beautified with six prominent buttresses, giving it a very prepossessing appearance. The architecture is Gothic throughout the building, the inside being in character with the outside appearance. The pulpit is of the platform style, and much admired; and we are only reiterating the sayings of the public when we say, there is not a more handsome-looking building in Kingston of the same kind of work.

On September 14, 1862, this noble structure was dedicated to the worship of God. Appropriate and interesting sermons were preached in the morning and evening by the Rev. R. Boyle, of Toronto, and in the afternoon by Professor Mowat, of Queen's College, Kingston, to large and respectable congregations. On Monday evening, we held a public meeting in the church, which was rendered interesting by suitable addresses, and by the services of the choir; also an explanation of our financial position was given. But Tuesday evening was our greatest success, numerically and financially. We held a great festival in the City Hall, at which his worship the mayor, O. S. Gildersliene, Esq., presided. Cakes, fruit, and lemonade were served to an assembly of upwards of six hundred persons; after which addresses were delivered and sacred music performed. On the platform were present the Revs. R. Boyle, W. Newton, C. Roffe, and J. Edwards (Baptist), with several gentlemen of the city, who rendered us good service. By these opening services, nearly £50 have been realised, and an impetus has been given to our work in Kingston. Altogether we have expended about £1,100; towards which we have raised, from all sources, £725; leaving a deficiency of £375. We are still labouring to reduce the debt, and a sufficiency can be raised by the pew-rents to pay the interest on what money we require to borrow. We are therefore much encouraged. From first to last God has prospered us in this great undertaking. And it is further remarkable that the week after we vacated our old chapel, a fire broke out in an adjoining building, which extended to our old chapel, and reduced it to ashes. As it was sold, we shall not sustain any loss; but if we had not already been in our new chapel, we might have been entirely destitute of a place of worship. We have now worshipped four Sabbaths in our new sanctuary, and our congregations have been more than double what they used to be in the former place. Thanks to all who have assisted us, and above all to God; and may He beautify the place of His sanctuary, and make the place of His feet glorious; and may the glory of this latter house be greater than the glory of the former. Amen. G. Wood.

NORTH ADELAIDE, SOUTH AUSTRALIA.—
Extracts from James Read's Journal.

May 1st, 1862.—Rode to Mount Barker (24 miles). Found Mr. Wright and family all well and happy after their exchange of stations. I was glad to hear that the Lord is blessing the Mount Barker Circuit with prosperity. New chapels are in the course of erection, old ones are being enlarged, and sinners are being converted. Hallelujah! O that God may send a shower of grace on Adelaide! Amen.

3rd.—Rode to Strathalbyn (11 miles). Met with Mr. Pithouse, lately out from England, whom I knew, having been with him in Devonshire. We had some interesting conversation about our native land and its kind-hearted friends. He is now quite reconciled to "bush life."

4th.—Heard a sermon on the Christian's privileges, and afterwards rode ten miles, and preached missionary sermons at Bull's Creek. A native was one of my congregation in the afternoon, and one of my most attentive hearers. It is very seldom the natives of this colony attend any place of worship. If they do, it is only for a few minutes; they soon take their departure. If they are asked, "Why they come to white man's corroboree," they reply, "Him shout, him make plenty noise." They are very partial to tea-meetings, but it is for the sake of the cake and tea; but though they are degraded, thank God there is a power in the Gospel to raise them; though the mantle of darkness and ignorance envelops their minds, the Gospel, and the instruction and consistent example of the white man, can draw it aside.

5th—8th.—Attended missionary meetings at Bull's Creek, Giles's Flat, Langhorne's Creek, and Guy and Fowler's Station. They were interesting and profitable.

9th.—Rode home (35 miles). I felt God's power to bless by the way.

11th.—Rode 30 miles, and preached missionary sermons at Gawler River and Port Gawler, on the Salisbury Circuit. There were good congregations and good collections. But oh! I wish to see souls converted. If souls are saved, liberal hands and liberal hearts will not be wanting.

12th.—16th.—In company with Mr. Braithwaite, attended missionary meetings at Port Gawler, Gawler River, Burton, and Salisbury. The collections were better than last year, but the boxes were not so good. The circuit will be able to send £20 to the missionary treasurer.

17th.—Rode home, and preached at North Adelaide on the preciousness of Christ. May my faith increase, and then His preciousness to me will increase.

18th.—Preached twice at Queenstown, and once at Port Adelaide, on the wharf, to the sailors. When tossed upon the wild waves of the vast ocean, I trust they will think of the words they heard.

19th.—Attended the anniversary tea-meeting at North Adelaide. About a hundred sat down to tea. Sermons were preached on the Sabbath by the Rev. T. Braithwaite and Mr. W. Hannaford. At the public meeting the chapel was crowded. Addresses were given by myself, Mr. Martin, the Revs. J. Warner, and T. Braithwaite. We raised about £16.

21st.—Gave the second lecture on the "Pilgrim's Progress," at North Adelaide. The characters of Obdurate and Pliable were portrayed, the Slough of Despond was spoken of, the Village of Morality, and the Wicket Gate.

27th.—I feel determined, God helping me, to pray, believe, and live for sanctification, and make it more than I have done the theme of my pulpit ministrations. My heart's desire is for "a closer walk with God." Come, Thou blessed Spirit, take up Thy kingly sceptre, and subdue thy foes in my soul. Enthroned Thyself within the temple of my heart, and lead me on to higher ground and more sacred heights.

June 1st.—Commenced protracted meetings at North Adelaide. I preached a sermon in the evening, on Christian perfection. A blessed influence was felt, and God's people were quickened. They buckled on their armour, and got it brightened by prayer, and are determined to work for God and souls.

2nd.—Gave a short exhortation at North Adelaide, and held a prayer-meeting after. A youth was made happy in Jesus.

5th.—North Adelaide. A powerful meeting. I spoke from, "Give an account of thy stewardship, for thou mayest be no longer steward." A deep solemnity pervaded every mind. Sinners were invited to the penitents' form; eight came forward to be pointed to the Lamb of God; four of them, before we left the chapel, were enabled to sing—

"My God is reconciled," &c.

Praise the Lord.

8th.—Preached at North Adelaide on the signs and sounds of approaching good. One young woman was made happy in the Saviour's forgiving love. Prayed with a man for three hours, who seemed in an agony because of his sins; but unbelief hindered him from obtaining the blessing. His wife was converted at our last meeting.

10th.—Preached at Islington on Mercy's interposition. God's presence was felt to quicken and save. One converted.

11th.—North Adelaide. Two brought to God, and a backslider reclaimed. Glory be to God.

13th.—North Adelaide. Preached on the fearful position of the four lepers outside the walls of Samaria. One person was made happy in Jesus. She went home and told her husband "what great things God had done for her soul." Her blessed testimony made an impression upon his mind, and before the morning he sought and found the Lord.

15th.—Preached anniversary sermons at Queenstown. Excellent congregations, and good collections.

16th.—Gave a lecture at Queenstown, after the tea. We realised about £22. This is noble for a society of nine members. They give liberally themselves, and by so doing get the sympathy and help of others.

18th.—North Adelaide. Gave the third of a course of lectures on the "Pilgrim's Progress." Subject—"The Interpreter's House." The representative pictures in this chamber of imagery—the brave picture, the grave, saintly man, the dusty parlour, Passion and Patience, the fire burning against the wall, the stately palace, the man in the iron cage, and the dreamer awaking from his midnight dream—were noticed.

20th.—Spoke on the past and present state of the children of God. Three or four penitents came forward to be prayed with. One who had been in distress for more than a week found the joy unspeakable.

21st.—Fellowship meeting. It was a good time. God's people gave testimony of His quickening power; and the young converts spoke of His converting grace. Ride on, Jesus! still ride on.

31st.—Commenced protracted meetings at Beverley. Members were quickened, and sinners were in distress.

July 4th.—At Beverley I warned sinners of their danger. Many felt their critical position, and cried aloud for mercy. Some laid hold on the promises, and cast their souls upon the atonement.

5th.—A powerful meeting at Beverley. Bright clouds seemed to hang over the congregations, and then burst upon us. There were about ten penitents, three of whom I trust were enabled to believe in Jesus.

8th.—In company with three brethren went again to Beverley. This meeting will be remembered by some in eternity. A man about fifty years of age was impressed with the need of a new heart. We prayed with him for hours. A young man said to him, "When I was seeking the Lord, I soon found Him. I laid hold on the promises, and was saved." "Yea," said the seeking one, "no doubt you soon found pardon, but you hadn't but half as many sins to wash away as I have." A man who has been on the way to heaven for many years replied, "It is not the number of your sins; you must look away from them, and look to Christ."

"But," said the weeping sinner, "who can help looking at them when they are right before me?" He has since been made happy, and has joined society.

11th.—In visiting some of the members at North Adelaide, I called on a man who had been a member of a Christian church at Castlemaine, but had fallen from grace. I got him to come to class.

27th.—Preached and led a lovefeast at North Adelaide. It was a good meeting. A powerful influence was felt, and I trust impressions made that will be lasting. A man was present who had not been to a place of worship for fourteen years. There is a great work to do in South Australia. Oh, for more earnest workers and labourers for Christ! Great is the spiritual darkness of the people. Oh, for more burning and shining lights that shall be flaming torches in the service of God!

Brethren, pray for us. Young men! lovers of souls, "come over (to Australia) and help us." Souls are perishing. Come and "haste to the rescue."

---

LITERARY NOTICES.

---

Missions in Western Polynesia: being Historical Sketches of these Missions from their commencement in 1839, to the present time. By A. W. MURRAY, Twenty-five years a Missionary in Polynesia, in connection with the London Missionary Society. London: John Snow, Paternoster Row. 1863.

SOME sixty years ago, when the missions belonging to the London Missionary Society were in their youthful bloom, William Jay, then a young man recently ordained over the congregation assembling in Argyle Chapel, Bath, made a journey by coach from Bath to London, for the purpose, it is said, of submitting to good old John Newton, of St. Mary's Woolnoth, a very important question, namely, "Is the conversion of the heathen to Christianity to be expected? or, must not all missionary efforts for that object be regarded as problematical?"—to which the venerable old clergyman replied, while big tears streamed down his weather-beaten face, "My dear young brother, never since God converted my soul have I had one doubt as to the possibility of his saving any sinner upon earth!" The perusal of the volume now before us has deepened the conviction in our mind of the propriety of that memorable answer. Surely if any sinners on earth are too vile, too ignorant, too superstitious, too sensual, too desperate for grace to soften, to subdue, and to save, those of Western Polynesia might be supposed to be in that condition. But this work shows most satisfactorily that he who came "from Edom, with dyed garments from Bozrah," is there, as everywhere else, and still, as in ancient days, "Mighty to save." What triumphs of redeeming grace, what trophies of soul-saving power, are to be found among those islands of the Great Pacific ocean! Truly we see no reason to doubt that the vision of the prophet shall yet be fulfilled, "The earth shall be full of the knowledge of the Lord, as the waters cover the sea." Well did the late Dr. Pyc Smith remark that, "the prophecies relating to the final triumphant reign of the Messiah are in far greater proportion to the bulk of prophetic Scripture than those that relate only to his advent, his humiliation, his sufferings, and his death." And we may safely add, that if the one class of predictions has been so fully accomplished, the other class is certain in the fulness of time, to be as absolutely verified in the conquest of even heathen lands by the Gospel. "The world for Christ," must still be the motto of all the churches; and no difficulties, however formidable or multitudinous, must damp the ardour of our faith, or deter us from the prosecution of our evangelistic toils. We must still pray with David, "Let the whole earth be filled with his glory," and only when we have breathed our last, or seen the answer to our prayers, must it be said in regard to such petitions, "The prayers of" this and that believer "are ended." But while we pray as if all depended on God, we must labour as if all depended on ourselves. Prayer without labour is enthusiasm, and labour without prayer is atheism, but both together are Christianity. The reading of Mr. Murray's book we cannot but think, will stimulate to increased faith and prayer, and to increased labour for the conversion of the heathen world.

From the preface we learn that the principal portion of this volume was originally published in a series of letters sent to the "Sydney Morning Herald," but that the whole has been carefully revised, and the information given is brought down to the most recent date. The volume treats largely of the work of God in the New Hebrides, and more especially in the Island of Aneiteum. The native superstitions and cruelties are described with great freshness; and the progress of the Gospel, despite all the obstacles it has had to surmount, is graphically portrayed. The Erramangans who massacred the lamented John Williams, turn up in the narrative, as do the inhabitants of Fotuna and Tanna, and other "islands of the sea." Some most romantic stories will be found in the book, such as, one would suppose, are sufficiently interesting, to secure for the work a decided preference over the fictions of Dickens, Thackeray, Bulwer, Disraeli, and even Sir W. Scott. "Facts stranger than fiction," abound here. And after all we have heard of the romance of fiction, of history, of poetry, of real life, and of other kinds ad nauseam, we submit that the romance of missionary narrative, as here detailed, is more romantic than any of them. We have room for but very few extracts, or we could find abundant material of a highly interesting character, to fill many pages. Speaking of the strangling of widows on the decease of their husbands, the Author writes:—"The avowed reason for strangling wives was that their souls might accompany those of their husbands to the world of spirits. Married women were accustomed, from the time of their marriage, to wear about their necks the cord with which they were to be strangled on the death of their husbands, as wives in Christian lands wear the marriage ring."

In reference to the superstitions with which the missionaries had to contend in Aneiteum, the writer says,—“Hitherto scarcely anything had been stolen from the missionaries; now the natives commenced stealing from them in right earnest. It was a common way to show their displeasure, to steal, and it is still the practice on the neighbouring island of Tanna. The services were almost deserted, and those who did attend looked sullen and angry. The missionaries were totally at a loss to account for the altered conduct of the people. At length the problem was solved. A man named Nathana, who claimed to have dominion over the sea, went to the teacher, Simeona, and told him that the people were very much enraged with the missionaries, and that they were talking of burning their houses and driving them from the island. The missionaries lost no time in inquiring into the cause of the displeasure of the people. The following grave misdemeanours were laid to their charge. First, they had taken cocoa-nuts from trees on their own land, whereas the cocoa-nuts were all under a tabu for a great feast which was at hand. The missionaries pleaded ignorance of the tabu, but agreed to respect it for the future, though it seemed rather hard that it should be extended to trees growing on land which they had purchased and paid for. Secondly, the missionaries had taken coral from the reef to make lime for their buildings. The Natmasses (imaginary divinities) who were supposed to have their residences near the mission premises, had smelt the burning of the coral, and were very angry at the natives for allowing it to be taken; and to punish them for their undutiful conduct, had made the fish scarce. The missionaries told them, of course, who it is that reigns over sea and land, and all that is therein; they agreed, however, not to take any more coral, only begging that they might be allowed to burn a kiln which was already prepared, and which was necessary to complete works that were in hand. To this the natives agreed. The third charge was, that whereas a small hill behind the mission premises was the residence of some important Natmasses, and the path by which the said Natmasses were accustomed to pass from the mountain to the sea lay through a piece of ground on which the chapel was being erected; and, as the missionaries were about to put a fence round the chapel, the path would be obstructed, the Natmasses would be angry, and would punish the natives with sickness and death in consequence. The missionaries replied that the contemplated offence was a sin of ignorance; the man from whom they bought the land not having told them anything about the path of the Natmasses. This the man admitted, and the matter was amicably settled by the missionaries agreeing to leave the path open." This is but a specimen of the many strange things this book brings before us. There is one thing among all the darkness that prevails around these heathens which is not unworthy of note, as indicating a power of thought which is exhibited not only in Polynesia, but which we remember Dr. Livingstone names as having been witnessed by him in Central Africa, and which appeals powerfully to all friends of Christian missions, namely, the way in which they start questions in reply to the exhortations of the missionaries. For example, after listening to a missionary one day for some time, one of the Aneiteumese said, "How is it, if these things you tell us be true, that we have never heard of them before?" Let all the friends of the heathen ponder this solemn question.

This book is beautifully printed, and neatly bound in cloth, and sells at 10s. 6d. To all who wish to have their intelligence regarding Western Polynesia and the cause of missions there brought down to the latest date, and supported by first class authorities, we would say procure and ponder this valuable contribution to our missionary literature.

Freedom and Happiness in the Truth and Ways of Christ. Sermons by the Rev.

JAMES STRATTEN, more than forty years minister of Paddington Chapel. London: J. Nisbet and Co., 21, Berners Street. 1862.

This goodly volume, of nearly 500 pages, contains twenty sermons on some of the most interesting and weighty subjects that can occupy the tongue of a preacher or the pen of a writer. They are culled by the venerable author himself from the MSS. which a very protracted ministry among the same people may be supposed to have required. The author was unwilling to cross the Jordan without leaving on this side some substantial memorial of a ministry remarkable alike for its happiness and its long-continuance. Readers of sermons, we believe, are more numerous just now than was the case a few years ago, and the publication of such sermons as these may well be expected to increase the number. Without endorsing every sentiment,—which cannot be expected of us,—we have great pleasure in giving expression to our admiration of these valuable sermons, and recommending them to all whose taste lies in the sermon-reading direction.

The Mission Pastor: Memorials of the Rev. Thomas Boaz, LL.D., Twenty-four Years Missionary in Calcutta. By his Widow. Edited by his Brother-in-law. London: John Snow, Paternoster Row. 1862.

It may well be supposed that the work before us was written ex amore, or with right hearty sympathy with its subject; and we should not, therefore, be too exacting in regard to the style or the matter. But while we make this admission, we must say we should have been glad if a more careful revision had been bestowed upon the sheets as they passed through the press, as certain glaring defects of style might thus have been obviated. On the whole, however, the work is of a very superior order. Dr. Boaz was a very worthy man, and served his generation to good purpose; and his biography contains a large amount of stirring and useful information, and is well calculated to stimulate its readers to more earnest devotedness to God. The Doctor belonged to the London Missionary Society, and was highly successful, and extensively known and loved. He was born at Scarborough, and the good old town may well reckon him among its noblest sons. He died at the comparatively early age of fifty-seven, but he had done a great work in Calcutta, and had not been without fruit elsewhere. Life is not always to be measured by years, but rather by deeds. He lives longest who does the most. Dr. Boaz, on this principle, was an old man at fifty-seven. Rays of light on the state of India will strike the reader as he goes over these pages, and, if we mistake not, this is one of the best ends the publication of the work will serve.

Submission and its Reward: a Memoir of Alice Johnston, including an Account of the Annan Revival. By the Rev. JAMES GAILLEY, ANNAN. With a prefatory note by Professor Martin, of Aberdeen. London: J. Nisbet. 1863.

A SUPERIOR piece of biography is this. The subject of it was one of the excellent of the earth, and we wish the handsome volume, containing the narrative of her many excellences, were distributed broadcast among all the Christian women of the British Islands. Alice Johnston was the daughter of a Scotchman, but she was born at Skipton, in Yorkshire, and was early brought into contact with some of the good Christians of her native town, and she soon gave satisfactory evidence of a work of grace in her heart, which ripened more and more to the final harvest. She was influenced by a burning love to the Saviour and to precious souls to devote much of her time and energies to the promotion of the work of God among the people where, at different times, her lot was cast. Eminently active, self-denying, prayerful, and pious, she was rendered very useful; and her connection with the revival at Annan was the happy result of previous spiritual life and devotedness. We can warmly recommend the perusal of this excellent volume to all our friends, especially the female portion thereof; it will do them good, and they will be obliged for our recommendation of the book.

The Works of Thomas Goodwin, D.D., sometime President of Magdalen College, Oxford; with General Preface, by John C. Miller, D.D., and Memoir by Robert Halley, D.D. Vol. V. Containing: Christ the Mediator—The supremacy of Christ above Moses—The Reconciliation of the People of God by Christ's Death—The one Sacrifice—Reconciliation by the blood of Christ—Three Sermons on Heb. i. 1, 2. Edinburgh: James Nichol. London: James Nisbet and Co. 1863.

THE table of contents above specified will give to all the readers of Goodwin a clear idea of the volume before us. His style is distinguished by the usual excellences and defects of his age. The present volume is of average quality, and would have been still better if the limited Redemption theory had not marred it. It seems a pity that the strong harness of such noble heroes has such open joints; but perfection beneath the sun is not to be expected. The worthy publisher still executes his part in the production of this series wisely and well. He has our best thanks; and, on the whole, we repeat with pleasure our recommendation of these standard theological works.

Prayer and the Divine Order; or, the union of the Natural and the Supernatural in Prayer. By THOMAS HUGHES. London: Hamilton, Adams and Co. 1863.

THE respected author of this volume is a Wesleyan minister, and when we have said this, our readers will know what class of sentiments to anticipate in his productions. This is by no means the work of "a 'prentice hand," but of a master in Israel. Several works published previously by Mr. Hughes have gained him a locus standi among the glorious company of authors. The present publication will help to make good his position. It is calm, philosophical, and clever, and, except that some may think it hardly sufficiently evangelical, it is about all we could desire. The study, we do not say the reading of it will be of essential service to Christians generally, and not least, to those who have to minister in word and doctrine. We give it a cordial welcome, and wish it great success.

The London Quarterly Review. No. 38. January, 1863. London: H. J. Treasider, 17, Ave Maria lane, E.C.

THIS excellent quarterly holds on its way, and grows stronger and stronger. The present publisher does his best to secure for the work a patronage commensurate with its merits. More he could hardly desire. The work is under able editorial management, and commands the services of a first-rate staff of contributors. Its doctrines are Methodist, and thus we can afford to recommend it more freely than if it belonged to the class of the Westminster or the National, on the one hand, or to that of the Quarterly or the Edinburgh, on the other. Nor need it shame in the presence of the North British or the British Quarterly, able and excellent as those reviews undoubtedly are. The present number contains ten articles on such important subjects as "Davidson on the Old Testament," "The British Association at Cambridge," "The Pictures at the late Exhibition," "Apostolic Theology," "Greek Testament Literature," and "The Defects, and the remedies for them, in the Established Church." Variety and ability distinguish the number. We cheerfully recommend it.

The History of the Religious Movement of the Eighteenth Century, called Methodism; considered in its different denominational forms, and in its general relation to Protestantism, by ABEL STEVENS, LL.D.; revised and corrected by the Rev. W. WILLEY. (To be completed in sixteen parts.) With a portrait, from an original painting, of the Rev. John Wesley, A.M. London: J. Willey, Fleet street, E.C. Price sixpence. Part I.

DR. STEVENS is well-known as an American writer of eminence, and his able history of Methodism occupies a lofty position in transatlantic literature. The present edition of his great work has been carefully edited by the Rev. W. Willey, and is got up in a very superior style, and got out at a very reasonable figure. Sixteen sixpenny parts are to complete the work, and it will be placed, by this mode of publication, within the reach of most readers of Methodist works. The letterpress is excellent, and forty pages are given in this first part, while a splendid portrait of Wesley adorns it. An engraving of Wesley's rescue from the burning rectory is to be given in the second part. Dr. Stevens is decidedly Wesleyan, and therefore some of his views will not be held in admiration by the more liberal sections of the Methodist family; but on the whole, unless readers are unneccessa-rily strong in their partialities or prejudices, we conceive the work will secure general approval. We know of nothing equal to it as a history of Methodism. We therefore shall be happy to possess it, and have satisfaction in bringing this first part under the notice of our numerous readers. The Newspaper Press Directory. By C. MITCHELL and Co. London: Fleet street, E.C. Price One Florin.

A VALUABLE publication to readers of papers and periodicals, to advertisers, and to literary men. It is respectably got up, and must be well received by the public.

Lost—but not for Ever. My Personal Narrative of Starvation and Providence in the Australian Mountain Regions. By the Rev. R. W. VANDERKISTE, author of "The Dens of London." Second Edition. London: James Nisbet and Co. 1863.

THIS will be a welcome book to all lovers of the marvellous, for marvellous indeed are the facts—notfictions—it brings before us. Here is marvellous information about a marvellous man, in a more marvellous country, and most marvellous circumstances—geography, travels, natural history, anecdotes, hair-breadth escapes, providence, prayer, and faith, and what else, form the contents of this thrilling book. It will be very popular with the young, and is worthy of the attention of the old. Handsomely got up, and printed in good bold type, it will be an ornament to the table, as well as a good companion at the hearth. Believing it worthy of extensive patronage, we cordially recommend it to all our readers.

Ada Malcolm. By ELIZABETH MORPETH. London: S. W. Partridge, 9, Paternoster row. 1862.

A SWEET story, illustrating the triumphs of grace over the temper, and the other evils of our nature. A very appropriate gift for the young, and a very acceptable "light reading" book for the pious. We rejoice to find so healthy a tone in this class of works at present.

Memoir of the late Rev. John Baird, Minister of Yetholme, Roxburghshire; with an account of his labours in reforming the Gipsy population of that parish. By W. BAIRD, M.D., F.L.S., &c. London: James Nisbet and Co., Berners street, W.

"EVERY man in his own order." How wonderful is the variety in men's spheres and capacities of usefulness, and yet the same superintending Providence controls all! "The right man in the right place" has grown into a proverb, and here we have another illustration of it. These are truly stirring times—times of all sorts of effort to benefit mankind. Among "the signs of the times," this is one of the best.

Mr. Baird was a worthy Scotch minister, who devoted much labour, with marked success, to the reclamation and reformation of what Dr. Chalmers might have well called the "outlying population" of his parish. The narrative of his life and labours is very enchanting. Let it be widely circulated.

The Children's Friend. Illustrated by Gilbert, Weir, Foster, Anelay, Huard, &c. Vol. 2. New series. London: Seeley, Jackson, and Halliday, Fleet street; and S. W. Partridge, Paternoster row.

THIS is a beautiful book for our young friends—full of pictures, poetry, and pretty stories. By all means let the little folks have it.

The Christian's Banquet. By J. W. HOWELL. Fifth thousand. London: R. Davies. Leeds: J. Parrott. 1862.

THAT this little book has reached a fifth thousand indicates the fact of its being worthy of patronage. Mr. Howell has rendered good service to Christian readers by its publication, rich as it is in Scriptural and pious thought and feeling. Let those who wish to be instructed on the doctrine of entire sanctification, ponder these excellent pages. Sound, clear, and devotional, we have pleasure in according the work our meed of praise.

Hints on Scripture Reading and Study. London: J. Nisbet and Co. 1863.

A NEW and admirable little handbook to the Bible. Just the thing for young persons, and others who wish to see how best to study the Holy Scriptures to profit. Let them procure it; it is portable and cheap; and then let them "read, mark, learn, and inwardly digest," as they are herein advised. Good will be the result.

The Way of Peace. A Book for the Anxious. By HORATIUS BONAR, D.D. London: Nisbet.

MUCH of the same character with the immortal "Anxious Inquirer," by the late Rev. J. Angell James. Dr. Bonar is a worthy labourer in the same field of usefulness. His former works praise him in many a gate, and this will enhance his fame. If he had been Methodist in his creed his work would have been more to our liking; but Calvinist though he is, there is little to object to, and very much to commend. We trust, by the Divine blessing, many anxious inquirers will be spiritually profited by its pious and pointed teachings.

Hymns, Dialogues, and Addresses for Sunday School Anniversaries, containing the four series already published, with Large Additions. By THOMAS

HIRST, Author of "The Music of the Church," &c., &c. London: Kent and Co., Paternoster Row; Nottingham: Dearden and Son.

SOME capital poems, pieces, dialogues, &c., are herein offered for the use of the teachers of Sabbath Schools, who wish to prepare their scholars for exhibiting their power of memory before the public. If children must practise this sort of thing, we do not know anything better for them than the present neat little volume. We would rather children's understandings should be well cultivated, than that they should spend too much time in preparing for mere memoriter exhibitions. But if memory, understanding, and heart be all looked to, it is well. Of this work we can speak in terms of praise.

The Church of Christ in England. By C. STOVEL. London: Heaton and Son, 21, Warwick Lane, Paternoster Row.

MR. STOVEL is an uncompromising Dissenter, and a consistent Baptist minister. He speaks his mind on church questions very freely in this trenchant pamphlet. It is another of the Bartholomew publications, and has strong claims to consideration.

Conscience for Christ; or August the Twenty-fourth. A Lecture by the Rev. W. ROAF, of Wigan. Published by Request. Illustrated. London: W. Freeman. Fleet Street. Price Sixpence.

The Model Church (published by recommendation of the adjudicators of the Bicentenary Prize Essays). By Rev. L. B. BROWN, Berwick-on-Tweed. London: Freeman. One Shilling.

THESE two pamphlets have waited for a notice several months, but we have pleasure in bearing our testimony, at last, to the ability they both display. Mr. Roaf is so devout a Christian, and so large-hearted a Gospel minister, that he was sure to give utterance in a loving spirit, to whatever of controversial matter he might feel constrained to publish. And, hence, it is gratifying to read what he has to say on the Bartholomew question. Much sterling thought is here embedded in a mass of historic lore and Christian sentiment. The illustrations render the book all the more appreciable and valuable. Mr. Brown's book, having been recommended by the adjudicators of the Bicentenary prize essays, scarcely needs any recommendation of ours. It is of sterling worth, and readers in general will do well to procure it.

The Church and the Nation in 1862. By SAMUEL MARTIN. London: Jackson, Walford and Hodder.

The Church of England as I saw it on Sunday August 17th, 1862. By Rev. R. W. BETTS. Same Publishers. Three-pence.

The Searcher Searched; or, the Rev. H. Carpenter, M.A., of St. Michael's, Liverpool, confronted with the Truth. By Rev. E. MELLOR. Same Publishers and same price.

THE names of the able Authors guarantee the value of these pamphlets. They are all of first rate character, and worthy of a thoughtful perusal.

Joy in Heaven over One Repenting Sinner.

By late Rev. A. M. TOPLADY, A.M. The Gospel a Joyful Sound. By Same. An Essay on the Fears of God's people. By Same. London: W. H. Collingridge, 117 to 119, Aldersgate street, E.C.

THREE characteristic sermons, at one penny each, by the late Mr. Topladý. Calvinistic, but otherwise good.

OBITUARY.

On Tuesday morning, January 20th, 1863, my dear mother, Mrs. ELIZABETH ANTLIFF, departed this life at Newark, Nottinghamshire, in the 76th year of her age. Before her marriage she was a member of the Wesleyan Society, and both she and my father remained in that Church for several years subsequent to their marriage. When, however, the Primitive Methodists visited Cauntton, where my parents were resident, my father soon saw it to be his duty to unite with them, and accordingly he did so, and became their first leader, and shortly afterwards a local preacher. My mother still continued with the Wesleyans for some years; but, in course of time, she, too, cast in her lot with the Primitives, and remained a member till her decease. No doubt, the fact of her husband and some of her children having become identified with our people was a chief reason why she united with them. Of late years, she generally resided at Newark, and she was much esteemed by our friends there, and received many tokens of kindness from several of the members. As she advanced towards the grave, she gave proof of a meetening for her future home. I was gratified on several occasions, when I had an opportunity of visiting her, to find that she was increasingly devoting her thoughts and time to the subject of preparing for heaven. Several months ago I engaged to preach and lecture at Newark on the 18th of January, and following three days, and the prospect of seeing me was very consolatory to my dear mother in her then feeble state of health; but I little expected that I should have to see her depart from earth to heaven during my visit, and to remain to witness her interment ere I could return to London. But so a gracious Providence ordained. On my arrival on the Saturday, Mr. Daykin, who kindly met me at the railway station, intimated that my mother was very near her end, and was anxious to see me. I found her suffering severely under bronchitis and inflammation of the lungs, but perfectly conscious, and happy in the Saviour. My brother Samuel met me at her house the same night, and took his last leave of her; and several other members of her large family saw her, and afforded her the consolation of a sight of them before her departure. She was much interested about our Sabbath services, though she could not be with us. Her afflictions were heavy, but grace sustained her. I was permitted to have several conversations with her, and repeatedly offered prayer to our Heavenly Father in her behalf, and I realised the sweetest satisfaction one can enjoy under such circumstances. The pain of bereavement is distressing, but our loss is her gain. I am assured she is now far from all the sorrows and sufferings of her probationary state, and enjoying the glory of the heavenly world. She had been through life industrious, economical, honest, persevering, and prayerful; and I owe much to her as one of the most attached and excellent of mothers. She had her share of the trials of life, and sometimes her spirit seemed chafed by affliction; but her steady aim was to "glorify her God below, and find her way to heaven." Her sons and daughters are under great obligations to her, and will ever revere her memory; and many of her early and later friends feel her absence very sensibly, but indulge the cheering hope of meeting her again "in the good land and Canaan."

The following lines were sent to me some days after her decease by Mr. Joseph Fawcett, of Sunderland, and express very touchingly his estimate of the departed one. He writes:—

"When I was last at Derby, I had the pleasure of meeting with your dear mother, was very much pleased with her society, and promised that on my next journey to Newark I would call upon her, and I think I never enjoyed two hours more in my life. She was just recovering after five weeks' illness. I read the Scriptures, and we prayed together, and it was truly, "good to be there." She seemed to be like a stock of corn ripening for the garner above. I thought this morning what pleasure I should have in calling upon her on my next visit to Newark; but the pleasure is denied me; she has been taken "from the evil to come;" and I have no doubt that, being "absent from the body, she is present with the Lord;" she has gone to be "with Christ, which is far better." It was fortunate that you happened to be down at the time, for I have no doubt it would be a great consolation to her to have you with her in her last moments. I offer you my condolence under your bereavement. May we be also ready!—J. FAWCETT."

She is interred at Cauntton, in the same grave as my dear father, who died in 1847, and together their dust will sleep till the trump of the archangel awake us all on the morning of the resurrection. May all her family meet her at the right hand.

"When soon or late we reach that coast,
O'er life's rough ocean driven,
May we be found, no wanderer lost,
A family in heaven." Amen.

EDITOR.

MONTHLY SUMMARY.

Two of the ablest of Biblical scholars have recently passed away to their rest beyond the skies, namely, Dr. EDWARD ROBINSON, of America, the author of "Biblical Researches," a "Greek and English Lexicon of the New Testament," a "Harmony of the Four Gospels," and other valuable works; and RUDOLPH STIER, of Germany, author of "Words of the Lord Jesus," and various Biblical commentaries. Dr. ROBINSON was sixty-nine years of age, and STIER somewhat over sixty. Both rendered eminent service to the cause of evangelical Christianity, and both were contemplating other works when called home. STIER died at Eiselsen, the place where Martin Luther was born and died.

The Church of England is evidently uneasy. Colenso is not the only troublesome bishop just now. Dr. Gray, of Cape Town has given great offence to the evangelical party by his High Church attempts upon the Island of Madagascar. He regards the success of the London Missionary Society there with jealousy, and therefore affects to ignore it, and to be deeply concerned for the conversion of the natives; and, of course, the appointment of a bishop looms before him. Dr. Pusey and others have commenced a crusade against Professor Jowett, at Oxford, on account of his heterodoxy. It is a little surprising to find Dr. Pusey so anxious for the orthodoxy and purity of the Church, his antecedents being remembered. "Is Saul also among the prophets?" is not yet an obsolete question. The Society for the Propagation of the Gospel has taken the name of Colenso from among those of its presidents or vice-presidents, and the bishops have given him a polite hint of their wish for his resignation, but to this hint he unequivocally replies he has no intention of tendering his resignation just yet.

The London Missionary Society held a large meeting, on February 17, in Freemasons' Hall, London, the Earl of Shaftesbury in the chair, for the purpose of promoting the scheme of chapel building in Madagascar. Of the £10,000 wanted for the object, it was stated £6,600 had already been contributed by fewer than four hundred individuals. Earl Shaftesbury, Dr. Tidman, the Rev. S. Martin, the Rev. W. Arthur (Wesleyan) and others, ably urged the matter on the meeting. Four chapels are to be built, and four additional missionaries to be sent out. The Congregational Chapel-building Society reports that three hundred memorial chapels, in connection with the bicentenary movement, have been opened, commenced, or projected to be completed by the end of 1864.

The Report of the London Congregational Association, of which the Rev. J. H. Wilson is secretary, is highly satisfactory. It shows that though there exists a vast amount of spiritual destitution in this Christian metropolitan city, yet there was never more done for the evangelisation of the masses than at the present time. There are now as many chapels belonging to Protestants in London as there are churches—viz., four hundred of each, and the increase in the ten years, from 1851 to 1861 is as follows:—Churches, 50, and chapels, 89; of this latter number the Congregationalists provided 40; the Baptists, 17; the United Presbyterians, 4; the Wesleyans, 11; and other bodies the remainder. The Roman Catholics have increased in the same period from 21 chapels, with 50 priests, to 34 chapels with 80 priests—the increase being chiefly through the importation of Irish labourers, who find employment on the new buildings of the metropolis. But among the causes for gratitude which exist in the midst of our Congregational friends there are some for anxiety. Professor Godwin, of New College, has caused a good deal of discussion by the publication of his questionable views on faith. His book is the "Congregational Lecture," and should not, certainly, have been made the vehicle of unsound theology. The council of the college has had to take the matter up; but it seems that nothing decisive has been done.

We hear the Wesleyan Missionary Society has felt the pressure of the times latterly, as its ordinary income is said to be some £12,000 below that of the previous year. The Rev. J. Maughan, missionary of the New Connexion, reports progress in a very interesting letter from Australia, and Dr. Krapf writes encouragingly of the Methodist Free Church mission in Africa.

The Sunday closing of public-houses is being agitated with increasing energy, and, we hope, with increasing prospects of success. Several petitions have lately been presented to Parliament in favour of the movement. The Sunday Rest Association has also held a meeting under the presidency of Dr. Longley, the new Archbishop of Canterbury. The object is to secure the closing of tradesmen's shops on the Sabbath, and many tradesmen themselves are anxious for the success of the effort.

The following extract from the Patriot will show that the spirit of bigotry is not yet dead in the land:—

"LORD DARTMOUTH AND THE BAPTISTS.
—The Particular Baptists of Blackheath, being urgently in need of a site for a chapel, applied to the Earl of Dartmouth to grant them, as lord of the manor, a bit of waste land, or to lease them a plot on his own estate. His lordship replied that there were considerable legal difficulties in the way, and added,—'Above all, there would be an insurmountable objection on my part to afford in any degree encouragement to those unhappy divisions which, it is to be feared, impede rather than forward the progress of true religion both at home and abroad.' Mr. Jones, the minister, through whom the application was made, very naturally upon this referred his lordship to the dissensions in the Establishment, and asked him whether there were any 'divisions' that could possibly impede religion at home and abroad like those. His lordship's agent then, on his behalf, distinctly declined to grant land for a building for public worship 'conducted on any other principles than those of the Established Church, of which his lordship is an attached member;' and he cannot imagine why his lordship should be accused of illiberality: in simply claim-ming the privilege to exercise the same liberty of conscience in declining to support any sect of Dissenters, that such Dissenters themselves exercise in declining to conform to and support the Established Church.' Seeing that Dissenters are at present obliged to support the Established Church by tithes and church rates, and that his lordship was simply asked to stand out of the way, and to remove an obstacle to the building of a chapel, his lordship's agent has not improved his case."

We are happy to learn that the friends of temperance are exerting themselves among the young men in mercantile establishments in London. Several meetings have been held in large warehouses by Messrs. S. Morley, Newman Hall, W. Tweedie, and other friends of the cause. We hope much good will be the result.

The Saturday Review, or as John Bright called it, the Saturday Reviler, has been mulcted in £50 damages for a libel on the Rev. Dr. Campbell. It is notorious as the vehicle of the slander which unfledged lawyers and others wish to vent upon all and sundry who are earnest for the progress of spiritual religion. Probably it may learn a little moderation by this decision. A Dr. Kenely has brought an action against the Weekly Review, a Presbyterian paper, because of a severe review published by its editor on a book the doctor had issued. The book was said to be filthy and obscene, but the doctor has now intimated he will not prosecute his case. Possibly he had not great hopes of victory. A society, called the Systematic Beneficence Society, has had a good meeting in London.

P O E T R Y.

THE PLEASURES OF SPRING.

Now reigns the lovely Spring in all her pride,
And spreads her verdant robe, adorn'd with flowers,
Around the fields and meads; they cheerful smile
In her gay livery drest; the whispering winds Breathe softly, and on their balmy wings convey Reviving sweets. The feathered choir awake
Their artless songs, and all th' enchanting scene
Is harmony and beauty: nature's charms
Subdue the heart, and every sense is fill'd.

But while the eye rolls o'er the blooming mead
With careless pleasure, or the list'ning ear
Attends the soothing music of the grove;
Think, whither does the soft enchantment tend?
Are nature's various beauties lent for this—
Only to please the sense? For nobler ends
The God of Nature gave them. Nature spreads
An open volume, where in every page
We read the wonders of Almighty power,
Infinite wisdom, and unbounded love.
Here sweet instruction, entertaining truths,
Reward the searching mind, and onward lead
Inquiring thought; new beauties still unfold,
And opening wonders rise upon the view.
The mind, rejoicing, comments as she reads:
While through the inspiring page conviction glows,
And warms to praise her animated powers.
How great, how glorious is the Sovereign Hand,
Which forms so beauteous every plant and flower,
And on the vegetable world inscribes,
In lively characters, his wondrous Name:
While active life speaks in a thousand forms
Power, wisdom, and beneficence Divine!
The parts of Nature, in their just proportion,
Uniting, harmonizing, blend to form
One perfect system; truth and beauty smile,
Inviting contemplation upward still,
From step to step; till, at their glorious source
Arriv'd, the soul in low prostration bends,
Adoring, with submissive silent awe,
The great Unsearchable, the wondrous Name,
Which creature praise can never, never reach!

Yours Affectionately
William Brewer

Barn 1810

THE Primitive Methodist Magazine.

---

MAY, 1863.

---

BIOGRAPHY.

MEMOIR OF THE REV. JOHN MORTON,

By his Brother, the Rev. J. MORTON, F.R.A.S., Wesleyan Minister, of Leeds.

THE late Rev. John Morton was born April 23rd, 1809, at Bradwell, Derbyshire, a scattered township remarkable for the rugged grandeur of the surrounding scenery, and for the robust health, strong common sense, and independent character of its population; great numbers of whom being freeholders of the soil or owners of mines, are happily uninfluenced by the dictations of a paramount proprietor, a state of society highly favourable to the spread of Christianity; hence this locality has been again and again visited by very gracious and extensive revivals of religion.

Bradwell has long been the head of a Wesleyan and also of a Primitive Methodist Circuit, and it has had the honour of sending forth eight of its hardy sons into the work of the Christian ministry; viz., two Wesleyans and six Primitive Methodists; of this number John Hallam and John Morton have been called to their reward, while Joseph Hibbs, Joseph, George, and Robert Middleton still survive.

John Morton was the eldest of ten children, and though not born to the possession of wealth, of hereditary honours, or of profound scholarship, his birth was connected with advantages of yet more substantial value; for his parents were decided Christians, and he had thus secured to him the unspeakable privilege of a religious training, enforced by the benign influence of a godly example at home. His mother, a strong-minded and superior woman, was converted to God at the age of about thirteen years; she was for forty-four years a member of the Wesleyan Methodist Society, and for a long time enjoyed and exhibited in her life and conduct the inestimable privilege of Christian holiness. Her end was glorious.

His father was the first to open a door to receive the Primitive Methodist preachers when they visited Bradwell, about the year 1819, at the same time allowing his barn to be used as a preaching place. A powerful revival of religion broke out and spread through the neighbourhood. George Morton now took charge of a class, and continued an official member of the Primitive Methodist Society during the remainder of his life. He ended his earthly course with a hope blooming with immortality, June 22nd, 1852. While they lived my late brother ever cherished towards his parents the most filial affection; after their removal by death he greatly venerated their memory, and rejoiced in hope of meeting them again in a better world. The references to them found in his journals are often affecting, exemplifying the sacred precept, "Honour thy father and thy mother, which is the first commandment with promise."

Eternity alone will unfold the full value of those impressions which John, in common with his brothers and sisters, received from the spirit, conversation and deportment of his father and mother. He was restrained from outward sin, taught to keep holy the Sabbath, and to attend regularly the services of God's house. Having been religiously trained, and possessing an even temperament, his conversion, which took place in 1821, was unmarked by any very striking outward change; he however at once united himself with the persecuted Primitive Methodists, whose labours by the blessing of God had brought him to the knowledge of salvation by the remission of sins; he took up his cross humbly and firmly, and never wavered, but became a consistent follower of Christ.

When the pardoning love of God is shed abroad in the heart by the Holy Ghost, and the soul is rejoicing with joy unspeakable and full of glory, that heart burns with zeal for the salvation of others. The young convert is anxious for a sphere of useful labour; how can he be passive while men are perishing in their sins? It was no small advantage to John Morton that his earliest efforts to do good were lovingly watched, wisely directed, and constantly encouraged by his parents, and always supported by their prayers; his mother entreating him to aim at personal holiness, as the sure foundation of extensive usefulness, and his father urging him to preach for souls. Their son would be sure to begin at the beginning, regularly attending the weekly class-meeting and prayer-meetings, where after a while he began to give a short exhortation to those who attended. He soon became the leader of a class, and while yet in his teens was counted fit to be employed as a local preacher, and in this work God owned his labours, making him the happy means of bringing souls to Christ, some of whom having died happy in the Lord, he has doubtless joined in the house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens.

About the close of the year 1828, Paul Sugden, a travelling preacher, visited Bradwell; he was in search of a young evangelist to labour with him in the word and doctrine. Finding his way to the house of George and Hannah Morton, he asked them to lend their first-born unto the Lord. Their son was not yet twenty years of age, it was hard to part with him, but they well knew that to preach the Gospel of the Saviour is the most glorious toil under heaven, and to be set apart to the special vocation of saving souls from eternal death the highest honour which can possibly fall to the lot of man; they therefore gave him up, and thus, amid many tears, and followed by the fervent prayers of many friends, he accompanied Paul Sugden to Wrockwardine Wood Circuit, and became the servant of the Church by whose labours he had been converted to God; the Church of his early choice, and which he continued to love and serve to the end of his days.

The path of a young itinerant minister is beset with temptations and snares; he often finds himself in the midst of difficulty and trial, and no one more frequently needs counsel and encouragement. John Morton's parents were fully aware of this, and in a letter dated Bradwell, January 8th, 1829, they thus write to him: "Dear John, your letter was received with tears of joy; we are glad to hear of your prosperity, thanks be to God who giveth you the victory through our Lord Jesus Christ. Now, dear John, if you have souls for your hire, and seals to your ministry, give God all the glory; see that you glory in nothing save in the cross of Christ. You will have your difficulties to pass through, but pray that God may keep you in your own place, that is in the dust, at his feet; then you have every promise on your side. Now be a man of all prayer, lest you enter into temptation. As we have given you to the service of God, walk well-pleasing in his sight, and go on in the strength of the Lord. Live close to God, get Satan under your feet. We are all gratified to hear that you are well received in your circuit. We are striving for heaven."

His next circuit was Burland, where his labours were crowned with considerable success; here he was favoured with the friendship of a very hospitable Christian family, whose kindness he records in his journal, towards the close of his life, in the following terms: "Met Mr. John Taylor, of Burland Circuit, was extremely glad to see him. His mother was a mother to me at a time when I wanted one. Mr. John gave me a watch, and Mr. George Taylor gave me the kindest and best advice while I was in the Burland Circuit, and now that he and his mother are gone, I bear this, my humble testimony, that I have not found their like in any circuit where I have travelled, and I have met with many kind and excellent people."

After leaving Burland, he laboured one year in the Oswestry branch of the Prees Circuit, and the next two years he was stationed in the Tunstall Circuit, the first of which he spent in the Macclesfield and Congleton Branch, and the second in the Pillawell Branch of the same circuit. While here he had the rare honour of suffering imprisonment for preaching the Gospel of the Saviour in a much degraded part of the city of Hereford, an account of which is given in Petty's History of the Primitive Methodist Connexion, pp. 296, 297.

After being stationed at Kidderminster for one year he removed to Presteign, where he became acquainted with his first wife Ann Cambridge, who was to him a help-meet indeed, and of whom he always spoke in the most affectionate terms. This excellent woman ended her earthly course in great peace at Brierley Hill, September 30th, 1860. He remarks in his journal, "In her I have lost a good wife and true friend." He felt her loss very much;—an itinerant minister will specially feel the loss of a truly good wife; being necessarily much from home domestic matters in his absence are apt to go wrong;—hence he subsequently writes, "This day last year we buried the remains of my beloved wife. The year has been chequered; I have aimed to do the will of God, not my own. Many considerations induced me to marry again much too early for some of my would-be-friends. I cherish as sincerely the memory of my late wife as if I had remained unmarried until now. I desire in all things to glorify God; I aimed to do this in my second marriage."

During his ministerial life he had met with instances in which serious mistakes had been made by young persons entering into the married state, and where the connection did not result in an increase of happiness, but the very opposite, and his little books entitled, "The wife that will Suit You, and How to win Her," "The Husband that will Suit You, and How to treat Him," were written with a view to guide young people in this most important step, and to point out how married life may be made what God intended it to be, viz., a state of greater holiness, happiness, and usefulness to those who enter upon it. He found it so in his own case, and was wishful to lead others to the same blessedness.

The limits of this brief memoir will not admit of a detailed account of his labours in his different circuits; a simple mention of the stations which he occupied must suffice. After he left Presteign he exercised his ministry in the following stations:—Bishop's Castle, Prees Green, Cwm, Darlaston, Oswestry, a second time, Congleton, Dudley, Darlaston, a second time, Birmingham, Brierley Hill, and West Bromwich. His journals, which must now supply a few characteristics of the ministerial life of this devoted servant of God, do not contain a distinct record of his own religious experience; we may, however, clearly infer what that experience was, on the whole, from the spirit and temper in which he prosecuted his labours; and the journals furnish the most convincing evidence of his hearty and growing attachment to the doctrines, church order, and evangelical agencies of the Christian community of which he was a minister. In his estimation this community occupied the front rank among the means called forth by the special providence of God for the world's conversion. He wrote "Reasons for being a Primitive Methodist," and he did his best to work the system of Primitive Methodism in his various circuits, well knowing this to be the most effectual method of strengthening, extending, and increasing its usefulness.

It cannot be doubted that a yearning desire for the salvation of perishing souls should be constantly felt by every Christian minister, and it matters but little what other talents, gifts, or abilities he may possess, if he has not an abiding love for souls, leading to earnest efforts to bring them to Christ: without this, all else is as "sounding brass or a tinkling cymbal." Hear what my brother says, "Feel almost broken-hearted because the work here is so low." "Saturday is come again; I have laboured hard, and seen but little fruit this week." "I have prayed hard, visited much, and preached my best, but none converted. Why are not souls converted, Lord? Why?" "Oh, my God, no souls saved. What shall I do?" "Very powerful time, wonder no one was converted." "The camp-meeting was attended by at least two thousand persons; processions, praying, singing, preaching, and attention of the people all good. The lovefeast was good; five or six were made happy. Lord save more, many more." "This ends my three years' labours in ———. I have done some good, put some crooked things right, reduced the chapel debts, been respected, but I might have lived nearer to God and been more useful. May my successor be much more successful than I have been." These extracts referring to periods of his ministry, far apart, indicate that John Morton was actuated by a deep concern for the salvation of souls from eternal death. It is well known that he was a willing worker, not sparing himself; nor would any minister with these impressions of the great importance of succeeding in his grand undertaking fail to devote his whole strength to the work. It were easy to show that he sometimes, especially in the earlier years of his ministry, went even beyond his strength.

A successful minister is a man of much prayer; this brings down upon him the Holy Spirit, clothes him with power, gives point to his preaching, and makes it soul-saving. My late brother appears to have lived constantly in the spirit of prayer. On entering a new sphere of labour he prays, "Lord, bless us in this house, and make us a blessing to this circuit." Sending the new plan to the press—"May it give general satisfaction, and may God bless it." On the departure of two of his brothers, after paying him a visit, he writes, "Lord, save them both." If a society was in a low state, "Doing badly here, Lord revive us again." "They have taken a new place to preach in here, God bless the undertaking."

He attended with uniform conscientiousness to his preaching appointments—to visiting Sabbath-schools—to the discipline and management of the various societies, and as long as health permitted, he did a full average of pastoral visitation.

He well understood the importance of each department of labour, and its bearing on the prosperity and extension of the Redeemer's kingdom, that preaching the gospel is God's chosen means of bringing men to Christ, but he also knew that to ensure their growth in grace, so that they may be "steadfast, unmovable, always abounding in the work of the Lord," they must be carefully and diligently instructed in the apostles' doctrine, trained in the duty and practice of constant Christian fellowship and breaking of bread, and have afforded to them opportunities of exercising their gifts in prayer. The following extracts afford evidence of his deep interest in his circuit work : "Walked ten miles; people were in the harvest. I had only two to preach to, but I preached."—He once preached to one, from the words, "Forgive us our trespasses."—"I am very ill, yet I thought I would go to preach. About ten have been converted here of late, thank God." "I am not well enough to work, almost worn down, yet I keep on. Lord, help me." "This week I have been much oppressed with a bad cold, or I ought to have visited more families." Notwithstanding this remark, the journal shows that "forty-eight" families had been visited during this week of indifferent health. "Mr. Lea visited one side of the street and I the other; thus about two hundred families were visited." "Gave tickets; had travelled twenty-two miles; could not visit more." Six visits had been paid that day; and another day, after visiting nine families, he remarks, "People were not at home, therefore did not visit more."

His view of the importance of class meetings and 'good discipline was sound. He knew that it would be impossible to over-rate the value and advantage of the class-meeting to the individual and to the society at large; as a rule, providing, of course, that opportunities be equal, those who most love God, and most regularly attend the class-meeting, are the most exemplary, devoted, and useful Christians. This means of grace is one of the grand peculiarities of Methodism, and must not be allowed to fall into disuse. Other Churches languish for want of some such means of Christian fellowship and edification: they that fear the Lord love to speak often one to another. He again writes :—

"This society is very low; no good attention paid to the class." "Met the leaders; no 'class book was brought, therefore no proper leaders' meeting. Bad discipline this! Can we prosper with this and other neglects! I think not. Lord, have mercy upon us" Again, "The revival services put aside the leaders' meeting, which I think deplorable; nothing can be a substitute for proper management."

Towards the latter end of the year 1859, my brother's good health gave way. He had serious apprehensions that Brierley Hill would be his last circuit. Symptoms of hydrocele began to be developed, but through the blessing of God upon a surgical operation, very skilfully performed in the following spring, by Oliver Pemberton, Esq., of the General Hospital, Birmingham, he was soon able to resume his work, though with abated strength. The strong nerve and fortitude with which he endured this operation, and the philosophical coolness with which he declined the use of means suggested for lessening its painfulness, drew forth admiration; and on the other hand, the valuable advice of Dr. Melson, always cheerfully afforded, the marked attention and complete success of Mr. Pemberton, the kindness of the friends at Brierley Hill, and above all, the goodness of God, called forth from him the warmest expressions of gratitude and praise. It soon became evident, however, to his friends, that the strong man was bowed down; he could not labour as theretofore.

About this time, too, he was deeply affected by the death of his brother Thomas, who, although yet comparatively young, had distinguished himself as an officer in the army, and who, after having been preserved through the perils of thirty-six engagements, was, in answer to prayer, permitted, by the good providence of God, to return home and receive honours and promotion, opening before him a bright future. Other painful bereavements soon followed, so that one page of his journal contains the record of five deaths of near relations, including his wife, to whom reference has already been made.

At the Conference of 1861 he was appointed to the West Bromwich Station, and was enabled to do his circuit work with tolerable regularity, until about the end of February, 1862, after which he only preached a few times. He, however, attended the District Meeting at Congleton, in May, where, in Stephen Street, in the open air, he preached for the last time, from the very appropriate words, "Let us hold fast the profession of our faith without wavering, for he is faithful that promised." In the District Meeting lovefeast he spoke in that plain, calm, and forcible manner so peculiar to himself. Referring to the complaint from which he was then suffering, he said, "I shall get worse and worse, for I am about to die. I may live to see the harvest over, and then I shall leave the earth and go to heaven." Then, referring to the vault he had prepared for his first wife, he said, "I have a nice, comfortable grave awaiting me, where sleeps my dear wife." While these words are very characteristic of the man, they are prophetic of his end, and remind one of the Christian philosopher calmly hailing death.

The last public service in which he engaged was at the laying of the corner-stone of the new chapel at West Bromwich Square, Hill Top. The stone was laid by a Wesleyan, the Wesleyan new school-room was kindly lent for the tea and public meeting, many of the speakers were Wesleyans; a Wesleyan minister had also the pleasure of preaching two of the opening sermons, and was greatly delighted to see himself once more surrounded by his old and esteemed friends, who were the most liberal supporters of this important undertaking. My brother did not live to see the chapel opened, but in reference to the stone-laying, he records in his journal, "the Wesleyan friends rendered amazing aid, and the affair was a great success;" but he also says, "The day after I was much worse for the labour and excitement." His strength was gone, his end was near; death was visible in his countenance, internal disease was making rapid and fatal progress, no remedies could reach it, no medical skill could counteract it, the cold hand of the last enemy had firmly grasped his vitals, and nothing could make him relax his hold. The friends at West Bromwich, the relatives of her who is now his widow, and others were exceedingly kind, but all was in vain. His work was done, and the voice of the Master was heard calling his servant home from the field of toil to the labourer's rest and reward in heaven.

The nature of his last affliction, and the manner in which he met death, will be seen from the following extract:—"He died, as I anticipated during life, from cancer originating in the stomach. Happily this worked its evil way without inducing, until the last few weeks, much suffering; and when this came, you well know how the strong faith of the good man lessened even the bitterness of this. There was no remedy for the disease; we could only detect its presence, and anticipate its effects. You thank me for my poor services rendered to your brother. Believe me, dear sir, that I never gave any services so cheerfully, and never witnessed any death-bed that gave me such unalloyed and indescribable feelings of admiration for a really simple-minded, trusting Christian believer, as that of your brother: With kind regards, I remain, dear sir, most truly yours, Oliver Pemberton."

My brother died, as he had lived, an even-minded, placid, faithful servant of Christ, who, though he was not favoured with any remarkable ecstasy, was yet happily exempt from those fierce and powerful temptations of Satan by which so many good men are often assailed in the hour of nature's weakness and final dissolution. In a letter to myself, shortly before his death, after describing the symptoms of his complaint, and well knowing that his end was very near, he says, "Yet I do not feel like a dying man. I fear sometimes I am too quiet, too easy; yet I rest on the Atonement, I trust in Christ, and am calm, peaceful, and free from doubt or anxiety." Thus his dying experience was a comment upon his last text; he held fast the profession of his faith without wavering, and found him faithful that promised.

In this confidence of faith, calmness of soul, free from doubt and anxiety, in the fifty-fourth year of his age, and the thirty-third of his ministry, John Morton passed away "from earth to heaven," Oct. 6th, 1862. His remains were interred at Brierley Hill, in the tomb already referred to. Being well known and much respected in the neighbourhood, his funeral was very numerously attended, both by ministers and friends wishful to pay the last mournful mark of respect to this devoted servant of the Lord.

The following sketch has been kindly prepared by one of my brother's former colleagues:—"I have the melancholy pleasure of furnishing you with some impressions of my late esteemed superintendent. I follow the order suggested in your note, and viewing him—1. As a man, first, intellectually, I may say, if his talents were not of the highest order, they certainly were very respectable; if not brilliant, yet (which is infinitely better) they were useful. The leading feature of his mind was a certain innate dignity of soul, which threw an air of magnanimity over all his conduct. This was very perceptible to any one on a first introduction to him. As a result of this he was frank, generous, and disinterested. His imagination, if not fertile, was lively, which considerably relieved the sober character of his pulpit ministrations. He had a discriminating judgment, and was wise as well as determinate; he had a quick penetration, a comprehensive knowledge of the world, an acute perception of moral right, and a felicity in discerning times and seizing opportunities, especially in connection with the appointment of revival and special services. His acquaintance with human nature, and his aptitude for illustration, are fully demonstrated in his small but valuable publications. Second, socially, he was discriminating in his friendships, but when formed, true and abiding. He was remarkably genial in his intercourse with his people, and a special favourite with their children, to whom he always paid kind attentions, and for whom he always had a varied and interesting fund of information, and it was gratifying to observe how he delighted himself in pleasing them. Under this head his candour should not be forgotten. Though this virtue was opposed to the native cast of his disposition, yet he was prompt in its observance when required. In cases demanding admonition, his candour was never compromised for friend or foe.

"2. As a Christian. The features which distinguished him as a man were sanctified by the influence of his religion. It is true that in his society the social rather than the religious elements seemed to preponderate, and his graces ordinarily did not shine so brightly as those of some; but that rich spiritual graces were possessed by him was always apparent, requiring but the circumstances, the trial or ordeal, to bring out their native lustre. He was an humble Christian, and his humility was deep and sincere; whilst filling positions of authority, he never lorded it over his brethren; he was never vain, proud, or disdainful, but seemed indeed clothed with humility. I have observed myself that when he gave advice, which he always did with acuteness and decision, he was quite superior to that littleness which is offended, if the counsel is not followed. Christianity taught him to check a little natural irritability, and to cultivate that wise and cool deliberation which grew with his experience. He was eager as a man, he was calm and considerate as a Christian.

"3. As a preacher. I had not the pleasure of hearing him frequently. My impression is that his preaching was remarkably plain, and when I so denominate it, I use the term in a complimentary sense, regarding plainness as constituting the greatest excellence of pulpit effort. He justly held in contempt undue attention to verbal niceties, rhetorical ornament, measured cadence, and all 'the start-theatric practised at the glass.' His statements of truth were scriptural; they were the great doctrines of the ruin and recovery of man, his disease and remedy, his poverty in himself, and his riches in Christ; and he dwelt more or less on all the branches of religion in their order. Whilst his preaching was plain and comprehensive, it was always adapted; the character of his discourse would often be moulded by the character of his audience; if the majority were young people or Sabbath scholars, his sermon would at once be suited to such. I recollect instances of this at camp-meetings, processional services, and other promiscuous gatherings peculiar to Primitive Methodism, when his remarks invariably had a present application. As a preacher, his moral courage should not be lost sight of; in persecution and imprisonment, how heroic!

"'Bold in his Master's cause, he earth and hell defied.'

"4. As a manager of a circuit, his acquaintance with the entire church polity of his own community was full and correct; this gave him power and authority, and secured for him deference in the Connexional official meetings. As a superintendent of a circuit, he acted kindly, but firmly and impartially. He looked well after the societies, and was a pastor as well as a preacher; he likewise gave due attention to chapel building, many now remaining as monuments of his zeal in this department of his work; yet he was not wont to erect spacious chapels and leave enormous debts for his successors to liquidate. Of this I have often heard him complain very bitterly and very justly. Of course he had his imperfections, like all the rest of us poor mortals. 'His frailties were those of man.' Peace to his memory. I think of it with tears, and shall always cherish it with respect."

---

MEMOIR OF MR. J. HAWKSWORTH.

JOHN HAWKSWORTH, the subject of this sketch, was born at Burton Grange, near Barnsley, December 23rd, 1781. Little is known respecting his early life, but his moral training seems to have been neglected.

On attaining to a proper age he was bound apprentice to his uncle at Woolley, a few miles from his native place. Nothing remarkable occurred during his apprenticeship, save that he indulged freely in youthful follies, and occasionally fell into sins of intemperance. Soon after the termination of his apprenticeship he entered into the marriage state, and in a few years became the father of a rising family; but instead of reflecting upon his increased responsibility, he still sought the gratification of his appetites and passions, and became a confirmed drunkard.

About the year 1810, however, it pleased the Lord to awaken him to a consciousness of his guilt and danger; he then sought mercy through faith in the Lord Jesus Christ, and was enabled to rejoice in the God of his salvation. At this time he united with the Methodist New Connexion, at Ardsley, where he had then taken up his abode. For some years he continued a useful and acceptable member of this branch of the Christian Church; when, sad to relate, he again relapsed into intemperate habits, and he remained for two years a miserable backslider.

In 1820 the Primitive Methodists found their way to Barnsley and the adjacent places, and the Lord graciously owned their labours. Brother J. Pollard, to whom we are indebted for the foregoing particulars, remembers with gratitude the entrance of our people into Ardsley. The Rev. W. Taylor was the preacher who missioned the village, and after he had sung up the street, “Stop, poor sinner, stop and think,” &c.

he conducted service in the open air, in the presence of a large assembly. Our late Brother Hawksworth was present on that occasion, and it was under an arousing sermon then preached from Genesis xix. 17, “Escape for thy life,” &c., that he was again smitten with deep conviction, and led to sorrow after a godly sort. A class of three members was shortly formed, and Brother Hawksworth became the leader. A new era in his history now commenced, and he gave evidence of his zeal for God and of his love to souls, by cheerfully consecrating his all to the Redeemer’s cause.

Some months after his conversion he began to exhort sinners to flee from the wrath to come, and in due time he became an accredited local preacher. The Barnsley Circuit was then wide, embracing many places which now belong to other stations, and frequently would our deceased brother walk above twenty miles on a Sabbath to preach the glad tidings of mercy. His preaching abilities were not of a high order, but his labours were always acceptable and useful. His punctuality secured him the confidence of his congregations, for he did not allow either distance or bad weather to prevent him from fulfilling his appointments. In our lovefeasts he was usually one of the first to bear his testimony for the Lord; and as he was the oldest local preacher in our station he was much respected by his brethren throughout the circuit.

For about two years previous to his death his strength had begun gradually to decline; but he was always ready to take an appointment when he had strength to do so. In his last affliction, which was of short duration, he rested fully on the great Atonement, and spoke of his death as his departure to his future home. This event occurred on the 10th of August, 1862, and was improved by Brother J. Pollard, on September 7th, in our chapel at Barnsley, from Psalm cxvi. and 15, "Precious in the sight of the Lord is the death of his saints," when many felt it good to be there.

GEORGE NORMANDALE.

---

MEMOIR OF MRS. MARIA SAUNDERS,

(LATE WIFE OF THE REV. W. E. SAUNDERS.)

MARIA, wife of William Edmund Saunders, was the second daughter of the late Mr. Ralph Brown, currier, of Newcastle-under-Lyme. She was born August 8th, 1825. The late John Brown, formerly the Newcastle-under-Lyme circuit steward, a man greatly beloved, was her brother. Her parents adhered to the Established Church, and she was baptized in infancy at the parish church.

Her brothers, John and Frederick, being both local preachers with us, she also attended the religious services at our chapel in the high-land, Newcastle, and in 1839 she received the assurance of the new birth, being then fourteen years of age. She had been deeply affected by conviction in the religious services of the chapel, but did not obtain the Divine answer of peace until after a prayerful and earnest covenanting with God in the privacy of her chamber.

She then became a member of Mr. Ralph Capper's class, and, with a boldness inspired by faith, she witnessed continually a good confession, and with a very wise regularity and constancy she used all the means of grace. She was a devout worshipper, ever feeling after God; and being naturally of a fervent spirit and prompt in action, she laboured with earnestness in the means of grace.

In 1844 she entered the marriage state, and commenced her itinerant life, which continued seventeen years and three quarters, she having been with me in ten stations. During her itinerant life, her labours were much owned of God in the salvation of souls, especially in class and prayer-meetings. In addressing herself to awakened sinners, and directing seeking penitents, she was an adept. Taking a kneeling position, she would pointedly ask, "Do you feel that you are a sinner?" In leading the mourner into faith, she presented the all-sufficiency of the crucified Saviour, and in prayer her hold of God was instant and powerful.

Early in her itinerancy the following incident occurred. The evening of the regular week-day service was a cold, dark, and stormy one in the winter season; the preacher was there, but besides him and

Mrs. Saunders, only three other persons attended, and they were females. The preacher proposed there should be no service, and commenced to tie on his cravat. This distressed Mrs. S., who thought perhaps one at least of those young women might wish to be saved, and she walked down the room towards where they sat, spoke personally to them, and found it to be as she had thought. She beckoned the preacher, and they prayed, and two of the three were converted. One of the two shortly afterwards died in the Lord.

For many years previous to January, 1859, the society at Wem in Prees-Green Circuit had been in a stationary condition, but then a revival commenced, without special means, in which Mrs. S. laboured with success, many of the converted claiming her as their mother in the Lord. This revival continued until the following Midsummer.

In her diary is the following entry: "On the 3rd of April, 1859, my children, Samuel and Anne Maria, found peace with God and were made happy. Samuel found liberty first, and then prayed earnestly for Anne Maria until she said she believed the Lord had saved her. Anne Maria says she is the Lord's little lamb, and she must not tell untruths now she is converted." Samuel's age was nine years, and his sister's six years.

A very blessed work of God took place in our society at Newcastle-under-Lyme in the spring and early part of the summer of the year 1862; about one hundred professed to be saved, many of whom Mrs. S. led to Jesus. In prayer and band meetings, and in street processions, her labours were abundant, perhaps increasingly so on account of our being in her native place, and among her early religious associates. She, with another praying member, covenanted to pray for her nephew, Mr. A. B., who was fast verging on moral ruin; soon after, he was among the converted, and still continues a happy and useful member with us at Newcastle. In several stations she has had the charge of classes as leader, and in one the superintendency of the Sunday school devolved upon her.

The immediate occasion of her death was hemorrhage of the lungs. During fourteen days she raised much blood, and suffered greatly through exhaustion; but a calm peace, a holy joy, and the confidence of hope seemed to carry her above the circumstances of her affliction. To avoid any exciting cause of hemorrhage, silence, as much as possible, had been imposed; but on the third day after her confinement to her room, she, with a look of composure, said to her husband, "If I die I shall be in heaven, you must be sure and meet me there." She was much exhausted next day; she awoke out of a doze, exclaiming, "Oh! praise the Lord!" She then explained that a sight of heaven open, and the approach of a chariot, had filled her with rapture and caused the exclamation. The surgeon came, and seeing how happy she looked, he said, "I would give the world to possess what you do!" She replied, "You can have it for less than that; give up all sin, and give your heart to God, and you will have it." Four days before death she was very happy, and desired to hear sung—

"Come sing to me of heaven," &c.

Distressing muscular spasms afflicted her three days before death. Once in the night she exclaimed,—

"Jesu's blood, through earth and skies, Mercy—free, boundless, mercy cries ;"

and then added, "The devil does not like that; he has tried to make unpleasant thoughts trouble me, but that was the victory." Frequently she said, "What should I do if I had religion to seek?" And often she wondered at the tenacity of life, saying, "The cords of the tabernacle seem long and difficult in loosing." The night of the 4th of September appeared likely to close the mortal strife; her two children came one after the other to her bedside, and, placing her hand upon each one's head, she prayed for each, but oh! with what compass of prayer—with what close association with God—with what power and faith—such as only a mother, whose soul was full of Divine love for her children in prospect of immediate bereavement, could do. On the day of her death she calmly gave advice respecting funeral matters. As servants waiting the return of their Lord, so she calmly, and in willing readiness waited the moment of release: and it came at forty-five minutes past ten at night, when, without either a pain or a struggle, she exchanged mortality for life, September 5th, 1862, aged thirty-seven years.

It was deemed desirable, in the programme of the funeral services, to recognise our chapel; accordingly, at three o'clock her mortal remains were borne within the chapel, where, until half-past four, religious services were conducted by the Rev. J. Barnes. The congregation crowded the chapel, and a solemn and heavenly unction pervaded all. A very large procession then accompanied the corpse to the church and the grave, and a suitable hymn was sung in the street.

She was a devoted wife, a truly good mother, a holy Christian, and a zealous labourer for God in his beloved cause. The temperance cause also, and the United Kingdom Alliance for the suppression of the liquor traffic, shared her sympathies and cordial co-operation.

"In the dispensation of the fulness of times, when God shall gather together in one all things in Christ, both which are in heaven and which are in earth, even in him," there will be a blessed reunion of the sainted wife and the now sorrowing husband.

W. E. SAUNDERS.

MEMOIR OF MR. D. SCOTT.

MR. DARIUS SCOTT was born at Hilgay, in Norfolk, in the year 1784, and died at Saham, in the Brandon Circuit, September 6th, 1862. His parents led him to the house of God, and in his youth he maintained a strictly moral life. Nearly fifty years since, providence conducted Mr. Scott to Saham, where he heard the Gospel proclaimed by the Wesleyan ministers. The word, by the power of the Holy Spirit, pierced his heart. At length a resolution was formed to yield his all to God. Effort succeeded effort: the cross was seen, the atonement received, and the Holy Spirit took possession of his heart; salvation came to his soul, and all was peace and joy.

Circumstances which need not be named induced him to unite with the Primitive Methodists, and with the people of his choice our friend was always happy. The late Rev. J. Smith recommended Mr. Scott as a suitable person for our local preacher's plan, and his labours were always acceptable; and some have died in the triumph of faith who were brought to God by his labours.

The prosperity of the Saviour's cause was always to him the most important object, hence he laboured to secure it; and no reasonable distance, no common storm, would keep him from his appointed work. Brother Scott never disappointed a congregation; but when the field of labour was large, and the labourers were few, he took a large share of work in his own parish, and in distant places. In Saham a society was formed, a house was raised in which many have long worshipped, a Sabbath-school was also established, and a great many have been brought from the darkness of sin to the light of the truth at the place. Mr. Scott laboured on till compelled by age and infirmities to cease. And this was his greatest trial, to give up that work in which he had so much pleasure.

On Tuesday, September 2nd, he was taken worse than usual, and assisted to bed. He said but little; but O that happy countenance, so expressive of perfect resignation to the Divine will! There was no lingering after life, nor a wish to suffer less. His aged partner asked the state of his mind, and with great sweetness of expression, he said—

"Our souls are in his mighty hand,
And he shall keep them still;
And you and I shall surely stand
With him on Zion's hill."

And thus he sweetly fell asleep in the seventy-eighth year of his age, having been a member and local preacher with us about thirty-three years.

W. KIRBY.

MEMOIR OF MR. R. WINTERBOTTOM.

RICHARD WINTERBOTTOM was born at Rothwell, in the Leeds Second Circuit, in the year 1832. He was the son of poor parents, and lived according to the course of this world till about the thirteenth year of his age. Whether any attention was paid to his education and moral culture during this important period of his life, does not appear; yet it is stated that he was during this time, the subject of Divine influence: God's Spirit strove with him, to incline him from evil to good. His family having removed to Hunslet, he was now sent to the Baptist Sabbath school, and he continued to attend it for about two years. Special revival services being held in our Hunslet Chapel at this time, our brother was drawn to attend. These services were lively and powerful, a gracious unction attended the various exercises, and the result was a considerable revival of religion. While saints were edified, sinners were awakened and constrained to sue for pardoning mercy at the throne of the heavenly grace. Amongst these was the subject of these lines.

Having "tasted the good word of God, and the powers of the world to come," he felt it a duty and a privilege to cast in his lot with our people at Hunslet; and he remained a steady and consistent member to the day of his death. The reality of his conversion was soon verified by his careful endeavour to walk holily and justly before God, and unblameably before men. His piety shone with a bright and softened lustre; simplicity and godly sincerity marked his career. Though but young in years, his fervent and active spirit yearned for a suitable sphere of usefulness; and he therefore tendered his services to our Sabbath School, and was entrusted with the care of a class suited to his capabilities.

As a teacher, he was very regular, attentive and zealous. Not contented with the bare routine of hearing his class read and spell, he endeavoured to impress Divine truth upon their consciences, and to simplify it to their apprehension. And it appears that he was successful, and by apt, but familiar illustrations, was enabled to impart more real instruction, than a stiff and formal method would have allowed him to give. And furthermore, it is not to be overlooked, that his method gained him much more esteem and attention amongst his juvenile auditors, than any other course of tuition would have done. No wonder his class soon began to love and appreciate him, for he loved them; and, as far as in him lay, he endeavoured to make them wise unto salvation.

At the December Quarterly Meeting of 1852 he was appointed to accompany Brother C. Atkinson in taking his appointments, and to speak a little as occasion served. He endeavoured in this new department of labour to use his utmost capabilities for the glory of God and the spiritual good of his fellow-men. In due time he became an approved local preacher. His pulpit labours, though not quite up to the taste of some, were acceptable to the generality of those who sat under his ministrations. The plain and practical predominated in his addresses. Best of all, however, it is stated that Divine unction attended his word, and souls were awakened and saved. Punctuality was a peculiarly characteristic feature of our brother's deportment; hence his attendance on the means of grace, at his Sabbath-school duties, and public pulpit labours, he was alike "steadfast, unmoveable, and always abounding in the work of the Lord." What he did, he did from love to Christ, and a sense of obligation. As a consequence, he was much esteemed, both in the Church of Christ and in the world. But his general health was never very good, and his system seems to have been very susceptible of derangement. This further gave him opportunity to prove "the perfect power of godliness," and aided the development of his moral excellences. Even in affliction's furnace he could magnify the grace of Christ. After enduring and rallying from repeated prostrations of his strength, he came forth more purified and quickened, more earnest and laborious, more humble, patient, meek, and submissive.

But early in last July he was again laid aside from work by his constitutional malady. He shortly rallied a little, and it was hoped he would again "come forth as gold seven times purified." Not so this time: he relapsed, gradually sank, and languished till September 8th, when his blood-washed spirit departed, "to be with Christ, which is far better." He was in the thirtieth year of his natural life, half of which he had spent in the bosom of Christ's Church, and a third of which he had devoted to the promotion of religion, as far as his limited capabilities would allow, and in some senses beyond them. The society mourned the loss of so useful a member; and all who knew him testified their respect both in words and deeds. He left a bereaved wife and infant to feel their loss: may his God preserve and bless them.

G. W. ARMITAGE.

---

MEMOIR OF MR. J. HOBSON.

THE late James Hobson, of South Elmsall, Pontefract Circuit, departed this life September 15th, 1862, aged thirty-three years. He was born at Hootton Levitt, near Rotherham, of irreligious parents, who were in a humble station in life. His religious privileges were very limited, neither being led to the house of God, nor sent to a Sabbath or week-day school. Being brought up in great ignorance of spiritual things, his evil propensities were unchecked; hence up to eight or nine years ago he lived after the course of this world. About that time he received his first religious impressions, under the ministry of E. Brooke, Esq., of Huddersfield. After considerable mental distress, he realized a sense of sins forgiven. Removing to South Elmsall, he united with our people in church fellowship, and was made very useful in the erection of a neat house of worship. Having learned to read, principally under the instruction of his wife, and being devotedly pious, he was placed on the plan as a prayer-leader. Rapidly improving in speaking capability, and being generally acceptable, he was soon put among the accredited local preachers. Soon after he was admitted on the plan, he was also appointed class-leader, which office he filled with great satisfaction. In the village where he resided he was much respected ; his employers speak of him in the highest terms, and indeed all bear one testimony, that “he was a good man.” His piety was sincere, progressive, and unassuming ; his character upright, inoffensive, and unwavering. He was a loyal Primitive Methodist, a dutiful and trustworthy servant, a kind and loving husband, an affectionate father, an acceptable preacher, and a devoted and earnest Christian.

His health began to give way some time before his last illness. He felt persuaded that his end was nigh. When at work, feeling unwell, his mind at times was distressed on account of his wife and small family ; but he would pass away his grief and fears by singing the 836th hymn which was a favourite. The last time he was at the class he expressed to his members his conviction that he would not have the privilege of leading them any more. His last affliction was very severe, but he bore it with patience and resignation. Before his departure he spoke of heavenly things in a most interesting manner, intimating that glorified spirits were present. With his remaining strength and expiring breath, he repeated, with great emphasis, the last verse of the hymn named above—

“ Give joy or grief, give ease or pain,
Take life or friends away ;
But let me find them all again,
In that eternal day.”

He has left a mourning widow and four small children to the watchful care of Him who has said, “Leave thy fatherless children ; I will preserve them alive ; and let thy widows trust in Me.” May they meet him again on “ That clear mount

Where happy souls shall meet,
And with transporting joys recount
The labours of their feet.”

H. COOKE.

---

D I V I N I T Y.

---

THE ROYAL MARRIAGE.

A SERMON PREACHED BY THE REV. WILLIAM SAUL, OF STOKESLEY.

On the occasion of the Marriage of His Royal Highness, Albert Edward, Prince of Wales, to Her Royal Highness, Princess Alexandra of Denmark, March 10th, 1863.

“ And Jesus answered and spake unto them again by parables, and said, The kingdom of heaven is like unto a certain king, which made a marriage for his son, and sent forth his servants to call them that were bidden to the wedding : and they would not come. Again he sent forth other servants, saying, tell them which are bidden, behold, I have prepared my dinner; my oxen and my fatlings are killed, and all things are ready: come unto the marriage."—Matthew xxii. 1—4.

THE method of communicating religious instruction is not uniform, but various. Parables are not only among the most ancient modes, but they occupied a prominent place in his method who "spake as never man spake." For this preference many reasons might be assigned. The Saviour foresaw that if he proclaimed himself on every occasion as the Messiah he would raise a prejudice against his character and mission, and thus hinder the success of many an important lesson. He used parables also in gracious accommodation to the weakness and infirmities of his disciples. Moreover, it is not easy to convey a comprehensive knowledge of Christian doctrine to the masses of mankind through the medium of abstract reasoning or by the use of express terms. The poverty of human language is such that the sacred writers constantly describe the love of God to man, and the process of his grace upon the soul, by terms borrowed from the visible creation and sensible objects. Is the compassion of our heavenly Father to be illustrated? We are told "his bowels yearn" towards us. Is it our future glory that is to be revealed? Then the representations are borrowed from the sources of human delight and childish pleasure; from banquets and marriage feasts; from beautiful houses and palaces; from brilliant stones of various hues, and precious metals; and from green trees and pleasant fruits.

In the twenty-nine parables recorded by the four evangelists, what great and pregnant truths are illustrated by means of some familiar imagery or striking comparison! Thus, those of the "Good Shepherd" and the "Lost Sheep" would lead a pastoral people like the Jews to the sheep of which Christ is the shepherd, needing the most watchful care and protection, liable to go astray into the thorny paths of sin and error, and demanding the powerful control of divine grace and authority to guide their souls into green pastures and by still waters. So, again, the parable of the "Royal Marriage Feast" would in a convincing manner proclaim the exhaustless riches of the Divine Being who spreads a table of fat things, and welcomes not the great ones only, but all, without exception, to eat and drink, and bless his name.

In adverting more particularly to the passage read out, let us first explain, and then apply the doctrine of the parable.

We need not particularize on every part of the parable. Perfect correspondences in every particular are not intended in figurative language, for then the image would be no longer an image. The phrase, "The kingdom of heaven," generally refers to an event or state of things in which the power, the authority, or the glory of God is conspicuously displayed, as the fall of Jerusalem, the calling of the Gentiles, the final judgment, the bliss of the Church triumphant; but in this place it refers to the dispensation of his grace in the person and work of Christ. God is the king ; his Son our Saviour. By the servant sent forth may be meant prophets, apostles, and ministers, who are his messengers ; the marriage, the incarnation or union of the Divine in the human nature ; the feast means the blessings of the new and better covenant, to the reception and participation of which all are invited.

But why are Christ and his fulness compared to a marriage ? Evidently because in that state, it is the arrangement of Divine Providence that the greatest of all earthly happiness is to be found. Without it human beings were unsocial and solitary ; rough, hard, uncouth, and almost unfeeling creatures. Rob the heart of the passion of love, and life is not worth having ; youth has nothing to enjoy, and age has nothing to remember with delight. And without marriage, without selection, without single attachment, what is love ? The passion is still the same, but leading to a long list of woes instead of pleasures ; plunging, in short, a whole community into the unbearable miseries of debaucheries, robbing children of the care and protection of parents, and scattering a devastating blight upon every green thing. In addition to being the most intimate and solemn contract by which two persons can bind themselves, marriage is also the source of most of the virtues, upon the cultivation of which the prosperity and happiness of families and nations mainly depend. It was from such and similar considerations that we recently participated in the joyous nuptial festivities between the Prince of Wales and the Princess Alexandra of Denmark, upon whose future career we devoutly pray that the blessing of God may rest.

In what sense or particulars may the kingdom of heaven be likened to a royal marriage ? We remark—

I. IN THE PRELIMINARIES TO THAT EVENT. Much has been made of Eastern marriages, but could they exceed the magnificence and grandeur, the pageantry and parade of the royal pair on Saturday, the 7th of March ? From Gravesend to London, and from London to Windsor, their progress was one unbroken succession of beauty, abundance, and display. History, at any rate English history, has not its parallel on record. It formed a picturesque and an advantageous contrast with similar events of our previous royal celebrations. Fancy you see the bride and bridegroom seated in the royal carriage, arrayed in splendid apparel, ornamented with jewels, one of which cost £10,000, preceded and followed by a long train of attendants, surrounded and deafened by the acclamations of loyal enthusiastic multitudes,—and you may form some idea of the preparations for a royal marriage.

But what was the character of the preliminaries for celebrating the union of those widely distant natures which constituted the son of the certain king named in the parable, the God-man, the Mediator ? It was the custom of eastern monarchs, when they travelled, to have harbingers going before them, to give notice of their approach, and likewise to prepare the way and remove obstacles? And was there no voice to proclaim the way of the Lord, and make straight in the desert a highway for our God? In the displays for the Prince's marriage the noble and wealthy were principally regarded. But notwithstanding the costly preparations and magnificent ceremonials of Windsor Chapel on the 10th of March, I take it for granted that those who were honoured with the first information of the coming of Emmanuel, "God with us," enjoyed as his harbingers a much more sublime and delightful entertainment. Scarcely were our first parents placed in the garden of Eden than the magnificent preparations commenced, and they stretched over a period, not of a few weeks, but four thousand years. From the beginning to the close, all the prophets made it their leading theme to honour him as the Divine Bridegroom. The testimony of Jesus was the spirit of prophecy.

Wonderful as it may appear, it was nevertheless a reality, when the imaginations and works of man were only evil from his youth, and the whole human race were dead in sin, tied and bound by the fetters of the wicked one, and, bending under the wrath of the Almighty, had sunk in deep mire, where there was no standing, and the pit was about to swallow them up, He, "the fairest among ten thousand, and altogether lovely," disrobed himself of his kingly purple, and gave it to others; he would not retain his white linen for himself alone, but presented it to humanity for a beautiful garment, and decorated the "worm Jacob" with his splendid attire, with his jewels, and chain, and crown.

II. IN THE NUPTIAL REJOICINGS. As the marriage union is one of the most intimate nature, so it is one into which the parties usually enter freely, and without compulsion. And the case is exactly parallel with respect to the incarnate Son of God. The proof of this is abundantly unfolded in the prophecies of the Old Testament, and in the express declarations of Christ himself. "His delights were with the sons of men." Sweet and refreshing as were his manifestations to his people under the old covenant, the relationship was too distant, the friendship was too cold. He thence became incarnate—our Kinsman, our Brother. Yet what we can say respecting this great mystery is as nothing; for even the seraphim, who, now for nearly two thousand years since this great event, have looked into this abyss of love, and vainly tried to fathom it, and the matter of all whose astonishment is derived from the cleft rock, from the living fountain—even they cannot fully declare it.

This doctrine is the very pillar and ground of the truth, the only foundation of the world's hope. We do not say that the human nature of Christ, considered by itself, possesses the attributes of Deity, or is the proper object of worship; nor do we say that God could suffer, bleed, or die. But we do teach that the human nature was so intimately associated with the divine that the properties and actings of each nature are justly ascribed to the one person of Christ, the God-man.

In consequence of this mystical union, he is not a weak, but a powerful Saviour, equal to his vast designs, and every way fitted to fulfil them. O happy union! O blessed coalition of parties! A divine person in the human nature!

“O for such love, let rocks and hills
Their lasting silence break,
And all harmonious human tongues
The Saviour's praises speak.”

Who does not recollect that impressive portion of the fortieth Psalm, the close application of which to the character and mission of Christ, forbids us to consider it in any other light than as an inspired prediction of the one atoning sacrifice for sin? The sacrifices of the Mosaic economy, though for a season a shadow of good things to come, God could not delight in, they being insufficient for an atonement for human guilt, and for the satisfaction of divine justice; and having demanded a higher price than the whole world could give, his own well-beloved Son proffered his own humiliation, for the fulfilment of those ancient promises of a Redeemer mighty to save, which were written in the volume of the Book of Eternal Truth. Hence it is that in the forty-fifth Psalm, the Psalmist ascribes to the Divine Bridegroom those graces for which he alone is pre-eminent. Listen to the sublime address:—“Thou art fairer than the children of men. Full of grace are thy lips, because God hath blessed thee for ever.” Then follows an all hail! for the Captain of our salvation, whose doctrines shall fill the world as the waters cover the sea. “A sceptre of righteousness is the sceptre of thy kingdom.” Thou hast the most undisputed title to reign. “Thou hast loved righteousness and hated iniquity, therefore God, even thy God,” in covenant hath anointed thee, to thy mediatorial office, with the Holy Ghost, or the most immeasurable fulness of spiritual gifts and graces. Then from the 9th to the 17th verse you have the most extraordinary description of the nuptial rejoicings, commemorative of the adoption of the Gentile nations as his church and spouse. By the spices named may be signified the graces of Christ for the consolation and blessing of the church, which is spoken of as a queen robed in a vesture of gold, worked with many colours, and attended by even kings' daughters, in accordance with another prophecy:—“All kings shall fall down before him, all nations shall do him service.” Then follows the instruction of the Husband to his newly-affianced bride—“Hearken, O daughter, and consider; forget also thine own people, and thy father's house.” Being the offspring of the world, the bride is counselled to renounce her natural attachment to the world, and centre all her affections upon him who is her Lord God; “so shall the King greatly rejoice and have pleasure in thy beauty; and then shall the riches of all nations be laid at thy feet. Thy Maker is thy Husband the Lord of hosts is his name, and thy Redeemer, the Holy One of Israel, the God of the whole earth, shall he be called."

What infinite distance is here ! But, O happy reconciliation ! O blessed union ! If men are not impressed with this amazing love, or do not feel its powerful force, their hearts are hard indeed ; if they will not be struck with deep astonishment at this, heaven and earth will unite in arraigning their more than inanimate stupidity and in wondering that such a degree of insensibility should dwell in human hearts. But God's ways are not like our ways, nor his thoughts like our thoughts :—which leads us to consider—

III. THE FEAST PROVIDED. To this the Saviour himself invites us as being superior to our richest dainties. "Labour not for the bread which perisheth, but for that which endureth unto everlasting life. I am that bread of life." That is, believe on the incarnate Son of God, whose atoning sacrifice is the food of the soul ; resort to him as the support of your spiritual hopes, as you do to daily food for the support of the body. This is what is meant by eating the flesh and drinking the blood of Christ, or feeding upon his body ; that is, partaking of the blessings which he died to procure. These are called promises or things promised, and freely bestowed upon all who apply for them in the appointed way. The minister, in preaching Christ, holds out in God's name and on his behalf, the offers of mercy and salvation ; then faith in the hearer appropriates these blessings to himself. He knows and feels that they are for him as well as for others : and when he honours God by trusting his declared willingness to bestow them, God honours his faith by imparting the desired good. All is of grace through faith. When we believe in Christ we receive the blessings of his atonement, and we know that he dwells in us by the Spirit which he gives unto us.

The blessings of salvation, illustrated by reference to a feast, would strike the Jews very powerfully, for they knew more about feasts than any people in the world. And besides such representations being adapted to them as a dull, gross-minded, and imperfectly civilized people, living under an inferior dispensation, they were also intended to illustrate the redemption which Christ came to obtain for us. Almost every extraordinary event in their history was commemorated by a feast, but they had three of a distinguished kind—the Feast of Passover, the Feast of Pentecost, and the Feast of Tabernacles. The Passover lasted seven days, and commemorated the angel's passing over the families of the Hebrews, and the deliverance from the bondage of Egypt ; the second, the Pentecost was kept fifty days after the Passover, and was called the feast of harvest,—the first-fruits of which were presented to God,—and lasted but one day ; and the third, the Feast of Tabernacles, was designed to keep in remembrance the dwelling of the Israelites in tents in the wilderness,—and it lasted eight days.

The analogy of the Jubilee to the Gospel dispensation is referred to by Christ himself on the occasion of his quoting the first and second verses of the sixty-first chapter of Isaiah: "The Spirit of the Lord is upon me, because he hath anointed me to preach the gospel to the poor; he hath sent me to heal the broken-hearted, to proclaim deliverance to the captives, and recovering of sight to the blind; to set at liberty those who are oppressed; to proclaim the acceptable year of the Lord." No wonder after he added, "this day is this Scripture fulfilled in your ears," that the listening people bore testimony to him, and were astonished at the gracious words which proceeded out of his mouth. What heights and depths of mercy! O Jesus, what could draw thee from thy heavenly paradise? What force could bring thee from the palace of thy glory? None but thyself; none but thine infinite love and unparalleled goodness.

And now let us pass on to the invitation, untrammelled as it is by restraint or qualification. God himself condescends to welcome us. Then, indeed, to say the least, this is expressive of his kind concern and good will. Every exhibition of his character, every utterance of his mind, every page of the Bible, proclaims his munificence, and his purposes of mercy to our guilty race. Now we have done nothing to deserve these kind attentions; we have done everything to forfeit them; we not only had no loyalty to the Great King, but we were in absolute rebellion against him. No Ethiopian was ever so black, no leopard was ever so spotted, as our inbred corruptions rendered us. We are, as Homer paints Thersites, a lump of deformity. Our best garments are filthy rags. Such worthless worms are, however, invited to the Royal banquet. If not welcome, we should not be sent for. It cannot be questioned that the terms of the invitation authorize us to invite all. The streams of his bounty are sufficient. "Him that cometh I will in no wise cast out."

Is it not grievous, then, to think what little value and esteem many have for the blessings of the new and better covenant? They would have minded no distance, regarded no weather, reckoned no expense, in fulfilling the wish of Her Majesty to sit down at the marriage supper of the Prince of Wales; but when their souls are famishing, and the King of kings invites them to his table, without money and without price, they make light of it. Behold the King of Glory inviting to this banqueting house men who prefer the husks which the swine eat, and would rather serve in hell than reign in heaven. Hence our Redeemer utters his heart-felt concern, "Ye will not come unto Me that ye might have life."

Its freeness engages our attention. When the great ones of the earth have anything valuable to bestow, they generally select the chief of their friends as the objects of their regard, and the poor are either put off with the refuse, or with that which is not worth the acceptance of any other. But it is not so here. However humble the persons, or indigent the circumstances, all are expressly included in the invitation to the "marriage of the Lamb." It is diffused in every point of direction from the centre to the circumference. Outward state makes no difference. The rich have no advantage over the poor. Contempt is poured upon none. The petty distinctions which prevail among men are not countenanced. Very early intimations were given that the invitation should sweep over the frontiers of geographical boundaries, and that Gentiles should be as welcome to the feast as Jews. Through the ages of the past, the servants of the Great King have been shouting out, "God shall enlarge Japheth, and he shall dwell in the tents of Shem." Abraham's card of invitation bore the inscription, "In thee and in thy seed all the families of the earth shall be blessed." Isaiah understood the bearings and extent of it, for he wrote seven hundred years before the advent, "The Gentiles shall come to thy light, and kings to the brightness of thy rising;" and our Saviour's declaration, that many should come from the east and from the west, and sit down with Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob; and that great peace should be preached to them who were afar off, as well as to those who were nigh, confirmed it, as the late events connected with the enlargement and extension of Messiah's kingdom abundantly show.

Then, again, the abundance of the provision referred to. "Behold I have prepared my dinner; my oxen and fatlings are killed, and all things are ready: come to the marriage." The immense love of God spared not his own Son, but made him to be sin for us, and obtained complete redemption, so that God can now be "just, and the justifier of him who believeth in Jesus." One knows not which most to admire, the majesty or the mercy of this invitation. Earthly monarchs would soon exhaust their treasures if all the poor and miserable applied to them for relief answerable to their wants and wishes; but the riches of God's storehouse are unsearchable and inexhaustible. The ransom was paid down:—

"The fund of heaven,
Heaven's inexhaustible, exhausted fund,
Amazing and amazed, poured forth the price,
All price beyond: though curious to compute,
Archangels failed to cast the mighty sum;
Its value vast, ungrasped by minds create,
For ever hides and glows in the Supreme."

The child which plays upon its mother's knee may not always understand her words; but the language of her smiles and the actions of her tenderness have to him a ready meaning, and he can comprehend and feel them. So it is here. "God so loved the world (every word is emphatic), that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have everlasting life. For God sent not his Son into the world to condemn the world; but that the world through him might be saved." This is speaking in act and deed, speaking in loud and intelligible language; and, tell it to the simplest child of nature, tell it to the wildest wanderer in the wood or the wilderness,—he can enter into its meaning. There is in all this transaction an overpowering manifestation of the kindness and love of God our Saviour towards man, "That not by works of righteousness which we have done," oh no! for we have none; "but according to his mercy he saved us, by the washing of regeneration and renewing of the Holy Ghost, which he shed on us abundantly through Jesus Christ our Saviour; that being justified by his grace, we should be made heirs of the hope of eternal life." This subject speaks to—

1. The Undecided. "Wherefore do ye spend your money for that which is not bread, and your labour for that which satisfieth not?" Why weary yourselves in seeking happiness where it is not to be found, hewing out for yourselves cisterns which can hold no water? Harken diligently unto me, saith the Lord, and let your souls delight themselves in fatness. He that comes to Christ shall never hunger, and he that believeth in him shall never thirst. The prophet Jeremiah has given a beautiful description and illustration of the two states of the believer and the unbeliever, in the way of contrast: "Thus saith the Lord, Cursed is the man that trusteth in man, and maketh flesh his arm, and whose heart is departed from the Lord. For he shall be like the heath in the desert, and shall not see when good cometh, but shall inhabit the parched places of the wilderness, in a salt land not inhabited. But blessed is the man that trusteth in the Lord, and whose hope the Lord is; for he shall be like a tree planted by the waters, and that spreadeth out her roots by the river, and shall not see when the heat cometh; but her leaf shall be green, and shall not be careful in the year of drought, neither shall cease from yielding fruit."

2. The Penitent. You have seen the vanity of creature attachments—the unsatisfying nature of worldly good. After spending much of your time and strength in the indulgence of sensual appetites, you are disposed to listen to the higher teachings of God's Word and Spirit. Bless God that you are welcomed, by infinite love and wisdom, to sit down at the table where you will find milk to nourish, wine to cheer, a treasure to enrich you, and a key to unlock and open the gates of heaven for you.

3. The Pious. You are to be congratulated. Going from strength unto strength you will in due time appear perfect before God in Zion above, when you shall participate in the joy and gladness of the marriage supper of the Lamb, gaze with glowing rapture upon the meat of your heavenly Father's table, and the sitting of his servants, and the attendance of his ministers, and their apparel, appropriating to yourself the exclamation of the Queen of Sheba at the court of Solomon—"It was a true report I heard in mine own land, and behold the half was not told me." "Beloved, it doth not yet appear what we shall be, but we know that when he shall appear we shall be like him, for we shall see him as he is." To the enjoyment of this unutterable bliss all the wise virgins shall be admitted at the coming of the Bridegroom. They that are ready shall go in with him to the marriage. An abundant entrance shall be given you into the everlasting kingdom of our Lord and Saviour, who will make you kings and priests for ever. O may we triumph so!

---

WORKS OF CREATION.

---

THE HUMAN EYE: ITS PHENOMENA AND ILLUSIONS.

No man living is entitled to speak on subjects of light and vision with more authority than Sir David Brewster. From an article in Good Words, abounding in passages of great interest, we select the following on "colour-blindness":—A very remarkable condition of the eye is that under which it is blind to certain colours. This colour-blindness, as it has been called, seems to be a modern affection of the eye unknown to the ancients. The earliest case of it was described by a Dr. Turberville, of Salisbury, who found it in a maid-servant, who could only see black and white, being blind to all proper colour. In consequence of Professor Dugald Stewart, Dr. Dalton, and Mr. Troughton being blind to certain colours, the subject has recently excited so much interest that the late Dr. George Wilson has written a whole volume on the subject. This defect is of three kinds:—1, an inability to perceive any colours but black and white; 2, an inability to distinguish browns, greys, and neutral colours; and 3, an inability to distinguish between red, blue, and yellow, and between green, purple, orange, and brown. The first of these varieties is very rare; three or four cases only are known, and these have been very imperfectly described. In the second of these varieties, the mere shades of the more compound colours are alone mistaken, such as browns, greys, and neutral tints. The most common difficulty is to distinguish purple from pale blue, owing to the insensibility of the eye to red light. In the third variety, the primary colours of red, blue, and yellow, are confounded with the secondary and tertiary colours, such as green, purple, orange, and brown. This imperfection of vision is, in many cases, hereditary. There are several examples in which all the members of a family have been afflicted with it. Dr Wilson informs us that, with few exceptions, each colour-blind person whom he examined had near relatives as colour-blind as himself. Five had each a brother colour-blind. One had five brothers equally defective. Another had his father, brother, sister, and nephew in the same predicament. The Countess of D.'s brother, son, and two nephews are colour-blind, and a Mr. P. has, or had, five near relatives equally so. From a great number of observations, Dr. Wilson is of opinion that one person in every fifty mistakes red for green, brown for green, purple for blue, and occasionally red for black; and including all kinds of colour-blindness, he thinks that one in twenty is colour-blind. It is obvious that this imperfection of sight disqualifies the person for all professions that require a knowledge of colours. Colour-blind sailors or railway servants, who daily peril life and property, in the case of red or green signals, are dangerous functionaries; and we have no doubt that Dr. Wilson is right in his suspicions that fatal shipwrecks and collisions at sea have arisen from the mistaken colour of a harbour-lamp or a light-house beacon. Serious as such risks are, there are others of a higher order which may arise from this defect of vision; in the preparation of medicines; in the manufacture, adulteration, and preparation of food; in the operations of war, and in criminal trials. A colour-blind compounder of coloured ingredients; a colour-blind manufacturer of food, and even of beverages; a colour-blind officer or sentinel; and a colour-blind witness, would be all dangerous in their respective spheres.

LIFE IN UNEXPECTED CIRCUMSTANCES.

WE occasionally meet with animal or vegetable life existing under conditions, not which are not as truly proper to them as the jungle to the tiger, or the river to the crocodile, but which appear to us strange and incongruous; which create in us surprise, as the most prominent emotion of the mind—surprise at finding life, or any particular phase of it, in circumstances where we should not, a priori, have at all expected to find it. Examples will best explain what is meant.

LIFE IN THE DEPTHS OF THE OCEAN.—Take, then, the existence of animal life at great depths of ocean. The researches of Sars, M'Andrew, and others, in the Norwegian seas, and those of Edward Forbes in the Ægean, have shown that mollusca exist under two hundred fathoms of water. Dead shells, indeed, are continually dredged from far greater depths; but these may have been voided by the many fishes which feed on mollusca, and would, of course, fall to the bottom, whatever the depth of the sea in which the fish might happen to be swimming. Mollusca have been taken alive in the northern seas at two hundred fathoms depth. In the Ægean Sea two little bivalves were dredged; the former in one hundred and eighty, the latter in one hundred and eighty-five fathoms, and one tribe in two hundred and thirty fathoms.

Nor is the power of sustaining life, at such immense depths, confined to the molluscan tribes: zoophytes rival them in this respect. Great tree-like corals spring from the bottom rocks, to which they are affixed, at a depth of a hundred fathoms and upwards. The magnificent free coral, recently discovered by Sars, lives on the mud at two hundred fathoms; soft-bodied sea anemones reach to the same depth; while other species of the same race live at the amazing depth of from two hundred and fifty to three hundred fathoms.

It has been observed that the shells of mollusca, which inhabit very deep water, are almost entirely devoid of positive colour, and this has been supposed to be the inevitable result of the darkness in which they live; for it is assumed that all, or nearly all the sun's light must be absorbed by so vast a mass of water. But yet, most of these zoophytes are highly coloured animals, one being of a fine yellow, another of a red, more or less intense, and a third of the most refulgent scarlet. The pressure of a column of sea water, from twelve to eighteen hundred feet in height, must be quite inconceivable to us; and we are at a loss to imagine how the corporeal tissues can sustain it, and how the vital functions can be carried on. Yet the presence of these creatures implies the presence of others. The molusca are mostly feeders on minute animalcules and plants; and these must, therefore, habitually live there. The zoophytes are all carnivorous; and, being all stationary, or nearly so, the prey on which they feed must be abundant there in proportion to their requirements. Indeed a small kind of lobster, about as large as a small prawn, was dredged by Mr. M'Andrew (after whom it has been named), in the Scottish seas, at a depth of one hundred and eighty fathoms.

LIFE IN SNOW.—Who would expect to find the expanse of everlasting snow in the Arctic regions, and at the summits of the Alps, the seat of abundant life, whether vegetable or animal? Yet such is the fact. Ross observed, in Baffin's Bay, a range of cliffs covered with snow, which was tinged with a brilliant crimson colour for an extent of eight miles, the hue penetrating from the surface down to the very rock, a depth of twelve feet. The same phenomenon has been observed in other parts of the Polar regions, on the glaciers of the Alps, and in other similar circumstances. Scientific investigation has proved this colour to be caused by the excessive abundance of minute organisms, mostly vegetable, of a very simple character, in the form, according to Dr. Greville, of a gelatinous layer, on which rest a vast number of minute globules, resembling, in brilliance and colour, fine garnets. Professor Agassiz, however, maintains that these globules are not vegetables, but the eggs of a minute though highly organized animal, one of the Rotifera, named Philodina roseola; which animal he found in abundance, with the globules, in the glacier of the Aar. Other minute animals were also found in the snow.

TREES GROWING IN ICE.—As a curious incident, not altogether out of place in this connection, though the parallelism of the cases is more apparent than real, we may notice the trees which Mr. Atkinson found growing, under very unusual circumstances, in the valley of the Black Irkout, in Eastern Siberia, a romantic gorge, whose precipitous sides are formed of different marbles—one white, with deep purple spots and small veins; another a rich yellow kind, equal, if not superior to the best Sienna, but wholly untouched by man.

"We reached," he says, "a part of the ravine filled with snow and ice, where large poplars were growing, with only their tops above the icy mass; the branches were in full leaf, although the trunks were embedded in the snow and ice to a depth of twenty-five feet. I dismounted, examined several, and found that there was a space around the stem, nine inches wide, filled with water, the only parts that appeared to be thawing. I have often seen flowers penetrating a thin bed of snow, but this was the first time I had found trees growing under such circumstances."

LIFE IN DESERT SANDS.—The burning, sandy deserts of Arabia and Africa seem, at first sight, to be utterly without organic life, and doubtless they are the most barren of all regions. But even there both animals and vegetables do exist. Several sorts of hard, thorny shrubs are scattered over the dreary waste, the chief of which is the Hedysarum of the Sahara, a plant about eighteen inches high, which is green throughout the year; it grows absolutely out of the arid sand, and is eagerly cropped by the camels of the caravans. There are also beetles, which burrow in the sand, and nimble lizards, which shine, as they bask in the burning sun, like burnished brass, and bury themselves on being alarmed. The lizards probable live upon the beetles, but what the beetles live upon is not so clear.

LIFE IN A VOLCANO.—The rugged desolation which characterises the interior of the crater of a volcano, even though the fiery torrent which formed it be at the time dormant, seems ill suited for the smiling beauty of flowers; yet such occasionally exist there.

Sir Thomas Acland, who ascended to the summit of Schneehätten, the lofty volcano of Norway, describes the crater to be broken down on the northern side, surrounded on the others by perpendicular masses of black rock, rising out of, and high above, beds of snow that enveloped their bases. The interior sides of the crater descended in one vast sheet of snow to the bottom, where an icy lake closed the view, at the depth of one thousand five hundred feet from the highest ridge. "Almost at the top," he says, "and close to the snow, which had probably but a few days before covered them, were some very delicate and beautiful flowers, in their highest bloom, growing most profusely; nor were they the only inhabitants—mosses, lichens, and a variety of small herbaceous plants, were in the same neighbourhood; and, lower down, dwarf birch, and a species of osier, formed a pretty kind of thicket. The traces of reindeer appeared on the very topmost snow."

FOR PREACHERS AND CLASS-LEADERS.

THE CHRISTIAN MINISTER.

IN the church of Christ there are many offices, but none more honourable, responsible and important than that of the Christian Minister. The man who is called to it by God, and set apart for it by the church, occupies an imposing position, a position invested with awful duties and solemn responsibilities, and nothing short of Divine assistance will enable him to finish, faithfully, the work which God has given him. He should place his feet in the foot-marks of our Saviour, "who has left us an example that we should follow his steps;" the mind and Spirit of Christ should be in him and dwell there. The meekness, devotedness, and humility of Christ should characterise him who is Christ's ambassador. Next to our Saviour, the Apostles should be chosen as fit patterns for imitation. One among them is worthy of particular commendation, for his eminent personal piety and his great success in the cause of God. Luke speaks of him as being "a good man, and full of the Holy Ghost, and of faith." Such was Barnabas, a good man in the highest and best sense—his was goodness such as God approved. He was filled with the Holy Ghost, which is not an exclusive privilege. Ministers of the Gospel may just as well be filled with the Holy Ghost now as was Barnabas. He can do for us now exceeding abundantly above all that we can ask or think. The Spirit should dwell in the minister's heart, so as to rule it completely, and govern all his passions, and impel him in all his labours. Barnabas was full of faith, and that was why he was full of the Holy Ghost; faith embraced the Gospel, which led to sweet intercourse with Christ, and communion with the Holy Ghost; and his fulness of faith and of the Holy Ghost accounted for his success in the Gospel. Without this deep work in the minister's own heart, he has no right to expect his preaching to be successful in saving souls. Neither will the testimony of his own conscience comfort him, and the scene around will be cheerless and dark. He may think his efforts successful, but without true piety he is inflating a bubble that may unexpectedly burst. There must be zeal according to knowledge, devotedness even unto death, prayer earnest and sincere, but there must also be faith and childlike simplicity. Prayer will bring the soul to God, and faith will take the blessing from God and give it to the soul. This eminent piety will make a minister great, and this is the only greatness which is worth having, that which will survive after his death. It will impart dignity to his character, inasmuch as the outward doings of a man are the expression of his habitual thoughts and emotions. It will chasten his temper. It will humble to exalt; and when raised to the highest point of his exaltation, he will not feel proud; it will make him think less of himself, to be thought the more highly of by others; it will give him support under the most discouraging circumstances.

Quarrels may occasionally arise. The most trivial cause of strife will, sometimes, swell into a vast magnitude, and involve the peace of the whole church. Piety will help him to endure scorn and coldness; to bear indifference, slander, and persecution from those who, previously, were his friends. Thus showing that he is following the example of Christ, whose dignity and glory arose from his unblemished fame, whose holiness was his tower of strength; who was calumniated, but the arrows shot at him fell pointless, and he still stood forward in all the majesty of divinity. Without this piety, he will be exposed to the snares and darts of the wicked one; but with it he will prove himself invulnerable. Such men will not cease to work for God until they no longer labour for themselves. A man seldom curtails the expenses of his establishment until his funds are getting low. A minister will not say, "God does not require all this labour from me; I will give some of it up;" and after a little time, through some little circumstance, leave the ministry altogether, and think himself justified in so doing, unless he is declining in personal piety.

The minister must be in earnest in the pulpit and out of it. He must enter into his work like a man bent on victory. He must not preach with hesitation, but with confidence; not come like a messenger of justice and death, but of mercy and life; for God has not given to him the ministry of vengeance and wrath, but of reconciliation. His manner should correspond with the character of his ministry. He must preach Christ as the only medium of reconciliation, and the way by which heaven is realized by fallen souls. It is his duty to turn the attention of his hearers to Christ and fix their gaze upon his saving and redeeming mercy. He must not attempt to display his intellectual abilities; he must rather be inclined to hide his head in the dust; he must exhibit the cross, but hide himself behind it; he must show the glory of Christ, but not try to set forth his own excellence. He must point out the excellence of Christ; his holiness, his love, and the glorious scheme of redemption which he has wrought for mankind.

All vulgarities, fawnings, bellowings, and mountebankisms, should be avoided by all Christians, and more especially by Christian ministers. The success for which a minister ought to crave, should not be merely to draw a large congregation, or secure an amply filled exchequer; but that which consists in the conversion of souls. For this he should live, preach, and pray.

The Bible is the book he should study most, and all other books should be brought to the Bible and tried by it; and not the Bible taken to other books, and tried by them and valued accordingly. He should make use of every available help for the full discharge of the important duties devolving upon him, so as to glorify God, honour the church, and bless the world. He should seek counsel of God and trust in the Holy Ghost for success, knowing that though he may have power to alter the judgment, or affect the feelings, yet he cannot touch the soul, without divine help. It is not to give an intellectual treat, or to cause animal excitement, that he preaches; but to raise in the soul pure religious feeling. To the accomplishment of this all his powers should be sanctified. The great end of preaching is to save souls; it should be the chief study of the preacher to be made most useful in the accomplishment of this end. In this may I be made useful; in this may Primitive Methodist ministers everywhere prove themselves worthy of treading in the footsteps of their ancestors in the Gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ, that others may point to any one of us and say,—

“There stands the messenger of truth;
There stands the legate of the skies.”

Wallaroo, South Australia.

E. W. STEPHENS.

THE FOUNTAIN-HEAD.

“You come to the fountain-head, I see.”

“Yes, Sir; the water is clearer here.”

I admired the wisdom of the woman who gave me this answer. Her lowly cottage stood by the road-side, and within a few feet of the threshold, ran a tiny stream of water. She was just leaving the door when I approached, carrying in her hand an empty pail. Walking beside the rivulet for some distance, she at length stooped down, and dipped her pail in the water. I came up just then, and saw that the spring was there. At that spot the bright water welled from the earth, and passing away in a little stream, was lost in the fields beyond. The woman to whom I had spoken had come to the fountain for water. A few moments sufficed to make the observation above, and hear her reply. A little was said about the “living water” that Christ imparts, and I walked on meditating. Yes, the woman manifested wisdom in going for water to the fountain-head. She might take the water freely there. Just below, the stream ran into Squire Somebody’s meadow, and the gate was locked against trespassers. But at the road-side spring, none could lawfully hinder her; and the water there was to be had pure. I noticed that, below, it ran in a ditch, and in passing among the weeds, it became discoloured. It was to be had pure and bright only at the fountain. And the water was there in the greatest abundance. It had scooped out for itself a deep cistern, and the overflowing of this formed the little stream below. The woman, therefore, did well to go at once to the fountain for water.

There was something to be learnt from all this. It discovered to me at once the secret of the power which some men possess. It is not brilliant gifts or extensive knowledge which render them so successful in the work of God, but an undefinable something which attends their efforts, and brings to decision the souls they try to save. Mr. — is a case in point. I formerly sat under his ministry. I have heard better preachers, but few so powerful. There was a present power in his words, which sent them direct to the heart. In Mr. —, I see another who is possessed of this gift. He is a class-leader, and a successful one. The growth of his members in holiness is manifest to all, and his classes continually increase in numbers. There is nothing peculiar in his mental formation to explain this. We can only say, he has power. Mr. —, the Sabbath school teacher, is a man of the same stamp. He is not peculiarly gifted, nor does he seem specially adapted for teaching. Yet one-half of the children in his class have been brought to God through his instrumentality.

We all know such men, and are ready to envy them. We say, “Give us also this power.” But they cannot communicate it. What makes them to differ from their brethren? How have they obtained this priceless blessing,—this gift of power? It must be, that in seeking it, they have gone to the Fountain-head. This is their grand secret. “Ye shall receive power, after that the Holy Ghost is come upon you.” They have waited for, and obtained, the baptism of the Holy Ghost.

I am conscious of a hungering after spiritual knowledge. A vast ocean has seemed to be before me, and around; but all unfathomed and unknown. How circumscribed is my knowledge of myself, of the spirit-world; and, above all, of God? My knowledge is small, my ignorance great. And my prayer has been, “Lord, that I might receive my sight!” I have yearned for a deeper insight into the things of God. “To comprehend with all saints what is the breadth, and length, and depth, and height:”—what can this mean? “Let him that glorieth glory in this, that he understandeth and knoweth me.”—can this be possible! From whence shall I look for this coveted knowledge? Where shall I find the pearl of true wisdom? “How can I, except some man should guide me?” These have been my thoughts. But while I asked, I received the answer. It was this:—“Go to the Fountain-head. ‘God is light.’ ‘If any of you lack wisdom, let him ask of God, that giveth to all men liberally, and upbraideth not.’”

I knew a Christian man who woke up awhile ago to the necessity of living entirely sanctified to God. He saw this to be desirable above all things else; but he knew full well, that against this one principle, a thousand others were in active opposition. It seemed plain, that unless he had powerful aid, separate from the purpose of his own mind, the desire for holiness would die away; his view of its importance would grow dim, and, in a while, he would again be carried away by the stream of worldliness. He wanted a helping influence to sustain his purpose till it became supreme. Such aid was needed only for a time; but, for that time, was absolutely necessary. Like the train on the railway, which needs a power to move it, but afterwards will proceed by the force of its own motion,—so needed he power to continue in pursuit of holiness, till his soul, of its own accord, would run after it. He knew that “as soon as the mind is under the power of a predominant tendency, the difficulty of growing into the maturity of that form of character, which this tendency promotes or creates, is substantially over.”* The question then was, “From whence shall I obtain this moving, supporting influence?” The constant companionship of holy men, in whose hearts the principle had become established, would suffice; but such persons were not at hand. A continued perusal of such books as tend to stimulate desire for holiness, might have been effectual; but his attention could not be so exclusively devoted. He sought, therefore, for another stimulus, one near at hand, and suited to his case. But he sought in vain, till he fell into this train of thinking:—“Why may I not go to the Fountain-head? Why not, by constant communion with the source of all holiness, gain increasing love for it, and an intenser ardour in its pursuit?” Thus the necessities of his case were met. To the question, “How shall I, in the midst of unholy influences, maintain a steady pursuit of it?” the answer was obtained “Go to the Fountain-head, and by personal fellowship with him whose name is holy, secure at once grace to seek, and ability to attain it.”

God’s ear is open to the cries of his children. They may, through Jesus, enter at once into his presence. “Let us therefore, come boldly to the throne of grace that we may obtain mercy, and find grace to help in time of need.”

---

FOR THE FAMILY.

---

QUIT THAT.

QUIT what? Quit telling your innocent, confiding, trembling children about ghosts and hobgoblins. You are throwing a sorrow upon young hearts that will cling there through life. How many mothers there are who quiet their children by saying, “The bug-a-boos will come and take you off! Come, old nigger! Come, and—well; will you hush this minute?” The poor child believes all its mother tells it, and why should’n’t it? It ought to believe. That is its filial duty. The sobbing, fluttering heart is quieted, but not comforted. Those tearful eyes close in a sleep of terror; a weary broken rest follows; the child dreams, but oh, who can tell the sadness of a child while it dreams in a sleep frightened upon it by alarms of all that is terrible and repulsive. Such inhuman treatment endangers the mind—the intellect.

Mothers, beware! See that no servant or nurse, or older brother or sister, drive arrows of grief to the very soul of your child. A sorrow early planted and watered by tears will bring forth a harvest of bitterness and despair. How common a habit it is to teach children to fear unseen dangers at nightfall. The peaceful night, so full of sweetness; the night that brings the honeyed drops of dew to bless the flowers and refresh the leaves; the night that brings rest to the weary: this dearest time of all is to be made terrible to children. What wickedness! Why it is blasphemy to make little ones believe that God forgets them, and sends tormentors to trouble them in the silent watches of the night.

* Foster.

Parents, think of this. See that your children hear no ghostly lessons; see that they are taught to love the ever present Saviour, and honour his ever blessed name. How heavenly the teachings of that familiar hymn, when breathed from a true mother's soul over a sleeping child!

"Hush, my babe, lie still and slumber, Holy angels guard thy bed."

Sent by I. S. N.

A WHISPER TO A WIFE.

STUDY your husband's temper and character, and be it your pride and pleasure to conform to his proper wishes. Check at once the first advance to contradiction, even of the most trivial nature. Beware of the first dispute. Whatever might have been concealed as a defect from the lover, with greater care should be concealed from the husband, and pains taken to eradicate it. Let your husband be dearer and of more consequence to you than any other human being; and have no hesitation in confessing your reliance upon him. This must win his affections, and will lead him to feel that in you he has a friend whom he cannot neglect without ruining his own peace and happiness. And the consciousness that she is necessary to her husband's happiness, must be a satisfactory thought to every good and true wife.—Old Jonathan.

"MOTHER, YOU HAVE FORGOTTEN MY SOUL."

So said my little niece, three years old, as her kind and careful mother was about to lay her in bed. She had just risen from repeating the Lord's Prayer. "But, mother," she said, "you have forgotten my soul."

"What do you mean, Anna?"

"Why, 'Now I lay me down to sleep, I pray the Lord my soul to keep. If I should die before I wake, I pray the Lord my soul to take.' We have not said that."

The child meant nothing more, yet her words were startling. And O! from how many rosy lips might they come with mournful significance!

You, fond mother, so busy, hour after hour, preparing and adorning garments for the pretty little form, have you forgotten the soul? Do you commend it earnestly to the care of its God and Saviour? Are you leading it to commit itself, in faith and love, to his keeping?

"WHIP ME; BUT DON'T CRY."

THE SON of a pious father, who had devoted great attention to his education, had maintained an unblemished reputation until the age of fourteen, when he was detected in a deliberate falsehood. The father's grief was great, and he determined to punish the offender severely. He made the subject one of prayer, for it was too important in his esteem to be passed over as a common occurrence of the day. He then called his son, and prepared to inflict the punishment. But the fountain of the father's heart was broken up. He wept aloud. For a moment the lad seemed confused. He saw the struggle between love and justice in his parent's bosom, and broke out with all his usual ingenuousness, "Father, father, whip me as much as you please; but don't cry."

The point was gained. The father saw that the lad's character was sensibly affected by this incident. He grew up and became a distinguished Christian minister.

POETRY.

MY BIRTHDAYS.

THE birthdays of my childhood, O! how gay they used to be,
 When every flower that gemm'd the earth, I thought was sent for me,
 When sparkling streams, and meadows green, brought gladness to my heart
 And in the music of the grove my young voice bore a part;
 When all seemed gay around me, and all looked bright above,
 And I lived in my own joyous world of sunshine and of love:
 Ah! then those precious annual gems of concentrated glee,
 The birthdays of my childhood, O! how gay they used to be!

The birthdays of my sanguine youth they too were gay and bright,
 Life still was fresh and beautiful, I had not dreamt of blight;
 And flowers as dear to youth's warm heart the moral world displays,
 As those which Nature kindly gives to charm our childish days:
 For Love appears in witching guise, with Hope upon his wings,
 And friendship warm with youthful truth a thousand blessings brings:
 And when these flowers form'd a wreath to crown my natal day,
 The birthdays of my sanguine youth they too were bright and gay.

The birthdays of my riper years, my life's autumnal time,
 They cannot boast the brilliancy of spring or summer prime;
 For childhood's joys have ceased to charm, and youth's fond hopes are faded,
 And the bright sunshine of those days dark sorrow's clouds have shaded:
 Oft has my weak heart vainly wept, o'er joys long passed away,
 And often hoped no one would mark that once gay festive day:
 But there are joys for every age, and flowers for every clime,
 For the verdant bloom of childhood, and for life's autumnal time.

The birthdays of my age. Ah! then how vain will seem the whole;—
 One date alone be worth a thought,—the birthday of the soul:
 Then may heavenly flowers surround me, and shed a holy calm,
 With "Sharon's Rose" my heart be cheer'd, and soothed with "Gilead's Balm:"
 And the hopes that rest upon them no earthly storm shall blight,
 For though darkness close around me, within there shall be light;
 And that blessed light shall still increase unto the perfect day,
 When the birthdays of my mortal life shall all have pass'd away.

---

 THE SABBATH SCHOOL.

---

 THE INFLUENCE OF SABBATH SCHOOL TEACHING ON THE TEACHER.

THE Church is a kind of normal school. Christ is here training his disciples for that better and higher service expected of them in the world to come. One of the essential conditions of a normal school is, that there should be connected with it a school of practice, where those in the normal school, while receiving lessons in the theory of their art, may go in and try their hand by actual experience. So it is in the Church. The master there teaches to his disciples the lessons of the kingdom. They there learn the theory of the heavenly graces. But he has also his school of practice, in which they become rapidly proficient in his lessons, and that is by the religious training and instruction of the little ones. If such a thing could be supposed, that the Sabbath-school was of no benefit whatever to the children, yet such are the extent and variety of the reflex blessings that it brings upon the teachers, that it would still be worth all the labour and money it costs.

Think, in the first place, how rapidly Sabbath-school teachers improve in Scriptural knowledge. All Christians are supposed to study the Scriptures and to be growing in knowledge. It is undoubtedly the duty of all Christians thus to add continually to their knowledge of Divine truth. But human nature is frail at its best estate. We may read the Bible, and read it stately and attentively; but that is quite a different thing from studying it. It is rare indeed that people study the Bible, or study anything, unless for some specific purpose. The teacher who has a class in the Sabbath-school dependent on him for instruction, has just such a motive stately recurring. He has every week to make himself master of some particular portion of Scriptural truth. He must not only acquire it, but must make his knowledge of it so definite and precise, that he may communicate it intelligently to others. Hence no class of Christians give to the Bible so much real study, none study it so stately and systematically, none grow so continually and healthily in Bible knowledge, as Sabbath-school teachers.

Besides this, there is something in the very act of teaching that gives force to the argument. It is a noticeable peculiarity of the human mind, that a man's knowledge is made more certain and definite to himself by the act of communicating it to another. A man, indeed, can hardly be said to know a thing himself until he has told it to somebody else, or has in some way, by tongue or pen, given expression to it. Teaching, we learn. By communicating to others what we have learned of Holy Scripture, we clinch the knowledge of it in our own mind. By imparting it, we only make it the more inalienably our own. Hence the true teacher is always a learner. There is probably no portion of a Christian congregation of which we may feel so sure that they are advancing in knowledge, as the band of faithful Sabbath-school teachers.

If service in the Sabbath school tends to promote the knowledge of the teacher, much more may it improve active piety. He gets the courage to address a youth on the subject of personal religion, when he would shrink from doing the same to a man or woman. He can pray with a young person, when he would not with an older. By visiting his scholars, he learns how to visit others for religious purposes. His timidity in religious duty gradually wears off. His tongue is unloosed, and he learns the secret of speaking a word in season for his Master.

Not only does service in the Sabbath school improve the Scriptural knowledge, and increase the activity of those who are truly pious, but it leads often to the conversion of those who engage in it while unconverted. Considerable numbers of unconverted teachers are annually brought into the kingdom. The serious character of the truths which they have to deal with in the lessons of the class, gradually affects their own minds. They are led almost inevitably to reflect upon the importance of being able to speak on these topics from their own experience. They can hardly help thinking how sad it would be if the children of their charge should be saved, while they themselves become "cast away." Sometimes, under the teaching of a sober-minded but unconverted person, children are awakened, and begin to inquire of their teacher, with tears in their eyes, what they must do to be saved. Such inquiries, from these young and tender minds, send conviction to the conscience of the teacher, and lead him to bring home the question to his own soul. We ourselves once knew a large school, in which, at its opening, a sufficient number of teachers who were members of society could not be obtained. During the first year, some eighteen or twenty of the teachers were unconverted persons. Before the end of two years every one of these teachers was converted and brought into church-fellowship. We have never been connected with any Sabbath school, for any length of time, in which some were not converted while engaged in teaching. While watering others, they have themselves been watered.

---

NOISY SABBATH SCHOOLS.

I do not know that my nerves are more delicate than other people's, but this I do know, that they are grievously offended, Sunday after Sunday, by the confusion and noise in our school.

It is a perfect Babel, and the comparison is truer than you may think ; for not only is there confusion and tumult, and hindered work, but it really is difficult for one to understand what another is saying. My neighbour's class is nearer than I like, but that cannot be helped. I think, however, he might help the noise in his class. Do not call it talking, it is bawling. He bawls to his scholars ; they bawl in reply : and, as we now and then catch some of the words, my boys are always turning round to learn more fully what is going on in this adjoining class. My class not only have their attention diverted away from me, but they find it difficult to hear me, unless my voice be unduly raised. I have good lungs, certainly, and I can make myself heard if I try ; but really I have bodily exertion enough during the week, without being obliged to try to rival a Boanerges on Sabbath afternoons. I believe my own class to be noisy, compulsorily ; for last Sunday the teacher of the other adjoining class (a thin, pale young man, with a weak piping voice) came to me, and whispered, "Mr. E., will you be so good as to speak a little lower ?"

You will ask me, perhaps, why do you not get the superintendent to keep order ? Ah, there is the difficulty ! Our superintendent positively defends this noisy state of things. He says it shows that the school is being carried on vigorously, with life and spirit ! I do not agree with him, and there are others who think with me. But then our present head, though young, is a good-hearted man, who works most zealously for the school. We all like him, and respect him for his zeal, but he does not possess much talent in organizing or in maintaining discipline.

MISCELLANIES.

POPISH PERSECUTION OF PROTESTANTS IN SPAIN IN 1860-2.

THE following brief narrative of this persecution is extracted from the Evangelical Alliance Intelligencer for January, 1863.

Don Manuel Matamoros is the son of a lieutenant in the Spanish artillery, now deceased. He was himself an officer in the Spanish army, and about seven years ago he got possession of the Spanish Bible, in which he soon became interested. When he had at length become alive to the truth, he spoke to his brother officers, and being subjected to many petty persecutions in consequence, he left the service, and finally attached himself to a society in Barcelona. In September, 1860, he came in contact with a young man who was being educated as a priest in Granada, and who, having been suspected of Protestant doctrines, fled. Alhama, a hatter in Granada, much respected in that city, advised him to flee to Gibraltar, which he did. His parents irritated at their son's falling away from the faith, accused Alhama of having aided in his flight, and in consequence his house was searched, and himself arrested and carried off to prison. Among the papers found in Alhama's house were some letters from Matamoros, and one addressed to him by Alhama. One of the letters found suggested, as a matter for consideration, whether it might not be desirable to petition the Cortes to decree or permit freedom of worship. In consequence of these letters being found a telegraphic order was sent from Barcelona for his arrest, and at half-past six o'clock on the morning of the 8th of October, 1860, the police entered his house and proceeded to search it. Papers were discovered proving that he was a Protestant, and in correspondence with Protestants. He was then taken to the police station and placed in a cell. Three hours afterwards he was visited by the chief of the police and required to give the names of his Protestant friends, they not being discoverable from the papers seized. He refused ; he was ready to suffer but would not betray his friends. The officer left him. He was then thrown into a dungeon in Barcelona. The gaoler was directed to put him in rigorous confinement as a prisoner charged with a heavy crime. The first day he suffered much from burning thirst, and it was not till the approach of night that the gaoler came and gave him a little water. No bed was supplied to him till the next day. After the lapse of three days, the tribunal sat, and he was taken before them, and after a prolonged examination was sent back to prison. Efforts were made by influential friends for his release; he was described as a harmless citizen, and highly respected; but the officials said, that "if he had been guilty of any other crime, such as robbery or murder, he might be got off; but here there was no alternative; he was a heretic and could not be forgiven." Eight days after, during which he was kept in terrible solitary confinement, he was examined again. He was asked if he professed the Catholic Apostolic Roman religion. If not what? He answered, "My religion is that of Jesus Christ; my rule of faith is the word of God, or Holy Bible, which, without a word added, curtailed, or altered, is the basis of my belief; and in this I am confirmed by the last few sentences of the Apocalypse, and the many distinct charges of the apostles in their epistles. The Roman Catholic church, not being based upon these principles, I do not believe in her dogmas, and still less do I obey her in practice." "Do you know what you are saying?" interrupted the judge. "Yes," replied Matamoros, respectfully; "I have put my hand to the plough, and dare not go back." He was ordered to commit to paper what he had said, and was then sent back to a lower dungeon, on charge formally notified, of being a "Propagator of the Protestant faith." His mother, earnestly imploring his liberation, was told "that it was impossible; that his crime was one of the worst possible" (el peor de los crimines possible). He was put into a place where many other criminals were confined, and there he had to sleep at night. A report having been industriously spread that he was arrested for a politico-religious conspiracy, he wrote to several journals, disavowing all connexion with any political parties, and declaring that his efforts were simply religious. The tribunal of Granada, whence the order for his removal had emanated, demanded that he should be sent there for examination. He was ordered to go. The distance was 180 leagues, the time the depth of winter. He was ill, and spat blood, brought on by his confinement in prison. And yet he was ordered to go on foot in company with a gang of criminals, the journey occupying nearly three months, and the places in which they were to be made to lodge too loathsome and disgusting for description. The persevering intercession of his mother was backed by a strong medical certificate; and the remonstrance of some of the journals of Barcelona to postpone the day of departure, and the medical certificates, were forwarded to Granada. The authorities at Granada, after perusing the documents, ordered that whether well or ill, he should be sent. Fifteen days thus elapsed. In the meantime he had written to England and Paris, acquainting his friends there with his position, and backed by their representations, he was allowed to go by sea to Malaga, and to post thence to Granada. The authorities gave permission for this change of route, but insisted on his paying, not only his own expenses, but those also of the guard (there and back) who accompanied him. It was at this point, on the journey from Malaga to Granada, that Sir Robert Peel met him; and he was much struck with the earnestness and devotedness of the prisoner. Sir Robert has himself publicly stated that he never before saw Christian faith so practical and honest as this, and it had made a deep impression upon him. On arriving at Granada he was again placed in rigorous confinement; he was put in a dark and miserable cell, and here would in all probability have continued, had it not been for the vigorous and persevering efforts of Sir R. Peel, who visited him in his dungeon. Matamoros was removed to a new prison, and soon after Alhama and Trigo being imprisoned with him, he was again summoned before the tribunal, and required to ratify his declaration at Barcelona, which he did. Hearing that some of the Government journals had endeavoured to make him a political offender, he again wrote to the liberal journals to show that the question was really a religious one. About this time they began to treat them with increased rigor. Their friends were also made to suffer. At midnight on the 6th of March, 1861, four gens d'armes, with their sergeant and a constable, entered the house of Alhama. His aged mother admitted them, and they demanded all the keys to search the house. His wife was in bed ill from premature confinement brought on by distress. They compelled her to rise, and searched even the mattress on which she was lying. For two hours the savage search continued. Nothing, however, was found to criminate the family; but the terror was too great for Alhama's wife, who fell down in an epileptic fit. The same night fourteen other persons were cast into prison. This, however, arose from a blunder of the police, who arrested a party whom they suspected to be in treasonable communication with the prisoners, but they were acquitted and released. About this time one of the prisoners writes to his friends, "It is now thirty-three days since any of our friends have been permitted to see us. Any convicted criminal, the lowest and vilest in the place, is treated with greater kindness than we."

In 1861 an insurrection suddenly occurred at Loja, a town between Granada and Malaga. One of the cries was, "Death to the Pope!" This, of course, was connected with the prisoners, and was regarded as of political origin; and on this ground they were put in separate dungeons, and underwent worse torture than ever. Hired spies were employed to entrap Matamoros in his conversation, and they attempted to criminate him before the military tribunal in July. Notwithstanding the most unscrupulous perjury on the part of the witnesses, Matamoros was triumphantly acquitted. One of the suborned witnesses named Espenona, conscience-stricken at his crime, after two attempts to commit suicide, confessed his treachery to the civil tribunal. After his acquittal, Matamoros was again thrown into prison, and treated with the greatest cruelty and inhumanity. Instead of compensating the victim of their injustice, for the great wrongs he had suffered, the Government Fiscal demanded that he should be sent to the galleys for eleven years, which was afterwards reduced to eight years on appeal; and against this sentence, as too lenient, the Fiscal has made another appeal. Such is a brief outline of this sad history.

Although only the prisoners whose names are familiar to us are mentioned in the above account, says the Editor of the Intelligencer, it is well known that there are many others in Spain who are in bonds for the Gospel's sake. An English gentleman writing from Spain in a letter dated April 20th, says, "There are now thirty-four Protestants in prison in various parts of the country."

To enable the readers of the preceding heart-sickening account, to judge of the moral character of the principal prisoner, Matamoros, I subjoin extracts from a letter addressed by him to the foreign Secretary of the Evangelical Alliance. It is dated thus:—

"Prison of Audiencia, Granada, October 30th, 1862.

"Heartly thanks for your letter of the 24th, which has given me so much pleasure and comfort. I have also, through you, received that beautiful letter of the Synod of the Waldensian Church, signed by its excellent president Paulo Geymonat, of Florence. I should like adequately to express what I feel of love and gratitude, as a Christian and a prisoner, towards you and your friends, whom I love with my whole heart. I would only beg of you to accept my poor and humble words as a faithful testimony of my sincere Christian love and gratitude.

All that you tell me in your letter, I am thankful to say I have felt and daily witnessed from the first days of my imprisonment. The efforts made by your Alliance for the cessation of the tribulations which tyranny has brought upon the suffering and persecuted Spanish Church have touched my heart, and greatly comforted it. The whole Church has witnessed those efforts, and knows, admires, and blesses you in her prayers. My unhappy country, touched by your worthy and Christian attitude, has deeply felt the religious motives and strength of faith and Christian sympathy which have characterized all your steps; and as such, they have been recognized and respected, even by the most inveterate enemies. . . . Oh, could my grateful voice but reach those beloved brethren, far and near, of whom you speak to me in your letter! Oh that you could, by some means unknown to me, communicate with them, and tell them that the greatest and most positive of all benefits which they can bestow upon the prisoners, and upon the Spanish Church in general, is prayer!—yes, tell them that I love them in Jesus as much as one can love; tell them that I do not forget them in my prayers, that earnestly and daily I ask God to pour out upon the whole body of Christ the blessing of his holy peace, and the secret consolations of his Holy Spirit; tell them lastly, that whatever may happen, and whatever my situation may be, my spirit is with them, that they occupy a loving place in my heart, and that under the chains of the galleys, I shall pray to God, as I pray to-day in this prison, that to every one of them he may grant faith unto the end. You kindly mention in your letter the glorious thought the Evangelical Alliance entertain of preparing a European deputation to Madrid, to intercede with the Queen of Spain and her government for the liberation of the prisoners. Oh, I highly appreciate this plan, and render to the Alliance my heartfelt Christian thanks.

I cannot say how far this important deputation may succeed in the liberation of the prisoners; however, I can assure you in the most energetic manner, that this most important step would have a wonderful effect, and prepare the way for religious toleration in this enslaved country. The nation understands perfectly well the true value and bearing of such a step, which will doubtless perpetuate in brilliant letters in the public conscience, the great events which have inspired so much devotion and sympathy; and this sympathy awakened in the conscience of the nation is in itself a triumph. . . . . A great part of that portion of the press which is a sincere friend of religious toleration welcomed the mission of the venerable and much beloved General Alexander to Spain, (who carried out his Christian mission with admirable tact) warmly, and even that part of the press which takes opposite views in this matter, did neither anathematize the object of the journey, nor pronounce anything but words of respect about it. I am thankful to say that from the time of that visit up to this moment, I have been free from those vexatious and saddening searches and visits which afflicted me so much before.

And now I must conclude. You will know already that I had been sentenced to eight years of the galleys, to perpetual inability of exercising any political rights, and of holding any public office as teacher, and to the exorbitant costs of the lawsuit. The Fiscal of her Majesty has protested against the sentence. He demands eleven years, as in the first trial; and insists upon having a new trial instituted, on the ground that I had confessed Christ before the tribunal. The same sentence he demands for Alhama and Trigo; and eight years of the galleys for those who were at liberty on bail, and the same punishment for all the refugees. The severity of men, this implacable hatred of our enemies, does not sadden my heart: the Lord, in his mysterious and merciful will, grants sufficient strength to those who love him with all their hearts, to suffer the assaults of the world. He has graciously given me so much strength, that all my sufferings are turned into joy and Christian happiness.

I wish that this poor letter may also be accepted as the sincere expression of love, and gratitude, and regard for the Evangelical Alliance, and for all those other Christian societies which take an interest in the cause of God in Spain and elsewhere. You may use my letter in whatever manner you think right; you may, if you like, publish it as a testimony of my love to the brethren to whom I refer in this poor letter. My beloved mother salutes you and all the brethren, as a sister in Jesus, and as a grateful mother. The Spanish prisoners and all the brethren also salute you. The Lord be with you, my dear brother.

Your humble brother in Christ,

MANUEL MATAMOROS."

Here then we are presented with a specimen of Roman Catholic intolerance and barbarous cruelty to the innocent seceders from that apostate church—the faithful adherents of which in England and Ireland, make such an hypocritical outcry in the British Parliament and elsewhere, for liberty of conscience. And after all the pretences put forth about the improved character of that blood-thirsty and persecuting Church in modern times, the above shows us irresistibly what Protestantism has to expect if she ever gain the ascendancy. Will not God avenge his own true Church upon that "mother of abominations?" Lord, hasten it for thy truth and mercy's sake. Amen.

G. W. ARMITAGE.

CONNEXIONAL INTELLIGENCE.

HOME DEPARTMENT.

WESTGATE CIRCUIT.—This station comprehends Weardale and the parish of Stanhope in the extreme west of the county of Durham. Weardale is a narrow, but pleasant and romantic valley, lying east and west between steep and bold mountains, whose summits reach a height ranging from 1,500 to 2,000 feet above the sea. Standing on one of these lofty hills, and looking down into the green and populous valley below, the dale appears to be sunken deep in the earth, yet the superintendent's house, a neat and pleasant residence, near the centre of the vale and the circuit, and close to the river Wear, is 900 feet above the level of the sea. The hills abound with lead, iron, and limestone, and the dale produces abundant crops of the finest grass.

Defended on all sides as this secluded and peaceful valley is, by natural bulwarks, traces of camps and trenches indicate that even here, the fiend of war erst found his way. And here too in the good old times, so called, when England owned but one church, the wealthy bishops of Durham, with their jolly retainers, used to indulge in the pleasures of the chase. But there was one bishop of Durham who had been rector of this parish, to whom Christendom is indebted for the famous "Analogy." Indeed it is said that the unanswerable book was written at Stanhope. The quaint old edifice in which Butler used to preach is still the parish church. The living is one of the richest in England, and Dr. Philpotts, it is stated, reluctantly resigned it to become Bishop of Exeter.

The inhabitants, a strong and well formed people, with an air of manly independence, are mostly farmers and miners. They live in neat and clean villages, and comfortable cottages scattered over the hill sides. There is no appearance of squalor or poverty; and if a mean or shabby person is seen in this dale, it is understood that he is a stranger. Here are several public libraries, as well as smaller ones attached to the numerous Sabbath-schools, and many of the people possess considerable intelligence. But the history of the valley shows that the industry, sobriety, decency, and intelligence so general here, are the fruits of evangelical religion, chiefly in the form of Methodism. Wesleyan and Primitive chapels of large dimensions are numerous, and well attended by the larger portion of the population. John Wesley preached in one of these chapels, near which a venerable thorn still stands, under which he stood to preach to a crowd in the open air. This thorn was dug up a few years ago in order to improve a turn in the road, but a mining agent who lived in the neighbourhood, and made no pretension to religion, ordered it to be planted again in the same place, assigning as a reason that, Wesley had preached under that tree. It was accordingly replaced, and there it still grows.

This circuit has for many years made considerable progress in the number, piety, and Scriptural information of its members, as well as in its financial income. It has sent all its missionary money to the general treasurer since 1857. And it is worthy of remark, that its quarterly income has rapidly increased ever since. When a part of the missionary money was retained, there was sometimes considerable difficulty in meeting the circuit's demands, but since it has all been sent away, there has been a constantly increasing balance in the hands of the steward, although the demands have also increased. The greater the demand, the greater the supply, has been the rule here.

The most extraordinary revival known to have ever taken place in this dale, commenced in December, 1861, at Frosterly, immediately after the opening of a new and beautiful chapel at that place, which was built to contain about twice as many hearers as the old one would accommodate. From the day on which it was opened the people flocked to it in such numbers that a general complaint obtained, that the new chapel was too small. Meetings for prayer and preaching were held every night. The Word of the Lord had free course and was glorified; and in about two months the society increased from 68 members to 147. The holy fire ran through the whole circuit, and members were added to every society. The preachers spoke with a freedom and power seldom before experienced, and the people prayed with unusual faith and earnestness, a sacred awe and godly fear seemed to have fallen upon the whole population, and religion became the most common subject of conversation. Cold, wet, dark, and dismal as the winter nights often were, the people continued for weeks, night after night to crowd the places of worship. Five or six hundred persons were frequently found in a chapel an hour before the appointed time, in order to secure sitting room.

In addition to Frosterley, Westgate, Wearhead, and St. John's shared most largely in the produce of the revival; but the last-named place, situated in the most populous part of the dale, was the most distinguished for the number of converts. Here for several successive nights, as many as twenty, and sometimes more, professed to be converted at each meeting, and on one Sunday night the number reached thirty.

An increase of 177 members for the quarter was reported to the March quarterly meeting of 1862, and a further increase of 223 was reported to the quarterly meeting in June, making a total increase of 400 members for the previous six months. Besides this, a spirit of moral reformation appeared to influence the conduct of those who refused to be converted, and seven public-houses were closed on Sundays, without the interference of any one. It should be here stated, that the arduous labours of Mr. and Mrs. Lowry, and Messrs. Bell and Booth, local preachers from neighbouring circuits, contributed in no small degree to these results. A large majority of those brought to God in this revival had long been attentive hearers of the word of truth, delivered in our chapels, many had so far yielded to Divine influence as to resolve to give themselves to the Lord and his people; and this gracious outpouring of the Holy Spirit enabled them at once to break away from the world and sin, and surrender themselves to their rightful Lord and Master. It was the gathering in of a glorious harvest, already ripe and fit for the sickle. The Lord at length heard the prayers of his saints and blest the labours of his servants.

Bible Classes and Book Clubs have been formed to imbue the minds of the young converts with religious knowledge, and to aid in establishing them in the faith of the Gospel.

It is now about twelve months since the revival may be said to have ceased; the reaction which generally follows such a movement may be presumed to have taken place, and the result is, that 51 of the 400 converts are now missing. A great part of these were children, and the other part consisted almost entirely of persons who had not been previously in the habit of attending any place of worship. The ground was stony, the seed soon sprang up, and soon withered away; 349 remain, it is to be hoped, as pillars in God's house to go no more out. Many souls have been added to our societies since the revival, and the congregations throughout the circuit are larger now than they ever were before, thus encouraging a hope of future prosperity.

To give an idea of the extent of Primitive Methodism in this dale, it may be stated that about one-fifth of the adults are members of our church. It is calculated that owing to infancy, affliction, and old age, not more than 70 per cent. of the population can attend public worship, and more than one-third of that proportion here regularly assemble at our chapels to hear the Word of Life.

The inhabitants of the parish in 1861 amounted to 9,654. Stanhope parish, Weardale, and Westgate circuit occupy the same ground, and contain the same population.

HENRY PHILLIPS.

[This is a most delightful account of a blessed work of God. O! for many such—and soon.—Ed.]

SCACKLETON, MALTON CIRCUIT.—At this village the Primitive Methodists have ministered for upwards of thirty-six years. During this period the services have been held in the farm house of Mr. Ward and his sons, and the ministers have been and still are kindly entertained by the family. But on account of a blessed increase in Society there has been lately much inconvenience for want of a more suitable place in which to conduct religious worship; at length, however, having procured the consent of Mr. Ward to allow us the large room adjoining his house to be fitted up as a Primitive Methodist Chapel or Preaching Room, our warm-hearted friends, with Mr. Ward's assistance, soon lifted the roof, and made a very commodious place of worship, with about fifty lettable seats, besides twenty free sittings. The opening services of the room commenced on Sunday, October 12th, 1862, when two powerful sermons were preached by Mr. R. Belt, of Luton. On Tuesday, October 14th, about 150 persons partook of an excellent tea, the trays having been gratuitously furnished by the ladies and friends of the society. The public meeting was crowded to excess and many could not gain admission. The chair was ably occupied by Mr. G. Wales, and addresses were delivered by Messrs. G. Renely, J. Ward, and the writer. The cost of fitting up is about £30; towards which we have raised near £23. To all who have in any way aided in this good work we render our thanks. J. BOOTLAND.

IPSWICH CHAPEL RE-OPENING.—About thirty years ago it pleased God to direct the steps of the Primitive Methodist ministers to this town, and his blessing has attended their labours from that time downwards. For several years our people worshipped in different rented places, but in the year 1839, six cottages were purchased, four of which were taken down and a small chapel was erected, with an end gallery, on which a debt of £800 was left. By this heavy debt, in connection with various other things, the efforts of the society have been much retarded; but they have recently exerted themselves to the utmost for the removal of the debt, and with considerable success. Mr. J. Lear generously promised that upon the discharge of £100 he would give another £100, a condition which was most gratefully accepted by the friends. They entered heartily into the work themselves, and, aided by the liberality of others, together with a grant from the General Chapel Fund, they accomplished their object. For several years the society and Sabbath school had been gradually increasing, so that the chapel became too strait for them. We accordingly proposed in order to meet the growing spiritual wants of this thickly populated part of Ipswich, and especially to provide for the instruction of many hitherto neglected children, to enlarge the chapel so as to secure the requisite space for both the congregation and the school. We first commenced a subscription list towards the object, and when we had raised about £50, we had plans and specifications put into the hands of tradesmen, and soon found that the sum required for the enlargement and other important alterations, would be considerably over £200. This sum we knew could not be raised by our own church, as it is entirely composed of the working classes. But feeling persuaded that Christians of other denominations would help us, our people felt it their duty to "arise and build;" they entered spiritedly into the work, took down one of the cottages connected with the premises, and cleaned all the old materials fit for use free of expense. The contractor unroofed the chapel, took down the front, and the east side wall, and 19 feet on the west side, which part was in a dilapidated condition, and then laid an excellent foundation with concrete; then several courses of 18 inch brick work, while the rest of the work is 14 inches. There are seven good windows in the east, and four in the west. The front is built of the best red brick, with four white brick piers; the three large windows in front are circular headed, and there is a fanlight over the door and a very neat inscription stone in the gable. The chapel is covered with blue slate, and is inclosed with iron palisading and has a flag pavement in front: the whole has a neat appearance. The inside is properly fitted up with strong benches stained and varnished, and free sittings, and lighted with gas by 18 burners. The size of the chapel is 48 feet long by 33 feet 6 inches wide, with an end gallery which will seat about 100 persons. The roof is open, being plastered to the rafters up to the ridge. The beams, ring posts, &c. are stained and varnished. The re-opening services commenced on Thursday, October 16th, 1862, when a sermon was preached by the Rev. T. Morris (Baptist). A tea meeting was held in the evening, when about 250 sat down to the social cup. After tea we had a meeting of the most pleasing character; addresses were delivered by Major E. Grimwade, the Revs. J. Gay (Independent), J. J. Kelley (North American Indian), and the writer. On the 19th and 26th of October, and Nov. 9th, sermons were preached by the Revs. J. J. Kelley, J. Gay, W. Chapman, and Mrs. H. Chipperfield. The proceeds of the services, inclusive of the profits of the tea meeting amounted to £26 3s. 9d.; the total amount raised by collections, private subscriptions, donations, and profit of tea meeting is £160. The cost of the alterations is about £210, besides nearly £10 of work done gratis. We expect to pay £20 more off shortly, and we have agreed with the builder to pay the rest off by instalments, so that the whole debt is to be discharged in twelve months. W. RUMB.

[Has it now become a general practice among Christian denominations to pass by their own ministers, so as to have their first sermons preached in new places by ministers of other churches? Is it good policy to do so?—ED.]

BLEDDFA, KNIGHTON BRANCH.—The Primitive Methodists of this village having completed the erection of their new Chapel, whose foundations were laid under cheering auspices in July last, held the opening services on Lord's-day, October 12th, 1862. The day was very unfavourable as the rain descended in torrents until beyond the time of the afternoon service; and as the district is mountainous and the population scattered, fears were entertained that there would be but a small attendance; but despite every inconvenience many people came for miles, and the services proved quite a success. Two sermons were preached on the occasion by Mr. J. Edwards, of Kingston, and Mr. J. Nott, of the Farlands, both staunch and influential members of our denomination. The chapel itself is quite a model of neatness and convenience. Its size is 27 feet by 21, with a small enclosed yard in front. It is built of green stone with Bath stone quoins, and an ornamental coping of the same material on the parapet. The inscription is cut in old English characters; and this, with a string course of Bath stone immediately above it, gives a beautiful appearance to the frontage which is seen a long way down the valley.

The interior is also chaste and well designed. It has seven forms on each side with rail backs, all stained and varnished. Its rostrum is of a modern plan, about 5 feet high from the floor to the Bible board, with steps at each end; the lower part of its front is panelled, and the upper part is of strong trellis work. The outlay will be about £116 (exclusive of the labour which has been done by the friends and neighbouring farmers gratis), towards which we have raised £46; this leaves a debt of £70, of which £30 are lent by the trustees without interest. The friends have adopted the golden system, and intend paying off £20 the next anniversary.

On the following Wednesday after the opening, a public tea meeting was held in a tent erected for the occasion. The quiet little village of Bleddfa was on that day a scene of such excitement as it has rarely witnessed; nearly 200 persons partook of tea prepared by the friends. About six o'clock a religious service was commenced in the chapel, when Mr. I. D. Rutter was called to the chair, and interesting addresses were delivered by Mr. I. Moore on "The Value of Religious Decision in Youth;" by Mr. I. Udell on "This as an Age of Progress;" by the Rev. S. Roberts, Welsh Methodist, on "The Importance of Public Worship;" the Rev. J. Middleton, on "The Means to produce Religious Revivals;" and by the Rev. H. Leech on "Recent Improvements in Christian Societies." The writer then spoke of the general sympathy in this new enterprise, and acknowledged the kindness of the friends. Space will not permit the mention of all the names of persons who have responded to our appeals; be it enough to say that all good deeds are registered in heaven, and will be blessed items in the morning of the resurrection.

G. MIDDLETON.

ALVELEY, KIDDERMINSTER CIRCUIT.—More than thirty years have passed since the first Primitive Methodist missionary entered this village, and a society was formed. Some of the first members remain to this day. Attempts have repeatedly been made to secure land on which to erect a chapel, but, until recently, without success. When the writer entered this circuit in 1860, the cause here was low, but as several chapels were being erected in the circuit, the society once more began to wish for one, and thank God, this time not in vain. Mr. James Wood gave a suitable piece of land, worth about £12, and preliminaries having been arranged, on the 19th of July the foundation-stone was laid by Miss Fisher, of Hall Close, (to whom the trustees presented a mallet and silver trowel,) who performed the ceremony in a very efficient manner, and then placed upon the stone a purse containing fifty sovereigns. Michael Fellows, Esq., of Hall Close, likewise placed £10 thereon (as a first donation); Mr. Thomas J. H. Load laid down £5, and other sums were given amounting to £74 6s. 10½d. These well-timed donations gave great pleasure to the trustees and all well wishers of the object.

The building progressed rapidly, and was opened for Divine worship on Sunday, October 19th, 1862, when the writer preached in the morning, and Samuel Ward, Esq., of the Wood, Oswestry Circuit, in the afternoon and evening. The collections amounted to £17 7s. 0½d. The chapel is built in the Italian style of architecture, of red brick, the quoins, window jambs, and arches, being white stone. The moulded frontispiece and the steps at the entrance, and a large projecting cornice across the front, are also of white stone. In the centre of the front pediment is an ornamental inscription-stone, with our connexional name and the date. There are two circular headed sash windows on each side, two in the front, and a very rich bull's eye window over the rostrum, and a fanlight over the door, both of stained glass. The aisle is laid with encaustic tiles of appropriate pattern and colour. The seats are all forms, with backs of a novel construction, made of red deal and stained and varnished, and will accommodate about 140. Especial care has been taken for the ventilation of the building, and it is warmed by a handsome ornamental descending stove. The front and one side are protected by cast iron palisading, and the whole is an ornament to the village. The total cost of the building is £253 4s. 6d. To meet this outlay, besides the sums given at the laying of the foundation stone and the opening services, we have raised by a tea-meeting £9 10s. 5½d. Mr. T. Turley has given a second donation of £2; Mr. H. Turley, £5; thirteen friends have given £1 each, and £7 have been obtained in small sums. The white stone for the building was given by Messrs. Wood and Jones.

Our generous friend Miss Fisher, in addition to the £50 previously given, has presented a second donation of £40, besides putting in, at her own cost, the ornamental window and fanlight, and giving two handsome bronze chandeliers, of the aggregate value of £23 10s. To Michael Fellows, Esq., we are indebted for the encaustic tiles with which the aisle is laid, value £5, besides his first donation of £10. He, with the generosity of a noble mind, has resolved that the house of the Lord shall be free, and that his second donation shall be all the remaining cost, amounting to about £50.

Altogether the chapel is a credit to the Connexion, and the fact of its being free from debt is worthy of notice by all our societies engaged in chapel building, and is a source of great pleasure to the trustees and the circuit at large, who desire to tender their heartfelt thanks to all parties who have rendered assistance, especially to our large-hearted friends Mr. Fellows and Miss Fisher, for their invaluable assistance. Their generosity is not confined to their own neighbourhood, but they have helped us in other cases especially Miss Fisher, who has lately given a donation of £17 to Gallowtree Elms chapel, and two years ago she gave £50 to Stourport chapel. May the Lord reward them a hundred fold. But we are most of all grateful to the Most High for the spiritual blessings vouchsafed to the worshippers in the new sanctuary; and we rejoice to add our congregations and society are nearly doubled; and that this chapel may be the birth-place of hundreds of souls is the earnest prayer of

W. GWILLIM.

[We have great pleasure in giving publicity to the foregoing very satisfactory account of the liberal aid our Alveley friends have experienced at the hands of the kind-hearted lady and gentleman named above, and it will accord with our feelings if we be allowed to publish, from time to time, in our pages, similar instances of Christian generosity, as having been witnessed in other places in our Connexion. We hope some of our wealthy friends will hear a voice whispering, while perusing the foregoing account, "Go, thou, and do likewise."—Ed.]

BARNTON, NORTHWICH CIRCUIT.—This village was missioned by the Preston Brook Circuit, about thirty years ago. A society was formed which has held its meetings in a cottage till the present new chapel was built. Many trials have been made to obtain land for a chapel, but without success, till June last. Then the Lord opened our way, and a suitable plot of freehold land in a good situation was purchased for £21 12s. On the 7th of July, 1862, the foundation stone of a new house for the Lord of Hosts was laid by Thomas Higgin, Esq., who gave £21 12s., which was the price of the land. A sermon was preached on the occasion by the Rev. J. Macpherson, and the sum of £4 1s. was collected. The chapel was opened for Divine worship, October 19th, 1862, by the Rev. Thomas Jobling, October 26th, by the Rev. D. Tuton, and on November 2nd, by Mr. J. Read, of Manchester. On Monday, November 3rd, a tea meeting was held, which closed the opening services. The chapel was well filled on each Sabbath, and a good influence attended all the services, and the collections, including the proceeds of the tea party, amounted to £27 10s. Since the opening the congregations have been very good. On November 30th, a revival meeting was held there, and the Lord poured out his Holy Spirit on the people, sinners cried for mercy, and five souls obtained peace through faith in Christ. Special services were continued through the week, and eight more souls tasted that the Lord is good, and several others were convinced of sin. Truly the Lord is with us, and the God of Jacob is in the midst of us.

The chapel is built of brick, the walls being a brick and a half thick. It is 30 feet long, 21 feet wide inside, and 16 feet from the floor to the ceiling. There are twelve pews in it which are all let. The chapel will comfortably seat 140 persons. It has cost £250, towards which including donations and opening services, £120 has been raised. This is good for a place like Barnton. It may be truly said, the people had a mind to work, and have done what they could, and they are still doing what they can to bring down the debt to £100. The trustees tender their thanks to all friends who have so willingly assisted them, and to the Giver of all good for the prosperity he has granted us, and especially for the pouring out of his Holy Spirit, and the conversion of thirteen souls in the new chapel. This is a fine consecration of the building. May it be said of hundreds in the great day of accounts that they were born there.

A. KIRKLAND.

[Our old friends at Barnton have done well. May they go on and prosper.—Ed.]

SOUTHPORT, PRESTON CIRCUIT.—Southport is a beautiful, well-built watering town in Lancashire, situate about eighteen miles north of Liverpool, containing a resident population of 10,000, and during the summer months a visiting population of at least 10,000 more. To this lovely town thousands flock from different parts of Lancashire, Cheshire, Derbyshire, Yorkshire, and Staffordshire. It is well known that many come hither in search of health, while others come for mere pleasure, and go away highly satisfied with their seaside rambles. The Primitive Methodists, I am informed, missioned this place about the year 1830, and preached in the open air, but it appears they did not meet with much success for several years. Efforts, however, were still put forth amidst discouragements and unfavourable circumstances, till God in his mercy and providence opened their way for greater usefulness, and made them a blessing to many souls.

In the year 1848 Southport was put on the Preston Circuit's plan, and preaching services were held in a cottage on Sunday afternoons, and the Lord graciously visited our people while worshipping there; and in the year 1853, when the Rev. W. Rowe was stationed in the circuit, a great revival took place, and many were added to the society. In the following year a small chapel was built, where our people have worshipped till the opening of the new one. The old chapel was very small and inconvenient and in a bad situation, so much so that visitors were scarcely ever able to find it; some visitors have gone away after being here for some time without knowing that we had a chapel in Southport. This being the case our friends have long desired to have a more commodious place of worship in a better situation. Efforts have often been made to secure their object, but without success, till the beginning of this year, when Brothers Kaye and Graham succeeded in securing a plot of land in London-street. The land is taken on a lease for the term of ninety-nine years, at a very small rent, and is well situated, being only about three or four minutes' walk from the railway station, or from the market place, which places are near the centre of the town. The foundation-stone of the new chapel was laid on the 9th of August, 1862, by Jonas Segar, Esq., who delivered a very appropriate address on the occasion. Very profitable addresses were also delivered by the Revs. J. Gibson, of Liverpool, J. Graham, and John Lamb, Esq., of Preston; the latter of whom presented to Jonas Segar, Esq., on behalf of the trustees, a silver trowel, and a mahogany mallet. A public tea meeting was held in the Temperance-hall, trays were furnished by the friends gratuitously, and a large number sat down to tea; after which a public meeting was held, John Lamb, Esq., in the chair, and addresses were delivered by the Revs. J. Graham, R. Middleton, J. Gibson, A. M. Stalker, Baptist, W. Jowett, Independent, and

Mr. Ashton, of Wigan. The building progressed very rapidly and was completed without any loss or accident. Arrangements having been made for opening the new and beautiful sanctuary, the first opening service was held on the 23rd of October, 1862, when the Rev. Charles Garrett, Wesleyan, of Preston, preached an excellent sermon to a large congregation, and a good collection was realized. On the following Sabbath, October 26th, two sermons were preached by John Lamb, Esq., and a dedication prayer meeting was conducted in the afternoon by the Rev. R. Middleton. On the following Tuesday, October 28th, a sermon was preached by the Rev. John Harvard, Wesleyan, of Southport. On Lord's day, the 2nd of October, three sermons were preached, that in the morning by the Rev. R. Middleton, and those in the afternoon and evening by the Rev. W. Sanderson, of Kirtton Lindsey. On Sabbath, the 9th of November, sermons were preached by the Rev. J. Gibson, of Liverpool, and Mr. T. G. Higgins, of Halton; and on the 10th of November, a public tea meeting was held in the Temperance-hall. After tea the meeting adjourned to the new chapel, Jonas Segar, Esq., presided, and addresses were delivered by the Revs. J. Graham, R. Middleton, A. M. Stalker, W. Jowett, T. Cherry, and Dr. Goodman. The meeting was of a most interesting character. The collections at all the services amounted to £33.

The chapel is built of red brick, and looks remarkably well. It does credit to the builder, Mr. Illingworth, and to the architect, Mr. Hodge. It is 48 feet by 38 feet 6 inches, and 22 feet from the floor to the ceiling, so that it will admit of a gallery when required. It is lighted by twelve circular headed windows. It is well finished inside, and well ventilated. There are forty pews, and the rest of the sittings are free. Many pews have already been taken. There are two small vestries at the back, each 9 feet by 8 feet. The chapel will seat 350. The entire cost of the building will be about £520, and we have raised towards it, with subscriptions and collections, £220, which leaves a debt on the chapel of £300. We tender our thanks to the generous friends who have so nobly assisted us in the great work. To Jonas Segar, Esq., for a donation of £25, besides giving a large donation to our old chapel; to Mr. Joseph Armitage, of Liverpool, for £20, and to his little son George, for £1 7s. 7d. saved in pence, &c., and given; to Mrs. Grace Armitage, for £5; to J. Stead, Esq., for £5; to Mr. Haigh, for £5; to Mr. Joseph Marshall, for £5; to Mr. William Wright, for £5; to Mr. James Spencer, for £5; to Mr. Walter Smith, for £5; to Mr. Froggatt, for £5; to L. Heyworth, Esq., for £5; to Mr. Ashton, of Wigan, for £4; to Mr. Illingworth, the builder, for £4; and to Mr. P. Ball, for £2; to Mr. W. Wright, sen., for £2; to Mr. Green, for £2; to Mr. Pendlebury, for £2; to a Friend, for £2; and to many others for donations of £2 and downwards: and to Mrs. Green, near Manchester, for a handsome velvet cushion for the pulpit; and to Mr. Armitage, of Liverpool, for a large pulpit Bible.

R. MIDDLETON.

BRIERLEY HILL.—The annual sermons were preached in our chapel at Brierley Hill, in behalf of the Trust Funds, on Sabbath, October 26th, 1862. Those in the morning and evening, by the Rev. R. Jukes of Westbromwich, and that in the afternoon by the Rev. James Arnold. The proceeds for the day amounted to the sum of £12 16s. 0d., which was considerably in advance of last year. The evening sermon was devoted to the improvement of the death of the late Rev. John Morton. The chapel was crowded to excess, many being unable to obtain admission.

C. BECKLEY.

HILL TOP, WESTBROMWICH CIRCUIT.—The opening services of the new chapel here, were held on Lord's days, Oct. 26th, and Nov. 9th, when excellent sermons were preached by the Revs. J. Morton, Wesleyan, Leeds, W. Antliff, of London, R. Jukes, of West Bromwich, and Mr. Wm. Rigby, of Wednesbury. Much Divine influence was felt on each occasion, and lasting good was done. The total amount collected reached the noble sum of £53 11s. 8d. The chapel is a substantial brick building, about 31 feet long, 33 feet wide, and 31 feet from the floor to the ceiling—being quite high enough for a gallery. It has 5 windows in front, and 6 on each side, with vestry and orchestra, also a platform and communion rails; there are 16 pews, and the remaining seats are free, there being accommodation for about 250 persons. There is palisading with gates in front, and at the back ground to erect a school upon. The entire cost will be about £480, including £50 for ground, towards which we have raised about £180, and we are determined, God helping, to put all our energies, to work, so that the chapel may soon be free from debt.

M. NICHOLAS.

COCKWELLS, PENZANCE CIRCUIT.—The fourth anniversary of our Cockwells chapel, was celebrated on Sunday, Nov. 2nd, 1862; when three sermons were preached: that in the morning, by Mr. T. Pascoe, and those in the afternoon and evening by the writer, to overflowing congregations. The friends gave freely and liberally of their substance, and the proceeds were £3; being considerably in advance of those of last year. At the evening service, several sought the Lord with tears, and three have joined society. • J. HAWKINS.

ASTON ABBOTS, ATLESBURY CIRCUIT.—A chaste, comfortable, and substantial sanctuary, has been erected in connection with our society in this place. It is, in the clear, 28 by 20 feet, 13 feet high, and lighted by 6 windows. The door, and the 2 front windows, are circular headed, with neat projecting arches of white bricks. The inside has a modern appearance, the pews and rostrum are stained, and the building is an improvement and ornament to the village. The opening services were commenced on Sunday, Nov. 2nd, 1862, when the Rev. S. Turner preached morning and afternoon in the new chapel, and in the evening the congregation being very large, the Independent chapel (kindly offered for the occasion), was filled, and a good discourse was delivered by the Rev. G. Moore. The services were resumed on the following Sabbath, and three excellent sermons were preached by the Rev. E. Bishop of Bedford. The next day a tea meeting took place, when about one hundred and forty sat down in the old chapel, after which a public meeting was held in the Independent chapel, presided over by the Rev. S. Turner, and addressed by the Revs. G. Moore (Independent), E. Bishop, and J. Nevill. The collections and donations amounted to about £60 (which is rather more than one third of the entire cost,) of which £20 were collected or given by Mr. Joseph Stranks, £4 7s. by Mr. George Simmonds and mother, £3 by Mr. Ezra Stilton, besides liberal donations from other friends deeply interested in the undertaking.

S. TURNER, JUN.

NEWBURY STATION, ALDBOURNE, WILTS.—On Lord's day, Nov. 2nd, 1862, a course of protracted meetings was commenced in this place, when sermons were preached by Brothers Phelps, Lewis, and Curtis. The Holy Ghost was in the word, and in the prayer meeting at the close of the evening service one soul was rescued from the grasp of the devil. On Monday evening, the writer preached under a severe conflict, it seemed as though the infernal troops of hell were let loose upon me, but I laid hold on Him, who is Almighty. On Tuesday night I again preached, my soul was burdened within me; the heavens seemed like adamant to my prayers; but whilst I and others were breathing the desires of our souls to God, He who by fire answered Elijah's prayer, dispersed the dark clouds, bade the shadows fly, and liberated our souls; we could then sing,—

"In darkest shades if thou appear,
My dawning is begun;
Thou art my soul's bright morning star,
And thou my rising sun."

On the following evening the great Goliath of hell with drawn sword came against me, and tried hard to prevent me from making inroads into his territories, but with all his diabolical skill he was defeated, and the armies of our Israel, under the blood-stained banner of Calvary, shouted "Victory, victory, through the blood of the Lamb,"—while a poor unhappy backslider, sitting on a stool, with her baby in her arms, again embraced her Saviour, got her backslidings healed, and rejoiced in a sin-pardoning, and a soul-saving God. On Thursday night I preached again; the chapel seemed filled with Satanic influence, but through the strength of our great Immanuel we conquered. On Friday evening we processioned in the streets, arousing the inhabitants by singing in true Primitive Methodist style the well-known hymn,—

"Hark the Gospel news is sounding."

And having reached the chapel, I ascended the pulpit, and endeavoured by God's assistance, to pourtray the awful doom of those who reject offered mercy, and neglect their soul's salvation. The word was with power, and in the prayer-meeting after the service three sisters professed to believe in Christ as their Saviour, and were enabled to go their way rejoicing. To God be all the glory. On Saturday evening we again processioned in the streets, singing: "Grace is flowing like a river," &c., and on arriving at the chapel I preached from "Escape for thy life." We felt the Spirit's influence to be very mighty. A young female was smitten with deep conviction, but left the chapel without finding peace. The day following being the Sabbath, I held a prayer meeting, and preached in the morning on Sanctification. Mr. S. Osmond preached a pathetic sermon in the afternoon, from the jailer's penitential cry, "What must I do to be saved?" In the evening we held a love-feast, and in the prayer-meeting after, the young female, who on Saturday night was so deeply convinced of her need of salvation, and another person, ventured their all on Christ, and stepped into the glorious liberty of the children of God. During the week following, the services were continued and carried on by the local brethren, who have laboured faithfully to save deathless souls from hell, and point them to the Lamb of God. God blessed and owned their efforts, and two blood-bought souls found peace through believing in Jesus. Glory be to God for all his wondrous works. Seven of the above named converts have united in church fellowship with us.

H. PORTNALL.

GLoucester and ChELtENHAM MISSION.
—We have recently held a course of missionary services on this station, and I am happy to inform you, that in this department of our work we are moving in the right direction. The services have been held in Gloucester, at Cheltenham, and at Brookthorpe. Preparatory sermons were preached on Sunday, November 9th, by the Revs. Murray Wilson (deputation), J. Hall, and W. Robinson. The public meetings were held on the three following evenings, when addresses were delivered by the afore-named brethren. Our meeting in Gloucester was presided over by Mr. J. Mercer (Congregationalist), and we were also assisted by the Revs. W. Collings (Baptist), and E. J. Baxter (Methodist New Connexion). Here the sum of £8 2s. 6d. was raised.

At Cheltenham the chair was taken by Mr. Clifford (late of the Isle of Man), whose opening speech contained many practical suggestions, and was listened to with much interest by an attentive audience. Here we raised the sum of £8 5s. 8d.

At Brookthorpe our meeting was held, in a carpenter's shop; in which shop, by the kind permission of Mr. Beard, our services are regularly held. This being our first missionary meeting in the village, considerable interest was felt by our small society. The meeting was of a highly interesting character and resulted in laying upon the missionary altar the sum of £1 6s. 2d. The amount, though comparatively small, is, considering the circumstances, very creditable to the friends, and exceedingly encouraging to ourselves.

The total proceeds of these services amount to £17 14s. 4d., being £7 0s. 7d. in advance of the previous year. It may not be out of place to add, that our prospects here, are on the whole, improving. In several villages, houses have been secured in which to hold our services regularly during the winter months. We have just formed a society in one village, where our friends will be subject to much petty persecution—persecution in its meanest kind—the withholding of charities from the deserving poor during the inclemency of the winter season. That these, our new friends may be graciously sustained in mind and body, and abide stedfast in the faith, we ask the fervent and sincere prayers of those who are interested in our home missionary operations. For the successes of the past we are truly grateful to the God of missions; but yet on our banners is inscribed "Excelsior!"—higher still! J. HALL.

NEWBRIDGE, ABERDARE CIRCUIT.—OPENING OF "JEHOVAH-JIREH." The above substantial and beautiful chapel was opened for divine worship in the following order. Sunday, October 26th, three sermons were preached; in the morning and evening, in English, by the Rev. G. Johnson, and in the afternoon in Welsh, by the Rev. H. Oliver, B.A. Independent. Sunday, November 9th, three sermons were preached, in the morning and evening, in English, by the Rev. Thomas Hobson, Pontypool; and in the afternoon in Welsh, by the Rev. E. Roberts, Baptist. Monday morning, November 10th, two sermons were preached, by the Rev. T. Hobson, and J. Lambert, Esq., Bristol. At two o'clock a tea meeting was held, at which from 300 to 400 attended. At four o'clock a public meeting was held, presided over by Geo. Smart, Esq., Cardiff, who generously gave £5 at the collection. The following gentlemen took part in the meeting, Revs. T. Hobson, P. Maddocks, Cardiff, J. Greenland (Wesleyan), G. Johnson and W. Hunt, Circuit ministers, Messrs. J. Lambert, J. Howells, Cardiff, H. Davis, Dowlais, and others. The Taff Vale Railway Company very kindly allowed all the friends to travel to the Monday's services and back for one fare. The chapel is 40 feet by 30. The local papers pronounce the building an ornament to the town, and a great credit to the connexion. The cost of the whole is about £350. We have borrowed £200, at five per cent for six years, if necessary. We have raised by the foundation-services, the opening-services, and subscriptions, about £115. We purpose to make another effort to raise what is required. May this chapel be the birthplace of many souls. G. JOHNSON.

LINSLADE, LEIGHTON BUZZARD STATION.—The first anniversary of our chapel was celebrated on November 16th and 23rd, 1862. The Rev. W. Antliff, of London, and Mr. Sharman, of Leighton, officiated on the former Sabbath. The Rev. W. Antliff also delivered a very able and thrilling lecture on Monday, the 17th, in the Temperance-hall. On the latter Sabbath J. Wilson and Master Danzy Sheen preached; and on Monday, the 24th, a tea and public meeting were held. We had a good congregation at each service, liberal collections, and, best of all, a very gracious influence attended the word preached; many wept tears of joy, and said, "Master, it is good for us to be here." The following figures will show that we have cause for gratitude to God and a generous though poor people. Donations and subscriptions, £123 11s. 9d.; collections and profits on tea, £14 4s.—total, £137 15s. 9d. We trust, by the blessing of the Most High on our efforts, to reduce the debt in twelve months from this time to £300; and when we consider the chapel and school with the new gallery just erected, will have cost nearly £1,100, we thankfully and humbly lay ourselves afresh on the altar, exclaiming, "Not unto us, but to thy name be all the praise!" J. WILSON.

NORTHAMPTON STATION.—We have just opened a new chapel at Paulerspury, the birthplace of the distinguished Dr. W. Carey, and about one hundred yards from the house where he was born. Sermons were preached Nov. 9th, by Mr. H. Collier, and Nov. 16th, by the writer, and Mrs. Sharman. Nov. 17th, a soiree was held, and a good meeting after. The chapel is 23 feet by 16 feet in the interior, and 13 feet from the floor to the ceiling. It is built of good brick, with dressed Bath stone sills, and arches over the windows and door, and a neat ornamental inscription stone. The interior is fitted up with pulpit, rail back-seats, and forms. The entire cost will be about £75 towards which we have received by collections, &c., £19, and expect to realize the one-third shortly. P. COATES.

BRIGHTON.—We record our gratitude to God, because this important, yet suffering station is inspiring more hope of life and permanent progress. Much open air preaching in suitable localities has drawn together large and influential congregations in this fashionable watering place on Sabbath afternoons, and deep impressions have been made by the truth on many minds. We have also had large companies of the baser sort, at 9:30 on Sabbath mornings in the worst part of the town. Here, however, quite unexpectedly, the police awhile ago gave us much trouble. They tried to stop and drive us away, as they had done the town missionaries in other streets; but we still held the position, although sometimes two or three officers of various grades, in plain and official attire, presented themselves, spoke largely, and threatened heavily; and when this was quietly received without our desisting, they actually drove the peaceable hearers right and left, who fell back to the unmoved preacher, like disturbed water to its own level. Still Mr. Parrott would not move or close the service before the proper time; but in the hearing of all the people told the officers his name, address, his licensed authority under the Crown, and our object. "We are," said he, "the Queen's moral police; you professionally, her civil police. Both of us are employed and paid to keep the peace, and teach the people to know and keep their own places. We use the Gospel of peace, you stern looks, threatening words, and hard wood." He exhorted the people to keep quiet, make no resistance by word or act, to hear God's message for themselves, carefully to watch all the proceedings, and be ready to witness for the truth in case of arrest, for which he was prepared and ready. Each time he had one of his colleagues or a local brother with him, and after opening the service, he got one of them to preach first while he moved about the crowd to keep all quiet, and prevent obstruction in the thoroughfare. This respectful intrepidity, accompanied by Divine influence, gained the people's esteem, and rendered the officious heroes powerless, and ultimately ashamed, if not afraid, they being publicly told by Mr. Parrott that they were the only disturbers of order and peace, and would be held responsible should they gall the people into any violent retaliation; and they knew there were in the motley group desperate characters whose faces and attitudes spoke of rising passions ready to vent themselves in desperate deeds. About five successive Sabbaths closed the campaign which made a town's talk. Each day we finished our service in quietude, the word visibly making good impressions. Afterwards the molestations ceased, and one of the police force actually became chief musician in our chapel, and all the others treated us with respect, or silently passed us by. The effects of these open air services soon became visible in our chapel, by a more than doubled congregation, a quickening in the members, and a genuine but comparatively quiet work of soul saving, which is progressing among sinners.

We had thirteen increase for Brighton for the quarter, and twenty more were covenanted for the ensuing quarter. The rather bold effort made in taking the "Royal Pavilion" for our late missionary meeting, did our cause good, although the extremely wet and uncomfortable day prevented a financial success. The money taken was, however, about five times the amount of last year in our chapel, and our way is opened there for the future. Large success might have made us less dependent on and confiding in God, who has our principles and graces tried as with fire. What we get is as it were through the very teeth of the devil, who obstinately and malignantly confronts us at every step. But we press forward, eye the Captain of our salvation, remembering Calvary and the Saviour's promises. Matt. x. 39; Rev. ii. 10.

On November 17th we had an excellent tea meeting to refit our minister's house, which had become very bare: it cleared over £5. Since then we have raised £1 10s. 10d. for our distressed friends in Lancashire, besides new and old clothing. Shoreham Society is looking up. By special effort they raised £5 5s. for their chapel in November. Since then £2 6s. for the Lancashire distress, and clothing of several pounds value. Their regular income is considerably in advance of that of last quarter. Brother Wilkinson is leading them on, and souls are beginning to embrace the blessed Saviour. In the villages, where we have rooms, our congregations are improving. Lewes, our county town, with its 10,000 inhabitants, remains a mass of rock, but even that rock can and must be broken up by agents properly furnished with the power from on high. The regular income of the station is fully 25 per cent. over last June quarter. Other projects are devised for further improvements, humbly expecting success, aided by our never failing friend, our "one Master, even Christ, who is over all, God, blessed for evermore." Brethren, pray for us.

J. PARROTT.

SWAFFHAM CIRCUIT.—We have lately held our annual Missionary meetings at Swaffham, Castleacre, Litcham, and Little Dunham. Sermons were preached on Sunday, November 23rd, 1862, by the Revs. W. Antliff, (of London, Connexional Editor), W. Crown, C. Hirst, and R. Clamp. Public meetings were held at the above places the following week; the congregations were good, and in some instances overflowing. The collections were liberal,—about twenty guineas were realized. The circuit town brought up ten pounds and five-pence, being nearly half of the above sum. We beg to say that one old gentleman, a local preacher with us, nearly eighty years of age, whose work is almost done, felt impressed that he ought to do something special in behalf of the missionary cause, and not being able to give much, he determined to beg; so a few days before the public meetings, he came four miles to ask the superintending preacher for a missionary box, and as he could not be furnished there and then, he took his wife's workbox, and had a hole cut in the top, and took a walk with it amongst his friends, and brought just ten shillings to the meeting. He has since been furnished with one of our missionary boxes. Another of our collectors, a female thirteen years of age, dressed up a little doll, placed it on a table in her mother's house, put a little bag by its side, and a slip of paper in its hand with an inscription, "Please give me something for the missionaries;" and the doll realised four shillings and sevenpence halfpenny, which when added to the money in her missionary box, enabled her to present two pounds to the meeting. Thus young and old are using means to diffuse the truth. Mr. Antliff, our Editor, rendered us good service, and we trust the instruction given, and the influence exerted, will have a lasting effect upon the friends who attended his ministrations. We tender our thanks to all our subscribers and collectors, hoping they will resume their work of faith and labour of love. We also thank God and take courage. May success attend the mission work generally.

W. CROWN.

STOKENCHURCH, CHINNOR CIRCUIT.—It is highly gratifying to us as a religious community, to witness the erection of so many new sanctuaries, which are standing monuments of gospel victories. At the above village, we have preached the gospel about twenty-seven years. In the early part of this time, our missionaries and friends had to endure no small share of brutal opposition, but by persevering effort in connection with providential interposition, the good Lord has opened the way for us to build a very neat little sanctuary for the honour of his great name. The foundation stone was laid by T. Wheeler, Esq., of High Wycombe, September 2nd, 1862. Mrs. Mary Burgess, a respectable but aged widow lady, of the place, kindly gave the site of land on which to build. The chapel is built of brick with a good slated roof; it is 38 feet in length, and 20 feet in width—17 feet from a good boarded floor to the ceiling; it has 5 windows, a good platform, two square pews, some good letable rail back seats, mostly movable. It is well ventilated, and presents a very neat appearance. The opening services were conducted on Sabbath, November 23rd, 1862, when three very excellent sermons were preached by the Rev. G. G. Pinder, of Hampstead, London. The day was fine for the season, and the congregations were overflowing. A very blessed influence was realized, and one backslider was reclaimed, and many others were deeply affected. Indeed the Divine glory filled the place. Hallelujah. A tea meeting was held on the Monday, when a goodly number sat down to an excellent tea, part of which was provided gratuitously by some friends. A public service followed, when the Rev. E. Hancock presided, and some thrilling and animated addresses were delivered, by Mr. T. Marshall, (local preacher), the Rev. W. James, Rev. E. Green, (Independent minister of Chinnor), and the Rev. G. G. Pinder, whose efficient services were highly appreciated. The total cost will be near £180, towards which we have raised a considerable amount, as follows:—By Mrs. M. Burgess, £5; Mr. C. Avery, £5; Mr. J. Eustace, £5; Mr. J. Bates, £2; Mr. D. Bates, £1; Mr. R. Hunt, £1; Mr. J. White, £1; Mr. T.

Day, £1; Mr. Dodwell, £1; Two friends, £1 each; Col. W. Fane, M.P., £1; Mr. Spyer, 500 bricks; with many smaller sums from 10s., down to 1s. Mrs. L. Bates, presented a cushion; Mrs. J. White, a good bible, and another female friend a pulpit hymn book. So that by the opening collections £6 1s. 0d., and other promised sums, we shall secure by the blessing of God, the one-third of the cost, and we trust more by the time allowed. We have let a goodly number of seats, and the friends feel deeply interested in their new place of worship, and we anticipate it will prove the spiritual birthplace of many souls.

E. HANCOCK.

PENRITH MISSION.—On Lord's Day, November 23rd, 1862, missionary sermons were preached at Penrith, by the Rev. M. Lupton, of London; at Catterlen, and Lazonby, by the Rev. T. Atkinson, and at Skelton, by the Rev. D. Robb. On Monday, the missionary meeting was held at Penrith, Mr. R. Gate, (Wesleyan) presided, and addresses were delivered by the writer, the Rev. D. Robb, the Rev. J. Tannahill, M.A., (Presbyterian), the Rev. W. Brewis, (Independent), the Rev. J. Warnes, of Brough, and the Rev. M. Lupton. The missionary meeting was held at Catterlen, on Tuesday; the writer took the chair, and addresses were given by the Rev. D. Robb, the Rev. J. Warnes, and the Rev. M. Lupton. On Wednesday, the missionary meeting was held at Lazonby; Mr. W. Hogg, presided, and the meeting was addressed by the writer, the Rev. D. Robb, and the Rev. J. Warnes. The missionary meeting was held at Skelton, on Thursday, Mr. J. Martin, took the chair, and addresses were delivered by the Rev. D. Robb, the writer, and the Rev. J. Warnes. The congregations were large, respectable, and attentive; the speeches were full of energy and power, and the people were pleased and profited. The proceeds of this very interesting course of missionary services amounted to £26 11s. 9d., being £3 1s. 2d. in advance of last year. To the Triune God be all the praise and glory. T. ATKINSON.

HEXHAM.—The town of Hexham is pleasantly situated on the banks of the river Tyne, and contains a population of about 5000 souls. Shortly after our missionaries visited the north country they entered this town, and with earnestness and power they proclaimed the "glorious gospel of the blessed God." A society was soon formed, and for a considerable period we preached in a kiln, used previously as a malt house. Ultimately a chapel was built in Bull Bank, certainly one of the worst situations in the town. Soon after the erection of the chapel, the society and trustees were involved in trouble. The chapel was seriously mortgaged; and the interest was not met. Several of the trustees abandoned the chapel, and left their brethren to struggle with difficulties of no ordinary character. By a sad mistake the property was conveyed to the mortgagee, instead of being made connexional. The result was, the mortgagee took possession of the chapel, and for several years we have had to pay an annual rent. But the Almighty, who has beheld all the storms through which his people have had to pass, has in his providence wrought out a deliverance. The late Rev. Henry Hebborn, feeling deeply interested in our little society at Hexham, expressed a desire during his last affliction, to erect a chapel at his own expense, and present it to the Primitive Methodist Connexion. Death terminating his laborious and useful life before his desire was executed, his pious widow has resolved to complete the purpose of his heart. And accordingly, the foundation stone of the new chapel was laid on November 24th, 1862, by Errington Ridley, Esq., in the presence of a large concourse of people. The trustees presented Mr. Ridley with a silver trowel, bearing the following inscription:—Presented to Errington Ridley, Esq., by the Trustees, on the occasion of his laying the Foundation Stone of the Hebborn Primitive Methodist Chapel, Hexham, November 24th, 1862." The ceremony was of a deeply spiritual character. That glorious Being who blessed His people at the dedication of Solomon's temple, condescended to sanction and bless the proceedings of His servants on November 24th, so that many said "Lord, it is good for us to be here." J. WILSON.

PRESTON CIRCUIT.—Hoole is a village six miles from Preston. Here the Primitive Methodists have had a cause for nearly forty years. That cause has for many years been in a very low state; still our friends have kept labouring and praying for a revival of religion, and God has graciously heard and answered their prayers by sending them signs of better times. During the last few weeks about twenty young persons have professed to find peace, through believing, and others are anxiously seeking an interest in the precious blood of Jesus. O that the converting work may spread through the village. At Preston, revival services have lately been held, and many sinners have been converted, and at some other places the Lord is making known his power to save, and our prayer is, that the whole of the circuit may be baptized with the hallowed fire. R. MIDDLETON.

WEYMOUTH.—The missionary services for this year, on this mission, have just closed, Dec. 4th, 1862, and we are happy to say they have been of a very cheering character; we have had a gracious influence, and much Christian liberality. The deputation, Brothers J. Philips, of Exmouth, and H. G. Button, of Sherborne, were highly efficient in the pulpits and on the platforms. The chapels were crowded to overflowing and in some places many were unable to gain admittance. At Portland we were favoured with the use of the Independent chapel, and at Dorchester, with the Independent school room; and from the feeling manifested it is evident the missionary spirit is not dying out, but the friends see the importance of their position, and are determined to go forth with increased energy in the cause of God. The total amount raised this year is £52 2s., being £8 10s. in advance of the preceding year. To God's name be all the glory. We are also pleased to say that we have recently had several sinners converted in different parts of the mission. O that we may be baptized afresh for the great work of soul saving, and only live to glorify God, is the prayer of yours in Jesus, J. RACKHAM.

HULL SECOND CIRCUIT.—FOUNDATION-STONE LAYING.—You will rejoice to hear that we are providing extended chapel accommodation to assist in meeting the spiritual necessities of the rapidly increasing population of Hull. The Primitive Methodists have now laboured for the moral and religious benefit of the inhabitants of Holderness-road, and the neighbourhood, for about forty years, and this too under serious disadvantages for want of a suitable chapel and school rooms. The rented chapel and premises which they now occupy in Holborn-street, are inconvenient, and, in other respects, unsuitable. After diligent inquiries, frequent disappointments, and long delay, the society at length succeeded in securing an eligible building site, on which they are now erecting a spacious chapel, school rooms, vestries, &c. Preparatory sermons were preached by the Rev. C. C. McKechnie, of Allendale Town.

The foundation-stone was laid on Monday, December 1st, by Henry Hodge, Esq. On this deeply interesting occasion the trustees, through the medium of the Rev. William Garner, superintendent of the circuit, presented to Mr. Hodge a handsome silver salver bearing an appropriate inscription. To a few remarks offered by Mr. Garner, Mr. Hodge replied in a brief and pertinent speech, to which the large assembly listened with evident tokens of delight. He was followed, in a catholic strain, by his senior brother, Alderman Hodge, who, in his turn, was followed by his brother, Mr. Samuel Hodge. These unusual incidents gave to this department of the service a special interest. The weather was very damp and cold, the procession from Clowes Chapel, nevertheless, and the gathering of people on the site of the intended new chapel, were unexpectedly large. In the evening a public and sumptuous tea was provided gratuitously by our female friends, who loaded the tables, as they are wont to do on such occasions, with a superabundance of provisions. About 700 persons partook of the social repast. After tea a public meeting was held in Clowes Chapel, when the attendance was gratifyingly large. Alderman Hodge occupied the chair. At these thrilling services we were favoured with the valuable assistance of the Revs. W. Harland, President of the Conference, Colin C. McKechnie, editor of "The Christian Ambassador," T. Greenbury, author of "The Standard Bearer Fallen," &c., and J. Petty, our Denominational historian.

In furtherance of the religious object of these efforts a bazaar was held in the public rooms on the 15th, 16th, and 17th instant, when about £170 were realized,—a very respectable amount, all circumstances considered. Only twelve months ago we took at a bazaar in the same rooms, for the benefit of Clowes' Chapel, £270. In getting up our last bazaar the service of the ladies, who took a leading part in the effort, were strongly characterised by well-directed zeal and perseverance. In three months after the issue of the bazaar circulars, a spacious room, like a little market-place, was well stocked with a great variety of useful and ornamental articles; another striking proof of the noble things which can be done by judicious and persevering co-operation.

To aid us in carrying out our designs we have already received in contributions and valid promises upwards of £800. With pleasure we record our gratitude to the ladies who provided the public tea, which, with £10 2s. in cash from several friends, realized £42.—To the trustees for the noble example of liberality which they have set before the Christian public: for instance, H. Hodge, Esq., £225; Mr. Henry Simpson Hodge, £50; Mr. Samuel Hodge, £50; Mr. Thomas Hodge, £50; Mr. George Hodge, £5; Mr. J. T. Robson, £50; Mr. W. Render, £5; Mr. R. Milson, £5; Mr. James Sharp, £25; Mr. W. McCollin, £10; Mr. W. Knowles, £5; Mr. W. Carter, £2 10s.; Mr. H. Morrill, £5 6s.; Mr. James Worsnop, £5; Mr. T. Robinson, £5; Mr. W. Howden, £5; Mr. H. Nayler, £5; and Alderman Hodge, though not a trustee, £50.

With general begging, opening services, and other means, we hope to obtain one-third of the entire cost of the chapel and premises, which will involve an outlay of £4,000 or a larger amount. We calculate that these premises, which will be a freehold, and for which a Connexion Deed is already executed, will prove a very valuable acquisition to Hull Second Circuit. That God may crown the undertaking with his special blessing, and fill the sacred house with his glory, is the fervent prayer of W. GARNER.

HULL FIRST STATION.—Laying the Foundation Stone of a Jubilee Chapel, Spring Bank.—Spring Bank is a beautiful neighbourhood, in the borough of Kingston-upon-Hull, leading to the General Cemetery. A considerable population of respectable inhabitants has sprung up in the locality during the last few years, which is likely to be materially increased in a few years to come. Hence the necessity of a new and commodious place of worship, in order to meet the religious requirements of the important and interesting neighbourhood. A few of our friends have for some time looked upon the locality as a suitable one in which to attempt the establishment of a new interest; and on the writer's entering the station in July, 1860, Mrs. Norman pointed out to him the propriety of the enterprise, and urged its importance and utility. Several difficulties, however, then stood in the way of immediate action, which it is needless to specify. It is sufficient to state that these, one by one, were in due time removed, or were happily surmounted, and that during last summer the undertaking was entered upon in earnest. Mr. Downes interested himself in procuring for us a most eligible building site,—the best indeed which the beautiful neighbourhood presents, comprising 1,500 square yards, having a frontage of thirty yards to the main road, directly opposite to Park Street, and another frontage of fifty yards to a new street hereafter to be made. We are partly, at least, indebted to Mr. Downes for having obtained this splendid site at the moderate price of ten shillings per yard. An efficient set of trustees, twenty in number,—all members, and most of them office-bearers in the society, some of them connected with West Street, and others with Thornton Street chapels, having been obtained, plans and specifications were prepared by Mr. J. Wright, the architect, one of the trustees, and the work was advertised; but as the estimates sent in considerably exceeded the expectations of the majority of the trustees, it was deemed advisable to make some alterations, in order to lessen the expenditure. This caused considerable delay, and produced some degree of discouragement among the friends. But new plans and specifications were after a time prepared; the work was again advertised, and a much larger number of estimates was obtained than before, all the principal builders of the town having entered into competition for the work. An agreement was made with satisfactory parties, and arrangements hastened for laying the foundation stone.

On Sunday, Feb. 8th, 1863, preparatory sermons were preached in West Street and Thornton Street chapels by the Rev. W. Sanderson, of Kirton Lindsey, and the Rev. J. T. Shepherd, of Winterton. The congregations were crowded, the collections larger than expectation, and the services eminently satisfactory and efficient. In the prayer meeting after the evening service at West Street, ten or more persons professed to find peace through faith in Christ.

On Monday, February 9th, a grand procession, comprising the trustees, the ministers, and other office-bearers of both the Hull Circuits, with numerous other friends, left West Street chapel at half-past two o'clock, and proceeded to the building site, whither the elder scholars of West Street and Thornton Street Sunday schools, together with several hundred ladies, had previously repaired, for whose accommodation a convenient platform had been prepared. The weather was splendid, and the excitement produced both wide and intense. Several thousand persons were attracted to the scene, and a most interesting service was conducted. Besides the ministers of the first circuit, most of those in the second assisted, and effective addresses were delivered by the Revs. J. T. Shepherd and J. Wood, of Scarborough, and W. Briggs, Esq., of Leeds. A bottle, containing a document relating to the enterprise, and of historic interest, was placed in the foundation stone. Whilst this was being done, the scholars of the two schools aforementioned sang an appropriate hymn with much animation. The stone was laid by Mrs. Norman, to whom a beautiful silver trowel was presented by Mr. Charlesworth, in behalf of the trustees; and after laying the stone, she deposited upon it a small parcel containing fifty guineas. She also presented each of the scholars with a bun in celebration of the occasion.

At five o'clock a public tea was provided both at West Street and Thornton Street chapels, the school-rooms of both of which were excessively crowded. The ladies who gratuitously furnished the trays had very kindly and considerably provided for double the number of persons for which they had promised; otherwise serious difficulties would have arisen, as the numbers who attended exceeded our expectations. Eight hundred persons, at least, took tea on the occasion—450 or more at West Street, and about 350 at Thornton Street. A public meeting was held in each chapel afterwards, both of which were crowded, and both of the meetings were of the most delightful and enthusiastic character. J. M. McCulloch, Esq., of York, was expected to preside at West Street, but was unavoidably prevented. He, however, kindly remitted a donation of five pounds; and in his absence, the chair was very efficiently occupied by Mr. Sissons, assisted by W. Hodge, Esq., of Hull Second Circuit. The meeting was entertained by a splendid oration by the Rev. W. Sanderson, whose services were in such demand on the occasion that to meet the wants of all parties he kindly consented to speak at both meetings. His oration was followed by a lucid and interesting statement of suitable and appropriate facts by the Rev. W. Garner. The Rev. J. Wood urged some important and valuable practical advice, and Messrs. W. Hodge, C. Bowman, and the Rev. H. Woodcock gave brief addresses.

W. Briggs, Esq., presided in a very satisfactory manner at Thornton Street meeting, and kindly presented a donation of five pounds; and very interesting and effective addresses were given by the Revs. J. Tongue and W. Whitby, of the second circuit; the Revs. R. W. Monkman, W. Sanderson, and J. T. Shepherd, who very efficiently occupied the most prominent position, and delighted the audience with their pleasing and persuasive eloquence.

The proceeds of the different services, exclusive of Mrs. Norman's liberal donation, exceeded one hundred pounds. It was highly gratifying to witness the intense interest evinced by the societies of both chapels; affording an encouraging promise of success. The new chapel will be at nearly an equal distance from West Street and Thornton Street chapels; being about half a mile from each; and receives the united assistance of the two societies,—one of the advantages resulting from our Presbyterian form of church government. The enterprise is a very responsible one, as it will incur an outlay of £4,500; but it is calling forth the energies and prayers of our friends in general, and the services in connection with the laying of the foundation stone have, it is believed, exerted a wide and beneficial influence in its favour. We are under great obligations to the ladies who made such ample and gratuitous provision for the tea, but dare not solicit space to insert their names.

We may be permitted to state that in addition to the fifty guineas presented by

Mrs. Norman, we have also received fifty guineas from Mr. Norman; fifty pounds from Mr. Charlesworth; twenty-five from Mr. Wright, and other encouraging sums, hitherto equalling our expectations. As our brethren in the second circuit are engaged with a similar undertaking on Holderness Road, both circuits have the prospect of greatly extended usefulness in this large and increasing town. Enterprises of such magnitude, undertaken at the same time, require, of course, much prayer, much liberality, and much active zeal; but it is hoped that our friends will prove equal to the occasion, and that both enterprises will be conducted to a successful issue, redound to the glory of God, contribute largely to the extension of the Redeemer's kingdom, and minister to the salvation of thousands of souls: objects these worthy of the utmost liberality, earnest prayers, and most active efforts of Christian people.

J. PETTY.

[We have given this article insertion before its turn in order that it may be seen at once what noble efforts are being put forth by the two Hull stations for enlarging our borders in that stronghold of Primitive Methodism. Truly the Hull friends set a fine example to the whole Connexion.—Ed.]

COLONIAL DEPARTMENT.

MOUNT BARKER, SOUTH AUSTRALIA.—Dear Brother Antliff,—Feeling confident that many of your readers will be glad to hear how we are doing on this side of the seas, I take this opportunity of giving you a few items of our progress. The last year has been one of great success in the Christian Church in our colony. Amongst the Wesleyan Methodists some hundreds of souls have been saved. In this we rejoice. We are glad, too, that on our beloved Zion the Spirit of the Lord has been outpoured, and in several places numbers have been added to our ranks. On our station we have caught part of the shower of saving influence. At Little Hampton, one mile from Mount Barker, the Lord has made His voice heard, and many have yielded to David's Lord. At Wistow, about thirty have been brought to God the last few weeks. In this place there are many families from Kelling, in Norfolk, who used to listen to the writer when preaching Jesus in the old country. Many of them have now given their hearts to God. We almost feel as if in the dear old county when hearing these sons of thunder praising the Lord. Watergate is another small place in the bush, with a small, but good chapel. Within a few days, over thirty hearts have been broken by the hammer of God's word. One man and his wife (each over 60 years of age,) have sought and found mercy. Among the persons saved is one young woman who had such views of herself, sin, and hell, that she left home to end her life by violence; but the Holy Spirit spoke to her heart, saying, "Do thyself no harm." She came to the house of God, and could soon rejoice in possession of salvation. By faith she touched the cross and lived. She had been a great novel-reader—in these mud-waters she delighted to sport, on these streams of pollution she had been carried, till she felt they were life. As soon as she had drunk of the fount of God, she would not stand, no, not even on the bank of the river of death-water. She brought about seven volumes of novels, and burnt them at the chapel door. What a beautiful blaze they made! It was a fine sight. We have other places on our station which, to some extent, have shared in this good work. The Lord is with us. Praise Him! Hallelujah! I hope and pray that God may bless all the stations with great prosperity.

J. G. WRIGHT.

HEIDELBERG, VICTORIA.—On Sabbath, the 2nd of November, 1862, two sermons were preached in behalf of the school by the station's preacher. The services were well attended, especially that in the evening; the chapel being so densely crowded, that several were unable to gain admittance. The children acquitted themselves in a most admirable manner. The pieces, which were well selected, were pleasingly recited. We are also happy to be able to report progress. After filling up the breaches occasioned by seventeen removals, an increase of seven scholars for the year is recorded; total on the roll, 47. The collections, &c., were also good, the sum of £8 being obtained, which is in advance of the amount raised at the preceding anniversary. Too much attention, we believe, cannot be paid to our Sabbath-schools. The children composing them may, with peculiar emphasis, especially in this country, be termed, "our army in reserve." From them, if rightly trained, we expect great and good things. That God would bless our Sabbath-schools, and bring from them noble-hearted men, that will seize with a vigorous hand the weapons of our spiritual warfare—men that will present an invulnerable front to the common foe of God and humanity—men who, with divine courage and determination, will make destructive inroads into Satan's empire, assist to break the galling yoke of the wicked one, and help to build up Zion until Jerusalem becomes a praise in all the earth, is the hearty wish of

H. HEATHSHAW.

LITERARY NOTICES.

John Leifchild, D.D. His Public Ministry, Private Usefulness, and Personal Characteristics. Founded upon an Autobiography. By J. R. LEIFCHILD, A.M. London: Jackson, Walford and Hodder, 27, Paternoster Row. 1863.

ONE of the most interesting of George Gilfillan's many books, is his "History of a Man." And the history of a thorough man is at all times a treat. Such a treat the present work supplies. Mr. Leifchild has had a fine opportunity for an exhibition of true filial affection and piety, and he has turned his opportunity to good account in the production of this beautiful book. His excellent father had an unusually long career of extensive and varied usefulness, and the son has shown a fine appreciation of his father's character and labours. As intimated on the title page, the present work is partly autobiographical, and, of course, it is none the less reliable on that account. Both father and son, therefore, have laid us under obligations to them in the deeply interesting history here furnished. We can not at present recapitulate or summarise the leading incidents in Dr. Leifchild's valuable life and labours, but must content ourselves with expressing our sense of the ability, honesty, piety, and usefulness of the work. We have been anxious to see the book, and now have great pleasure in according it our humble meed of praise, and strongly recommending its perusal to all who labour in word and doctrine, and whose aim is to win a name among the good and great of their generation. Dr. L. was a noble model for young men, and for Gospel ministers generally. His life seems to say to each, "Go, thou, and do likewise." We may hereafter give some extracts from this interesting work.

Lectures on Theology, Science, and Revelation. By the late Rev. GEORGE LEGGE, LL.D., Leicester. With a Memoir, by JAMES LEGGE, D.D., Hong Kong. Edited by JAMES LEGGE, D.D., and JOHN LEGGE, M.A. London: Jackson, Walford, & Hodder, Paternoster Row. 1863.

THE Lectures before us are on some of the most interesting and important subjects that come within the range of human thought:—the Importance of Truth, the Duty and Limits of Free Inquiry, Human Nature, the Free Agency of Man, Human Responsibility, Human Depravity and Guilt, Christ the Redeemer, the Influence of the Spirit, the Millennium, the Final Condition of Man, Science and Christianity, Astronomy, Geology, Geology in Relation to the Deluge, and the Idea of God. Dr. Legge was a Christian, a scholar, and a gentleman. Hence his treatment of the subjects indicated may have been a priori expected to be such as would meet all reasonable calculation. In the discussion of recondite and controverted questions it is a great point to have the pre-requisites above named. Here we have an admirable development of those qualities. On all points, we cannot anticipate that his readers will endorse the doctor's views. We do not see eye to eye with him ourselves in some things. But we agree with most he says, and much admire the way in which he says it. Knowing that his leanings were Calvinian and not Methodistic, we cannot expect his views always to accord with our own. But the work is a storehouse of precious thoughts, and worthy of the devoted author, his editors, and the publishers. The prefixed memoir is deeply interesting, and extends to about 100 pages.

Memoirs of New Zealand Life. By EDWIN HODDER. Second edition. London: Jackson, Walford, and Hodder.

THIS work has now been some time before the public, and has been favourably noticed in many of the periodicals of the day. We are glad to see it has won its way to a second edition, and have no doubt it will go through many another. To all who want to know what a sensible man, who has spent some time in the country, has to say about New Zealand, this volume will be very welcome. The facts and incidents of the narrative are neatly sketched, an air of naturalness runs through the whole, and a fund of valuable information for those who contemplate emigrating to New Zealand, or those who wish to increase their acquaintance with the far off colony, as it was before the recent Taranaki war, during its continuance, or since it was supposed to be over, is here available. Mr. Hodder has something to tell us too about the gold diggings—something of which the theory is quite as comfortable as the practice—and a good deal about the natives, the colonists, and the scenery. The book reads like a romance, but so far as the writer is concerned, it is evidently a romance of real life. We recommend it especially to the attention of our junior readers.

The Homilist. Conducted by the Rev. D. THOMAS, D.D. Vol. iv. New Series. Vol. xi. from the commencement. London: Ward & Co., 27, Paternoster Row.

THIS is an excellent volume. It comprehends a large and various amount of theological and literary intelligence. As we had occasion to say recently, The Homilist grows in favour with us. This volume for 1862 is worthy of great praise, and has our hearty good wishes.

Sermons Preached in Marlborough Chapel, London. By J. GAGE PIGG, B.A. Second Edition: London: Ward & Co., Paternoster Row.

A DOZEN Sermons, rich in thought, beautiful in expression, diversified in subject and illustration, devout in tone, and practical and useful in aim, constitute the contents of this volume. We rejoice to see that the London pulpit is speaking out in all directions on the leading truths of religion; and we are glad to find the trumpet gives no uncertain sound. The Sermons of such men as George Smith, Daniel Katterns, Samuel Martin, Charles Stanford, J. Gage Pigg, and others, not to name Mr. Spurgeon, Mr. Binney, or Dr. Thomas, are a proof that there is still power in the pulpit of the London chapels, as well as churches, and that old theological themes have no need to be laid aside because they are antiquated, and cannot be made interesting to this generation. That such Sermons as Mr. Pigg's are read, as well as heard, with increasing zest and profit, is no evil omen. Sermon literature we rejoice to find is becoming more and more popular, and we trust that as the intelligence and piety of the ministry increase, the people will more and more appreciate this kind of reading. We recommend the present volume to our readers as being one of the best now in circulation.

The Model Preacher. Comprised in a Series of Letters, Illustrating the best mode of Preaching the Gospel. By Rev. WILLIAM TAYLOR, of the California Conference, Author of "Seven Years' Street Preaching in San Francisco," "California Life Illustrated," "Address to Young America," &c. Tenth Thousand. London: H. J. Tresidder, 17, Ave Maria Lane, E.C.

HERE is a handsome volume of 400 pages on one of the most important themes that can engross our thoughts—the best mode of preaching the Gospel. It will be assumed the writer is an American Methodist; and the present is an American edition. Ten thousand copies of a work on such a subject! What say the writers of the Times and other diurnal and hebdomadal sheets to this? Is preaching really out of fashion now? Do men care nothing for the pulpit and its teachings? Has it positively lost all its quondam prestige and influence? A thousand silly things recently said are admirably answered by this ten thousandth issue of a work on preaching. We cannot this month, find space for extracts from this stirring book, but we shall, probably, avail ourselves of an early opportunity to cull some racy pieces therefrom for the special delectation of our numerous readers. Suffice it for the present to say, the volume abounds in terse aphorisms, striking illustrations, judicious suggestions, and noble examples. We advise our young preachers, itinerant and local, to peep into it the very first opportunity.

An Exposition upon the Epistle of Jude.

Delivered in Christ Church, London.

By the Rev. WILLIAM JENKYN, M.A.

1652-1653. And of the Epistles to the Philippians and the Colossians.

By the Rev. JEAN DAILLE, Minister of the French Reformed Church at Charenton, A.D., 1639. Translated and

Edited by the late Rev. JAMES SHERMAN, of Surrey Chapel, London.

Edinburgh: James Nichol. London: James Nisbet. 1863.

ANOTHER of the commentaries now being issued by the respectable houses named. The present volume is worthy of its predecessors, and that is saying much. The Epistles of Jude, and those to the Philippians and the Colossians are very interesting and important parts of the New Testament Scriptures; and these valuable expositions will make the study of them both more interesting and more profitable. These able men had not lived in vain if they had only prepared these valuable works. We do trust the publishers will find the sale of the works equal to their merits, and then they will have no reason to regret this speculation.

The Works of Thomas Goodwin, D.D.

Vol. vi., Containing the Work of the Holy Ghost in our Salvation. Edinburgh: James Nichol. London: J.

Nisbet & Co.

If there is one thing more than another of which we have reason to be jealous in regard to the Church in this age, it is the tendency to ignore the work of the Holy Spirit in man's salvation. In certain quarters, both on this side the German Ocean and on the other, and not less so beyond the Atlantic, the tendency in question may be said to crop out offensively when opportunity serves. We deem the publication of the present volume of Goodwin's works the more opportune on this account, as we hope it may act as an antidote to the poison of such false theology. That all Goodwin's views quadrate with our own will not be supposed; but there is a mass of solid thought, on one of the grandest subjects in Christian theology, comprehended in this noble volume. May it have a patronage commensurate with its high claims!

The Class Meeting Manual. By WILLIAM SAUL. Revised and Abridged by W. HARLAND. London: R. Davies, Conference Offices, Sutton street. 1863.

It is not easy to over-estimate the importance of Class-meetings to the spiritual prosperity of our societies, and hence the desirableness of making every judicious arrangement for promoting the efficiency of these meetings. In the little manual before us some very valuable and seasonable suggestions are offered by both the author and the editor with reference to this object. The high importance of the subject led our last Conference to purchase the copyright of this useful book, and to request Mr. Harland to revise it for a new edition, and to condense the contents of it as much as possible, in consistency with the retention of the most important portions intact, in order that it might be reduced in price, and put into general circulation. It has been neatly got up, and is sold at 8d. The members of our societies generally, and our class-leaders and assistants especially, are urged to procure the manual, and devote some of their leisure moments to a careful and prayerful perusal of its teachings and suggestions. Our hope and prayer shall be that the members of our societies may be abundantly profited by the publication of this little work, and that God may grant to us all, those new covenant blessings, for obtaining which we from time to time meet in our respective classes.

The Immortal Theme, Christ for Me. By J. ASHWORTH, Author of "A Voice from the Tomb." London: R. Davies, Sutton street, E. Peterborough: W. Pentney, 18, Narrow street. 1863.

"CHRIST in the Divinity of his nature and glory of his perfections, in the wonders of his love, in his glorious exaltation, in his gracious offices, in his distinguished titles, Christ for the penitent, for the believer, for the dying saint, Christ the grand object of attraction in heaven, and conclusion"—these are the headings under which Mr. Ashworth discourses of "The Immortal Theme." Evidently the book is full of Christ, and the respected author has shown no little discrimination in putting forth his views of him. The pious reader will find his heart warmed and his mind instructed by the perusal of this work. Sound, pithy, practical, earnest, and useful,—we desiderate for the book a wide and lasting popularity.

Infant Baptism Defended; or, An Argument on the Authority, Import, Subjects, and Mode of Baptism. By WILLIAM COOKE, D.D. Three pence. London: H. Webber, 21, Warwick Lane, Paternoster Row, E.C.

THIS is just the thing to put into the hands of persons who have not time or money to spend on larger works on the Baptismal Controversy. Dr. Cooke gives the gist of all the best discussions of the questions involved, in very intelligible and yet very conclusive terms. Many persons in different Methodist communities have had their minds disturbed—not by reading the Scripture teaching on Baptism, but by the glosses of our Baptist friends thereon. Hence the necessity of some little work to place within the reach of such brethren, that may serve as a quietus in such cases. Dr. C. has supplied this desideratum; and we hope he will have the gratification of knowing his labours are duly appreciated, and rendered abundantly useful.

---

OBITUARY.

---

ELIZABETH COLE died at Cinderhill, April 28th, 1862, in the twenty-seventh year of her age. She was induced by her husband to attend the means of grace, and at a prayer meeting she was heard to cry aloud, "God be merciful to me a sinner!" She was pointed to the Lamb of God, which taketh away the sin of the world, and enabled to cast her soul on the atoning merits of Jesus. Her conduct was consistent with her profession. She was the subject of much affliction, but in patience she possessed her soul. The day before she died she asked for the Bible, and said, "This is my only support."

S. COLE.

ELIZABETH BYWATER, wife of the Rev. J. Bywater, Primitive Methodist minister, was born at Swinefleet, in the county of York, September 12th, 1805. She was brought to a saving knowledge of the truth when about eighteen years of age, and maintained her Christian character to the end of her days. She was brought to God through the agency of the Wesleyan Methodists, and remained in connection with that denomination for several years, and was usefully employed as a Sabbath school teacher. In the year 1842 she was united in marriage to Mr. Bywater, and for twenty years shared with him in the joys and sorrows of a Primitive Methodist preacher's life. For two years previous to her death, her health was sensibly failing. After my entrance into this (the Scotter) circuit, Mrs. Bywater was the subject of excessive weakness and much suffering. Whenever I paid her a pastoral visit, I uniformly found her faith in Christ steady and lively, and frequently with tearful eyes, and a countenance expressive of inward peace, she would speak of her hopes and anticipations. On April 16th, 1862, she died calmly, and went to be "for ever with the Lord." May the writer and reader meet her in heaven.

T. WHITEHEAD.

BENJAMIN DOWDING was killed in a pit at Blaenafon, in the Pontypool Circuit, April 1st, 1862, by a mass of coal falling upon him.

About three years ago he was awakened to a sense of his sinful state whilst engaged in his work. It seemed as if he had heard a voice saying, "You must soon die, and if you die now, you cannot go to see your friends in heaven." For about three weeks he wandered in deep distress of soul, seeking retirement, and scarcely partaking of food, till one night, as his mother was preparing for class, unasked he resolved to go with her; she expressed her surprise, told him she was going to class, and explained a class-meeting to him. He replied, "Well, mother, I will come, and will tell them how I feel." He went, and that night he obtained pardon, through the precious blood of Jesus.

As soon as he was converted he learned to read, and from that time made the Bible his constant companion. He was often found with his God in secret; his place in the sanctuary and in the class-meeting was always filled: his experience was clear and scriptural, his piety exemplary; his upright conduct was noticed by all with whom he had anything to do, and he shed an influence for good upon all around. He frequently collected the young around him, and conversed with them about their souls, endeavouring to lead them to the "Lamb of God which taketh away the sin of the world." He gave great promise of usefulness; but God's thoughts are not our thoughts, neither are our ways His ways. He has taken him away to shine in a brighter sphere, and in a holier clime.

The last night he spent at home with his parents, he lay awake for hours, singing—

"In Heaven above, where all is love, There 'll be no sorrow there"— perhaps little thinking that in so short a time he should enter its sacred portals; but so it was, for he was cut down by the hand of death a day or two afterwards, in his eighteenth year. He breathed for about ten minutes after the coal fell upon him, but did not speak again. He has left the evidence of a holy life that he has gone to be with Jesus, "which is far better."

C. P. MAGER.

MARY LYON, of Saxby, in the Newport Branch, Lincoln Circuit, was born at Glenthams, February 18th, 1788. As far as we can learn, she did not receive the pardon of her sins till she had reached the age of thirty-one years, when a gracious work of the Lord broke out among our people at Glenthams, and she was one amongst the number who found peace through faith in Christ. After a time she removed to Saxby, and when our people missioned it, she cast in her lot amongst them. She there spent the last sixteen years of her life, and most of that time our people preached in her house. She was faithful to the various interests of the society. Her house was open for the preachers. She supported the cause according to her ability, was a steady and consistent member, and thus adorned the doctrine of Christ in all things. She was ill about ten months, and died on April 21st, 1862.

J. CHENEY.

LYDIA HANDLEY, of Brassington, Wirksworth Circuit, was born in the year 1780, and died April 23th, 1862. In early life she was moral, and respected religion and religious people, but did not see the necessity of a change of heart until the Primitive Methodists missioned Brassington, about forty years ago. Out of curiosity she went to hear them, and was pleased with their hymns and singing; but it was under their plain and powerful preaching her understanding was enlightened, and her heart made contrite. She saw and felt she was a sinner, cried earnestly to God for salvation, believed in Jesus Christ, and obtained mercy. She now went on her way rejoicing, adorned the Gospel by a consistent life, loved God's house, his word, and his people, and as far as her means would allow, supported the cause of God. She did not believe in a religion that cost her nothing. After witnessing a good confession for forty years, her end drew nigh, and a most glorious end it was. She could exclaim most triumphantly, "I have fought a good fight, I have finished my course, I have kept the faith. Henceforth, there is laid up for me a crown of righteousness, which the Lord, the righteous judge, shall give me at that day."

A little before she expired, she sang most sweetly and earnestly several beautiful and appropriate hymns, and asked others to assist her. One of the friends said, "What shall we sing?" She replied, "Come, sing to me of heaven, when I am dying." She seemed to suffer but little pain, and expired without a groan or a struggle.

DIED at Snelsmore, in the Newbury Circuit, on April 2nd, 1862, RICHARD FILEWOOD, aged forty-three years. Sometime after his marriage with the pious and devoted woman who now mourns his loss, he was prevailed upon to attend the ministry of the Primitive Methodists. His first intentions were to mock and persecute, but hearing a sermon on death preached by Mr. Bendle, he was led to see and feel himself a sinner in the sight of God, which constrained him to seek mercy, and as a humble penitent he confessed his sins, and obtained forgiveness through faith in the merits of Christ. He now united with our society, and he continued a consistent member until death terminated his earthly career. He was greatly attached to prayer and class meetings, and was seldom absent. He was a lover of Zion, and a good supporter of the cause. The affliction that terminated in his death was consumption, during which the adversary of his soul assailed him, and at times he had to endure severe conflicts; but he was enabled to rest on the immovable foundation, and to obtain a glorious victory. As a kind and affectionate father he sought the spiritual welfare of his children. For sometime previous to his death he was enabled to give up the whole of his family into the hands of God. He said, just before his departure from earth, "It is hard work. Oh, what could I have done without religion now. The struggle will soon be over. I should like to have a good shout, but weakness of body prevents me." Soon after which he fell asleep, leaving a widow and six children to lament their loss; but they sorrow not as those without hope. The society followed his remains to their resting-place. May his family and the society meet him in heaven.

T. CUMMIN.

MRS. ANN SPRING, of Brigg, departed to be with Christ, April 17th, 1862, in the sixty-seventh year of her age. About thirty years ago, John, her eldest son, was brought to Christ, and joined our Brigg Society. He was a young man of great promise. He went to bathe and was drowned. His affectionate mother was cut to the heart, and she said, "I'll meet him in heaven." She gave herself to Christ, joined our society, and adorned her profession for more than a quarter of a century. Two of her daughters are now members of Christ's Church. Her end was peace.

J. MULDS.

DIED, May 1st 1862, at Wisbech, RABEOCA PARLETT; aged seventy-eight years. She was brought to the Lord among the first of the Primitive Methodists of this town, which now stands at the head of a circuit numbering 600 members, and about twenty chapels. The death of a beloved child made a deep impression upon her mind, and on one occasion, while our people were passing her door singing in their usual manner, the work was carried to a decided issue. She thought this people shall be my people, and their God my God. She was a useful member for thirty-nine years. The first years of her pilgrimage were rough, her hardships many, and her struggles great; but none of these things moved her. She fought valiantly the good fight to the end. Her illness was short; it lasted only ten days. One day, when the doctor visited her, she said, "Now, doctor, I want you to tell me what you really think of me. I don't ask you because I am afraid to meet death, for my peace is made with God; and I am not afraid to die." He replied, "Well, Mrs. Parlett, you don't get on so well as I should like to see you." She then added, "I know by my own feelings that I shall die; but I am going home to my Jesus." She faithfully warned all who visited her, not to put off religion to a sick bed, and enforced the warning by saying, that if she had had to seek it now, her pain was so great, that she could not have attended to it.

One friend visited her who was very deaf, when to those who were in the room she said, "Oh! how I want to tell her to seek religion, but I am so ill, that I cannot talk loud enough to make her hear." We hope the last words to her grandson, who is in the society will long be remembered—"Be a good lad, and forsake not the Lord." Before she expired, she said to her family, that God had shown her the crown which was laid up for her, and the glory was so great that she could not describe it.

She lay, when unable to talk with the family, repeating, "Oh! Jesus do come for me;" and then in obedience to his call, left this world to be with Christ, and with her beloved husband, who died a member in our society, about eight years ago. She had the happiness of leaving some part of her family useful members in society.

W. WARD.

DIED April 17th, 1862, aged 65 years, LOIS NICHOLSON, of North Ferriby, Hull First Circuit. After our Chapel was built, she became a constant hearer, and she was converted to God on the 23rd of January, 1833. The way in which she travelled was sometimes thorny, but she clung to her Saviour to the end of her journey. Sometimes family troubles were her lot. One of her sons was killed on the railway near her home; and two of her daughters were removed in the bloom of life. These things caused her to feel what human life is. One trait in her character is worthy of notice—she was constantly seen at her class at the time appointed. In the early part of 1862, she began to show signs that she was going fast home. I generally called to see her once a week, and always found her trusting in the merits of the Redeemer. The Sabbath before her death I found her weak, but able to answer the questions put to her. She evidently rested her hopes on the Saviour. The Sabbath following her decease, she was followed to her last resting place by a large family, and many friends. May we all meet in heaven!

W. HUNTER.

ELIZABETH STEVENSON, wife of Mr. Thomas Stevenson, was born at Ibstock, in the County of Leicester, in the year 1803. When only sixteen years of age, her mother died, and she being the eldest, the care of the family mainly devolved upon her. The duties of her responsible position she discharged with great credit to herself for some years, until she united in marriage with Mr. S.

For a few years after marriage, she and her husband lived according to the course of this world; but at the age of twenty-seven she was awakened to a sense of her state as a sinner. Her distress of mind increased until it became an agony of silent grief. Her friends perceiving her gloomy state of mind, and not knowing the cause of it, feared she was sinking into a state of insanity. At this time lying upon her bed one night, she told her husband that she was intensely unhappy. The cause of her distress in an instant flashed on his mind, and he said, "Is it your sins that are troubling you?" She assured him that it was. Conviction seized his mind, and they together and at once sought pardon from an offended but merciful God; and there at the solemn midnight hour, they entered into covenant with each other, and with God, that their lives should thenceforth be spent in his service. God heard the vow and sealed the covenant: and thus began that devout Christian life which was continued without intermission until she was removed to heaven. Thenceforward the duties of life which she had performed respectably and to the happiness of her family, were performed under the influence of religion; and this, associated with the kindness of her disposition, and the regularity of her domestic habits bore much fruit to the glory of God. As a wife she was faithful and affectionate: in health and in sickness—sickness that was often occurring, and at times long continued, her love for her husband never cooled, and her kind attentions were never remitted. As the wife of a local preacher she may be said to have been his helper in the Gospel. To her it was a felt honour that her husband held forth the Word of life. As a mother she saw six of her offspring sink into an early grave. The distress occasioned by these bereavements none can know but those who possess a mother's heart. But in the midst of her most trying circumstances she sought and obtained help of the Lord. Thus she was enabled to be resigned to his will, and to glorify God in the midst of the fire. She earnestly sought the spiritual as well as the temporal welfare of her family, and would sacrifice her own privileges to enable her family to attend the house of God; and while they were worshipping God in the sanctuary, she would be in her secret chamber pleading with God, that his grace might rest upon her husband, her family, and herself. That God heard her prayers is evident from the fact that most of her eight surviving children are walking in the path of life. As a member of the church, there was nothing obtrusive in her deportment, but there was a constancy in her Christian life, that entitled her to be regarded as a model of Christian consistency. She appeared to act from the secret conviction that the proper sphere for female influence and operation was in the more retired positions of society. She was liberal in her support of the cause of God, and she loved a faithful ministry, and also had a strong attachment to the ministers of God's truth.

After thirty years spent in the service of God, the time drew near that she must die, and she appeared to be rapidly preparing for her great change. Her love for reading and prayer increased, and her mind became more fully occupied with spiritual things. About eleven weeks before her death she was seized with paralysis from which she never recovered. In her affliction she was enabled to repose full confidence in God, and when suffering severely she would exclaim, "Bless the Lord, O my soul, and all that is within me bless his holy name." She spoke with the utmost calmness about her departure, and deliberately set her house in order. She spoke to her family and attendants about her hope in God her Saviour, and about the heavenly home, into which she was about to enter. A few days previous to her departure it became evident that that event was near at hand: and as the hour approached, she expressed her love for her husband and family; and when the moment of her exit arrived, sustained by the hand of her Lord, she entered into rest—on the morning of the 21st of April, 1862, having just completed her fifty-ninth year.

S. PARKIN.

MARY THORP came to her end in a good old age, full of fruit, on the 5th day of May, 1862, in the seventy-seventh year of her age. She was brought to God in the early days of Primitive Methodism, when Pateley Bridge was in the Ripon Circuit, and for about forty years she has been a steady and consistent member of society. She and her husband received our infant society into their house at Clapham Green, and in prosperity and in adversity stood by it thenceforth. Her conduct as a Christian was worthy of imitation; she cultivated personal piety and a daily walk with God; she did not live on tears and raptures, but by faith on the Son of God: and the result was calmness and resignation to the Divine will, and a deep and settled peace in the soul, that was seldom ruffled. As a wife she was economical and affectionate; as a mother, kind, loving, prayerful, and attentive; as a Christian, sympathetic, benevolent, humble, consistent, and persevering. Her death was sudden. She was in the act of dressing that morning about her usual time, when she was suddenly attacked with a fit of coughing, and fell upon her knees; the only words she was heard to utter were, "Lord, help me!" and then she expired. By this sudden death her husband has lost a kind and affectionate wife, three children a loving mother, the Church a pious member, the world a pattern of good works, and the ministers of the Gospel a true friend.

T. SMITH.

ELAM SLEIGHT was born at Scaths, Lincolnshire, October 10th, 1831. His parents attended the Primitive Methodist Chapel, and he was taken by them to the house of God. He was also sent to our Sabbath School, was a scholar for many years, then a teacher, and then raised to the important office of superintendent. His official duties he discharged with credit.

At an early age he was the subject of serious impressions; he loved the house of God, and often felt the force of truth, but continued a stranger to its saving power, until May 3rd, 1855, when he resolved to serve the Lord. The Friday following, when Mr. J. R. Parkinson, in private conversation, pointedly and affectionately showed him "the way of salvation," he said, "I see the way, I do believe." His chains fell off, the burden under which he had groaned for some time was gone, and from that time to his death he was a consistent Christian.

As he was an intelligent young man, and to all appearance would be useful, the Quarterly Meeting of this Circuit gave him appointments on the plan as a prayer leader, and God blessed him with success. Last November there were striking indications that he was marked to fall. Consumption commenced its work on his system, under which affliction he lingered for some time. In his illness he was highly favoured from first to last. He had great calmness, and very happy musings.

Brother G. Hird, a local preacher of this Circuit says, "I often visited him. Once, when suffering much, he said, 'What a process the Lord has to put us through to refine us!' Pointing to the hymn book lying on the table, he said, 'Read me the 841st hymn,' and as I read, he shouted with his remaining strength, 'I shall rise! I shall soon stretch my wings!—glory! glory! my native place!' The last time I visited him, I found him very prostrate. I said to him, 'Is all well?' He replied, with hope beaming in his countenance, 'I shall soon have done, then home—I am going home, glory to God—home after this pilgrimage.'"

He continued in this happy state until May 1st, 1862; then without a groan or struggle, he went to be for ever with the Lord, being in the thirty-first year of his age.

S. BUNCE.

At Wretton, in the Downham Circuit, MARY ANN ALLISON, departed this life, April 28th, 1862, in the 84th year of her age. My earliest recollections of statements made by my sainted parent, assure me of the fact that she was favoured with parents whose spiritual mindedness induced them in the days of her youth to teach her to walk in "the good and the right way." And although at a later date, she "loved the present evil world," yet the impressions made in the morning of her life were never erased. Some long time before the God of my fathers granted me an existence, my revered parent had decided on choosing "the better part;" and I cannot call to mind any period of my life, when her efforts for the spiritual benefit of the family were intermitted. To the fervency of her Christian zeal and the warmth of her maternal entreaties, I owe to a great extent my conversion, and present attainments in the Christian religion. Prior to the last fifteen years she had been a member with the Wesleyans, but about so far back, being unable (from the infirmities of age) to walk to the Wesleyan Chapel, she united with our people, and remained a consistent member till her decease. For some time past the natural strength of some of her faculties showed symptoms of decline, but in the midst of all she knew most satisfactorily, "in whom she had believed." No particular disease seemed to battle with her general health, but the thread of life being "worn by slowly rolling years," ultimately gave way, and on the fore-mentioned date the Master came and called her to her long-anticipated asylum in Abraham's bosom. "By an unfaltering trust," she approached her grave,

"Like one who wraps the drapery of his couch
About him, and lies down to pleasant dreams."
And as on the day of interment I grasped the clay cold hand that had administered to my many wants in bygone years, earnestly did I pray that her six surviving children might be ready to meet her at last,

"When death shall all be done away,
And bodies part no more."

J. ALLISON.

MONTHLY SUMMARY.

Dr. COLenso has got into hot water with the Bishop of Manchester, and even the Bishop of Oxford has interdicted his lordship's ministrations in the Oxonian diocese.—The Lord Chancellor has given great gratification to the Episcopal bench and their friends by proposing to give up for sale 320 of the 720 livings in his gift. He thinks the poorer livings may be benefited thereby, and his own hands be relieved of a tedious piece of patronage. The secularity of the Church is disagreeably brought out in his lordship's speech, and in the comments it has elicited.—The Liberator has some strong remarks on the questions of patronage, Church rates, the conduct of many of the clergy in connection with the Royal marriage, and ecclesiastical questions generally.—The Sunday closing of public-houses is now being earnestly discussed; and we hope before the 13th of May—the day fixed for the second reading of the bill on the subject in the House of Commons—that many Primitive Methodist congregations will forward petitions in favour of the measure. Let all the friends of the sanctity of God's Sabbath, and of sobriety and religion, enter heartily into this matter; and if the House be flooded with petitions from all quarters, we may hope some good will be the result. We have much pleasure in giving the following quotation from a circular we have received from Bolton, Lancashire, on this subject:—"You are doubtless aware that the introduction of the Bill was opposed on the 17th of March, and the House divided on the subject, when a majority of 89 appeared in favour of the introduction of the Bill, the numbers being 141 in favour of, and 52 against such a step. This decision must neither be over nor underrated. The fact that 52 gentlemen would adopt the extraordinary course of opposing the introduction of the Bill, proves the unscrupulous and unstinted character of the opposition we shall have to battle against; but the other fact, that 141 voted in favour of its introduction, is one fraught with cheering hope. We are not warranted in concluding that all these gentlemen will vote for the second reading of the Bill; that will in a great measure depend upon the use made of the intervening time. The response to the first call for petitioning has in many cases been nobly made. We must repeat the blow. Strike again with more earnestness than before. Once more we appeal to you for help. Who will not help at such a crisis as the present? The second reading is to take place on the 13th of May. We entreat you, if you have not yet begun to petition, to get all your strength into the field and begin at once. If you have already worked your own town or village, look around and see if you can work the villages near you. Leave no effort untried now. The drink interest has already taken alarm. The next few days will not be lost by them, nor must they be by us. Much may be done by stirring up others to work, and when the work has commenced in a district, it will go on. Much also may be done by getting up memorials to your members, signed as numerously as possible by electors. They will have great influence with the wavering, and will strengthen the hands of true friends. If this cannot be done on a large scale, let every man who has a vote use it, by writing to the member who represents him in Parliament, and urge upon him to vote for this measure. A penny will be well spent thus. If possible, arrange for deputations to see your members personally. No time is now to be lost, as a few days may decide the fate of the Bill. With such a majority as 89 on the first fight, and some time yet to prepare for the second, our friends may take courage and work prepared to win. At the same time let us toil without ceasing, to prevent the first success being changed into a defeat. The measure can now be carried, if all persons who think it right will work in earnest for it. There must be no finching now. Every man to his post, and every one must do his duty. Minister! teachers! lovers of the Sabbath! work, work, help us to work; the cause is yours as well as ours."

The following lines were left out of our last month's summary, for lack of space:—"The all-absorbing topic of the month has been the marriage of the Prince of Wales. London and the country seem to have been vying with each other in demonstrations of loyalty and joy. We hope that the royal pair may copy the example of the parents of his Royal Highness, and then England will not cease to rejoice in their health and happiness. The liberation of 20,000,000 of Russian serfs, on the 3rd of March, and the fearful struggle in Poland, have presented a singular spectacle. In France the influence of the priesthood is increasing, and the more the Government extends its power, the stronger, seemingly, is the priestly ambition to control it. But there are some bright spots in France. The Wesleyans have obtained in Paris a splendid chapel, and the Congregationalists have got possession of their old one. Efforts are still being made for the liberation of the Protestant prisoners, Matamoros and others in Spain, but at present, we fear, with little hope of speedy success. The week of prayer at the opening of the year appears to have been extensively observed, and with good results in Russia and other foreign lands. A missionary conference has been held in India, and the cause of the Redeemer is advancing in that vast continent. The unhappy American strife still drags on, and our Lancashire operatives and others still have to suffer. Let us find in these things subjects for earnest prayer and benevolent effort. And may peace, righteousness, and prosperity everywhere speedily prevail."

We are happy to say we have news of progress from several districts of our Connexion, both at home and in the colonies; and we hope soon to be able to publish facts to show that, hard as the times have lately been in a large portion of this country, Primitive Methodism is still going on from one degree of success in soul-saving to another. We hear good news from the Manchester District, where, of course, the distress has been most severe. We understand it is likely the district will report upwards of 500 increase. London, Nottingham, and other districts, will likewise stand in a respectable position. The Missions have a good nett increase;—above 700. To God be all the glory! May the approaching District Meetings and Conference be rendered extensively useful to the Connexion! And may the prayers of all our friends ascend incessantly to heaven on this behalf.

POETRY.

REVELATIONS OF GOD IN NATURE.

OFF when the gentle twilight's veil hath mantled earth and sky,
And light hath faded to its home in silent majesty,
As low wild zephyrs softly sighed amid the trembling leaves,
Have ye not heard the voice of God upon the evening breeze?

And when night's sable shadows fell serenely all around.
While gazing upward thoughtfully into the vast profound,
Have ye not traced upon the beams of pale cold stars above,
The bright reflected radiance of eternal deathless love?

While musing by the ocean-waves, sparkling with jewels bright,
As sunset decked the sea's dark brow with veil of golden light,
Hath not the music of the deep, unceasingly sublime,
Echoed a power unlimited, and majesty Divine?

Reflections of the mind of God in beauteous flowers are seen,
His grandeur in the thunder cloud, and vivid lightning's gleam:
He spake and myriad orbs of light floated in realms of space;
Each one resplendently reveals his goodness, truth, and grace.

The song-bird's tuneful melody to nature's child so dear,
The woodland's beauteous scenery, and streamlet soft and clear,
All speak of the Creator,—and o'er dreary desert sod,
Are footprints of the Infinite, rays from the mind of God.

O lonely one! when o'er thy path droop shades of dark despair,
Go, trace in Nature's loveliness far from the scenes of care,
Foreshadowings of thy future home, beams of that holy light,
Which shineth in celestial bliss, cloudless, serene and bright.

Charlcombe.

EMILY F. PERRY.

*I am Yours affectionately
Henry Gault*

THE Primitive Methodist Magazine.

---

JUNE, 1863.

---

BIOGRAPHY.

---

MEMOIR OF THE REV. JAMES FLEETWOOD.

“Mark the perfect man, and behold the upright; for the end of that man is peace.”

JAMES FLEETWOOD was born at Frome, Somersetshire, on the 10th of March, 1835, but from this place he removed with his parents to London, when he was only two years of age. His mother had been for many years a member of the Primitive Methodist body, and hence she at once made search for a Metropolitan Society, to which she might attach herself; but as the cause in London was then in a very feeble state, she was some time before she succeeded in finding one. Our brother, like the rest of the family, as soon as he was old enough, was sent to a Sabbath school. Some ten months after their arrival in the Metropolis, circumstances caused the family to remove to the east of London, and then his connection with the Sutton Street Society commenced by his entering its school as a scholar; and although like most boys in an unconverted state, he exhibited many of the passions of an unrenewed nature, still he was never openly wicked or profane. On the 16th of April, 1850, the Spirit of God powerfully operated upon him, in a revival which broke out at that time in the school; and yielding to the operations of the Spirit he found peace, through believing. He now saw it to be his duty to endeavour to make himself useful, and, becoming a teacher, he laboured with great zeal and earnestness, until called to more public labours in the London 3rd Circuit. Brother Rogerson, who was superintendent of the school, says of him, “I have often noticed the powerful effect of his teaching upon the children, many of them while he was addressing them being bathed in tears. In 1852 he was appointed with me on the Prayer Leaders’ Plan, and on one occasion [especially was I struck with his earnestness and zeal in pointing sinners to the cross. His piety, I always considered deep, and humility was a leading characteristic of his life.”

In September, 1853, the Quarterly meeting gave him a note to take appointments on the preachers' plan, in connection with Brother Roffe, then a local preacher in the circuit, but who has since removed to America. In the June following his name appeared as an exhorter, or a local preacher on trial, and making his way among the people, and displaying considerable talent, he was in September raised to a full local preacher-ship, and he continued to labour in that capacity until the 1st of March, 1855, when (within a few days of completing his twentieth year) he was by the General Missionary Committee, taken out as a hired local preacher, for the Hammersmith Mission, on which he remained three months. On the 10th of July, 1855, he went by appointment of the Missionary Committee to labour on the Goudhurst and Tunbridge Wells Mission. Afterwards with much zeal, energy, and success, he travelled in Brighton, Deal and Dover, and Chelmsford stations. In July, 1859, he entered into the holy estate of matrimony with her who survives to lament his removal. He then removed to Ramsgate, where he laboured for two years with considerable results. He was then re-appointed for the Tunbridge Wells Mission, and remained there for about nine months, when he was requested by the General Missionary Committee to fill a vacancy which had been made by the withdrawal of one of the missionaries at Glasgow, which request he most readily complied with, and removed thither on the 7th of March, 1862. On this, as well on his previous stations, most marked success attended his ministry. But never having been so far north before, it is thought that the climate was too severe for his constitution, which, although apparently good, had been somewhat undermined by his labours in the early part of his ministry. His friends had laid out for him a long life of usefulness, but as the sequel showed, the Lord had willed otherwise. We see by his journal, that in the latter part of October he began to feel unwell, but he entertained hopes that nothing serious would be the result ; but oh ! how disappointed and shocked were all who knew him, to see that an unseen hand was gradually taking down the clay tabernacle. For the disease rapidly and speedily developed into galloping consumption, attended by bronchitis, typhoid fever, and diphtheria. During the time he was entirely laid aside, he frequently and fervently expressed his confidence in God, and even during the ravings of delirium the ruling passion strongly exhibited itself—his sole occupation seeming to be the leading of prayer meetings, preaching, &c. Deafness having supervened, the only mode of communicating with him when the fever abated, was by means of a slate. He retained his confidence in God to the last ; and although the enemy seemed at times to harass him, he gloriously triumphed through the blood of the Redeemer. "On the evening of his departure," writes his colleague, "at about nine o'clock, reason having returned to him, he commenced to praise God, and affectionately shaking hands with, and bidding good bye to his wife, his mother, Brother Robert Hall, Brother M'Dougal, and myself, with the light of heaven beaming from his emaciated countenance, he made a convulsive and strenuous effort to exclaim "Glory," and then, notwithstanding the care and love of an affectionate wife, and mother, and all the skill of his medical attendant, the weary wheels of life stood still, and his glorified spirit took its place before the throne, at five minutes past ten on Saturday night, the 20th of December, 1862, after an illness of seven weeks' duration."

From a close connection both by friendship, and marriage, the writer had many opportunities of forming an estimate of his character, both as a boy, and as a man; and I believe him to have been a Christian in every sense of the word; with strict propriety might he have adopted the language of Holy Writ, "The zeal of thine house hath eaten me up." He was a thorough Primitive Methodist. Warmly attached to the cause, he failed not to advocate its claims. His was no mere superficial love, but a deeply rooted attachment, which lasted till life's latest moments. Often has he spoken in the strongest terms of condemnation of those who, having obtained a position through Primitive Methodism, have turned their backs on the Connexion.

Many friends have sent us testimonials as to the sterling merit of our departed brother—a few of which we think will be interesting.

The Rev. J. Young says of him, "He was a thorough Primitive Methodist Preacher, one who thought no difficulty too great. No work too hard, if only he could advance the cause of Primitive Methodism, and save souls. His visit to Portadown will never be forgotten, and his name here is as ointment poured forth."

The Rev. Joseph Armstrong says, "he was a man of the right stamp, a true-hearted Primitive Methodist; religion was the great purpose of his life; viewing God everywhere, and in everything, he at all times strove to glorify him. The throne of grace was to him a well-known spot; the voice of God he daily heard and obeyed. I frequently visited him during his affliction, and always found him looking to Jesus. His end was peace."

The Rev. Thomas Oliver says of him, "I always found him to be a cheerful companion, with an open and sincere mind, which at once commanded esteem and confidence. His preaching was accompanied by the power of the Holy Ghost; it was practical in its character; the doctrine of a full, free, and present salvation, being at all times clearly set forth. His zeal was truly great, and his courage in the midst of fierce and brutal persecution extraordinary; his faith in God strong, and his success very marked."

The Rev. J. Ashworth says of him, "When he came to be my colleague, in July, 1855, I was truly glad. Although it was his first station, I found he had counted the cost; and I do not remember hearing a single murmuring sentence escape his lips. I never had a more laborious colleague; his love for open air work was strong. I wish all our young ministers were as zealous as he was, in proclaiming the glad tidings of mercy to the outcast, in the lanes and streets of our cities. I shall never forget the expression of his countenance, and the energy of his voice, when singing a favourite hymn,

‘With froward heart I went astray,’

The news of his unexpected death afflicted me much.”

His colleague at Glasgow, the Rev. B. Kenny, writes, “I am quite at a loss to describe his mental and moral excellence; his attachment to Primitive Methodism was manifested by his zealous and self-denying labours to extend its borders. His heart was a fountain of pure benevolence, and ever sent forth gushing streams of love and kindness. As a preacher he excelled; his pulpit orations teemed with floods of eloquence, which chained the hearts of his hearers. His sermons were searching and pointed, and will never be forgotten in Glasgow. He lived the gospel which he preached, and sacrificed his all on that altar; hence his great success. During his affliction his thoughts were fixed on things above, and he rejoiced in the prospect of death. He is greatly lamented on this station; but our loss is his eternal gain.”

His mortal remains were deposited in a grave belonging to one of our members, (and in which he had previously asked to be interred should he die in that city) in a Glasgow cemetery, and they there await the resurrection of the just. He has left a widow and two young children to lament his loss. May they, his heartstricken mother and sorrowing relatives, follow him as he followed Christ, and meet him in the better world.

“One more to bend with perfect love before the Saviour’s feet,
One more that still increasing throng with thankfulness to greet;
One more to swell that thrilling song he practised oft below,
One more in heaven to welcome us when we are called to go.”

JAMES MARSHALL.

[Though we had not the pleasure of a personal acquaintance with the subject of the foregoing sketch, we deem it proper to state that we have heard in different quarters very warm testimonies to his deep piety and considerable usefulness. And, we know he was highly appreciated by the General Missionary Committee, and that his death was felt as a severe loss. May his bereaved relations be divinely supported under the stroke, and his place be efficiently filled by other holy and useful young men.—ED.]

---

MEMOIR OF MR. ANDREW KELLS, OF PRESTON CIRCUIT.
THE subject of this sketch was born at Gateshead, in the county of Durham, on the 11th of April, 1835. He was the fourth of seven brothers, all of whom survive him, save one, who died in infancy. Soon after the birth of Andrew the family removed to Sheffield, and in that town were spent the first fifteen years of his life. From a child he gave evidence of a studious disposition. He had not the advantage of regular schooling, but the assistance of his father, and his own diligent and persevering application to study at home, supplied the lack of ordinary tuition. At the age of fifteen he had made very considerable proficiency in the higher branches of mathematical science, having mastered algebra, mensuration, &c.

In Sheffield, about this time, he attended a week-day school for fifteen weeks, and this was all the schooling, beyond what he had at home, he was ever favoured with.

When in his seventeenth year the family removed to Preston, and his father began business there as a clock and watch maker, and from the age of twenty the management of the business devolved upon Andrew. This for one so young was a weighty undertaking, but he proved himself fully equal to the task, and conducted the business of the shop to the entire satisfaction of his father, until incapacitated by the sickness which ended in his death.

His parents endeavoured to train up their children in the nurture and admonition of the Lord, and in Andrew their efforts were specially rewarded. From his boyhood he was strictly moral, and his father, who watched him as he grew up, and often prayed that God would preserve him from sin, says, "He was never known to tell a falsehood, or to take the name of God in vain." There are but few respecting whom such very pleasing testimony could be truthfully borne. Would to God that gross depravity on the part of youth were less common with us than it is. Notwithstanding all the barriers to wickedness and all the inducements to virtue—the multiplied agencies for the religious training and education of the young—notwithstanding the beneficial influence of Sabbath-schools and kindred institutions—notwithstanding the prayers and toils, the zeal and self-denial of philanthropists of all classes in the cause of Christian education, a great proportion of the youth of our land grow up strangers to the practice of morality and addicted to wickedness in its vilest forms. From such degradation Andrew was mercifully preserved. Of him, as of Timothy, it might be said, "From a child he had known the Scriptures."

About seven years ago, while sitting under the Primitive Methodist ministry, in Saul Street chapel, Preston, he was powerfully wrought upon by the Spirit of God, convinced of sin, felt deeply the burden thereof, and his need of salvation. He felt the pressure of his bonds, the bonds of iniquity, and longed greatly for pardon and peace with God. In the hope of obtaining that help and instruction in spiritual things, which he was now anxious to realise, he began to meet in class.

He continued in this anxious state of mind, seeking earnestly until he found the pearl of great price, until God in mercy revealed himself, spoke peace to his soul, and set his sin-bound spirit free. He gave evidence of the genuine character of the Spirit's work within him by a holy life. His deportment was blameless, "adorning the doctrine of God our Saviour in all things." He evinced a deep attachment to the house of God by his punctual attendance. He did not, as many do, haste away from the sanctuary as soon as the Sabbath evening preaching service was ended. He might be depended upon for the prayer-meeting. It would be well if his example in this respect were more generally copied, not only by the private members of our societies, but by those too who sustain an official position. Many good people display on this point an amount of indifference greatly to be deplored. After sitting under a faithful and impressive sermon they will depart apparently quite unconcerned, leaving the minister exhausted by the toils of the day, with just a handful of helpers to carry on the tug of war in the prayer-meeting. It gives increasing efficiency to the services when the members of the Church prize the prayer-meeting, and labour there to harrow in the seed sown, and to hold up the hands of the minister by their united supplications.

Our departed brother was a diligent and persevering worker in the Sabbath-school. As the teacher of the adult Bible class in the Brook Street school, he laboured with great success, and was much esteemed by all the members of his class. He did not content himself with a mere dry routine of lessons, but endeavoured to make the exercises of the class interesting and instructive, and he had the happy art of imparting information in a pleasant and interesting way. He made the truth so easy of apprehension that the simplest among them might understand. Under his tuition the class made rapid progress in Biblical knowledge, and grew in number, so much so that additional room had to be taken for their accommodation.

"A most delightful sight," says a friend, "it was to see the room filled; and both young men and old men listening with rapt attention to the teacher as he opened to them the Scriptures. Such was his love for the school that he was ever ready to undertake any task for its advantage. In his case the Scriptural injunction was fulfilled, "Whatsoever thine hand findeth to do, do it with thy might."

To all who knew brother Kells, it was evident that he possessed capabilities for usefulness in a wider sphere than the Sabbath-school offered. His name was placed on the preachers' plan. And the last two years of his life he laboured acceptably in the local ministry, seeking like his Master to save the lost. As a preacher he gave promise of sustaining a superior position. His mind was stored with varied information, the result of extensive reading and reflection, and in illustration of the contents of the Bible he brought forth out of his treasury "things new and old." His natural ability as a speaker was very considerable, and yet he was timid and fearful as a child. We looked upon his name up on the preachers' plan with pleasure, and hoped that he would fill his station and discharge the duties of his high appointment with credit to himself and the Church for long years to come, but in this our expectations have been cut off. He has gone to his reward. His sickness was very short and singular in its character. There was a strange change in one of his eyes, it was swollen, and the appearance of it was very peculiar; he grew quite listless, and then became so drowsy that if he sat down it was difficult to keep him awake. He complained of pain in his head some time before he sought medical advice.

On Saturday, the 21st of June, he went to consult the doctor. The next day he grew worse, and he was advised to keep his bed. From this time he continued to sink until the 1st of July, 1862, when his freed spirit passed away to glory. There were no ecstasies in his death, the disease affected his brain, and he was overpowered with sleep; but his spotless life was a sure forerunner of a happy and blissful end. For him to live was Christ, and to die was gain. May we imitate him in the purity of his life, and lay up in store for ourselves a good foundation against the time to come.

J. GRAHAM.

---

MEMOIR OF MR. JOHN ILEY.

JOHN ILEY was born at Colliery Dykes, April 12th, 1809, and died at Twizell, in the Shotley Bridge Circuit, September 3rd, 1862. His father, Stephen Iley, was waggon-way wright on the Pontop Colliery, under the Earl of Bute. Methodism was introduced into this neighbourhood by John Wesley and his fellow-labourers at an early period of its history; and souls were converted, a society was formed, and a chapel built at Colliery Dykes. This was about the fourth or fifth chapel erected by John Wesley in the North of England, and would be regarded as a great innovation in that day; but it has proved to be one of the greatest boons ever bestowed upon the people. To this chapel Mrs. Iley, with many others, resorted to hear the word of life. She was brought to a knowledge of the truth, joined the society, and from that time her lot was cast in with that excellent people. The religion of the Saviour which always produces an ardent desire for the salvation of souls, awakens in the hearts of parents deep yearnings for the conversion of their children. Thus moved, the pious mother took the hand of her darling child, and led him at an early age to the house of God, and there the principles of religion and the doctrines of Methodism were instilled into his mind. This may account for his clear views of Methodist theology during the after years of his life; and for his oft repeated statement that "He could not remember the time when the Spirit of God did not strive with him." He was deeply convinced of sin in early life, and felt the misery and danger of being "without God, and having no hope in the world.

Though strictly moral, Brother Iley reached the seventeenth year of his age in an unconverted state. But happily for him, about this time the Primitive Methodists were "making no small stir" in the neighbourhood of Colliery Dykes. At a camp-meeting held some time before, by the Revs. T. Batty, J. Gilbert, and F. N. Jersey, the mighty power of God came down, many souls were converted, and the holy flame of zeal and piety was intensified in the hearts of believers, who sought out sinners and brought them to hear the word. Among the number who were thus constrained to attend our chapel, was John Iley, and under a sermon delivered by the Rev. W. Summersides, on "The pale horse and his rider," (Rev. vi. 8), the word came home to his heart with mighty power; he was deeply convinced of sin, and became a true penitent,—but he did not then step into liberty. In company with Joseph Lawson he repaired into a neighbouring wood, but what took place there I attempt not to describe. The remorse, the sorrow, the self-reproach, the agony of soul, the prayer and supplications with strong crying and tears, are all known unto God, who came down in the power of his Spirit, not to move in the tops of the mulberry trees, or to shake the forest oak, but to speak peace to their poor disconsolate souls, while kneeling beneath the trees' spreading branches; and there and then he staunched the wound that sin had made, and dried the mourners' tears. The young men could now sing,

"O love thou bottomless abyss,
My sins are swallowed up in thee;
Covered is my unrighteousness,
Nor spot of guilt remains on me;
While Jesus' blood through earth and skies,
Mercy, free, boundless mercy, cries!"

They left the wood and came home rejoicing, because the anger of God was turned away, and he comforted them.

Having obtained the great blessing of pardon, brother Iley felt it to be his duty to unite with God's people in Church-fellowship. He was invited to class by John Richardson, who was a local preacher and class-leader; he complied, and became a member of the Church. From this time he gave evidence of the genuineness of the change that had taken place in his heart, by his steady onward steps towards the heavenly country.

When he had been a member about four years, having made some progress in Christian experience, and gained some knowledge of the sacred Scriptures, the brethren thought him a proper person to give a word of exhortation, for in those days all the talents of the infant cause were called into requisition; and accordingly he was put upon the plan. The brethren were not mistaken in their man. He soon gave signs of usefulness, and spoke with acceptability to the people, and speedily became an accredited local preacher. From that time he never lost his status. Whatever changes took place in the circuit he stood by the cause, until he eventually rose from the bottom to near the top of the plan, there being only one local preacher above him. Twenty-nine years he was a class-leader, and as such was a wise and judicious counsellor of God's people, leading them into green pastures, and beside the still waters, where they could rest at noon.

There is an openness and honesty, a straight-forward, outspokenness, which an honest-hearted man cannot but admire, even when it happens to come across himself. "Faithful are the wounds of a friend." This is a jewel of great worth in an age in which the rules of politeness carry with them a temptation to dissemble, and to conceal what ought to be spoken rather than offend. Brother Iley was one of the few who would hazard being counted an enemy rather than deceive a brother.

About thirteen years have passed away since he came to Twizell Colliery, where he has ever been respected for his straightforward conduct, and his honesty in regard to the things of this world. Mr. E. Mackinlacy, under-viewer, in a letter to me says, "For ten years past John Iley has been back-overman under me at Twizell Colliery, and during that time I do not think we ever had one disagreeable word. I always found him to be trustworthy in all that I committed to his charge. When we entered on our charge together the pit was like a little hell; but in a very short time we saw a change for the better, and soon the praises of God resounded from end to end; and I venture to say that at one time a better set of men no two masters could have charge of. You cannot say too much about John Iley." This is a master's estimate of the character of his religious servant, and shows us that honesty and integrity, coupled with a respectful deportment, are sure to command respect. The influence which masters are capable of exerting over their men is almost irresistible. Here are two men taking charge of a colliery wrought by a set of men who are sinners of the deepest dye; but a moral transformation is speedily seen among them. How is it effected? Not by threatening and brow-beating the men. Not by assuming an air of unapproachable dignity. No! they take a noble Christian stand, and by the force of moral suasion, and Christian example, and the accompanying blessing of God, a blessed change is soon effected.

For many years our brother was the subject of great physical debility, arising from injuries received in the mine, which prevented him from labouring as extensively in the cause of God as he had done in former times. Of late his weakness was more than usually apparent. His constitution was evidently giving way, and at last it suddenly broke up. But this took him not by surprise; he was standing on his watch tower, looking out for the coming of his Lord.

On the evening of August 27th, he returned from his work very unwell, and he gradually grew worse until exhausted nature broke up, and he died on Wednesday, September 3rd, 1862. During the week he had some struggles of mind, on account of the family he was leaving behind. Natural affection, accompanied by a desire to see them further up, rendered it hard work to part from them. But he calmly submitted, and said, "Thy will be done." So far as his own soul was concerned he had nothing to fear. Trusting in the atonement, and leaning on the Beloved, he was prepared for all emergencies. "To him to live was Christ, but to die was gain." Bright visions of future blessedness threw their cheering beams forward, relieving the gloom of the valley of the shadow of death. He frequently spoke to his friends of his comfortable state of mind, and of his inward sense of the Divine favour. He often said, "Christ is precious." "All is right !" and "All is well !" and with such expressions on his lips he passed away.

" Thus like a hero, when the wars are o'er,
He hastens homeward to his native shore :
While conquering millions his arrival greet,
He grounds his armour at his prince's feet."

RALPH SHIELDS.

MEMOIR OF MRS. BUTTERWICK.

THE late Mrs. Butterwick, formerly Hannah Morley, was born at High Harrogate, Yorkshire, February 22nd, 1820. Her parents, who were godly members of the Church of England, brought her up in the fear of the Lord, trained her to habits of industry, honesty, temperance, and piety. But morality, important as it is, is not religion. There may be restraining grace without regeneration : a form of godliness without the power. Of this our departed sister was deeply convinced in the year 1840, and she was led earnestly to seek the pardon of her sins, and a new heart, according to the provisions of the New Testament ; at the same time, as an evidence of her decision, and a means of obtaining what she felt her need of, she united with the Wesleyan Methodist Society, at Harrogate, at whose place of worship she had occasionally, if not regularly, attended, and heard the word of life for three or four years previously. It was at a meeting of her class, while they were engaged with one accord in prayer, that she first trusted in Christ, and obtained peace with God. No wonder that she ever after felt a lively interest in class and prayer meetings, as

" She never could forget that day,
When Jesus washed her sins away."

Excepting the circumstance just alluded to, we have no information as to the way in which she was made a partaker of " the grace of God in truth." Nor is it of much importance ; the practical evidences of the great change, the fruits of that grace, are chiefly to be regarded. One of her early Christian friends testifies that she continued steadfast in the faith and hope of the gospel, diligently attending the means of grace, and by active kindness and earnest prayer holding up the hands of her leader, and helping her Christian companions to bear their crosses, and, according to her measure, seeking to bring sinners to Christ. Possessing a strong mind, a good voice, a readiness and solemnity of utterance, with a considerable degree of moral courage, she was qualified beyond many of either sex for public religious exercises, in which she frequently engaged with happy effect. Her gift in prayer was so noticeable that she was engaged as a prayer leader during most of the time that she was in connection with the Wesleyan body. Nor did her religion overrun her morality; on the contrary, it was the grand motive to consistency of behaviour, in private as in public. Not only did she labour to abstain from all evil, but to "adorn the doctrine of God our Saviour in all things."

In the summer of 1844, she was united in marriage to the late Rev. S. G. Butterwick, a sensible, good man, and a laborious travelling preacher, whose memoir was published in our magazine for 1860. She was truly "a help-meet for him," not only in the domestic circle, but also in the church,—having now become a Primitive Methodist. Soon after her marriage she wrote to one of her intimate friends, expressing her gratitude to God for his great mercies to her, her renewed dedication to the service of Christ, and her increasing happiness therein. Extracts from several letters to the same dear friend, which for brevity's sake we forbear to quote, supply satisfactory evidence of her perseverance in the ways and work of the Lord. Frequently she expresses her humbling sense of unfaithfulness Godward; her desire for the more abundant life of love; her increasing estimate of the religion of Jesus; her bodily afflictions and mental conflicts; her happy deliverances in answer to prayer; her growing conviction of the vanity of everything that does not "help us on to God;" her cheering hope of immortality; her concern to be more useful; her grief on account of the comparative unsuccessfulness of the gospel; and, on other occasions, her joy and gratitude for seasons of gracious visitation from on high. The Rev. Henry Pratt, at the writer's request, has given the following testimony:—

"I first became acquainted with Mrs. Butterwick, in the year 1848, when her beloved husband and I were stationed together;—and as I stayed at her house for two weeks at once on several occasions, I had a good opportunity of becoming acquainted with her character. She was an excellent woman, possessing a kind sociable nature. She was always ready to enter into conversation upon any subject of interest, and to minister to one's comfort in every possible way, her affable manner giving to her acts of kindness a peculiar gracefulness. She was devoted to the cause of Christ above many ; taking a lively, practical, interest in whatever tended to promote its prosperity. She attended diligently on all the ordinances of the House of God, and her exercises in the class and prayer meetings were highly acceptable and useful.

"After Mr. and Mrs. Butterwick's removal to Guisbro,' while I was stationed at Stokesley, being contiguous to them, I had the pleasure of visiting them frequently, and of sympathising with them during the protracted affliction of Mr. Butterwick. Here I found Mrs. Butterwick still the same kind, sociable, pious, devoted, Christian woman. The officials of that station deemed that she had abilities for public speaking, and so gave her a place on the preachers' plan, in which capacity she was favoured with a measure of encouragement in the conversion of sinners. Her beloved husband being unable to take his regular work for a considerable time before his lamented decease, she willingly and efficiently assisted in supplying his appointments, as indeed she had occasionally done on a former station, in a similar case.

"During their station at Guisbro' there was a gracious revival of religion ; a great number of souls were converted and added to the society, and Mrs. Butterwick was very useful in building up the converts, having a large and flourishing class under her care, by whom she was highly esteemed. Her abilities for class-leading and the visitation of the sick, were considered by good judges to be very superior ; she was well acquainted with the Holy Scriptures, and was alike faithful and affectionate. Not a few precious souls will, we doubt not, be the crown of her rejoicing 'in the day of Christ.'"

About a year after she had been called to pass through the deep sorrow of bereavement, she came to reside at Newcastle-on-Tyne, with a view to making better provision for her five surviving children. Not long after which she was united in marriage to Mr. George Butterwick, a widower, with an equal number of dependent children, and a member of the Primitive Methodist Society of many years' standing. An old Christian friend, whose judgment is highly deserving of respect, and who for a considerable period had the best opportunities of observing the private walk of Mrs. Butterwick, not only corroborates all that has been said of her virtues, but specially notices her wisdom, self-control, kindness, long-suffering, spirituality of mind, cheerful seriousness, and her devotional habits in her own house. Sometimes "in heaviness through manifold temptations," but, although not always rejoicing, always living as under the eye of God. On the whole, from numerous testimonies, and from a personal acquaintance of many years, the writer has no hesitation in recording his conviction, that if in public she appeared to be a devout, earnest Christian, desiring the weal of Zion, the glory of God, and the salvation of sinners, she was the same in her family, making religion the first thing—giving it something like the pre-eminence which it justly claims; taking pains to keep alive the spirit of devotion, from day to day, and not only avoiding all unprofitable conversation, but endeavouring to have her tongue "a well-spring of life."

Her capabilities for usefulness were but just beginning to be duly recognised by the church at Nelson Street, when it pleased God to call her away. It appears that her general health had not been good for some time; she had had premonitions of her latter end, which there is reason to think she did not fail to profit by. Her last illness was severe but short, and her decease sudden. A fever, immediately occasioned by cold, soon reduced her to a condition of extreme weakness, requiring all possible precautions. Still it was hoped, as well as earnestly desired, that she might recover. On the day prior to her death, she seemed to be comparatively free from pain, and to enjoy much inward repose; but early in the morning of the following day, her suffering returned with more alarming symptoms, during which season she professed to experience divine support and comfort, frequently saying "Christ is precious." In this happy frame she met the "last enemy," committing her departing spirit into the hands of her blessed Redeemer, on September 8th, 1862, in the 43rd year of her age. May God bless the bereaved family, and help both the writer and the reader to profit by the solemn event.

W. DENT.

---

MEMOIR OF MR. HENRY WATERS.

MR. HENRY WATERS, local preacher, Yarmouth Circuit, was born in the parish of Freethorpe, Norfolk, April 23rd, 1814. His early religious impressions were received in a Wesleyan Sabbath School. When in the nineteenth year of his age, he was powerfully wrought upon under a discourse delivered by a female, and soon after he was converted to God. About two years after his conversion he was placed upon our plan as an exhorter, and his tact and talents rendered him everywhere acceptable. His preaching abilities were considered suitable for the ministry, and the church called him to give himself entirely to the work of God. But he did not see his way clear to comply with their wishes, and preferred to be employed as a local agent. And in this matter he doubtless was divinely guided, for his constitution was not one of the strongest. He laboured hard as a local preacher for twenty-six years, and was always welcomed as the Lord's messenger. He was the superintendent of our Freethorpe Sabbath School, and was greatly beloved by both teachers and children; indeed, such were his gentleness and kindness among them, that they all felt at home under his care.

His removal is among the mysteries of Providence, for he had just commenced business and was working out premeditated plans, when disease set in to put a final stop to all his earthly arrangements. How impressive are the words of the poet,

"Death steals along with silent tread,
Found oftenest in what least we dread;
Frowns in the storm with angry brow,
And in the sunshine strikes the blow!"

He had lofty views of the gospel, but humble ones of his own abilities; and independent of human praise, plodded on in his own way to do his Master's work like a faithful steward. During his last illness his prospects were cloudless. His enjoyments were not ecstatic, but he had a calm and settled peace in Jesus, with full assurance of hope. The affliction which terminated the earthly existence of our brother was typhus fever. He died on September 24th, 1862. His last words were, "I want to get to rest." "All is right, right, right!" A widow, one son, and one daughter, survive to mourn his departure.

"And though on earth his sun has set,
Its light shall linger round us yet,
Bright, radiant, blest."

RICHARD HOWCHIN.

MEMOIR OF MR. JAMES BARKER.

MR. JAMES BARKER, the subject of the following brief sketch, was the son of Joseph and Martha Barker, and was born at Sheffield, on the 16th of March, 1798, and exchanged mortality for life at Topcliffe, West Ardsley, on Sunday evening, October 12th, 1862, in the 65th year of his age.

His father died when he was very young, and he was taken to reside with his uncle at Brookhouse, near Rotherham, where with the family of his uncle, he was taken to the parish church on the Lord's-day, to attend divine service. When he was about fourteen years of age, his uncle removed to Drighlington, near Leeds, and James came to that place with him, and he soon after went into service as a farm labourer in that locality. In August, 1820, he united in marriage with Mrs. Bellhouse, of Topcliffe, with whom he lived in peace and comfort nearly 29 years, when it pleased God in his all-wise providence to remove her by death to the world of spirits. She died in Christ, June 3rd, 1849. On the 24th of April, 1850, Mr. Barker was married to Mrs. E. Barstow, of East Ardsley, a pious and amiable woman, who was suitably adapted to Mr. Barker in his declining years, and whom he has left behind to mourn her loss.

With regard to the moral condition of our departed friend in early life, and prior to his conversion to God, we know very little; whether he was an openly profane sinner, or moral in his deportment, we cannot say. Of this we are certain, that he lived without God and without hope in the world, till he was nearly twenty-three years of age.

In the year 1821, the Primitive Methodists opened a new chapel at Morley, when a popular female preacher was expected to preach. Mr. Barker was attracted to the place to hear her, but instead of the female, that eminent and successful minister of the Gospel of Christ, the Rev. William Clowes, occupied the pulpit. While that servant of God preached Christ to the people, the Spirit conveyed the truth to Mr. Barker's soul; he saw himself a ruined and helpless sinner in the sight of God, discovered the danger to which his sins had exposed him, and he fled for refuge to the only hope set before him in the Gospel; earnestly and prayerfully he sought redemption in the precious blood of the crucified Redeemer, and obtained pardon, peace, and reconciliation, by faith in our Lord Jesus Christ. He then joined the infant Society at that place, became one of its most active and useful members, and remained with it, till unhappily a division took place betwixt Miss Carr, (the female above alluded to) and her adherents, and the Circuit authorities, which division rent the Morley society to pieces; the chapel was then sold, and the society was broken up. Mr. Barker under these circumstances went to the Wesleyan Methodist Chapel, and united with that people in Christian fellowship, and was with them for several years.

In 1835, the Primitive Methodist Society erected and opened another chapel at Morley, and Mr. Barker again cast in his lot with the people of his choice. He was appointed one of the chapel stewards, and also the treasurer of the funds, which offices he discharged with fidelity, with much credit to himself, and with great advantage to the society, for upwards of twenty years.

Mr. Barker as a husband was kind and affectionate, and paid every possible attention to the temporal and spiritual welfare of her who now sorrows because he is not. As a father, he was deeply solicitous for the welfare of his children, with regard both to their temporal and spiritual interests. Mr. Barker held in high esteem the Primitive Methodist Connexion; he admired its constitution and polity; he highly esteemed its ministers, who always found a hearty welcome under his paternal and hospitable roof, as many of those who have travelled in the Leeds 2nd Circuit, and others who occasionally visited the place, can bear testimony. The Connexional Magazines were highly prized by him; for while the Bible was the first book with him, the Magazines were next in his estimation; and much spiritual profit he derived by reading their pages, which he did month after month, from beginning to end. He also highly esteemed the public and social services of the sanctuary. When he was in health his seat in the house of God was seldom empty at the time of public worship. In him we had a practical illustration of the words of David; "Lord, I have loved the habitation of thy house, and the place where thine honour dwelleth." He was truly a good man, and feared God; not that he was without faults, for then he would not have been human. He had his failings and infirmities, and his constitutional besetments, his easily besetting sins, by which he was sometimes ensnared. But who can tell the keen anguish of spirit and distress of soul that he experienced on those occasions. He always frankly confessed to his brethren the evils that had befallen him, and earnestly sought forgiveness at the throne of grace, and found mercy.

Having abandoned that by which he was frequently ensnared, the last three years of his life were marked with increased piety and devotedness to God; he evidently was growing in grace and in the knowledge of our Lord Jesus Christ; his warm-hearted exhortations in the prayer meetings and the earnest prayers he offered up to God, had a blessed effect upon the souls of others.

The affliction which terminated his sojourn on earth, was short but severe. Having attended the market at Leeds on the Tuesday, he came home at night and was taken ill, and though every means was adopted by his physician for his restoration, he never rallied, but gradually sank into the arms of death. A few of the friends from Morley with myself visited him on the Saturday night, and we found him suffering very severely in body, but happy in soul. I said to him, "Mr. Barker, you must rest by faith on Christ," he said, "Yes, I do rest on him." Truly it was a solemn scene to see him suffering so much as he did, and a weeping sorrowful family around his bed. We knelt down and offered prayer to God for him, and for his sorrowing wife and family, and the Spirit's sweet influence rested upon us, and we experienced the truthfulness of the poet's words,

"The chamber where the good man meets his fate,
Is privileged beyond the common walks of virtuous life,— Quite on the verge of heaven."

The following day was the last he lived on earth, and it was a day of extreme bodily suffering, but he bore all with patience, and resignation to the will of God, resting on the mercy of Jesus. Mr. Acham, his brother-in-law, who on one occasion was in the chamber by himself, unperceived by his dying brother, heard him dwell sweetly on the mercy of his Saviour, giving utterance to those beautiful words of Mr. Wesley,

"While Jesu's blood through earth and skies,
Mercy, free, boundless mercy, cries."

He was drawing near to the closing scene; life was fast ebbing out, when his son asked him, "Is Christ precious to you, father?" and he said "Yes! he is precious." He called his wife and family into his room, gave them his dying advice, wished them all to meet him in heaven, and then requested them to leave the room, and soon after his happy spirit quitted its clay tenement,—left this dark abode of sin and misery, and was borne to bright mansions above, to dwell in the presence of God for ever. That his dear wife and children, and all our families may meet him there, is the earnest prayer of my heart. J. ILLINGWORTH.

MEMOIR OF MR. WILLIAM OWEN.

WILLIAM OWEN, the first local preacher in the Witney Circuit, was born at Eynsham, near Oxford, April 18th, 1794, and died in the full assurance of receiving the crown of life, Tuesday, October 14th, 1862. For the want of materials we cannot say much of this "branch of the Lord's planting;" but it is certain that he "brought forth fruit in his old age, and that he was fat and flourishing" in the courts of the Lord's house. It is also certain that he could not attribute any of his moral growth and spiritual training to his parents, for they had not the fear of God before their eyes. Though darkness shrouded his juvenile path, and he for years remained destitute of the means of mental and moral cultivation, yet he possessed a conscience as quick and tender as the apple of an eye, and the constant power of that monitor within constrained him to visit the house of God, where he listened to the messengers of mercy, felt conviction for sin, and became decided to abandon the practice of vice, and to give his heart unreservedly to God. Those awakenings which led to his conversion, were received in the Newland Witney Chapel, under a Mr. Langeredger, a Wesleyan, and as soon as the change had taken place, he offered himself to that community for membership, and he would have remained with them but that their ministry was withdrawn for want of a place of worship.

Twelve months after his uniting with us, he was honoured with a place on the preachers' plan, and by his ability, punctuality, and thirty-seven years' perseverance, he gained the top of the local preachers' part of it. He was always interesting and acceptable in the pulpit; and his ability, faithfulness, and attention, secured for him a congregation.

In society and chapel matters he was deeply interested. He often expressed a great desire to live to see a Connexional chapel built at Eynsham, the place of his nativity; and through his great perseverance the ground was secured; and under the superintendence of the Rev. T. Jackson, a beautiful edifice has been raised for God. He was for years the subject of complicated afflictions, and these with extreme frailty terminated his pilgrimage in the sixty-eighth year of his age.

H. YEATES.

D I V I N I T Y .

SELF-DENIAL.

A SERMON BY THE REV. W. DENT.

"Then said Jesus unto his disciples, if any man will come after me, let him deny himself, and take up his cross, and follow me."—Matt. xvi. 24.

THE uncompromising character of our Lord's teaching supplies a strong evidence of his Divine mission. Human wisdom would never have framed a scheme so directly opposed to the prevailing opinions, passions, and customs of the world. He only whose knowledge of human nature was perfect, whose authority over mankind was absolute, and whose grace is sovereign and all-powerful, would have attempted to make proselytes, or gather disciples around him, while requiring them to renounce their most favourite maxims and pleasurable pursuits. When a certain scribe came unto him, saying, "Master, I will follow thee whithersoever thou goest, Jesus said unto him, The foxes have holes, and the birds of the air have nests; but the Son of man hath not where to lay his head."—Matt. viii. 19–22. The case of the rich young man who came to inquire what he must do to inherit eternal life, is equally striking, for to him Jesus said, "Go and sell that thou hast, and give to the poor, and come and follow me; and thou shalt have treasure in heaven."—Matt. xix. 16–22. In the fourteenth of Luke we read: "There went great multitudes with him: and he turned and said unto them, If any man come unto me, and hate not his father, and mother, and wife, and children, and brethren, and sisters, yea, and his own life also, he cannot be my disciple. And whosoever doth not bear his cross, and come after me, cannot be my disciple." Our context informs us that from the time of Peter's confession, "Thou art the Christ, the Son of the living God," "Jesus began to show unto his disciples how that he must go unto Jerusalem, and suffer many things of the elders and chief priests and scribes, and be killed," &c. He spoke, on this and other occasions, of his approaching sufferings and death, that he might, in the first instance, correct the notions of his disciples respecting the nature of his kingdom, and the way in which it was to be established. They, in common with the Jewish nation generally, thought that he would "redeem Israel," by delivering them from the Roman yoke, and raising them to universal political dominion. They had looked with a carnal eye on the glowing descriptions of Messiah's glory in the books of the prophets. He tells them that he must first suffer and die before entering into his glory; and that, therefore, his kingdom is not of this world. He designed also to give them an intimation that, as his adherents and witnesses, they must be prepared for hardships, sufferings, and the hatred of the world, instead of a life of pleasure, ease, and honour. He wished them to count the cost, that they might not be offended in him "when tribulation should arise," because of their testimony for him. "Then Peter," partly, no doubt, from respect to his Master, and partly from an apprehension of being called to suffer with him, "took him, and began to rebuke him, saying, Be it far from thee Lord; this shall not be unto thee." Peter would rather have been required to show his fidelity and zeal by doing some "great thing," than by going into the garden of affliction. What was our Lord's reply to this most forward and heroic of his disciples, who had just made so noble a confession of him? Why, the hardest word that he ever addressed to one of them, except Judas, when he was just about to betray him. He "turned and said unto Peter, Get thee behind me, Satan: thou art an offence unto me; for thou savourest not the things that be of God, but those that be of men." Although Peter was a true-hearted disciple according to the light he had, yet he spoke for Satan on this occasion. It was the genuine language of unregenerate nature, under the influence of the god of this world. All men instinctively shrink from the cross, the symbol of suffering—the shame, the reproach of it, even more than the pain of it, shocks us. We all naturally wish to be "carried to the skies, on flowery beds of ease," amidst the smiles of all around us. The devil tempts the disciples in a similar way to that in which he tempted the Master, when he "shewed him all the kingdoms of the world and the glory of them," &c. "Then said Jesus unto his disciples, If any man will come after me"—if any man will be my disciple indeed, and enjoy the glorious privileges of my kingdom, "let him deny himself," &c., let him learn to give a flat denial to his corrupt propensities, and habituate himself to a life of holy obedience and patient suffering, after my example, who "am come into the world not to do my own will, but the will of him that sent me, and to finish his work."

I. BUT WHAT IS IT TO DENY OURSELVES?

1st. It is to renounce our own wisdom in relation to the sublime doctrines of the Gospel, and to cultivate a docile, child-like, spirit. Man in his original state, created in the image of God, saw light in his light. But after the fall his "understanding was darkened:" from the moment that the temptation was yielded to, "Ye shall be as gods, knowing good and evil," he became "vainly puffed up by his fleshly mind." This is the most strongly marked feature of the Satanic image. "Vain man would be wise, though man be born like the wild ass's colt." Hence, many either wholly reject the Scriptures as a Divine revelation, or attempt to reduce everything contained in them to the level of their puny reason. Even while professing their belief in the great Supreme, and acknowledging the incomprehensibleness of his perfections, they proudly refuse their assent to every doctrine that does not seem to harmonize with their notions. Instead of asking wisdom of God, they set themselves up as judges, and indulge an arrogant, disputatious spirit. This pride of reason—this "opposition of science, falsely so called,"—the great Teacher combats in several of his discourses. Instance the following passages:—"I thank thee, O Father, Lord of heaven and earth, that thou hast hid these things from the wise and prudent, and hast revealed them unto babes. Even so, Father: for so it seemed good in thy sight. All things are delivered unto me of my Father: and no man knoweth the Son, but the Father; neither knoweth any man the Father save the Son, and he to whomsoever the Son will reveal him."—Matt. xi. 25-27.

"It is written in the prophets, And they shall all be taught of God. Every man, therefore, that hath heard, and hath learned of the Father, cometh unto me."—John vi. 45. "Whosoever shall not receive the kingdom of God as a little child, he shall not enter therein."—Mark x. 15. See also Matt. xvi. 16, 17; 1 Cor. iii. 18. Self-denial includes, 2ndly. The renunciation of our own will as a governing principle, and practical conformity to the law of Christ. We all are naturally self-willed, prone to take our own course, without inquiry; to do just as we please, refusing to acknowledge any authority. "Our lips are our own: who is lord over us?"—Psalm xii. 4. "But this false and wicked pretence must be renounced;" this principle of rebellion must be subdued. "I will," or "I will not," must give place to the humble, submissive inquiry, "Lord, what wilt thou have me to do?" This is the first principle of religion—the foundation of Christian morality. "One is your Master, even Christ." "Ye are my friends, if ye do whatsoever I command you." Without a pure intention to please God—a true regard to the will of our Master in heaven, morality is but a conventional matter, and religion only will-worship. The apostles were commissioned by Christ, after his resurrection, to "go and disciple all nations; baptizing them in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost, teaching them to observe all things whatsoever" he had commanded them.

3rdly. To deny ourselves is to mortify, or crucify, all our earthly affections, or sensual desires, and to cultivate universal purity. Our desires are improper, when they either relate to unlawful things, or are excessive in relation to what is not forbidden. Ever since the prohibited fruit was tasted by our first parents their descendants have been "lovers of pleasure more than lovers of God." A sensual bias—an inclination to seek happiness in the gratification of the outward senses, is one of the most striking effects of the fall. "The lust of the flesh, the lust of the eye, and the pride of life," have usurped the place of the supreme good. In the second chapter of the Epistle to the Ephesians, the apostle, after speaking of those "who walk according to the course of this world," &c., says, "Among whom we all had our conversation in times past in the lusts of our flesh, fulfilling the desires of the flesh and of the mind," &c.; "But they that are Christ's," the same apostle says, "have crucified the flesh, with the affections and lusts."—Gal. v. 24. If we would be the disciples of Christ, we must deny ourselves of every unreasonable gratification, of every pleasure that would disqualify us for communion with God, and for other holy exercises. All uncleanness, either in deed, word, or desire; every kind of unnecessary, not to say hurtful, self-indulgence, in eating, drinking, sleeping, &c.; all gaudy, costly apparel, springing from, and ministering to, vanity and foolish desires; vain amusements, tending only to kill time, distract the mind, pollute the imagination, and stupefy the conscience ; ungodly companionship, and whatever tends to create or feed unnatural appetites, strengthen wrong habits, or invite temptation—must be avoided. There are many things that should be judged of, not so much by their positive character, as by their probable tendency. It might not be wrong for Eve to look at the forbidden fruit, which was “pleasant to the eyes, and,” apparently, “good for food.” But was it wise? was it safe? This is one reason why we are to “abstain from all appearance of evil,” “hating even the garment spotted by the flesh,” as we would keep from a leprous person or garment to avoid contagion. We do not say that it is wrong to read works of fiction or the news of the world ; but we do affirm that those who exercise no self-denial in connection with such reading cannot be sober-minded Christians, cannot “attend upon the Lord without distraction,” or have their “conversation in heaven.”

The moderate use of intoxicating liquors may not, in all circumstances, be ranked among sinful indulgences. But when it is considered that the drinking customs of society are intimately connected with a large proportion of the pauperism, crimes, diseases, and untimely deaths that afflict and disgrace our country, and present one of the greatest obstacles to the propagation of Christianity both at home and abroad, we are compelled to think that self-denial in this respect—abstinence, is a duty, agreeably to the teaching and example of the apostle Paul.—Rom. xiv. 21 ; 1 Cor. viii. 13 and x. 31—33.

Once more ; fasting is not plainly enjoined in the New Testament, but we know that it has been practised, more or less, by the holiest men, both Jews and Christians, of all ages and countries. And, certainly, the instruction our Lord has given us in regard to the spirit and manner in which it should be observed, supposes the duty of it. Indeed, if any one can “keep under his body,” and maintain a spirit of humiliation and of self-sacrifice, without fasting, he may be fairly exempted from it. For it is not to be regarded, absolutely, as a positive, any more than a moral duty, but as an aid to practical devotion, and an unconstrained expression of holy indignation at sin. Yet he who neglects fasting because of its irksomeness, or grievousness to the flesh, may justly entertain some doubt whether he is entirely devoted to God ; and, therefore, whether fasting may not be to him a duty.

The love of ease, also, is a form of self-indulgence so closely allied to the love of pleasure, and is so flatly opposed, not only to practical Christianity, but to every kind of moral excellence, that it requires some special remark. Indolence is not a simple defect ; it renders a man utterly incapable of virtue : sinks him to the level of brutes. And how prone are we to spiritual sloth ! This ignoble form of self-indulgence, in regard to religion, is even increased by the excessive eagerness with which inferior interests are pursued. Hence, we are so frequently commanded and exhorted to attend to the great business of salvation as the one thing needful; to “strive to enter in at the strait gate;” to take the “yoke” of Christ upon us; to practise a righteousness more perfect than that of the Scribes and Pharisees; to watch and resist the first motions to pride, anger, or evil desire; to pluck out the offending eye, or cut off the offending hand; to be not slothful in business, fervent in spirit, serving the Lord; “so to labour, working with our hands the thing that is good, that we may have to give to him that needeth;” to “pray always with all prayer and supplication in the Spirit, watching thereunto with all perseverance;” to “take to us the whole armour of God, that we may be able to withstand in the evil day; and having done all, to stand;” to “provoke one another to love and to good works;” to “lay aside every weight, and the sin that doth so easily beset us, and run with patience the race that is set before us,” &c. How little can be done, my brethren, either for our own souls, or for the good of others, without self-denial! And what reason many have to fear that they will receive the reward of “the wicked and slothful servant,” when the Lord shall come.

4thly. Self-interest, or what is commonly called selfishness, must be renounced. An inordinate regard to our own temporal interest, which is inconsistent with the just rights, or the welfare of our neighbour, is, perhaps, the strongest and most prevailing propensity of our degenerate nature. “All seek their own, not the things that are Jesus Christ’s.”—Phil. ii. 21. “The love of money is the root of all evil,”—1 Tim. vi. 10. This, as a preacher once said in our hearing, is “the perpetual motion.” It is this which mainly governs the actions of mankind, and occasions almost all the mischief and miseries in the world. But this unreasonable, injurious self-love is opposed alike to the precepts and the spirit of Christianity. “The law of Christ,”—“the perfect law of liberty,” is love—

“Love sincere and unconfin’d;
Love to all of human kind;
Love, which willeth all should live:
Love, which all to all would give.”

“Look not every man on his own things, but every man also on the things of others.”—Phil. ii. 4. “Ye know the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, that, though he was rich, yet for your sakes he became poor, that ye through his poverty might be rich.” See, also, the words of the Lord Jesus, Luke vi. 27—36; and xiv. 12—14. No almsgiving can be called Christian charity, if it be not done in a self-denying spirit, from love to Christ.—Matt. x. 40—42.

5thly. To deny ourselves is to renounce our own righteousness, and submit to the Divinely appointed method of salvation. Although unregenerate men are governed by self-will, sensuality, and covetousness, they yet entertain a favourable view of their character and state : instead of acknowledging themselves to be guilty, polluted, helpless sinners, they are rather disposed to congratulate themselves on their virtues ; and if they do their best, as they persuade themselves they are doing, they have no fear about getting to heaven. Like the Scribes and Pharisees in the days of our Saviour, they "trust in themselves that they are righteous," and so practically reject him who came to call sinners to repentance. "Being ignorant of God's righteousness, and going about to establish their own righteousness, they have not submitted themselves to the righteousness of God. For Christ is the end of the law for righteousness to every one that believeth." "Therefore by the deeds of the law there shall no flesh be justified in his sight : for by the law is the knowledge of sin."—Rom. x. 3, 4 ; iii. 20. The first lesson that Christ teaches his disciples is, poverty of spirit—a deep, affecting conviction that we are "very far gone away from original righteousness," and that self-recovery is as impossible as that the blood of bulls and goats could take away sin. We must deny ourselves, not only of our sins, but of our righteousness. Our good works, as well as our wicked works, must be renounced ; and, with Paul, we must "count all things but loss for the excellency of the knowledge of Christ Jesus our Lord ; desiring to be found in him, not having our own righteousness, which is of the law, but that which is through the faith of Christ, the righteousness which is of God by faith." Those who do not judge themselves worthy of death, death eternal, cannot have a saving interest in Christ. Self-condemnation is absolutely necessary to free justification.—Gal. ii. 19—21.

6thly. Once more, self-denial includes the renunciation of vain glory, inordinate self-esteem, and the love of worldly honour. Pride and ambition are deeply rooted in our fallen nature. A disposition to think more highly of ourselves than we ought to think, and to desire the praise of men more than the praise of God, is natural to us all. And nothing is more hateful in the sight of God, or more inconsistent with our real character. Among the seven things mentioned in Scripture as being an abomination to the Lord, "a proud look" is the first : "God resisteth the proud." "How can ye believe," said Jesus to the Jews, "which receive honour one of another, and seek not the honour that cometh from God only?"—John v. 44. One great design of Christ's becoming "poor," was to shame us out of our pride. He commenced his public ministry by pronouncing blessings on "the poor in spirit," those "who mourn," "the meek," and the world's outcasts. When the disciples were disputing about who should be the greatest in the kingdom of heaven, "he called a little child unto him, and set him in the midst of them, and said, Verily I say unto you, except ye be converted and become as little children, ye shall not enter into the kingdom of heaven. Whosoever, therefore, shall humble himself as this little child, the same is greatest in the kingdom of heaven.”—Matt. xviii. 1—4. “But he that is greatest among you shall be your servant. And whosoever shall exalt himself shall be abased; and he that shall humble himself shall be exalted.”—Matt. xxiii. 11, 12. And the teaching of the apostles on this subject after the day of Pentecost, was correspondent to that of their Master. “Mind not high things, but condescend to men of low estate.” “In honour preferring one another.”—Rom. xii. 10, 16. “Let nothing be done through strife or vain-glory; but in lowliness of mind let each esteem other better than themselves. Let this mind be in you, which was also in Christ Jesus: who, being in the form of God, thought it not robbery to be equal with God: but made himself of no reputation, and took upon him the form of a servant,” &c.—Phil. ii. 3, 5—11. This leads us to the next branch of our text:—

II. “AND TAKE UP HIS CROSS.” This is a figurative expression, signifying the resolution and patience with which we should meet persecution and afflictions in the cause of Christ. There is here, no doubt, an allusion to an ancient Roman custom in the case of a malefactor who was to be crucified: he was required to bear his cross to the place of execution, which was a great addition to his punishment, being not only painful, but highly disgraceful. The faithful, unswerving profession of the religion of Jesus, always, more or less, provokes the displeasure of the world. “If any man will live godly in Christ Jesus, he shall suffer persecution.” Turn to Matt. x. 24, 25, 32—39; and 1 John iii. 1, 12, 13. Ah! my friends, if you never decide for Christ—if you never connect yourselves with his people for the profession of his name and the advancement of his cause, till your ungodly relatives and acquaintances give you their suffrages, testify their approval—you are as near the kingdom of heaven as you will ever be. You are not, certainly, to seek crosses; but those that you meet with in the way of duty you are bound to take up and bear, as you would not forfeit your promised crown. You must be faithful to the Lord Christ, regardless of consequences. You are called to be his faithful witnesses in all circumstances, whatever temporal loss, reproach, or suffering you may have to endure. “This is a faithful saying: for if we be dead with him, we shall also live with him; if we suffer, we shall also reign with him; if we deny him, he also will deny us.”—2 Tim. ii. 11, 12. We come now to the last branch of our text:—

III. “AND FOLLOW ME.” To be a Christian is to be like Christ to learn of him who was “meek and lowly in heart;” to “walk as he also walked:”

“To trace his example, the world to disdain;
And constantly trample on pleasure and pain.”

We are not following him unless we are denying ourselves, and taking up our cross daily. “He pleased not himself:” it was his “meat to do the will of him that sent him." He "went about doing good;" he "endured the cross, despising the shame;" he "suffered for us, leaving us an example that we should follow his steps." "Let us go forth, therefore, unto him without the camp, bearing his reproach."—Heb. xiii. 13.

Such, then, dear friends, are the terms of Christian discipleship. And let it be remarked, in concluding, that these terms are not arbitrary and severe, but reasonable and necessary. We are so depraved—our views, dispositions, and conduct are so contrary to God, that we cannot possibly be restored to his favour and image, and qualified for duty and happiness, without self-denial in all its branches. Our pride of reason impugns the highest displays of his wisdom; our self-will opposes his just authority; our sensuality contradicts his excellent holiness; our selfishness belies and disgraces his benevolence; our self-righteousness ignores both his justice and his grace; our immoderate self-esteem, our eager thirst for human applause, robs him of "the glory due unto his name;" while our spiritual indifference, our reluctance to engage in his service, is a reflection upon him as a hard Master. It is only, therefore, as we deny ourselves, that we can be brought into that state of reconciliation with God and conformity to him; in which religion consists. "They that are in the flesh cannot please God." We cannot offer any sacrifice well-pleasing to him, or perform a single duty acceptable in his sight, till we have surrendered ourselves to him as the absolute Master of our hearts and lives. Selfishness, in its several forms, is the chief enemy with which we have to wage war. And he who is the most decided and constant in this home warfare, is the best Christian, and the happiest too.

Christian perfection, about which there have been so many unprofitable discussions, is neither more nor less than the effectual subjugation of our thoughts, our will, and our desires to God, so that we shall feel it to be equally our duty and our happiness to "do his pleasure,"—to have fellowship with him, and live according to his will. And who will say that this is either impossible or unnecessary? Who will plead for the continuance of what is "enmity against God," and what his Son Jesus Christ came to destroy? Has he not a right to the entire homage of our hearts, and the best service we can render? Those of you who are living to yourselves, we are aware, are still ready to say, "These are hard sayings, who can hear them?" But if you had right views of the Christian religion, and any just sense of its necessity, you would be like the merchant-man in the Gospel, "seeking goodly pearls, who when he had found one pearl of great price, went and sold all he had, and bought it." Oh! if ye loved the blessed Saviour, instead of standing aloof from him, hesitating, desiring him to come to your terms, wishful to divide your services between him and the world, you would rejoice to be counted worthy to be called by his name, interested in his sacrifice, conformed to his example, numbered with his followers, devoted to his service, trained for his kingdom and glory.

And ought ye not to love him? Why, he loved you even unto death—"the death of the cross." Had he not denied himself, and endured the cross for you, reconciliation with God would have been impossible, and you must have remained in your enmity, and guilt, and wretchedness for ever; for ever cut off from all that is good, and holy, and happy. You cannot, with any show of consistency, refuse attention to this subject, except on the supposition that there is no God, or that you are independent of him, and need not a Saviour—that holiness and sin, heaven and hell, are but empty names. And dare any of you continue to live according to so unreasonable a supposition? "Know ye not that ye are not your own? For ye are bought with a price: therefore glorify God in your body, and in your spirit, which are God's."—1 Cor. vi. 19, 20.

---

WORKS OF CREATION.

---

STRUCTURE AND POWER OF THE HUMAN HAND.

SINCE the enunciation of that primeval curse, "In the sweat of thy brow shalt thou eat bread," it has been man's lot to labour: but from that necessity have sprung many advantages. As we are at present constituted, it would appear as though the curse had been changed into a blessing: for, had there been nothing to spur us on, and to give zest to our efforts, the advantages of a high civilization would have been unknown, and the play of the affections would have been, in great part, checked. There would have been no mutual inter-dependence, to call into action those social virtues from which we derive so much of our earthly happiness; no trusting to the strength of another, to foster our love; no impulse arising from a consideration of the claims of helplessness; no grateful sense of obligation in return. In a word, neither could the one party have felt the necessity for help, nor the other the stimulus to exertion.

But, as it has been ordained that man shall labour, so has Providence arranged that obedience to this law shall bring its own reward. The hand is the chief member by which man fulfils his lot. An ancient philosopher went so far as to say, that it is to this member that man owes his pre-eminence over the rest of creation. But, although its wonderful structure, and its powers of adaptation, prove that it was intended to be a mark and a means of preserving to him his superiority, it must still be acknowledged that it is to the intellect that man is indebted for his high estate.

"Electric from the ruling brain
Descends the soul, to stir and strain
That wondrous instrument, the hand,
By which we learn to understand."

It cannot be denied, however, that it is to the hand that we owe the realization of schemes which have advanced man from the condition of a savage; and even the possession of glorious intellect would have profited him but little, had he been deprived of the means of carrying out its injunctions and preserving its fruits.

Without hands to execute, Newton and Watt, Stephenson and Brunel, would have been mere dreamers; for the value of the mind must be reckoned by the worth of its results. What would be the merit of philosophy without its applications, of learning without its benefits, of wealth without its power of procuring good things, or of charity without its power of bestowing them? It must be remembered, again, that the hands are requisite not merely for the practical development of these children of the mind, but even for the maintenance of the vigour of the intellect. With their loss we should forfeit not only many opportunities of receiving new impressions, to give rise to new thoughts, but also those constant calls upon the action of the brain, that continual stimulation, which we know to be necessary for the organs of the living body, in order to sustain them in their natural and pristine health. Deprived of this, the brain, like every other organ, would become weak and sluggish; and the mind, suffering from the imperfection of its instrument, and feeding upon its own diseased productions and exaggerations, would become impaired: as is the case, in fact, with all physically weak and imperfect nations. It was remarked by Sir Charles Bell, that the hand forms one of the chief agents of expression. Herein, truly, it ranks second only to the human countenance. By the position of the hand, we express the emotions of fear, horror, and astonishment; of grief, despair, and defiance. By its motions, we beckon, warn, or admonish; command, entreat, or condemn; praise or disapprove, show scorn or indignation. By its actions, we display joy, gratitude, and friendship; we welcome with hospitality, or dismiss with blessings; and we perform many other significant duties connected with the emotions, though scarcely to be called truly emotional.

The very shape of the hand is so stamped with individuality, and so characteristic of the possessor, as to become highly expressive. There is the long, lank, sinewy claw of the miser; and the full, large, open hand of the liberal man. There is the small, delicate, aristocratic hand; and the large, coarse, plebeian. There is the round, fair, female hand; and the square, bony, full-veined, masculine one. Then, as to the touch we all know the firm, frank clasp of honesty, and the cringing touch of deceit: we forget the mere formal adieu of ordinary civility; but "O for the touch of a vanish'd hand," that has grasped our own with all the warmth of friendship, thrilling through our fingers, even in after years, fresh as the memories of the loved and lost!

The full extent to which the human hand is useful, in the varied and innumerable occupations which employ our lives, is, at the best, imperfectly acknowledged. But, if we consider the vast range of motion enjoyed by this small organ,—the high character of its sensitive endowments,—the accuracy with which it can be adjusted to functions apparently the most opposed,—then we may be led to see more clearly the wisdom of its construction, and the perfection of its adaptation; and to acknowledge, in the complete and symmetrical design, the glory of its Creator.

Before examining the structure of the hand itself, it will be best to glance at the general structure of the upper extremity, and to point out its relation to the anterior limbs of the lower animals. We shall thus discover that the arm of the man, and the fore-foot of the quadruped, the wing of the bird, and the pectoral fin of the fish, or, at least, the paddle of the whale and seal tribes, are all closely connected, by similarity of construction, and identity of plan.

Thus, in whatever modification of form we see the anterior extremity, we find it to be the most movable of the limbs. And, though generally more slight and delicate in form than the hinder extremity, it is yet so governed, and connected with the trunk by large and powerful masses of muscle, as to be moved with great certainty and force; and these muscles are all so placed as to act upon it from the best possible points, and so to avoid all waste of power.

In this great mobility of the arm-bone lies the special adaptation of that member for receiving the attachment of the hand: for this would have been of much less value, if fixed to a rigid or sluggishly moving limb. With this object, the arm is furnished with a peculiar mechanical arrangement, the chief features of which are preserved in the anterior extremities of all vertebrated animals.

The shoulder-joint is of the kind known as the ball-and-socket joint; a form by which the greatest range of motion is obtained. The shoulder-blade, also, is found to project its receiving surface out from the line of the body, so that the arms always hang free, and the free swinging of the limbs is permitted in all directions, within a circle, the centre of which is the centre of the head of the arm-bone. It is, however, not a complete socket, for this would confine the range of the arm and hand, and prevent its movement towards the front of the body. In this respect it differs much from the hip-joint; for there, where strength and firmness are more requisite than an extensive range of motion, the socket is massive, and almost completely encircles the head of the bone.

In the shoulder, on the contrary, the spherical head of the arm-bone plays freely upon an almost plane surface; the shoulder-blade being only slightly hollowed at the point of junction, and the bones being kept in apposition chiefly by the agency of a movable but tough and very strong cap of tissue; in this way greatly enhancing the extent of motion, but at the expense of strength. Still further to increase this freedom of movement, the shoulder-blade is connected with the bony framework of the body only by the agency of large and numerous muscles; so that the range of the extremity is very much modified and enlarged.

The attachment of the large muscles of the chest to the arm serves not merely for the quick and powerful motion of that limb. It should not be overlooked, that they lift the ribs; and the chest, becoming filled with air, is so rendered a fixed point for their action, being also placed in the best possible condition for the function of respiration, during vigorous and long-continued muscular effort. The fore-arm is connected with the upper-arm by the elbow-joint, in such a manner as to allow only the forward motion, after the fashion of a door-hinge.

It will be observed, nevertheless, that we can turn the hand with the palm or the back uppermost. Now, this motion is allowed by the peculiar construction of the fore-arm, which consists of two bones; one of which is attached to the arm-bone, and forms the elbow-joint, but does not enter into the construction of the wrist-joint, and is unconnected with the hand; while the other is free, and unconcerned in the elbow-joint, moving freely in part around the fixed bone, but at its lower extremity giving attachment to the hand, and entering into the formation of the wrist.

By this arrangement, a free motion of the wrist, so necessary for the proper use of the organs of touch, is obtained without any corresponding loss of strength. Nay, had the fore-arm and hand been connected by direct continuity of firm and rigid bones, there would have been constant danger of injury: for the hand, being subject to constantly recurring shocks, would in that case have carried the force directly to the point of the shoulder, and the resistance there would have become a source of constant danger. But by the use of two bones, and the intervention of yielding and elastic ligaments, the shock is broken, and far greater safety is provided simultaneously with greater strength. Coming next to the wrist, we find the hand to be attached to the movable bone of the fore-arm by the intervention of a number of small bones, disposed in the form of an arch, held together by cartilages and ligaments, and forming joints between themselves; so that here again we have provision, not only for strength, but for a high degree of elasticity, and a certain amount of motion.

In the peculiar construction of this joint, we may again perceive the marks of a wonderful adaptation of structure for the uses to which it is applied, which may be traced throughout all the creations of Supreme Wisdom. We see the whole hand moving upon the wrist after the manner of a door-hinge. We see the fore-arm performing a rotatory motion with the hand and wrist; while the wrist itself, formed of a number of small and movable bones, admits of many minor and partial movements, well adapted to the delicate manipulations which the hand has to execute. And yet all these are so well guarded and connected by strong bands of cartilage, and so carefully disposed, (instance, the small bones of the wrist, built into the form of an arch,—the strongest in which they could be disposed,) as to preserve, nay, even to increase, the original strength of the materials, and at the same time to defend and enclose the delicate and important structures which pass from the fore-arm into the palm.

The hand itself has a framework of long bones, arranged in sets. The first is a set of four long bones, held together by firm ligaments in such a manner as to allow a very slight degree of motion upon each other. From each of these are carried on the bones forming the fingers.

The thumb is distinguished by its greater range of motion, and by the absence of the first long bone, called the metacarpal. And we find that the cause of its greater mobility is the peculiar character of the joint by which it is attached to the small or carpal bones of the wrist: for with these (or, rather, with one of them) it forms a joint almost of the same character as that of the shoulder, but even less perfect. The great range of motion which this peculiarity gives to the thumb is one of the distinguishing marks of the hand of man. Although the monkey and other quadrumana possess thumbs, these are very imperfect when compared with that of man. The chief use of the thumb appears to be, to clasp over the fingers, and in this way to render the grasp more tenacious; and the greater comparative length of this digit in the sloth, the monkey, and other animals of that class, is admirably adapted to the requirements of their peculiar habits in this respect. But in the hand of man so great length is not requisite; nay, it would be a positive inconvenience, because the great peculiarity in the movement of the human hand is the power of bringing the thumb in opposition to each and all of the fingers; a power by which we are enabled to do so many things which the less perfect members of the lower animals would always prevent them from accomplishing. Therefore it is, that the thumb of man is only of just such length as will reach across the palm. It may thus be conveniently and swiftly brought to oppose each digit in succession ; its size so beautifully and accurately adapted to all the variety of our wants, and yet in no way interfering with any of the other numerous and delicate actions of this organ. Deprived of the thumb, man with all his power of mind, would have been far below his present station in the world. All those delicate manipulations by which we are enabled to produce the innumerable appliances of an intellectual and luxurious civilization,—all those finer touches which serve to delight the fancy, and to elevate the taste,—would have been lost, or preserved only in a fragmentary and imperfect state. So great is the importance of so small an organ !

(To be continued.)

FOR PREACHERS AND CLASS-LEADERS.

JOHN WESLEY AND HIS PREACHING.

TOWARDS the close of his life, John Wesley was very particular in his instructions to his preachers. He urged upon them to guard against formality in public worship, to practise field preaching, whoever might be opposed to it, to hold a quarterly fast in every society, to preach the doctrine of entire sanctification, and urge believers to go on unto perfection. All his advices are singularly characteristic and racy. We select the following : “ What avails preaching alone, though we could preach like angels ? I heard Dr. Lupton say, ‘ My father, visiting one of his parishioners, who had never missed going to church for forty years, then lying on his death-bed, asked him, ‘ Thomas, where do you think your soul is going ? ’ ‘ Soul ! soul ! ’ said Thomas. ‘ Yes ; do you not know what your soul is ? ’ ‘ Aye, surely, ’ said he ; ‘ why, it is a little bone in the back that lives longer than the rest of the body. ’ ” So much Thomas had learned by often hearing sermons, yea, and exceeding good sermons for forty years ! We must instruct them from house to house. Till this is done, and that in good earnest, the Methodists will be little better than other people. Go into every house in course, and teach every one therein, young and old, if they belong to us, to be Christians inwardly and outwardly. Make every particular plain to their understanding. Fix it in their memory. Write it on their heart. In order to do this, there must be line upon line, precept upon precept. I remember to have heard my father asking my mother, “ How could you have the patience to tell that blockhead the same thing twenty times over ? ” She answered, “ Why, if I had told him but nineteen times, I should have lost all my labour. ” What patience indeed, what love, what knowledge, are requisite for this ! ”—Christian Journal.

THE BENEFIT OF CLASS-MEETINGS.

BISHOP JAMES'S labour of love with the class-leaders of the Church demands at least some contribution at the hand of every one to show our conviction that he has “ wrought a good work ” for this part of our economy. Class meetings as a means of Christian edification, and as a means of enlarging the Church of Christ, may as well be illustrated by personal experience, I apprehend, as in any other possible way. Having been converted on a Sunday evening, in the month of November, 1824, I might more properly say near the break of day on Monday morning, I repaired the next day, at the earliest convenience, to the then preacher in charge in New York, Rev. P. P. Sandford, residing in the old parsonage beside what was then called the Second Street (now Forsyth) Church. Of him, after telling "what the Lord had done for my soul," I received a permit, or ticket, to Mr. James Donaldson, of blessed memory, to be received into his Sunday-morning class.

I think it not well to omit on this occasion to record that my conversion occurred in a family of Methodists at that time in connection with the John Street and Second Street Churches. Among the parties present on the occasion to sympathise with my penitent and groaning spirit there were six godly women, five of whom were faithful unto death, and are now, I doubt not, in the paradise of God. Of the five praying men with me, one subsequently became "a burning and a shining light," the Rev. B. Creagh. He sees with open face the Lamb, whose death he pleaded in my behalf. Augustus Garrett, from whose estate sprang the "Garrett Biblical Institute," was then my fellow-clerk, and pleaded in prayer for me. Another, a fellow-clerk, became a prosperous merchant; but getting uneasy among us, he went among that excellent people, the Moravians; but he took his uneasy spirit with him, and gained no rest, I fear, until he laid him down to die, when loosing himself from earth, he took hold on life in Christ Jesus. Two others that were with me, waxing rich, gave up their classes, and both went out from among us. Mr. James Donaldson was a man of a very tender spirit, and never addressed us without tears. Among his invaluable advices to the young, was this one, "Let your life be like an even spun thread." I had the advantage of the practice as well as precepts of my leader. I knew the man and the manner of his communications. I had also the advantage of a class, every one of whom was older than myself—some of them were fathers in Israel, and had been tried and found faithful among the faithless for many years. Their life and conversation were to me a constant example and study. I know of but one living; he bears the name of Halsted, and has, so far as I have heard, run a steady race, and is still running in full view of the prize.

With this class I remained, and do not remember that I was ever absent from it but on one occasion, and then on account of sickness. My next leaders were preachers, both of whom are absent from the body; one of whom, Rev. Robert Seeny, profited me more by his ministry than any other I have ever known. My turn now came to be a leader. Being but twenty years of age, and charged with the care of older persons than myself, I could only endeavour to carry out the rule I had adopted in the beginning, to do the best I knew how. The aged were deferential when they might have been dissatisfied. We together made up our minds that a young man of our number ought to "go out into the work" as a preacher. We assisted him to pay his debts, purchased him a horse and wagon, and he went forth to run his race. He was wise, won souls, steadily improved in his ministry, never "whiled away time," and got through the labourer's day while he was yet in full strength. Another, who was an ardent admirer of the doctrine of "perfect love," printed or purchased an edition of "Wesley's Christian Perfection," and distributed it very extensively with his own hands. He himself had been a class-leader for many years, and ever found this means of grace was to him a well watered garden.

Two of the female members of the class went out into the highways, literally, and assisted in gathering a Sunday-school, out of which there grew, in their day, at least three Churches, which have each duplicated themselves since, yes, and more; one of them lives on in faith, the other in eternal fruition. Another member of my class became one of the founders of what is now the Eighteenth Street Church, and another a principal founder of a Mission Church, which has sent out several ministers to home and to foreign missions. One of these attained to a very ripe age—Father Tiemann—and left the shores of time, as I have seen by the New York papers, within the year 1862.

This class consisted generally of twelve, never of more than fifteen members, and it never required an hour to "lead" it. Perhaps no class was ever more regular and prompt in attendance. As a consequence, every one proved fruitful in good works ; those who have departed are greatly missed, and those who remain cannot be spared by those who know them. Their absence from among men will be a felt loss.

My other classes have afforded in process of time—first in my narrative, but third in order of time—a pastor, who lives to go in and out among us, was once in a city station, and who then, as now, desires nothing so much as to show that he was of those predestinated unto the adoption of children by Jesus Christ, to be holy and without blame before him in love.

The second is a youth into whose hands was put a good book, as in the case of the first—into the hands of the first, “Fletcher’s Appeal,” and “Wesley’s Christian Perfection”—into the hands of this second, a missionary work on Africa, the effect of which upon his young heart, was such, that his early love was set upon that field, and in that field sleeps his dust. When dying he expressed no regrets, and to forbid any among his friends at home, said, “If I had a thousand lives to live again, I would give them all to Africa.”

The third in my narrative shall close my present communication, and I mention them but as instances and illustrations of the class-meeting as a means to bring before the leader, if he be earnest and thoughtful, those who may be benefited by him, and made to bless the Church and the world. This third one, a coloured youth, was first met by me in class, as were the others, where I began with them, and did not leave them until they were fairly under way for the grand army of the itinerancy. This lad evinced talent and genuine piety. I proposed to him that he should enter upon a course of reading and biblical studies, which he was not slow to do, for the next time I met him in class, he presented me with a list of six subscribers for complete sets of “Clarke’s Commentary,” which in that day entitled him to the sixth copy. It was not long before he obtained his copy, and was thus fairly on the way. Soon after he entered an academy, and next became the teacher of a district school of white youth, was licensed to preach, was subsequently brought into Conference with Rev. John Seyes and with him sailed for Liberia, has been the principal of an academy there, the editor of our paper, and is now the superintendent or bishop of the Liberia Annual Conference. Glory be to God alone !—Christian Journal.

FOR THE FAMILY.

DISCOMFORT.

WHEN George Dunkly was married, he thought he had attained the summit of human felicity ; and his mother and sisters said, “If George be not happy, it will be his own fault.”

George Dunkly was the village carpenter. He had a good business ; a pleasant house of his own ; sober habits ; youth, health, and strength, in his favour. Moreover, being fond of reading, he had a respectable library already, and meant to have a larger before he had done. “Ah !” said he to himself, rubbing his hands gleefully, “what pleasant winter evenings we shall have—Margaret and I—when we have both done work, and have nothing else to do but she to listen and I to read aloud.” And George really laughed, he was so brimful with the pleasures of anticipation.

Margaret was young too, and healthy and strong. She was pretty, moreover, and faithful and affectionate. She really loved George for himself, and she had worldly wisdom enough to like him none the less for his pleasant house and his good business.

So George and Margaret were married ; and the honeymoon passed away blissfully. George was happier than ever.

But time wore on, and George began to wonder : according to his notions he had ample cause for wondering. For one thing, he wondered that he had not found out before he was married, that his house, instead of being, as in his simplicity he had always considered it to be, respectable for its external neatness and internal cleanliness, was, in fact, a very pigsty (or something near it) for dirt and dust. That it was so, he had Margaret's word for it; and he had, besides, the evidence of more senses than one, in the entire purification of every floor, and wall, and ceiling, and of every "stick and straw" that his house contained. He had before known his pretty young wife to be a famous cleaner, and he had pleased himself with the thought of her superior abilities in this way; but now he found that he had not known half the reality.

At first George was pleased to find that Margaret's good qualities were not dimmed by marriage; and, week after week, he bore with exemplary fortitude the infliction of mops, pails, brooms, and brushes, the strong odour of soap and soap-suds daily renewed, and the inconvenience of curtainless windows and damp floors. By-and-by, however, he began to wonder how it was his wife never got tired of scrubbing and scouring, and how soon, or how long it would be before his house would be to-rights.

Vain were the expectations he formed. The house was never to-rights. Every day had its appointed duties; and of these, the first and foremost was to scrub and clean. If the dinner was ill-cooked, or not cooked at all, or kept back half an hour, what of that? Was there not the wash-house to whitewash, and could anybody do two things at once? If the house was "turned out at window," and the once comfortable sitting-room had no chair for George to sit upon when he came in from work, what of that? Had not Margaret been hard at work all day too? Hadn't she been bees-waxing and turpentineing all the chairs and tables, and making them shine like looking glasses? Hadn't she been window cleaning? Hadn't she been clearing out the corner cupboards and the closets? And hadn't she got two hours' work yet to get through before her task would be done? How could George be so selfish and unfeeling as to talk about discomfort? But there! it was just like all the men: they think women have nothing to do, when the truth is, their work is never done.

"Don't go into that room, don't," said Margaret one day, in a pettish tone, as her husband was opening the door of the pretty little parlour which, before his marriage, he had papered with his own hands, and nicely furnished, and in connection with which he had suffered his imagination to picture many a pleasant domestic scene; but from which, after marriage, he had found himself almost divorced—"Don't go into that room, Dunkly," repeated Margaret, yet more pettishly, as she found that George was still bent upon entering.

"Why not, my dear?"

"Why not! Only look at your boots; see what a lot of dirt you are carrying in."

"No such thing, Margaret; I scraped them well, and rubbed them on the mat. Besides, where is the dirt to come from such dry weather as this?"

"They are dirty, George; and I only swept the parlour yesterday. And then, that nasty pipe!"

"Why, Margaret," replied Dunkly good-naturedly, "you didn't use to object to my smoking now and then; you didn't say 'nasty pipe' before we were married."

"Well, I do now then. I declare it makes everything stink of tobacco. The parlour isn't fit to go into after you have been smoking there."

George was good-natured and forbearing; but it was hard work for him to swallow the rising anger: nevertheless, he did it. "Well, Margaret," said he, "I won't go into the parlour, then, if you will just make the kitchen comfortable, and come and sit down with me. I am sure you must have finished cleaning for to-day at least. Come, I'll put my pipe down, and read to you. I have not had a quiet hour with you for many a long day."

Ah! Margaret, Margaret, what evil spirit was it that prompted you to say, "There, hold your tongue! Just like you men! Think women have nothing to do but to wait upon you. Don't you see I have two hours' work to do yet before I (with strong and bitter emphasis on that I), before I can sit down?"

George Dunkly darted from the house. It was eleven o'clock when he returned. He had been sitting in the public-house, drinking; for there was comfort there—of a sort. This was scarcely four months after marriage.

* * * * *

Ten years passed away, and still the great object of Margaret's life was to "bustle about" and to clean. Her house was, indeed, a picture of good housewifery—when it was to-rights, which was one day in seven; and her children (she had three) were orderly, and clean, and well-behaved, and—timid. Good reason they had to be timid. Dunkly himself was not greatly changed externally; but his dreams of domestic happiness had passed away like dreams. He never, after that one slip, again degraded himself by excess; for his principles were sound: but his home—alas!

Well, ten years passed away; and Margaret, careworn and weakened by her constant exertions, fell ill. She was very ill: her recovery was despaired of. With returning, or rather with awakened affection, George nursed her, and watched by her bed. At length the crisis was over; danger had passed; and very slowly Margaret recovered strength.

One evening—it was a fine summer's evening—she ventured, leaning on her husband's arm, to quit her weary couch, and totter to the window. It was partly open, and, shielded by the curtain, she sat, still supported by her husband, watching the setting sun. Presently, childish voices were heard below, and Margaret listened. They were the voices of her two elder children.

"George," said little Margaret to her brother, "father says that mother is getting well again."

"Is she really?" said the boy, in a tone that seemed to tremble.

"Ah, that she is; so father says. And I say, George, you take care; you know it wasn't I made those scratches on the wash-house wall."

"No, Margaret, no," replied little George, with agitation and fear in every tone; "but don't tell mother! Oh, Margaret dear, pray don't tell mother!"

It was a hard and painful lesson, but a most blessed one. There is not now a happier home than George Dunkly's; for Margaret, his wife, has learned that the excess of some kinds of excellence is a vice; and has had the magnanimity to sacrifice her house-idolatry at the shrine of family love.

"THEY HAVE NO PRAYERS AT THEIR HOUSE."

THIS was the reason which a little fellow gave for the wickedness of his schoolmate, than which nothing could be more philosophically correct. He was himself a proof of the truth of it; his observation was founded on his own experience. He had felt the restraining power of family religion.

What a tremendous responsibility rests upon professedly Christian parents! Not that any others are exempt from this responsibility, but these have recognized and assumed it by a public profession. They have consecrated their children to God in the covenant of baptism, and are under the most solemn obligation to use every available means for their conversion. Amongst the means available for this, family prayer is most important. God has ordained the family relationship, and blessed it. It was in the family that he first planted his church, and it is by the family relation that he has extended it. Family worship gathers around itself all other means of grace. Where there is family worship, there will be family instruction, parental authority, regular attendance of the children at school, and a certainty of their being seated with their parents in the house of God every Sabbath-day. Thus, from the hour when the seal of the covenant was administered to these children, until they leave the parental roof to go out into the world, they are brought up in "the nurture and admonition of the Lord." Such parents can confidently commend their children on leaving them, even if still unconverted, to a "covenant-keeping God." They feel that they have endeavoured to train their children for the service of God, to which they have been consecrated, and cannot but hope that to that service they will be devoted. Such children God will take and use for his own glory. They have been educated for him, and he graciously receives the gift at their hands.

A millionaire once said that, "he could not allow his children to think of religion; it would be fatal to their success in business; because to get and keep a fortune required all one's time and efforts." What a horrible consistency is this! yet consistency it is. He had dedicated his children to the service of Mammon, and Mammon they must serve. They could not be allowed to think of, much less to worship, any other God. Where are the Christian parents who act with equal consistency concerning the dedication which they have voluntarily made of their children to the Lord? If we may argue from our own observation, it is to be feared they are lamentably few. It is a fact, that multitudes of Christian parents are so much engaged in making money, that they have no time to attend to their children. The neglect of family worship is the real source of all other neglect of parental duty. If this were attended to at stated seasons, in a proper manner, the effect would be most salutary upon parents as well as upon children. It is this which has distinguished the families of the pious, among abounding wickedness, from the earliest times. It is by this means that the worship of the true God has been preserved in the world. Of Abraham God uses this remarkable expression, "For I know him, that he will command his household, and his children after him." It is not alone to the present, but to future generations, that we are under obligations to transmit to them by this means the true religion. I say by this means, because the families of unfaithful professors of religion have degenerated, generation by generation, into utter godlessness, though surrounded by all the other means of grace; being, apparently, judicially abandoned,—a dreadful, but deserved punishment.

Let not professedly Christian parents think that the maintenance of family worship is simply a privilege, which they may forego, because their own piety is at so low an ebb that they can get on comfortably without it. It is a duty which they owe to God, in their children's behalf; a means of grace to them, which they are doubly bound to use. God requires it of them, for the fulfilment of their covenant vows; and their children themselves require it of them, by every principle of natural justice. It is that solemn, habitual appeal to Almighty God, in behalf of their household, in the name of the Redeemer, which furnishes the most powerful motives to filial obedience and affection, as well as one of the most likely means to issue in their conversion. If parents neglect the use of this means of grace, they have no right to complain if their children are not only not converted, but if they should bring their "grey hairs with sorrow to the grave."

INFLUENCE OF A MOTHER'S LOVE.

"My son, . . . forsake not the law of thy mother."

THE REV. THOMAS BINNEY, when preaching a funeral sermon for Mr. Birrell, who died while a student for the ministry, mentioned a striking fact in connection with his early career, previous to his conversion.—"What a mysterious thing," said Mr. Binney, as he related the fact, "what a mysterious, magical, Divine thing is a mother's love! How it nestles about the heart, and goes with the man, and speaks to him pure words, and is like a guardian angel! This young man could never take any money that came to him from his mother, and spend that upon a Sunday excursion or a treat to a theatre. It was a sacred thing with him; it had the impression and the inscription of his mother's image, and his mother's purity, and his mother's piety, and his mother's love. It was a sacred thing to him; and those things that he felt to be questionable, or felt to be sinful, were always to be provided for by other resources, and by money that came to him from other hands. O! there is the poetry of the heart, the poetry of our home and domestic affections, the poetry of the religion of the hearth and the altar, about that little incident; and it strikes me as being perfectly beautiful."

P O E T R Y.

THE DAUGHTER OF JAIRUS.

FRESHLY the cool breath of the coming eve Stole through the lattice, and the dying girl

Felt it upon her forehead. She had lain
Since the hot noontide in a breathless trance,

Her thin pale fingers clasped within the hand

Of the heart-broken ruler, and her breast
Like the dead marble, white and motionless,

The shadow of a leaf lay on her lips,
And as it stirred with the awakening wind,
The dark lids lifted from her languid eyes,
And her slight fingers moved, and heavily She turned upon her pillow. He was there—

The same loved, tireless watcher, and she looked

Into his face until her sight grew dim
With the fast falling tears, and with a sigh
Of tremulous weakness, murmuring in his name,

She gently drew his hand upon her lips,
And kissed it as she wept. The old man sank

Upon his knees, and in the drapery
Of the rich curtains buried up his face,—
And when the twilight fell, the silken folds

Stirred with his prayer, but the slight hand he held

Had ceased its pressure, and he could not hear

In the dead utter silence, that a breath Came through her nostrils, and her temples gave

To his nice touch no pulse, and at her mouth

He held the slightest curl that on her neck

Lay with its mocking beauty, and his gaze
Ached with its deadly stillness.

* * * The same silvery light,
That shone upon the lone rock by the sea,
Slept on the ruler's lofty capitals
As at that door he stood, and welcomed in Jesus and his disciples. All was still,

The echoing vestibule gave back the slide
Of their loose sandals, and the arrowy beam

Of moonlight slanting to the marble floor
Lay like a spell of silence in the rooms
As Jairus led them on. With hushing steps

He trod the winding stair: but ere he touched

The latch, there came a whisper from within—

"Trouble the master not, for she is dead."
And his faint hand fell nerveless at his side,

And his steps falter, and the broken voice
Choked in its utterance; but a gentle hand
Was laid upon his own, and in his ear
The Saviour's voice, sank thrillingly and low,

"She is not dead but sleepeth."
They passed in.

* * * * * Like a form
Of matchless sculpture in her sleep, she lay—

The linen vesture folded on her breast,
And over it her white transparent hands;
The blood still rosy in her tapering nails;
A line of pearl ran through her parted
lips,

And in her nostrils, spiritually thin,
The breathing curve was mockingly like life;

And round beneath the faintly tinted skin
Ran the light branches of the azure veins;
And on her cheek the jet lash overlay,
Matching the arches pencilled in her brow.

Her hair had been unbound, and falling loose

Upon her pillow, hid the small round ears

In curls of glossy blackness, and about Her polish'd neck, scarce touching it, they hung

Like airy shadows floating as they slept
'Twas heavenly beautiful. The Saviour raised

Her hand from off her bosom, and spread out

The snowy fingers in his palm, and said,
"Maiden! arise!"—and suddenly a flush Shot o'er her forehead, and along her lips;

And through her cheek the rallied colour ran,

And the still outline of her graceful form Stirred in the linen vesture, and she clasped

The Saviour's hand, and fixing her dark eyes,

Full on his beaming countenance, arose.

Sent by J. C. ANTLIFF.

THE SABBATH SCHOOL.

ON THE HISTORIC CHARACTER OF THE BOOKS OF MOSES.

IN A LETTER TO A TEACHER OF A BIBLE CLASS.

You tell me, my dear W., that you have been troubled in your class by inquiries that arise from the book on the Pentateuch, which is now occasioning a little stir, having been talked of in their hearing. The book does not contain much to trouble those who have thought a little on the subject on which it treats—it need not trouble you ; it is, however, as you say, very desirable that if you refer to the subject at all, you should say what may prove a correct reply to the questions arising, and may guard your class against the scepticism and unbelief which the book is adapted to awaken and foster. I readily, therefore, comply with your request, and offer, if not a reply to the book, such observations as may afford you help in the endeavours you deem yourself called upon to make towards checking its mischievous tendency.

The objections which the book urges against the historic character, in other words against the truth, of the records contained in the five books usually attributed to Moses, range over a very narrow and exclusive field. Many of the circumstances in the Pentateuch are, it is said, improbable, some of them impossible. This seems to be the chief allegation which the book in question makes and repeats. Of course, the objection would be sufficient if it were true. Would it not, however, be wiser and more satisfactory to inquiring minds to get a little beyond the supposed probability or possibility of these circumstances ? The books which state these circumstances are here. They have been in existence from a time far beyond that to which any other history can be traced. The people of whose origin and early annals they give the account are with us ; still presenting the same peculiarities in all that is possible in their dispersed condition, which distinguished them from the first : and among their most cherished traditions, they maintain the most vivid remembrance of the peculiarities which are not now possible to them, and they still nurse a very strong affection for these peculiarities. How can this people be all that thus distinguishes them, if the Mosaic record is to be given up as untrue ? Take, for example, their religious observances. The expense those observances involve ; the self-denial they impose ; their consistency, and their universal and long-continued prevalence, make it impossible to assign them to the freaks of an early superstition, or the influence of a gorgeous fiction. These observances were what they are now more than eighteen centuries ago. They were not new then. Ages before had been familiar with them.

The historic character of the Books of Moses seems to be involved in these observances and traditions. Those books give at least a probable account of the origin to which, severally, these observances are to be attributed. The account is consistent. It has about it, to say the least, a great deal of verisimilitude ; and the facts or fictions which it records, are of a kind which could not be invented after the race it speaks of had become a separate people.

Considerations of this kind may not be regarded as sufficient to invalidate objections to the historic character of books full of fiction and fable ; they are, however, worthy of some attention, in relation to a book which has so long and so widely been taken as a veritable history. You, at all events, may urge them. If the Mosaic record be not historic, how can we explain and account for the belief, and the practices which unquestionably have prevailed among the Jews for ages, the suppression of which has baffled all the efforts both of ridicule and persecution ?

If you attempt to meet the objections urged, you must take care that you do not concede too much. For example—It is said that six hundred thousand strong men, or men in the vigour of life, as the expression translated able to go forth to war, Num. i. 45, may mean, with the much larger multitude implied in that number of fighting men, together with their flocks and herds, could not, within the brief period indicated in Exodus xiii. have been collected at any one place within the district of Egypt where they lived, so as to set forth on their march not even leaving one of their number behind. To this, some have replied, that the Hebrew mode of writing numbers was specially liable to error in the numerous transcriptions of the text, ere it can have come to us. It has been said, "We need not suppose so large a number to have left Egypt." I heard it somewhat adventurously added the other day, "Reduce the six hundred thousand to six thousand : my faith in the historic character of the writings of Moses is not thereby shaken."

I should tremble for the effect of your thus replying to the objection. There is force certainly, very much force, in the suggestion of a special liability to error in transcribing Hebrew numbers. A few examples will make this plain. ך Gimel, the third letter of the alphabet, represents 3. ן Nun, a letter very much resembling Gimel in form, represents 50. ך Daleth, represents 4. ך Resch, greatly like it, represents 200. ך He, stands for 5. ך Cheth, almost the same, for 8. ך Vau, represents 6. ך Zain, easily mistaken for a Vau, represents 7. Hundreds, thousands, &c., are indicated by slight marks over certain letters resembling the accents which in our spelling books and dictionaries mark particular syllables. Thus, ך the number 6 above, might become 600 or 6,000, &c., according to the number of these slight marks. Everybody will see that such a mode of notation is exceedingly open to mistake, especially with mere mechanical and ignorant copyers.

But whatever force there may be in this consideration, the numbers in the Pentateuch are often written in words at length ; they are for the most part consistent throughout ; and since they agree generally with what are found in the Samaritan and Septuagint versions, they must have been in existence as we have them when those versions were made. A reduction of numbers in one case, moreover, will involve the necessity of a similar reduction in other cases ; so that if one difficulty be met, another is created. Six thousand men able to go forth to war, instead of six hundred thousand, will bring the whole number of the Israelites so low as to awaken questions in reference to such promises as those in Gen. xiii. 16, xxxiii. 12.

You may more effectively deal with the objection by requiring that he who urges it, should be certain of his facts, or supposed facts. He alleges that a notice given to upwards of two millions of people (for that no doubt was the number of the Israelites) inhabiting an extended district, could not have collected them with all their possessions at Rameses between the morning and evening of one day, so that they should be ready by the next day-dawn to set forth on the march to Succoth ; and farther, as it seems to be reported they did set forth. Very well. In what part of the history does Moses record what the objector has supposed ? The people must have been anticipating their departure from Egypt from the date of the first of the ten plagues, which humbled the haughty monarch's heart. The contest between that monarch and Moses lasted, for aught that appears in the history, for weeks, perhaps for months. The immediate preparation for setting out, certainly does not date later than the intimations given to Moses of the last and most terrible plague. The history knows nothing of a notice given to two millions of people living over an extended district, in a morning, of their assembling by the same evening at Rameses, celebrating their passover, and being driven out of the land, with their old and their young, their flocks and their herds, and all their moveables, before dawn next morning. If, in the argument that may be found needful, you are not to assume anything, neither may the objector. Ground must be made good as you proceed. Objections are worth nothing if they rest on mere suppositions, and obviously the objection from the time between the notice, (Exodus xi. 45) and the event, (Exodus xii. 30, 39) has nothing better than supposition to sustain it.

The number of the Israelites escaping from Egypt, according to the narrative, furnishes other objections; and among them the two following are mentioned in your note. How could nearly two millions and a half of people of all ages, with large flocks, herds, and other property, pass through the Red Sea in one night; the thousands able to go forth to war, harnessed, or, as the margin of our Bibles indicates that word may be rendered, by five abreast?.. How, moreover, could so vast a multitude be gathered and addressed at the door of the Tabernacle, a space within which not twenty thousand, to say nothing of two millions, could stand?

In answering the first of these questions, you might feel yourself entitled to fall back upon the miraculous character of the whole passage of the Red Sea: but probably this may not be held to furnish a sufficient reply. Take care, then, I repeat, against the objector's assuming more than appears in the record. Where does he find that the passage through the Red Sea was effected in one night? The expressions Exodus xiv. 13, 14, certainly do not affirm this. I do not say that the passage was not effected in one night. I am not told in the narrative how long it occupied; so that on that point, I say nothing. But he who says the narrative is untrustworthy, because so rapid a passage is impossible, must show chapter and verse for this alleged rapidity.

The second question scarcely deserves a reply. Everybody knows that the meeting of a people's representatives is called, in common language, the meeting of the people. What is said to these representatives, is said to all. The people of Birmingham met the other day to take proceedings in relation to the distress in Lancashire,—and those proceedings are described as the proceedings of the people of that flourishing town in relation to the matter brought forward. Who will think a hundred years hence of objecting to a narrative of what was done, that it cannot be historically true because the Town Hall was not large enough to contain a twentieth-part of the people of Birmingham? Royal proclamations, address in certain cases all Her Majesty's loyal subjects; who will dream of those subjects, all and every of them, having assembled at Westminster or Windsor, because it shall be written in some future record that the Queen addressed the whole body of her people?

The sojourn in the wilderness for so many years is spoken of as requiring for the ritual prescribed to the people, flocks and herds utterly beyond the capacity of the "wilderness," even in its most fertile districts, to sustain. Whence, it is asked, were the myriads of passover lambs, and lambs for daily sacrifice obtained? and how were they supported year after year? You may with great propriety meet this inquiry with another. Where does it appear that the Israelites kept the passover, and offered their morning and evening lambs during the wilderness sojourn? I do not say that they did not, but from several circumstances in the narrative, their having done so seems to me very improbable. I might insist on the circumstance, so frequently repeated in the precepts of the ritual, that the thing to be done is expressly required for the time when they should have come to the land which the Lord should give them. I might quote from the ritual itself obvious indications that it was intended rather for a settled abode than for desert wanderings, see Exodus xxi. 5, 6; xxii. 5, 6; Leviticus xxiii. 9—14. Instead however of dwelling on these particulars, I would rather trace the epochs, if they may be so called, of the wilderness sojourn.

Within less than two years after the people had left Egypt, their whole ritual was prescribed. This covers the narrative from Exodus xv. to Numbers xii. Numbers xiii and xiv., contain the account of the spies sent to search out the land; their report; the disobedience of the people; and the sentence to the long wanderings by which that disobedience was punished. Precepts are added in Numbers xv. which, as appears from verse 2, and other parts of the chapter, were intended to guide the people when they should be come to the land of their habitations. Between these precepts and chapter xvi., a gap occurs in the history, of eighteen years or more, during which, either as to the ritual which had been but recently completed, or as to anything else, we know positively nothing. Numbers xvi. and xvii. contain an account of certain events which issued in the firmer establishment of the impugned authority of Moses and Aaron in their respective offices, together with certain directions in chapters xviii. and xix., some of which one would imagine would scarcely have been deemed necessary if the ritual had been observed during the gap which has been mentioned.

Before the events of the next chapter, another gap of about twenty years occurs. The people were soon to enter upon their promised inheritance, Aaron dies, and is succeeded by Eleazar. The wars and victories begin, which were to give the people their land, and again ritual precepts are given, which one would imagine, would not have been required if the observances prescribed during the second year after the escape from Egypt had been kept up among the people through the thirty-eight years that had rolled over. All that remains of the Pentateuch to the end of Deuteronomy, is a repetition of laws and ordinances designed to prevent the people's forgetting what had been commanded them; but how could such forgetting have been possible if the services intended for their settled home had been maintained during their long march thither? Commands which could be observed in the wilderness, doubtless were observed. The passover, Deuteronomy xvi., the daily offerings, Numbers xxviii., and other matters of a similar kind, did not come within this class of services; so that the question about the myriads of passover lambs required, and lambs for the daily sacrifices, falls to the ground.

I observe one point more in your note. It has been said, could the seventy souls mentioned as going down to Egypt with Jacob, have become nearly two millions and a half during the abode of his descendants in that land? Here again, you are entitled to meet the question with another. Is the objector sure that seventy souls comprised the whole of those who migrated from Canaan as parts of Jacob's family? We may not forget two facts in the preceding history: 1, Abraham, before he had even a single son, could muster from his own household three hundred and eighteen men able to go forth to war; 2, Jacob as he returned from Padan-Aram, had a family which he divided into two bands when he had eleven sons and one daughter. Had his family decreased in proportion when his sons and grandsons had reached to seventy in number? Many of these seventy were married; others would marry ere long after they reached Egypt. As polygamy had been practised by their ancestors, it is probable that many of them would have several wives. It is moreover matter of historical fact, that population increased much more in Egypt than with us. More than one child at a birth was common; as many as five have been mentioned, and that in four successive births. The enslaved and poor condition of the Israelites, would contribute to the rapidity of their increase. But beyond all this, it was specially promised that they should multiply very largely. Divine Providence in accomplishing this promise, would render births among them more numerous, and deaths fewer, than with other people. Instances have not been wanting of increase proportionately as great, in cases where there was no promise, and no provision like what the Israelites had in favour of their increase. "We refer the reader," says a modern commentator on the Book of Exodus, chapter xii. 37, "to the authentic and interesting account concerning the Englishman, who was, in the year 1589, by a shipwreck, thrown with four families upon a deserted island, south-east of the Cape of Good Hope, and whose descendants had, after 78 years, in 1667, increased to more than 11,000 souls." Other illustrations may be found in the "History of the Mutiny of the Bounty," and the condition of its crew and their descendants on Pitcairn's Island; and also in Doubleday's "True law of Population," pp., 61, 62.

With these facts and illustrations, we cannot permit the historic character of the Books of Moses to be impugned on account of what they contain as to the large increase of the Israelites during the two hundred and fifteen years of their abode in Egypt.

These then are a few suggestions, which in reply to your note I venture to offer as to how you are to deal in your class with the difficulties which just now are crossing your path. I offer them the more readily, because in the course of the present year your "List of Lessons" will bring these subjects before you. But after all it must be chiefly borne in mind that the great argument for the historic character of the writings of Moses lies in Christ's having again and again recognized this character, and attested the veracity of the old law-giver and historian, who was faithful in all matters pertaining to God's family: Hebrews iii. 3. Give Moses up, and you must give up Christ. Surrender the Pentateuch, and you render worthless every other part of Holy Scripture; and when this is done, what of religion is there left to elevate the affections, to enlighten the understanding, to enkindle and sustain hope, or to sanctify and ennoble human character?

S.

---

MISCELLANIES.

---

SOME FEATURES OF THE ROYAL MARRIAGE.

ROYAL weddings are common in our island home. In about the brief period of six years we have celebrated not fewer than three such events in connection with our royal house. The commonness of their occurrence, however, does not, as in most other events which transpire in society, detract from their prestige and popularity. The marriage of the beloved Princess Alice was properly of a private character, owing to the recent decease of her august and royal father; and it thereby greatly escaped public enthusiasm. Not so the marriages of their Royal Highnesses the Princess Royal and the Prince of Wales. The latter event was intensely popular—the most popular of all the royal marriages which have ever preceded it in this country. An eminent writer on the great event says, "We have seen many pageants in our time, and some of them truly grand ones—kings crowned and emperors buried; but we can frankly declare that we never witnessed one more truly magnificent, in every sense of the word, than that which took place on the marriage of the Prince of Wales to the Princess Alexandra of Denmark." It not for us to analyse motives, or to enquire how much of this was due to our traditional hospitality, how much to our fresh admiration of a constitutional monarchy through the present American war, how much to love for the Sovereign and her eldest son, how much to the interest which the adoption of a young, beautiful, and virtuous princess as a daughter of our royal house, would necessarily create. It is sufficient that the feeling was there, and that its exhibition rendered the event the most auspicious and unique royal ovation in our national history. Never during the five centuries since the first Prince of Wales was created has the marriage of a Prince of Wales been received with so much popular and general favour and enthusiasm—an honour of which his Royal Highness the present Prince of Wales may be proud; and with which, in its reflective character, his royal mother may feel a proud satisfaction. What a powerful evidence of the oneness of the crown and the people.

